THE MOST SACRED MAJESTY

OF

CHARLES II.

KING of GREAT BRITAINE,

FRANCE and IRELAND,

Defender of the Faith, &c.

Great Sir,

THE circles of the Divine Providence turn themſelves upon the affairs of the world ſo, that every ſpondel of the wheels may mark out thoſe Vertues which we are then to exerciſe; and every new event in the Oeconomy of God is God's finger to point out to us by what inſtances he will be ſerved. We have been ſorely ſmitten and for a long time; for (that I may uſe the words of the Prophet) Alas, for that day was great, ſo that none was like it, it was even the time of Jacob's trouble; and then, Faith and Patience, and all the paſſive Graces of Religion were in their own ſeaſon. But ſince God hath left off to ſmite us with an iron rod, and hath once more ſaid unto theſe Nations, They ſhall ſerve the Jer. 30. 7, 8.

Lord their God, and David their King whom I have raiſed up unto them; Now our duty ſtands on the Sunny ſide; it is our work to rejoice in God and in God's Anointed, and to be glad, and worthily to accept of our Proſperity is all our buſineſs: for ſo good a God we ſerve, that he hath made it our Duty to be happy, and we cannot pleaſe him unleſs we be infinitely pleaſed our ſelves. It was impoſſible to live without our King; but as Slaves live, that is, ſuch who are civilly dead, and perſons condemn'd to metalls: we lived to the luſts and inſolency of others, but not at all to our ſelves, to our own Civil or Religious comforts. But now our joys are mere and unmixt; for that we may doe our duty and have our reward at once, God hath ſent your Majeſty amongſt us, that we may feel the pleaſures of Obedience, and reap the fruits of that Government which God loves and uſes, which He hath conſtituted and adorned, which He hath reſtored to us by a conjugation of miracles, by the work of his hand and the light of his countenance, by changing the hearts of Men, and ſcattering the people that delight in War, by infatuating their Counſels and breaking their Cords aſunder; that is, which He himſelf hath wrought amongſt us by himſelf alone, and therefore will bleſs and will never interrupt: only we muſt be carefull never to provoke him any more by our Unthankfulneſs and infidel Apoſtaſie.

But now, Great Sir, be pleas'd to give me leave in the throngs of thoſe that rejoice to ſee the goodneſs of God to his ſervant Job, in imitation of them who preſented him with, every man, an ear-ring of Gold, and a piece of Silver, or a Lambe, to bring alſo my Offering, the ſignification of my joy. For though it be but two Books which like* like the Widows two mites make up but a contempti-ble Summe; yet becauſe it is all I have, your Majeſty may be pleaſed to accept: and ſo much the rather, becauſe it is alſo an expreſſion of that part of the duty of my Calling which hath fallen to my ſhare. For your Majeſty, like the King in the Goſpel, hath been in a far Country, and ſome of your Citizens ſent after you, and ſaid, Nolumus hunc regnare; Luke 19. 14. but God hath cauſed you to return and reign: and if your Majeſty ſhould by that example call us to render an account of our Talents, I can only ſay, that amongſt thoſe many Excellent perſons who have greatly improv'd theirs, I was willing to negotiate and to labour. What fruit will from hence accrue to Souls is wholly in the hands of God: but this ſemination and culture was much wanting in the Reformed Churches. For though in all things elſe the Goodneſs of God hath made us to abound, and our Cup to run over; yet our labours have been hitherto unimploied in the deſcription of the Rules of Conſcience and Caſuiſtical Theology. In which becauſe I have now made ſome attempt, if the production be not unworthy, I am ſure it is not improper to lay it at the feet of your Majeſty. For your Majeſty being by God appointed Cuſtos utriuſque Tabulæ, ſince like Moſes you are from God deſcended to us with the two Tables of the Law in your hand, and that you will beſt govern by the arguments and compulſory of Conſcience, and this alone is the greateſt firmament of Obedience; whatſoever can be the meaſure of Conſcience eſt res Fiſci, is part of your own propriety, and enters into your Exchequer.

Be pleaſed therefore, Gracious Sir, to accept this inſtance of my duty to God, to your Majeſty, and to your

THE PREFACE.

THE Reformation of Religion in the Weſtern Churches hath been ſo violently, ſo laboriouſly, ſo univerſally oppos'd by Evil Spirits and Evil Men, by willfulneſs and ignorance, by prejudice and intereſt, by error and partiality; and it ſelf alſo hath been done ſo imperfectly in ſome places, and ſo unskilfully in ſome others, becauſe the thick and long-incumbent darkneſs had made it impoſſible to behold the whole Light in all its ſplendour; that it was found to be work enough for the Miniſters of Religion to convince the Gainſayers, to oppoſe their witty arts by the advantageous repreſentment of wiſe truths, ſo to keep the people from their temptations. But ſince there were not found many able to doe this but ſuch which had other cures to attend, the conduct of ſouls in their publick and private charges, and the conſequent neceſſity of preaching and catechiſing, viſiting the ſick, and their publick daily offices; it was the leſs wonder that in the Reformed Churches there hath been ſo great a ſcarcity of Books of Caſes of Conſcience: though it is not to be denied but the careleſs and needleſs neglect of receiving private Confeſſions hath been too great a cauſe of our not providing materials apt for ſo pious and uſeful a miniſtration. But beſides this, it is certain that there was a neceſſity of labouring to other purpoſes then formerly: and this neceſſity was preſent and urgent; and the hearts and heads of men ran to quench that fire, & left the government of the houſe more looſely, till they could diſcern whether the houſe would be burnt or no by the flames of contention which then brake out: only this duty was ſupplied by excellent preachings, by private conferences, by admonitions and anſwers given when ſome more pious and religious perſons came to Confeſſions, and as they were upon particular occaſions requir'd and invited. But for any publick proviſions of books of Caſuiſtical Theology, we were almoſt wholly unprovided, and, like the children of Iſrael in the days of Saul and Jonathan, we were forc'd to go down to the forges of the Philiſtims to ſharpen every man his Share and his Coulter, his Axe and his Mattock. We had Swords and Spears of our own, enough for defence, and more then enough for diſputation: but in this more neceſſary part of the Conduct of Conſciences we did receive our anſwers from abroad, till we found that our old needs were ſometimes very ill ſupplied, and new neceſſities did every day ariſe.

Some of the Lutherans have indeed done ſomething in this kind which is well; Balduinus, Bidenbachius, Dedekanus, Konig, and the Abbreviator of Gerard: Some eſſays alſo have been made by others; Alſtedius, Ameſius, Perkins, and the late Eloquent and Reverend Biſhop of Norwich. But yet our needs remain; and we cannot be well ſupplied out of the Roman ſtore-houſes: for though there the ſtaple is, and very many excellent things expos'd to view; yet we have found the Merchants to be deceivers, and the wares too often falſified.

For 1. if we conſider what heaps of prodigious propoſitions and rules of Conſcience their Doctors have given us, we ſhall ſoon perceive that there are ſo many boxes of poiſon in their Repoſitories under the ſame paintings and ſpecious titles, that as it will be impoſſible for every man to diſtinguiſh their miniſteries of health from the methods of death; ſo it will be unſafe for any man to venture indiſcriminately. For who can ſafely truſt that guide that teaches him, [" [a]That it is no deadly ſin to ſteal, or privately " againſt his will and without his knowledge to take a thing from " him who is ready to give it if he were ask'd, but will not endure " to have it taken without asking; That it is no theft * privately to take a thing that is not great from our Father; [b] That he " who ſees an innocent puniſh'd for what himſelf hath done, he in " the mean time who did it, holding his peace, is not bound to " reſtitution; [c]That he who falls into fornication, if he goes to " confeſſion, may the ſame day in which he did fornicate receive " the Communion; That Communion is Manducation, and " therefore requires not attention; That he who being in deadly " ſin receives the H. Communion commits but one ſin, viz. that " againſt the dignity of the Sacrament; and that the omiſſion of " confeſſion is no diſtinct ſin, meaning, amongſt them who be- " lieve confeſſion to be of Divine inſtitution?] As bad or worſe are thoſe affirmatives and doctrines of repentance. [A dying man " is not tied to be contrite for his ſins; but confeſſion and attriti- " on are ſufficient:] and that we may know what is meant by attrition, we are told [" it is a ſorrow for temporal evil, diſgrace or loſs of " health, ſent by God as a puniſhment, or feared to be ſent;] this alone is enough for Salvation, if the dying man do but confeſs to the Prieſt, Prieſt, though he have liv'd wickedly all his life-time. And that we need not think the matter of confeſsion to be too great a burden, we are told, [" He that examines his Conſcience before " confeſsion, ſins if he be too diligent and carefull.] But as for " the precept of having a contrite and a broken heart [It binds " not but in the article or danger of death: nor then, but when " we cannot have the Sacrament of penance.] To theſe may be added thoſe contradictions of ſeverity for the ſecuring of a holy life: that [" If a man purpoſe at the preſent to ſin no more, " though at the ſame time he believes he ſhall ſin again, (that is, " that he will break his purpoſe,) yet that purpoſe is good enough: " That it is not very certain whether he that hath attrition does re- " ceive grace, though he does not formally reſolve to ſin no more:] meaning, that it is probable, that it is not neceſſary to make any ſuch reſolution of leaving their ſin; they are not certain it is ſo, nor certain that it is otherwiſe; that is, they find no Commandment for theſe things: It may be they are counſell'd and advis'd in Scripture, but that is no great matter; for [" It is no ſin " not to correſpond with the Divine inſpirations exhorting us to " Counſels.] Adde to theſe, that [" To detract from our Neigh- " bours fame before a conſciencious, ſilent and a good Man, is no " deadly ſin: To diſpenſe with our vows in a year of Jubile is valid, " though the condition of obtaining that Jubilee be not perform- ed.] Thus men amongſt them have leave to ſin, and they may live in it as long as their life laſts without repentance; and that repentance in the ſum of affairs is nothing but to call to the Prieſt to abſolve them; provided you be ſorrowfull for the evil you feel or fear God will ſend on you: but contrition, or ſorrow proceeding from the love of God is not at all neceſſary; [" neither is " it neceſſary that our ſorrow be thought to be contrition; nei- " ther is it neceſſary that attrition ſhould goe before confeſsion, " but will ſerve if it be ſome time after; and if you confeſs none " but venial ſins, it is ſufficient if you be ſorrowfull for one of " them; and the caſe is the ſame for mortal ſins formerly con- " feſſed.] But I am aſhamed of this heap of ſad ſtories: If I ſhould amaſs together what themſelves have collected in their books, it would look like a libel: but who is pleaſed with variety of ſuch ſores may enter into the Hoſpitals themſelves, and walk and look til he be weary.

2. But not only with the evil matter of their propoſitions; but we have reaſon to be offended with the ſtrange manner of their anſwerings. I ſhall not need to inſtance in that kind of argument which is but too frequent among thoſe who prevail more by their authority then their reaſon, of proving propoſitions by ſimilitudes and analogies. I remember that Gregory Sayr ſaies that all the Precepts of the Moral Law are to be reduc'd to the Decalogue; becauſe as all natural things are reduc'd to ten Prædiments, ſo it is expedient that all kinds of vertues & vice be reduc'd to the ten Commandments. And Beſſæus infers ſeven Sacraments from the number of the Planets, and the ſeven ears of full corn in Egypt, & ſeven water-pots changed into wine (though there were but ſix,) becauſe as the wine fill'd ſix water-pots, ſo the Sacrament of the Euchariſt fills the other ſix, and it ſelf makes the ſeventh; and that therefore peradventure the Sacraments are called Veſſels of grace. But this I look upon as a want of better arguments in a weak cauſe, manag'd by careleſs and confident perſons; and note it only as a fault, that the Guides of Conſciences ſhould ſpeak many things when they can prove but few.

Clavis Regia, l. 4. c. 2. n. 5.

3. That which I ſuppoſe to be of greateſt Conſideration is, that the Caſuiſts of the Roman Church take theſe things for reſolution and anſwer to queſtions of Conſcience which are ſpoken by an authority that is not ſufficient; and they admit of Canons, and the Epiſtles of Popes for authentick warranties, which are ſuſpicious whether ever they were written by them to whoſe authority only they do pretend; and they quote ſayings of the old Doctors, which are contradicted by others of equal learning and reputation, and all cited in their own Canon Law; and have not any ſufficient means to aſcertain themſelves what is binding in very many caſes argued in their Canons, and Decretal epiſtles, and Bulls of Popes. Nay they muſt needs be at a loſs in their conduct of Conſciences, eſpecially in all inquiries and articles of faith, when they chuſe ſuch foundations, which themſelves know to be weak and tottering; and yet lay the greateſt load upon ſuch foundations, and tie the Conſcience with the hardeſt ligature, where it is certain they can give no ſecurity. For it is not agreed in the Church of Rome, neither can they tell upon whoſe authority they may finally rely: they cannot tell who is the viſible Head of the Church: for they are not ſure the Pope is; becauſe a Council may be ſuperior to him, and whether it be or no it is not reſolved: And therefore either they muſt change their Principle, and rely only upon Scriptures and right Reaſon and Univerſal Teſtimonies, or give no anſwer to the Conſcience in very many caſes of the greateſt concernment; for by all other meaſures their queſtions are indeterminable. But the authority of man

they make to be their foundation: and yet if their allegations were allowed to be good argument, it would ſerve them but to very few purpoſes, ſince the Doctors, whoſe affirmative is the deciſion of the Caſe, are ſo infinitely divided.

4. This to me, and to very many wiſe men, looks like a very great Objection: but I find that they who are moſt concerned in it account it none; For the Roman Caſuiſts profeſs it, and yet do not ſuppoſe that the Conſequent of this ſhould be, that the caſe is difficult, and the men not to be relied upon, and the Conſcience to be otherwiſe informed, and that we ought to walk the more warily, but therefore the Conſcience is at liberty, and the queſtion in order to practice hath no difficulty; hard in the caſe, but eaſie in the action; for by this means they entertain all intereſts, and comply with all perſwaſions, and ſend none away Unſatisfied. For Uncertain anſwers make with them no Uncertain reſolution; for they teach us, that in ſuch caſes we may follow either part: and therefore they ſtudiouſly keep up this Academical or rather Sceptick Theology, Alii aiunt, alii negant; utrumque probabile. And upon this account, although with greateſt ſeverity they bind on mens perſwaſions the doctrines of meats and carnal ordinances, yet they have left them looſe enough when it comes to the Conſcience, ſo looſe that the precept is become ridiculous: for what can it be otherwiſe, when they teach, that "the Faſt is not broken by drinking of water or "wine, nay though we eate ſomething that our drink may not "hurt us; nor the uſual collation at night if it be taken in the "morning; nor if the Butler or the Cook lick his fingers; nor if "we eat egs or milk-meats, ſo it be not in the holy time of Lent; "nor if after dinner awhile you eate ſomething at the entreaty "of a friend; nor if you upon a reaſonable cauſe eate before "your time? in all theſe caſes you eat and faſt at the ſame time. All theſe things are derivatives from the contrary opinions of ſome eaſy, gentle Doctors; and the effect of this ſtratagem is ſeen in things of greater conſequence. For [We are free from our vow, or from a Commandement, if it be a probable opinion of the Doctors that we are free;] and [it is probable, if it be the opinion of one grave Doctor:] That is, in effect, plainly, If it be probable [in the doctrine,] it is certain [in practice;] and it is probable if any one of their Doctors ſays it.

5. And the miſchief of this is further yet diſcernible, if we conſider that they determine their greateſt and moſt Myſterious caſes oftentimes by no other argument but the ſaying of ſome few of their Writers. I ſhall give but one inſtance of it; but it ſhall be ſomething remarkable. The queſtion was, Whether the Pope can diſpenſe in the law of God? The inquiry is not concerning a diſh of whey, but of a conſiderable affair; upon which the right or the wrong of many thouſand Conſciences amongſt them do depend. It is anſwered [" That one opinion of the Catholicks " ſays, that the Pope can diſpenſe in all things of the Law of God, " excepting the articles of faith.] The proof is this, So Panormi- " tan ſpeaks, in cap. propoſuit, de conceſs. præbend. n. 20. citing Inno- " centius in cap. cum ad Monaſterium, de ſtatu Monachorum; where he " ſaies, that without cauſe the Pope cannot diſpenſe in things of " Divine right; intimating that with cauſe he may. And the " ſame is the opinion of Felinus in cap. Quæ in Eccleſ. de conſt. " n. 19, & 20. where amongſt other things he ſaith, that the Pope " when he hath cauſe can change the uſual form of baptiſme, " and make it lawfull to baptize in the Name of the Trinity, " which he reports out of Innocentius cap. 1. de baptiſ. in fine num. " 11. Yea the ſame Felinus is bold to affirm in cap. 1. de conſt. n. 23. " that the Pope with one word can create a Prieſt, without any " other ſolemnity, ſaying, Be thou a Prieſt; which he reports out " of Innocentius in cap. 1. Sacra Unct. The ſame Felinus adds further " that the Pope with his word alone can make a Biſhop; and he " cites Angelus in l. 2. C. de crim. Sacrilegii; & in l. 1. C. de Sententiam " paſsis. The ſame ſentence is held by Decius, conſil. 112. n 3. in fine; " & in dict. cap. Quæ in Eccleſ. n. 25. & ſeq. aliàs n. 44, & 45. in Novis. " Allegantur etiam alii Juriſtæ in cap. 2. de tranſlat. Epiſcopi; & in l. " Manumiſsiones. ff. de juſt. & jure; & in l. 2. C. de ſervit. &c.

Suarez. lib. 10. de leg. cap. 6. n. 3.

Here is a rare way of probation: for theſe allegations are not only a teſtimonial that theſe Catholick authors are of that opinion; but it is intended to repreſent, that this opinion is not againſt the Catholick faith; that Popes and great Lawyers are of it; and therefore that it is ſafe, & it may be followed, or be let alone: but yet this is ſufficient to determine the doubting Conſcience of a ſubject, or to be propounded to him as that on which he may with ſecurity and indemnity rely. The thing is affirm'd by Felinus, and for this he quotes Innocentius; and the ſame is the opinion of Decius, and for this opinion divers other Lawyers are alleged. Now when this or the like happens to be in a queſtion of ſo great Concernment as this, it is ſuch a dry ſtory, ſuch an improbable proof, ſo unſatisfying an anſwer to the Conſcience, that the great determination of all thoſe queſtions and practices which can depend upon ſo Univerſall an article as this, and a warranty to doe actions which their adverſaries ſay are abhorrent from the law of Nature and common honeſty, ſhall in their finall reſort reſt upon the ſaying of one or two perſons, who having boldly ſpoken a fooliſh thing, have paſſed without condemnation by thoſe Superiors for whoſe intereſt they have been bold to tell ſo great a lie.

In Concluſion, the effect of theſe Uncertain principles and Unſteady Conduct of queſtions is this; that though by violence and force they have conſtrain'd and thruſt their Churches into an Union of faith, like beaſts into a pound, yet they have made their caſes of Conſcience and the actions of their lives Unſtable as the face of the Waters, and Unmeaſurable as the dimenſions of the Moon: by which means their Confeſſors ſhall be enabled to anſwer according to every mans humor, and no man ſhall depart ſad from their Penitential chairs, and themſelves ſhall take or give leave to any thing: concerning which I refer the Reader to the books and letters written by their parties of Port-royal, and to their own weak anſwers and vindications.

If I were willing by accuſing others to get reputation to my own, or the Undertakings of any of our perſwaſion or communion, I could give very many inſtances of their Unjuſtice and partialities in determining matters and queſtions of juſtice which concern the Church and their Eccleſiaſtical perſons; as if what was juſt amongſt the reprobates of the laity were hard meaſure if done to an Eccleſiaſtick, and that there were two ſorts of juſtice, the one for Seculars & the other for Church-men; of which their own books * give but too many inſtances. I could alſo remark that the Monks and Friers are iniquiores in Matrimonium, and make inquiries into Matrimonial cauſes with an impure curioſity, and make anſwers ſometimes with ſpite and envy, ſometimes with licentiouſneſſe; that their diſtinction of Sins Mortal and Venial hath intricated and confounded almoſt all the Certainty & anſwers of Moral Theology: but nothing of this is fitted to my intention, which is only to make it evident that it was neceſſary that Caſes of Conſcience ſhould be written over anew, and eſtabliſhed upon better principles, and proceed in more ſober and ſatisfying methods: nothing being more requiſite then that we ſhould all be inſtructed, and throughly prepared to every good work; that we ſhould have a conſcience void of offence both towards God and towards man; that we ſhould be able to ſeparate the vile from the precious, and know what to chuſe and what to avoid; that we may have our ſenſes exerciſed to diſcern between good and evil, that we may not call good evil, or evil good. For ſince obedience is the love of God, and to doe well is the life of religion, and the end of faith is the death of ſin and the life of righteouſneſſe; nothing is more neceſſary then that we be rightly informed in all morall notices; becauſe in theſe things an Error leads on to evil actions, to the choice of ſin, and the expreſſe diſpleaſure of God; otherwiſe then it happens in ſpeculation and ineffective notices and ſchoole-queſtions.

And indeed upon this conſideration I was alwaies confident, that though the queſtions of the Schoole were nice and ſubtle, difficult and very often good for nothing; yet that in Moral Theology I ſhould have found ſo perfect an accord, ſo eaſie determination of queſtions, that it would have been harder to find out queſtions then anſwers; and the great difficulty in books of this ſubject would be to put the great number of inquiries into order and method. I was not deceived in the ground & reaſon of my conjecture; becauſe I knew that in promptu & facili eſt æternitas, God had made the way to heaven plain and ſimple, and what was neceſſary did ly open, and the lines of duty were to be read by every eye, or heard and learn'd by all underſtandings; and therefore it is certain that all practical truths are to be found out without much contention and diſpute, becauſe Juſtice and obedience to God in all morall converſation is Natural to us, juſt as Logick and diſcourſe is. But when I came to look a little nearer, I found that Men were willing enough to be tied up to believe the Unactive propoſitions of the Doctors, but would keep a liberty of pleaſing themſelves in matters of life and converſation: in the former they would eaſily be govern'd by leading Men; but in the latter they would not obey God himſelf, and without great regret would not be confin'd to ſtrictneſſe and ſeverity in their Caſes of Conſcience. Some would; but many would not. They that would, gave laws unto themſelves, and they could eaſily be Governed; but they that would not, were ready to trample upon their yoke, if it were made gentle and eaſie for their neck. But this was the leaſt part of the evil.

For beſides this, Moral Theology was made a trade for the houſe, and an art of the Schools: and as nothing is more eaſie then Natural Logick, and yet nothing harder then Sophiſtical, ſo it is in Moral Theology; what God had made plain, Men have intricated; and the eaſie Commandement is wrapped up in uneaſie learning; and by the new methods, a Simple and Uncrafty Man cannot be wiſe unto ſalvation; which is but ſmall comfort to him that ſtands in the place of the Idiot and Unlearned. Sometimes a ſevere Commandement is expounded by the ſenſe of eaſe and liberty, and the liberty is eſtabliſhed in Rule; but becauſe the Rule is not true in ſome hundreds of caſes, a conſcientious Man does not know how to make uſe of it: and if the Commandement be kept cloſe to the ſenſe of ſtrictneſſe and ſeverity, there are ſo many outlets and eſcapes found out, that few men think themſelves obliged. * Thus in the Rule [Spoliatum ante omnia reſtituendum] which is an excellent meaſure of Conſcience in many caſes, and certainly can have no direct abatement in the duty, and the party obliged can only be relieved by equity in the manner of doing it; yet of this plain and eaſie Rule, Gabrielius brings no leſſe then threeſcore and ten limitations: and to make all queſtions of that Nature and the Rule of Conſcience infinite and indeterminable, Menochius hath ſeven hundred ninety and eight queſtions concerning Poſſeſſion; and who is ſufficient for theſe things? * There is a Rule amongſt the Lawyers which very much relates to the Conſcience of thoſe men who are engaged in ſuits and ſentences of Law in all Countries which are rul'd by the Civil law, In quolibet actu requiritur citatio. Of this Rule Porcius brings an hundred and ſixteen ampliations, and an hundred and four and twenty limitations. Maranta enumerates forty caſes in which [A Negative ought to be proved:] and Socinus ſets down eight hundred and two fallencies (that's the word of the law) concerning the conteſtation of ſuits and actions at law. Many more might be reckoned even in the interpreters of the Civil law, and in the meaſures we derive from thence. But if any man thinks it better in the Canon law, which is ſuppoſed to be as great a rule of our Conſcience in the matter of Religion as the other is of Juſtice; I ſhall only ſay, that the very title of the Canon law was Concordantia Diſcordantiarum, a tying of contradictions together in one ſtring: and when you begin to look into the interpreters of the Decretum, which is the beſt part of the Canon law, Simoncellus tells us that the word Decretum hath five and twenty ſignifications. So that there is a wood before your doores, and a labyrinth within the wood, and locks and barrs to every door within that labyrinth; and after all we are like to meet with Unskilfull guides; and yet of all things in the world, in theſe things an error is the moſt intolerable.

Tract. de Decretis.

But thus the Enemy of Mankind hath prevailed upon us while we were earneſt in diſputations about things leſs concerning: Then he was watchfull and buſie to interweave evil and uncertain principles into our Moral inſtitutions, to intangle what was plain, plain, to divide what was ſimple, to make an art of what was written in the tables of our hearts with the finger of God. When a Gentleman was commending Dr. Fiſher Biſhop of Rocheſter his great pains in the confutation of Luther's books, the wiſe Prelate ſaid heartily, that he wiſh'd he had ſpent all that time in prayer and meditation which he threw away upon ſuch uſeleſs wranglings. For that was the wiſdom of the Ancients. Antiqua Sapientia nihil aliud quam facienda & vitanda præcepit: Et tunc meliores erant viri. Poſtquam docti prodierunt, boni deſunt. Simplex enim illa & aperta virtus in obſcuram & ſolertem ſcientiam verſa eſt; docemurque diſputare, non vivere. Our fore-Fathers taught their children what to do and what to avoid; and then Men were better. But when Men did ſtrive to become learned, they did not care ſo much to become good; they then were taught to diſpute rather then to live. To this purpoſe I underſtand that excellent ſaying of Solomon, Of making many books there is no end, and much ſtudy is a wearineſs of the fleſh. Let us hear the concluſion of the whole matter. Fear God and keep his Commandements; for this is the whole duty of man. Meaning, that books which ſerve to any other purpoſe are a laborious vanity, conſumptive of our time and health to no purpoſe: nothing elſe being to any purpoſe but ſuch things as teach us to fear God, and how to keep his Commandements. All books, and all learning which miniſters to this end, partakes of the goodneſſe of the end; but that which promotes it not, is not to be regarded: and therefore the Chaldee Paraphraſt reades theſe words into an adviſe of making many books tending to holineſſe. Fili mi, monitus eſto ut facias libros ſapientiæ plurimos, adeò ut non ſit finis; & ut ſtudeas verbis Legis, conſpiciaſque defatigationem carnis. Make books of wiſdom very many, and ſtudy in the words of the Law till thou mayeſt ſee the wearineſſe of thy fleſh. Beata ætas quæ in vita hominum regenda totam diſputandi rationem poſuit, Bleſſed are the times in which men learn to diſpute well that they may live the better. And truly it were much to be wiſhed that men would doe ſo now; endeavouring to teach the waies of Godlineſſe in ſincerity; to ſhew to men the right paths of Salvation; to deſcribe the right and plain meaſures of Simplicity, Chriſtian Charity, Chaſtity, Temperance and Juſtice; to unwind the intanglements of Art, and to ſtrip Moral Theology of all its Viſors; to detract all the falſhoods and hypocriſies of crafty men; to confute all the falſe principles of evil Teachers, who by uncertain and deceitfull grounds teach men to walk confidently upon trapdoors and pit-falls, and preach doctrines ſo dangerous and falſe, falſe, that if their Diſciples ſhould live according to the conſequents of ſuch doctrines, without doubt they muſt periſh everlaſtingly.

It is a great work and too heavy for one mans ſhoulders; but ſome body muſt begin; and yet no man ever would, if he can be affrighted with the conſideration of any difficulty in the world. But I have laid aſide all conſiderations of my ſelf, and with an intire dependence upon God for help, I have begun an inſtitution of Morall Theology, and eſtabliſhed it upon ſuch principles and inſtruments of probation which every man allows, and better then which we have none imparted to us. I affirm nothing but upon grounds of Scripture, or Univerſall Tradition, or right Reaſon diſcernable by every diſintereſt perſon, where the queſtions are of great concern, and can admit theſe probations: Where they cannot, I take the next beſt; the laws of wiſe Commonwealths and the ſayings of wiſe men, the reſults of fame and the Proverbs of the Ancient, the Precedents of holy perſons and the great examples of Saints. πεπαιδευμένε γάρ ἐστιν ἐπὶ τοσοῦτον τ' ἀκριβὲς ἐπιζητεῖν καθ' ἕκαστον γένος, ἐφ' ὅσον ἡ τοῦ πράγματος φύσις ἐπιδέχεται. Ariſt. lib. 1. eth c. 3 ὥσπερ γὰρ φαίνεται μαθηματικοῦ πιθανολογοῦντος ἀποδέχεσθαι, καὶ ῥητορικὸν ἀποδείξεις ἀπαιτεῖν. He that is well inſtructed will require in every kind of argument and diſputation no other proof or ſubtilty then the ſubject matter will bear. For it were ridiculous for a Mathematician to goe about to perſwade with eloquence, or an Orator to pretend to demonſtrations. But Morall Theology is a collective Body of all wiſdome, whereof ſome things are demonſtrable and many are probable, and other things are better then their contraries; and they are to be proved accordingly, every thing in its proportion and capacity. And therefore here I make uſe of all the Brocardics, or rules of interpreters; that is, not only what is eſtabliſhed regularly in law, but what is concluded wiſe and reaſonable by the beſt interpreters. Socinus, Duennas, Azo, Gabrielius, Damaſus, and divers other great Lawyers attempted this way in the interpretation of the Civil and Canon law. I intermeddle not in the queſtion, whether they did well or ill, but leave the conteſt as it lies between Duarenus and Balduinus who blame them, and Weſenbech and Gribaldus who are their confident Advocates. But in the diſcourſes of Conſcience, whatſoever is right reaſon, though taken from any faculty or ſcience, is alſo of uſe and efficacy. Becauſe whatever can guide the actions or diſcourſes, or be the buſineſſe or the conduct of any man, does belong to Conſcience and its meaſures; measures; and what is true in any Science, is true in Conſcience.

I do not ſay that what is true or allowed in humane laws is alſo true or allowed in the Divine; becauſe though God does juſtly and wiſely, yet men doe not alwaies ſo; and what is true in Sciences is not alwaies underſtood to be true in Civil laws. Qualis cauſa, talis effectus, ſaith the Philoſopher, The cauſe and the effect are of the ſame nature. But the Lawyer ſaies, this is not alwaies true. For Manumiſſion, which is a cauſe of liberty, is of the Civil law and poſitive inſtitution; but Liberty, which is the effect of it, is of the law of Nature. Now although the Philoſopher underſtands his Rule of Natural cauſes and effects, or thoſe cauſes which are artificial, but operate by the way of Nature, and intends it not at all to be perſwaſive in matters of poſitive and legal inſtitution; yet this truth and all other truths muſt prevail in Conſcience, becauſe they are emanations from the fountain of truth; from whence nothing can derive that is not alwaies true, and in all ſenſes true where they are intended to perſwade or teach. But then the truths of Philoſophy muſt be uſed in the meaſures of Conſcience by the intentions of Philoſophy, and not be carried on to a diſparate matter, and without cauſe be indifferently applied, the ſame words to things of another nature. * There is a Rule in Philoſophy, Incorporalia ſunt individua: from hence Hottoman argues, Therefore Dominion, Heritage, Uſusfructus, or the uſe of a thing by him that is not the Lord, are individual, becauſe they are incorporeal. Now this will deceive him that truſts upon it: not becauſe what is true in one place is not true alwaies and every where; but becauſe theſe words applied to other matters, and the words ſignifying other intentions, they abuſe the unwary hearer, but inſtruct not. But becauſe the queſtions of Conſcience doe relate to all matters, therefore to theſe all Arts and Sciences do miniſter. Res fiſci eſt ubicunque natat, Whatſoever ſwims upon any water belongs to this Exchequer; that is, ſaith S. Auſtin, Chriſtianus Domini ſui eſſe intelligit, ubicunque invenerit veritatem, If it be truth, whereſoever it be found, the Chriſtian knows it is his Lords goods: and therefore I have prov'd and adorn'd ſome truths with the wiſe ſayings of Philoſophers and Poets, ut Deo ſerviat quicquid puer utile didici, that, according to the expreſſion of the ſame Saint, whatſoever being a child I learned which can profit, may be brought in to ſerve and pay homage to God. But ſtill they are to be underſtood according to the ſenſe and meaning of their proper Art where they dwell. And though there is great need of skill in all thoſe Sciences from from whence we derive notices in order to the conduct of Conſcience; and that it will be hard for any man to pretend to be Maſter of all thoſe things which muſt be us'd in theſe diſcourſes; yet I who will not pretend to that, have yet taken as good a courſe as I could to inform my ſelf, though not in the whole Syſtem of every art in the whole circle which I have here occaſionally us'd, yet I have been carefull to underſtand thoſe few things which I have thence drawn in as auxiliaries: and leſt I ſhould yet fail, I have taken another courſe by way of caution and defence, that I may be right and ſure in the reflexe, if I had cauſe to doubt of any thing in the direct notice.

For I have propounded to my ſelf general meaſures to be as boundaries to the determination of doubts and the anſwer of queſtions; which ſo long as I do obſerve, my error will be very innocent, if any happens. For 1. In hard and intricate queſtions I take that which is eaſie and intelligible, and concerning which it will be eaſie to judge whether it be right or wrong. 2. In odious things, and matters of burden and envy, I take that part which is leaſt, unleſſe there be evident reaſon to the contrary. 3. In favours I alwaies chuſe the largeſt ſenſe, when any one is bettered by that ſenſe, and no man is the worſe. 4. In things and queſtions relating to men I give thoſe anſwers that take away ſcruples, and bring peace and a quiet mind. 5. In things relating to God I alwaies chuſe to ſpeak that thing which to him is moſt honourable. 6. In matters of duty I alwaies chuſe that which is moſt holy. 7. In doubts I chuſe what is ſafeſt. 8. In probabilities I prefer that which is the more reaſonable, never allowing to any one a leave of chuſing that which is confeſſedly the leſſe reaſonable in the whole conjunction of circumſtances and relative conſiderations.

Upon the account of theſe principles I hope to ſerve God and the good of Souls. For theſe being the points of my compaſſe, which way ſoever I ſail, I ſhall not ſuffer ſhipwrack: and if at any time I goe about, which I have avoided as much as my infirmities will permit, yet at laſt, and in the whole, I arrive where I ought to be. For indeed in this whole affair I have proceeded with great fear; as knowing that he who writes Caſes of Conſcience, does in a manner give lawes to all that do believe him: and no man perſwades more vehemently then he that tells you, This, God forbids; This, God commands; and therefore I knew that to be miſtaken here was very evil, and might do much evil; but to be careleſſe, or prejudicate, or partiall, or flattering, or oppreſſive with ſeverity, or unſafe with gentleneſſe, was criminal in the cauſe as well as miſchievous in the event: and the greateſt ſecurity which I have that I have not ſpoken unſafely in any mans caſe, is becauſe I have prayed much, and laboured much that I might not at all miniſter to error or ſchiſme, to folly or vanity, but to the glory of God, and to the good of Souls: and I have ſo determined every Caſe that I have here preſented, as I my ſelf would practiſe, as I would account at the day of judgment, through the mercies of God in Jeſus Chriſt, and the integrity and ſimplicity of my Conſcience: and therefore I deſire that my Reader will uſe the ſame caution and ingenuity before he condemns any concluſion, and conſider, that as in theſe things it was impoſſible to pleaſe every man ἑρμασιν ὲν μεγάλοις πᾶσιν ἀδεῖν χαλεπὸν· ſo I deſign'd to pleaſe no man but as he is a lover of truth, and a lover of his own ſoul.

The ſtyle that I here uſe is according as it happens, ſometimes plain, ſometimes cloſer: the things which I bring are ſometimes new, and ſometimes old; they are difficult and they are eaſie; ſometimes adorn'd with caſes, and the caſes ſpecificated in ſtories, and ſometimes in ſtead of a ſtory I recite an apologue, and diſguiſe a true narrative with other names, that I may not diſcover the perſon whoſe caſe I diſcourſe of: and in all things I mind the matter; and ſuppoſe truth alone and reaſon and the piety of the deciſion to be the beſt ornament; and indeed ſometimes the thing it ſelf will not be handled otherwiſe.

Ornari res ipſa negat, contenta doceri.

I was here to ſpeak to the Underſtanding, not to winne the affections; to convince, not to exhort: and where I had no certainty in a caſe, or that the parts of a queſtion were too violently contended for, without ſufficient evidence on either ſide, I have not been very forward to give my final ſentence; but my opinion and my reaſon;

Per verbum FORTE reſpondent ſæpe periti.

Gloſ. in c. quorum appell. non recipiuntur.

And yet I hope that in ſome caſes it will be found, that though I am not fierce, poſitive and decretory, yet the caſe it ſelf is ſufficiently declared, ſo that he who hath occaſion to uſe it, may upon thoſe accounts determine himſelf. For the Modeſty of him that teaches is not alwaies an argument that he is uncertain in his propoſition. Τὸ νομίζω, καὶ δοκεῖν, καὶ τὰ ζητούμενα ὲ πάντως ὅτι ἀμφιβολιᾶ πατοῦσιν οἱ παλαιοὶ, ἀλλὰ πολλάκις καὶ ὅτι τῶ ἀληθεύειν.

δόξειεν· ὅταν οὖν ϗ ὃ νομίζω ἐνταῦθα ἀντὶ τοῦ κρίνω, ϗ πρόδηλον, ſaith Ulpian. When the Antients ſaid, I ſuppoſe, I think, It ſeems, they did not alwaies mean that they were uncertain; but they ſometimes intended it for a modeſt, but a direct affirmative: and ſo I doe in ſome few Caſes where there is great reaſon on one ſide, and a great prejudice on the other: I give my reaſons, and lay down the Caſe and all its allays, and leave it to prevail without my ſentence by its own ſtrength. And for this I hope no man will be offended at me: if he be, it is becauſe I was not willing to offend him; but I was deſirous to inſtruct, to comfort, to determin and to eſtabliſh him that needs.

I have ſtudiouſly avoided all queſtions that are curious and unprofitable; ſuch, I mean, which are only trials of witt, but neither miniſters of Juſtice nor Religion. Such was that which was brought before the Lawyers and all the learned men of Athens, with great noiſes to little purpoſe. A Gentleman of Ægina dying left three daughters. The one was beauteous and wanton; the ſecond a lover of wine and gay pleaſures; and the third a good ſpinſter, and a great follower of Country houſwifry. He made the Mother of theſe daughters to be his Heir upon this condition, that ſhe ſhould divide all his eſtate between his daughters equally; but in ſuch a manner, that what they received they ſhould neither poſſeſſe nor enjoy, and as ſoon as ever they had quitted their portions they ſhould pay each of them to their Mother ten thouſand Philippics. The Mother runs to Athens, conſults the Lawyers and Philoſophers how this Will ſhould be fulfilled; but they know not, as ſuppoſing one part to croſſe another, and altogether to be impoſſible; for if the whole eſtate be divided amongſt them, how is it that they ſhall not enjoy it? and if they do not, how ſhall they pay their Mother her aſſignment? The Mother therefore finding no help there, contrives it thus her ſelf. To the pretty wanton ſhe gives rich clothes, ſmooth Eunuchs, ſoft beds, ſweet perfumes, ſilver lavatories, and all things which ſhe ſuppos'd might pleaſe her luſt, and conſume her portion. To the drinking girle ſhe provides veſſels of rich wines, a houſe well furniſhed, and all things fitted for expenſive entertainments. But to the Country houſwife, a good farm, plowmen and a great ſtock, many horſes and ſome cows, ſome Men-ſervants and a great many Maidens, a kennel of hounds and a few ſwine; ſuppoſing this was no very probable way for her to thrive, but the likelieſt way to do her Husbands will; becauſe the luſt of the firſt, and the thirſt and debauchery of the ſecond, and the ill-contrived ſtock of the third would conſume all their portions. But all this while ſhe conſidered not how when they grew poor, ſhe ſhould receive her ſhare. But at laſt, a wiſer Man then was in the Schools of Athens advis'd her thus; Give to the Drunken maiden the rich garments, the jewels and the Eunuchs; and becauſe ſhe loves them not, ſhe will ſell them all for old wines of Chios: To the Wanton give fields and cattel, oxen and ploughs, hinds and ſwine; and ſhe will quickly ſell them that ſhe may entertain her Lovers: But if you give veſſels of wine to the Country girl, ſhe knows not what to doe with them, and therefore will ſell them to the Merchant for ready money. Thus ſhall neither of them enjoy their portion; but by ſelling it, they ſhall be enabled to pay the money to their Mother. This was a Riddle, rather then a Caſe of Law or Conſcience; and ſo are many others, which I therefore reſolved to lay aſide, and trouble no mans Conſcience or head with them; as ſuppoſing that the anſwer of the dul Diodorus mention'd in the Greek Epigram is ſufficient for ſuch curioſities, Ἤ συι, ἢ πῦ ἐλεύῖι, &c.

It is ſo, or it is not ſo; it muſt be done this way, or ſome other; the thing in queſtion is yours, or ſome bodies elſe: but make the Judge your friend, and I will warrant your cauſe, provided it be juſt; but look you to that. A ſlight anſwer to an intricate and uſeleſs queſtion is a fit cover for ſuch a diſh; a cabbage leaf is good enough to cover a pot of muſhromes: but I have taken a ſhorter way, and laid them all aſide; remembring the ſaying of Frier John Annias to Nicolaus de Lyra; Teſtimonium Dei lucidum eſt, nec egent literæ Divinæ plicis, The things of God are plain and eaſie: and therefore I have rejected every thing that is not uſefull and intelligible; chuſing only to make ſuch inquiries by which we may become better, and promoted in ſomething of our duty;

Quid ſumus, & quidnam victuri gignimur, ordo viz. That we may be taught how to know what God requires of us, inſtructed to ſalvation, and fitted to every good work.

But

But now I ſhall deſire that he who reads my Book will not expect this Book to be a collective body of particular Caſes of Conſcience; for I find that they are infinite, and my life is not ſo: and I ſhall never live to write them all, or to underſtand them all: and if I ſhould write ſome and not all, I ſhould profit I know not whom, and doe good but to a very few, and that by chance too; and it may be that their caſes being changed by circumſtances would not be fitted by my indefinite anſwers. I therefore reſolved upon another way; which although No Man before me hath trod in writing Caſes of Conſcience, yet I cannot ſay it is new; for I took my pattern from Tribonianus the Lawyer, who out of the lawes of the old Romans collected ſome choice Rules which give anſwer to very many Caſes that happen. And after I had conſidered and tried many others, I found this moſt reaſonable, moſt uſefull and moſt comprehenſive of all matters relating to my preſent Undertaking. For I intend here to offer to the world a General inſtrument of Morall Theology, by the rules and meaſures of which, the guides of Souls may determine the particulars that ſhall be brought before them; and thoſe who love to inquire, may alſo find their duty ſo deſcribed, that unleſſe their duties be complicated with Laws, and civil Cuſtomes, and ſecular intereſts, men that are wiſe may guide themſelves in all their proportions of Conſcience: but if their caſe be indeed involved, they need the conduct of a Spiritual Guide to untie the intrigue, and ſtate the queſtion, and applie the reſpective Rules to the ſeveral parts of it; for though I have ſet them down all in their proper places relating to their ſeverall matters, yet when a queſtion requires the reaſon of many Rules, it is not every hand that can applie them: Men will for ever need a living guide; and a wiſe Guide of Souls will by ſome of theſe Rules be enabled to anſwer moſt Caſes that ſhall occur.

For although I have not given anſwers to every doubt; yet have I told what we are to doe when any doubt ariſes; I have conducted the doubting Conſcience by ſuch Rules which in all doubts will declare her duty: and therefore if the matter of the doubt be in the reception of the Sacrament of the Euchariſt, or in wearing cloths, or in eating, the Rule is the ſame and applicable to every matter. I have not diſputed whether Sumptuary lawes be actually obligatory to us in England or Ireland; but I have told by what meaſures we ſhall know concerning all laws, whether they be obligatory or no, in any place, and to every perſon. I have not expounded all the laws of God, but I have told by what rules they are to be expounded and underſtood. But becauſe theſe Rules have influence upon all particulars, I have by way of inſtance and illuſtration determined very many ſpecial Caſes: and I was a little curious to chuſe ſuch which are the matter of our uſual inquiries; and have been very ſtudious to draw in to particular Scrutiny moſt of the principal and nobleſt queſtions of Chriſtendom which could relate to the matter of my Rule; provided that they were practicall and did miniſter to good manners; having that of Lactantius in my mind, Non tam de rebus humanis bene meretur qui ſcientiam bene dicendi affert, quam qui piè & innocenter docet vivere. He beſt deſerves of mankind who teaches men to live well rather then to talk well: and therefore the wiſer Greeks preferred Philoſophers before Orators. Illi enim rectè vivendi Doctores ſunt exiſtimandi, quod eſt longe præſtabilius. It is better to be a Doctor of good life, then of eloquent or learned ſpeaking: for there are but few who are capable of eloquence, but to live well is the duty of all: and I have alwaies been pleaſed with the ſaying of Jupiter to Pallas in the apologue, when he kiſſed her cheek for chuſing the fruitfull Olive.

----Nam quod facimus, id niſi utile eſt, Stulta omnis atque inanis inde eſt gloria;

unleſſe it does good & makes us better, it is not worth the uſing: and therefore it hath been no ſmall part of my labour not only to doe what was neceſſary, but to lay aſide what was uſeleſſe and unfit, at leaſt what I thought ſo.

In this manner by the Divine aſſiſtance I have deſcribed a Rule of Conſcience: in the performance of which I ſhall make no excuſes for my own infirmities, or to guard my ſelf from the cenſure of the Curious or the Scorners. I have with all humility and ſimplicity deſired to ſerve God, and to miniſter to his Church, and I hope he will accept me: and for the reſt, I have laid it all at his moſt holy feet, and therefore will take no further care concerning my ſelf in it. Only I am deſirous that now I have attempted to deſcribe a General Rule, they who find it defective would be pleaſed to make this more perfect by adding their own Symbol; which is much eaſier then to erect that building which needs but ſome addition to make it uſefull to all its purpoſes and intentions. But if any man, like a bird ſitting upon a tree, ſhall foul the fruit and diſhonour it, that it may be unfit for food, I ſhall ſhall be ſorrowfull for him that does ſo, and troubled, that the good which I intended to every one, ſhould be loſt to any one. But I ſhall have the Prophet's comfort if I have done my duty in righteouſneſſe and humility: though I labour in vain and ſpend my ſtrength for nought, yet ſurely my judgment is with the Lord, and my work is with my God. Iſa. 49. 4. 5.

I know not whether I ſhall live to adde Matter to this Form, that is, to write a particular explication of all the precepts of Chriſtian Religion; which will be a full deſign of all ſpecial caſes and queſtions of Conſcience meaſurable by this General Rule. If I doe not, I hope God will excite ſome other to doe it; but whoever does it, he will doe it with ſo much the more profit, by how much he does diſpute the leſſe: and I remember that Socrates and Sozomen tell that Ælius the Heretick was counted an Atheiſt propter eriſticum loquendi & diſputandi modum, becauſe he taught no part of religion but he minc'd it into queſtions and chop'd it into Ariſtotle's Logick. The ſimple and rational way of teaching God's Commandements as it is moſt eaſie, ſo it is moſt uſefull; and all the caſes that will occur will the moſt eaſily be anſwered by him that conſiders and tells in what Caſes they bind, and in what they bind not: which is the duty of him that explicates, and may be delivered by way of plain rule and eaſie commentary.

But this I ſhall advertiſe; That the Preachers may retrench infinite numbers of Caſes of Conſcience if they will more earneſtly preach and exhort to ſimplicity and love; for the want of theſe is the great multiplier of Caſes. Men do not ſerve God with honeſty and heartineſſe, and they do not love him greatly; but ſtand upon tearms with him, and ſtudy how much is lawfull, how far they may goe, and which is their utmoſt ſtep of lawfull, being afraid to doe more for God and for their Souls then is ſimply and indiſpenſably neceſſary; and oftentimes they tie religion and their own luſts together, and the one intangles the other, and both are made leſſe diſcernible, and leſſe practicable. * But the good Man underſtands the things of God; not only becauſe God's Spirit by ſecret immiſſions of light does properly inſtruct him; but becauſe he hath a way of determining his Caſes of Conſcience which will never fail him. For if the queſtion be put to him whether it be fit for him to give a ſhilling to the poor; he anſwers that it is not only fit, but neceſſary to doe ſo much at leaſt, and to make it ſure, he will give two: and in matter of duty he takes to himſelf the greater ſhare; in privileges and diviſions of right, he is content with the leaſt:

and in queſtions of priority and dignity he alwaies prevails by ceſſion, and ever is Superior by ſitting loweſt, and gets his will, firſt by chuſing what God wills, and then what his neighbour impoſes or deſires. But when Men have no love to God, and deſire but juſt to ſave their Souls, and weigh grains and ſcruples, and give to God no more then they muſt needs, they ſhall multiply Caſes of Conſciences to a number which no books will contain, and to a difficulty that no learning can anſwer.

The multiplication alſo of Laws and Ceremonies of Religion does exceedingly multiply queſtions of practice; and there were among the Jews by reaſon of their numerous rites many more then were at firſt among the Chriſtians. For we find the Apoſtles only exhorting to humility, to piety towards parents, to obedience to Magiſtrates, to charity and juſtice; and the Chriſtians who meant well underſtood well, and needed no books of Conſcience but the Rule, and the Commandement. But when Error crept in, Truth became difficult and hard to be underſtood: and when the Rituals of the Church and her laws became numerous, then Religion was hard to be practiſed: and when Men ſet up new intereſts, then the laws of Conſcience were ſo many, that as the laws of the old Romans, which at firſt were nailed in a braſſe-plate upon a wall, became at laſt ſo numerous and filled ſo many volumes, that their very Compendium made a large Digeſt; ſo are theſe, too many to be conſidered, or perfectly to be underſtood; and therefore either they muſt be cut off by ſimplicity and an honeſt heart, and contempt of the world, and our duty muſt look for no meaſures but love and the lines of the eaſie Commandement, or elſe we can have no peace and no ſecurity. But with theſe there is not only collateral ſecurity, but very often a direct wiſdom. Becauſe he that endeavours to keep a good Conſcience and hath an honeſt mind, beſides that he will enquire after his duty ſufficiently, he will be able to tell very much of it himſelf: for God will aſſiſt him, and cauſe that his own mind ſhall tell him more then ſeven Watchmen that ſit in a tower; and if he miſſe, he is next to an excuſe, and God is ready to pardon him: and therefore in what ſect of Chriſtianity ſoever any man is ingaged, if he have an honeſt heart, and a good Conſcience, though he be in darkneſſe, he will find his way out, or grope his way within; he ſhall be guided, or he ſhall be pardon'd;

God

God will pity him, and find ſome way for his remedy; and if it be neceſſary, will bring him out.

But however it comes to paſſe, yet now that the inquiries of Conſcience are ſo extreamly numerous, Men may be pleaſed to obſerve that Theology is not every mans trade; and that it requires more wiſdom and ability to take care of Souls, then thoſe Men who now-adays run under the formidable burden of the Preachers office can bring from the places of their education and firſt imploiment. Which thing I doe not obſerve that by it I might bring reputation to the office of the Clergy; for God is their portion and lot, and as he hath given them work enough, ſo he hath given them honour enough, though the world deſpiſe them: but I ſpeak it for their ſakes who doe what they ought not, and undertake what they cannot perform; and conſequently doe more hurt to themſelves and others then poſſibly they imagine; which it were better they ſhould amend, then be put to anſwer for it before Him who loves Souls better then he loved his life, and therefore would not intruſt them to the conduct of ſuch perſons, who have need to be taught the plain things of ſalvation, and learn to doe juſtice and charity, and the proper things of a holy religion.

Concerning my ſelf I ſhall make no requeſt to my Reader, but that he will charitably believe I mean well, and have done my beſt. If any Man be troubled that he hath expected this Nothing ſo long; I cannot make him other anſwer, but that I am afraid it is now too ſoon; and I bleſſe God that I had abilities of health and leiſure now at laſt to finiſh it: but I ſhould have been much longer, if God had not by the piety of one of his Servants provided for me a comfortable retirement and opportunity of leiſure: which if I have improved to God's glory, or to the comfort and inſtitution of any one, He and I both have our ends, and God will have his Glory; and that's a good Concluſion, and to that I humbly dedicate my Book.

Of the TITLES of the Chapters, and the Rules of the

FIRST BOOK.

Of Conſcience, the kinds of it, and the generall Rules of conducting them.

CHAP. I.

The Rule of Conſcience in general.

RULE I.

Conſcience is the mind of a man, governed by a Rule, and meaſured by the proportions of good and evil in order to practice. Pag. 1.

The Duty and Offices of Conſcience are to dictate and to teſtifie or bear witneſs, to accuſe or excuſe, to looſe or bind. 11

3.

Be carefull that Prejudice or Paſsion, Fancy and Affection, Error or Illuſion, be not miſtaken for Conſcience. 26

4.

The Conſcience of a Vitious man is an Evil Judge and an imperfect rule. 30

5.

All Conſciences are to walk by the ſame rule, and that which is juſt to one is ſo to all in the like Circumſtances. 32

6.

In Conſcience that which is firſt is trueſt, eaſieſt and moſt uſefull. 34

7.

Conſcience by its ſeveral habitudes and relations and tendencies toward its proper object is divided into ſeveral kinds. 35

1.

In a right Conſcience the practical judgment, that is the laſt determination to an action, ought to be ſure and evident. 38

3.

4.

A Judgment of Nature or Inclination is not ſufficient to make a ſure Conſcience. 62

5.

When two motives concur to the determination of an action, whereof one is vertuous and the other ſecular, a Right Conſcience is not prejudic'd by the mixture. 64

6.

An argument not ſufficient nor competent, though it do perſwade us to a thing in it ſelf

ſelf good, is not the ground of a right, nor a ſufficient warrant for a ſure Conſcience. 73

A Conſcience determined by the counſil of wiſe men, even againſt its own inclinations, may be ſure and right. 80

8.

He that ſins againſt a right and a ſure Conſcience, what ever the inſtance be, commits a great ſin, but not a double one. 81

9.

The goodneſſe of an object is not made by Conſcience, but is accepted, declared and publiſhed by it, and made perſonally obligatory. 95

CHAP. III.

Of the Confident or erroneous Conſcience.

1.

AN erroneous Conſcience commands us to doe what we ought to omit, or to omit what we ought to doe, or to doe it otherwiſe then we ſhould. 99

2.

An erroneous Conſcience binds us to Obedience, but not ſo as a right Conſcience does. 102

3.

A Conſcience erring vincibly or culpably is an unavoidable cauſe of ſin, whether it be reſiſted or complied with. 109

4.

It is a greater ſin to doe a good action againſt our Conſcience, then to doe an evil action in obedience to it. 111

5.

It is not lawfull to delight in an evil action (after the diſcovery of our error) which we did innocently in our erroneous Conſcience. 112

6.

An innocent or invincibly erring Conſcience is to be obeyed even againſt the known Commandements of a Superiour. 113

7.

The Error of an abuſed Conſcience ought to be reformed ſometimes by the command of the Will, but ordinarily by a contrary reaſon. 116

8.

The Error of a Conſcience is not alwaies to be opened to the erring perſon by the Guides of Souls, or any other charitable adviſer. 117

CHAP. IV.

Of the Probable or thinking Conſcience.

1.

A Probable Conſcience is an imperfect aſſent to an uncertain propoſition, in which one part is indeed clearly and fully choſen, but with an explicit or implicit notice that the contrary is alſo fairly eligible. 119

2.

A Conſcience that is at firſt and in its own nature probable may be made certain by accumulation of many probabilities operating the ſame perſwaſion. 124

3.

Of two Opinions equally probable upon the account of their proper reaſons, one may be ſafer then another. 144

4.

An Opinion that is ſpeculatively probable is not alwaies practically the ſame. 144

5.

The greater probability deſtroys the leſs. 146

6.

When two Opinions ſeem equally probable the laſt determination is to be made by accidents, circumſtances and collateral inducements. 150

7.

It is not lawfull to change our practicall ſentence about the ſame object, while the ſame

An Opinion relying upon very ſlender probability is not to be followed, except in the caſes of great neceſsity or great charity. 154

9.

Multitude of Authors is not ever the moſt probable inducement, nor doth it in all caſes make a ſafe and ſure Conſcience. 156

10.

In following the Authority of men, no rule can be antecedently given for the choice of the perſons, but the choice is wholly to be conducted by prudence and according to the ſubject matter. 162

11.

He that hath given aſſent to one part of a probable opinion, may lawfully depoſe that Conſcience and that opinion upon confidence of the ſentence of another. 168

12.

He that enquires of ſeveral Doctors, untill he find one anſwering according to his mind, cannot by that enquiry make his Conſcience ſafe; but according to the ſubject matter, and other circumſtances he may. 171

13.

He that is asked concerning a caſe that is on either ſide probable, may anſwer againſt his own opinion if the contrary be probable, or more ſafe, or more expedient, or more favourable. 172

14.

When the Guide of Souls is of a different opinion from his charge or penitent, he is not bound to exact conformity to his own opinion that is but probable, but may proceed according to the Conſcience of the Penitent. 173

15.

The ſentence and arbitrement of a prudent and good man, though it be of it ſelf but probable, yet is more then a probable warranty to actions otherwiſe undeterminable. ibid.

CHAP. V.

1.

A Doubtfull Conſcience aſſents to neither ſide of the queſtion, and brings no direct obligation. 174

2.

A negative doubt neither binds to action nor inquiry nor repentance, but it binds only to caution and obſervance. 175

3.

A privative doubt cannot of it ſelf hinder a man from acting what he is moved to by an extrinſick argument or inducement that is in it ſelf prudent or innocent. 177

In doubts of right or Law we are alwaies bound to enquire: but in doubts of fact not alwaies. 178

5.

In doubts the ſafer part is to be choſen. 180

6.

It is lawfull for the Conſcience to proceed to action againſt a doubt that is merely ſpeculative. 184

7.

Every dictate and judgment of the Conſcience, though it be little and leſs material, is ſufficient, and may be made uſe of for the depoſition of a doubt. 187

8.

When two precepts contrary to each other meet together about the ſame queſtion, that is to be preferred which binds moſt. 188

CHAP. VI.

Of the Scrupulous Conſcience.

A Scruple is a great trouble of mind proceeding from a little motive and a will, first by chusing what God wills, and then what his neighbour imposes or desires. But when Men have no love to God, and desire but just to save their Souls, and weigh grains and scruples, and give to God no more then they must needs, they shall multiply Cases of Consciences to a number which no books will contain, and to a difficulty that no learning can answer.

The multiplication also of Laws and Ceremonies of Religion does exceedingly multiply questions of practice; and there were among the Jews by reason of their numerous rites many more then were at first among the Christians. For we find the Apostles only exhorting to humility, to piety towards parents, to obedience to Magistrates, to charity and justice; and the Christians who meant well understood well, and needed no books of Conscience but the Rule, and the Commandement. But when Error crept in, Truth became difficult and hard to be understood: and when the Rituals of the Church and her laws became numerous, then Religion was hard to be practised: and when Men set up new interests, then the laws of Conscience were so many, that as the laws of the old Romans, which at first were nailed in a brasse-plate upon a wall, became at last so numerous and filled so many volumes, that their very Compendium made a large Digest; so are these, too many to be considered, or perfectly to be understood; and therefore either they must be cut off by simplicity and an honest heart, and contempt of the world, and our duty must look for no measures but love and the lines of the easie Commandement, or else we can have no peace and no security. But with these there is not only collateral security, but very often a direct wisdom. Because he that endeavours to keep a good Conscience and hath an honest mind, besides that he will enquire after his duty sufficiently, he will be able to tell very much of it himself: for God will assist him, and cause that his own mind shall tell him more then seven Watchmen that sit in a tower; and if he misse, he is next to an excuse, and God is ready to pardon him: and therefore in what sect of Christianity soever any man is ingaged, if he have an honest heart, and a good Conscience, though he be in darkness, he will find his way out, or grope his way within; he shall be guided, or he shall be pardon'd;

God

God will pity him, and find ſome way for his remedy; and if it be neceſſary, will bring him out.

But however it comes to paſſe, yet now that the inquiries of Conſcience are ſo extreamly numerous, Men may be pleaſed to obſerve that Theology is not every mans trade; and that it requires more wiſdom and ability to take care of Souls, then thoſe Men who now-adays run under the formidable burden of the Preachers office can bring from the places of their education and firſt imploiment. Which thing I doe not obſerve that by it I might bring reputation to the office of the Clergy, for God is their portion and lot, and as he hath given them work enough, ſo he hath given them honour enough, though the world deſpiſe them: but I ſpeak it for their ſakes who doe what they ought not, and undertake what they cannot perform; and conſequently doe more hurt to themſelves and others then poſſibly they imagine; which it were better they ſhould amend, then be put to anſwer for it before Him who loves Souls better then he loved his life, and therefore would not intruſt them to the conduct of ſuch perſons, who have need to be taught the plain things of ſalvation, and learn to doe juſtice and charity, and the proper things of a holy religion.

Concerning my ſelf I ſhall make no requeſt to my Reader, but that he will charitably believe I mean well, and have done my beſt. If any Man be troubled that he hath expected this Nothing ſo long; I cannot make him other anſwer, but that I am afraid it is now too ſoon; and I bleſſe God that I had abilities of health and leiſure now at laſt to finiſh it: but I ſhould have been much longer, if God had not by the piety of one of his Servants provided for me a comfortable retirement and opportunity of leiſure: which if I have improved to God's glory, or to the comfort and inſtitution of any one, He and I both have our ends, and God will have his Glory; and that's a good Concluſion, and to that I humbly dedicate my Book.

A TABLE

Of the TITLES of the Chapters, and the Rules of the

FIRST BOOK.

Of Conſcience, the kinds of it, and the generall Rules of conducting them.

CHAP. I.

The Rule of Conſcience in general.

RULE I.

Conſcience is the mind of a man, governed by a Rule, and meaſured by the proportions of good and evil in order to practice. Pag. 1.

The Duty and Offices of Conſcience are to dictate and to teſtifie or bear witneſs, to accuſe or excuſe, to looſe or bind. 11

3.

Be carefull that Prejudice or Paſsion, Fancy and Affection, Error or Illuſion, be not miſtaken for Conſcience. 26

4.

5.

All Conſciences are to walk by the ſame rule, and that which is juſt to one is ſo to all in the like Circumſtances. 32

6.

7.

Conſcience by its ſeveral habitudes and relations and tendencies toward its proper object is divided into ſeveral kinds. 35

CHAP. II.

1.

In a right Conſcience the practical judgment, that is the laſt determination to an action, ought to be ſure and evident. 38

3.

5.

When two motives concur to the determination of an action, whereof one is vertuous and the other ſecular, a Right Conſcience is not prejudic'd by the mixture. 64

6.

An argument not ſufficient nor competent, though it do perſwade us to a thing in it ſelf self good, is not the ground of a right, nor a sufficient warrant for a sure Conscience. 73

A Conscience determined by the counsil of wise men, even against its own inclinations, may be sure and right. 80

8.

He that sins against a right and a sure Conscience, what ever the instance be, commits a great sin, but not a double one. 81

9.

The goodnesse of an object is not made by Conscience, but is accepted, declared and published by it, and made personally obligatory. 95

CHAP. III.

Of the Confident or erroneous Conscience.

1.

AN erroneous Conscience commands us to doe what we ought to omit, or to omit what we ought to doe, or to doe it otherwise then we should. 99

2.

An erroneous Conscience binds us to Obedience, but not so as a right Conscience does. 102

3.

A Conscience erring vincibly or culpably is an unavoidable cause of sin, whether it be resisted or complied with. 109

4.

It is a greater sin to doe a good action against our Conscience, then to doe an evil action in obedience to it. 111

5.

It is not lawfull to delight in an evil action (after the discovery of our error) which we did innocently in our erroneous Conscience. 112

6.

An innocent or invincibly erring Conscience is to be obeyed even against the known Commandements of a Superiour. 113

7.

The Error of an abused Conscience ought to be reformed sometimes by the command of the Will, but ordinarily by a contrary reason. 116

8.

The Error of a Conscience is not alwaies to be opened to the erring person by the Guides of Souls, or any other charitable adviser. 117

CHAP. IV.

Of the Probable or thinking Conscience.

1.

A Probable Conscience is an imperfect assent to an uncertain proposition, in which one part is indeed clearly and fully chosen, but with an explicit or implicit notice that the contrary is also fairly eligible. 119

2.

A Conscience that is at first and in its own nature probable may be made certain by accumulation of many probabilities operating the same perswasion. 124

3.

Of two Opinions equally probable upon the account of their proper reasons, one may be safer then another. 144

4.

An Opinion that is speculatively probable is not alwaies practically the same. 144

5.

6.

When two Opinions seem equally probable the last determination is to be made by accidents, circumstances and collateral inducements. 150

7.

It is not lawfull to change our practicall sentence about the same object, while the same

An Opinion relying upon very ſlender probability is not to be followed, except in the caſes of great neceſsity or great charity. 154

9.

Multitude of Authors is not ever the moſt probable inducement, nor doth it in all caſes make a ſafe and ſure Conſcience. 156

10.

In following the Authority of men, no rule can be antecedently given for the choice of the perſons, but the choice is wholly to be conducted by prudence and according to the ſubject matter. 162

11.

He that hath given aſſent to one part of a probable opinion, may lawfully depoſe that Conſcience and that opinion upon confidence of the ſentence of another. 168

12.

He that enquires of ſeveral Doctors, untill he find one anſwering according to his mind, cannot by that enquiry make his Conſcience ſafe; but according to the ſubject matter, and other circumſtances he may. 171

13.

He that is asked concerning a caſe that is on either ſide probable, may anſwer againſt his own opinion if the contrary be probable, or more ſafe, or more expedient, or more favourable. 172

14.

When the Guide of Souls is of a different opinion from his charge or penitent, he is not bound to exact conformity to his own opinion that is but probable, but may proceed according to the Conſcience of the Penitent. 173

15.

The ſentence and arbitrement of a prudent and good man, though it be of it ſelf but probable, yet is more then a probable warranty to actions otherwiſe undeterminable. ibid.

CHAP. V.

Of a Doubtfull Conſcience.

1.

A negative doubt neither binds to action nor inquiry nor repentance, but it binds only to caution and obſervance. 175

3.

A privative doubt cannot of it ſelf hinder a man from acting what he is moved to by an extrinſick argument or inducement that is in it ſelf prudent or innocent. 177

6.

7.

Every dictate and judgment of the Conſcience, though it be little and leſs material, is ſufficient, and may be made uſe of for the depoſition of a doubt. 187

8.

When two precepts contrary to each other meet together about the ſame queſtion, that is to be preferred which binds moſt. 188

CHAP. VI.

Of the Scrupulous Conſcience.

A Scruple is a great trouble of mind proceeding from a little motive and a great indisposition, by which the Conscience, though sufficiently determined by proper arguments, dares not proceed to action, or if it does, it cannot rest. 208

A Conscience sufficiently instructed by its proper arguments of perswasion may without sin proceed to action against the Scruple, and its weaker arguments or stronger tremblings. 213

3.

He that is troubled with scruples ought to relie upon the judgment of a prudent Guide. ibid.

4.

When a Doubt is resolved in the entrance of an action, we must judge of our action afterwards by the same measures as before; for he that changes his measures, turns his doubt into a Scruple. ibid.

5.

A Scrupulous Conscience is to be cured by remedies proper to the disease and to the man. 215

SECOND BOOK.

Of Divine Laws, and all Collaterall Obligations.

CHAP. I.

Of the Law of Nature in Generall.

1.

THE Law of Nature is the Universall Law of the world, or the Law of Mankind, concerning common necessities, to which we are inclined by Nature, invited by consent, prompted by reason; but is bound upon us only by the commands of God. 220

2.

The Law of Nature is the foundation of all Laws, and the measure of their Obligation. 243

3.

The first or greatest band of the Law of Nature is fear of punishment. 244

4.

The second band of Vertue is Love, and its proper and consequent deliciousness. 247

5.

The Imperfection of some provisions in civil Laws are supplied by the natural obligation remaining upon persons civily incapable. 251

6.

Sins against the Law of Nature are greater or less, not by that proportion, but by the greatness of the matter, and the evil consequent or the malice of the Sinner. 258

7.

Actions which are forbidden by the Law of Nature either for defect of power, or for the incapacity of the matter, are not only unlawfull but also void. 260

8.

When an act is forbidden by the Law of Nature for the turpitude and undecency that it hath in the matter of the Action, the Act is also void when the turpitude remains or hath a perpetual cause. 262

The Law of Nature can be dispensed with by the Divine power. 263

10.

The Law of Nature cannot be dispensed with by any Humane power. 269

11.

That the Obligation to a naturall Law does cease in any particular, is not to be presumed in every one, but is to be declared by the publick voice. 274

12.
The Exactneſs of naturall Laws is capable of interpretation, and may be allayed by Equity and Piety and Neceſsity. 275

CHAP. II.

Of the Law of Nature as it is drawn up in the Chriſtian Law.

1.
When the Law of Jeſus Chriſt was eſtabliſhed, the Old Teſtament or the Law of Moſes did no longer oblige the Conſcience. 275

The Ceremoniall Law of Moſes is wholly void. 280

3.
The Judicial Law of Moſes is annull'd or abrogated, and retains no obliging power either in whole or in part over any Chriſtian Prince, Commonwealth or perſon. 286

4.
The ten Commandments of Moſes, commonly called the Morall Law, is not a perfect Digeſt of the Law of Nature. 318

5.
All the Explications of the Morall Law that are found in the Prophets and other H. writers of the Old Teſtament are to be accounted as parts of the Morall Law, and equally oblige the Conſcience. 323

6.
Every thing in the Decalogue is not obligatory to Chriſtians, is not a part of the Morall Law or Naturall. 324
The meaſures of difference to diſcern between Morall precepts and precepts not Morall in all the Laws of God. 367

7.
There is no ſtate of men or things but is to be guided by the proportion of ſome Rule or Precept in the Chriſtian Law. 372

CHAP. III.

Of the Interpretation and Obligation of the Laws of JESUS CHRIST.

1.
IN Negative precepts the Affirmatives are commanded, and in the Affirmative commandments the Negative are included. 389

2.
When a Negative and an Affirmative ſeem oppoſite in any ſenſe, the Affirmative is to be expounded by the Negative, not the Negative by the Affirmative. 395

3.
In the Affirmative and Negative precepts of Chriſt, not only what is in the words of the Commandment, but whatſoever is ſymbolicall or alike, is equally forbidden or commanded. 396

4.
When any thing is forbidden by the Laws of Jeſus Chriſt, all thoſe things are forbidden alſo which follow from that forbidden action, or for whoſe ſake it was forbidden. 402

5.
The Laws of Jeſus Chriſt are the meaſures of the Spirit, and are alwaies to be extended to a ſpiritual ſignification. 404
Whatſoever is an Elicit or Imperate Act of vertue, whether it be acted by the ſoul or by the body, is an act of ſpiritual religion. 408
All acts of vertue are to be preferred before the Inſtruments of it; and that which exerciſes it before that which ſignifies it; and the inward Act before the outward. 410

The Imperate Acts or outward expreſsions of one Commandement muſt not contradict the Elicit Acts of another. 411

7.
When any thing is forbidden by the Laws of Christ, all those things also by which we come to that sin are understood to be by the same Law forbidden. 414

8.
The Suppositive Propositions with the supervening advices of our B. Saviour are alwaies equivalent to matter of Duty, and are by Interpretation a Commandement. 417

9.
The Institution of a Rite or Sacrament by our B. Saviour is a direct Law, and passes a proper obligation in its whole integrity. 420 10.

If the sense of a Law be dubious, we are sometimes to expound it by Liberty, sometimes by Restraint. 432

11.
The positive Laws of Jesus Christ cannot be dispensed with by any Humane power. 440

12.
Not every thing that is in the Doctrines and Sermons of Jesus Christ was intended to bind as a Law or Commandement. 448

13.
Some things may be used in the service of God which are not commanded in any Law, nor explicitly commended in any doctrine of Jesus Christ. 454

14.
The Christian Law both of Faith and Manners is fully contained in the H. Scriptures, and from thence only can the Conscience have divine warrant and authority. 472

15.
In the Law of Christ there is no precept that ministers wholy to the Law of Moses, but for a time only and less principally. 519

16.
The Laws of Jesus Christ are to be interpreted to the Sense of a present Obedience according to the subject matter. 520

17.
Because the Laws of Jesus Christ were delivered in Sermons to a single person or a definite number of hearers, we are curiously to enquire and wisely to understand when those persons were only personally concerned, and when they were representatives of the whole Church. 540

18.
Evangelicall Laws given to one concerning the duty of another do in that very relation concern them both, but in differing degrees. 546

19.
Custome is no sufficient Interpreter of the Laws of Jesus Christ. 548

20.
The measure of perfection and obedience required of Christians is greater then that of the Jews even in morall duties common to them and us. 554

THE

THE SECOND VOLUME.

THIRD BOOK.

Of Humane Laws, &c.

CHAP. I.

Of Humane Laws in general.

1.

THE Conſcience is properly and directly, actively and paſsively under pains of ſin and puniſhment obliged to obey the Laws of men. 3

Rules whereby to conjecture at the gravity or leſſening of the Sin of diſobedience to humane Laws. 10

Humane Laws doe not oblige the Conſcience to an active obedience, when there is an imminent danger, or an intolerable or very grievous evil in the obedience. 26

3.

The Laws of our Superiour that are not juſt and good do not bind the Conſcience. 32 4.

A Law that is founded on a falſe preſumption does not oblige the Conſcience. 37

5.

Humane Laws do bind the Conſcience to or from an act in ſecret as well as in publick. 40

6.

Humane Laws before ſufficient promulgation do not oblige the Conſcience. 44

7.

That a Law ſhould oblige the Conſcience does not depend upon the acceptation of the Law by the people. 46

8.

Humane Laws of indifferent matter do not oblige the Conſcience of the Subjects out of the Dominions of the Superiour. 49

9.

Obedience to Laws is to be paid according to what is commanded, not according to what is beſt. 51

CHAP. II.

Of Laws Penall and Tributary.

1.

IT is lawfull for Chriſtian Magiſtrates to make Penall Laws not only pecuniary and of reſtraint, but of loſs of member and life it ſelf. 53

2.

Penall do ſometimes oblige the guilty perſon to the ſuffering the puniſhment even before the ſentence and declaration of the Judge. 59.

In what caſes the Criminall is to be his own Executioner. 63

Signs by which we may judge when the Criminall is condemned ipſo facto. 67

Penalties impoſed by the Judge muſt be ſuffered and ſubmitted to, but may not after ſuch ſentence be inflicted by the hands of the condemned. 71

4.

He that hath ſuffered the puniſhment is not diſcharged in Conſcience, unleſs he alſo repent of the diſobedience. 79

5.

It is not lawfull for a guilty perſon to defend himself by calumny or a lye, from the penalty of the Law, though it be the ſentence of death. 82

6.

It is not lawfull for private Chriſtians without publick authority to puniſh malefactors, but they may require it of the Magiſtrate in ſome caſes. 107

7.

It is not lawfull to puniſh one for the offence of another merely and wholly. 117

8.

The Laws of Tribute are Morall Laws and not Penall, except it be by accident; and therefore do oblige the Conſcience to an active obedience. 124

9.

The Laws of tribute have the ſame conditions, cauſes, powers and meaſures with other Laws of government. 125

10.

Tribute and cuſtome, which are due, are to be paid, whether they be demanded or no. 127

CHAP. III.

Of Kings, Princes and all Supreme Civill Powers, and their Laws in Speciall.

1.

THE Supreme power in every Republic is univerſal, abſolute and unlimited. 130

2.

The Supreme power is ſuperior to the Civill Laws, but not wholy free from them. 138

3.

It is not lawfull for Subjects to rebell or to take up arms againſt the Supreme power of the Nation, upon any pretence whatſoever. 149.

4.

The Supreme civil power is alſo ſupreme Governour over all perſons and in all Cauſes Eccleſiaſticall. 160

5.

Kings have a legiſlative power in the affairs of Religion and the Church. 174

6.

The Supreme civil power hath a power of coercion over every perſon in the whole Order Eccleſiaſticall. 178

7.

The Supreme civil power hath Juriſdiction in cauſes not only Eccleſiaſticall but Internal and Spirituall. 199 8.

The Supreme civil power is to govern in cauſes Eccleſiaſticall by the means and meaſures of Chriſt's inſtitution, that is by the aſsiſtance and miniſteries of Eccleſiaſtical perſons. 207

CHAP. IV.

Of the power of the Church in Canons and Cenſures, with their obligations and powers over the Conſcience.

1.

2.

The Church hath power to make Laws, and to give Commands obliging the Conſcience, that is, tying the Subject to obedience under the penalty of committing or incurring the Divine diſpleaſure. 220

3.

The Church hath power to make laws in all things of neceſſary duty by a direct power and a divine authority. 224

4.
The Church hath power to make Laws in such things which are helps and apt ministeries and advantages of necessary duty. 226
The Rule [The Accessory follows the nature of the Principall] explicated. 227

When the Canons or Rules of Ecclesiasticall Rulers are confirmed by the Supreme civill power, they oblige the Conscience by a double obligation. 234

Kings and Princes are tied by the ties of religion, not of power, to keep the Laws of the Church. 237

7.
It is not lawfull for the Ecclesiasticall power to excommunicate Christian Princes or the supreme civil power. 240

8.
Ecclesiastical censures are to be inflicted by the consent and concurrence of the supreme civil power. 247

9.
Excommunication inflicted upon a light cause binds externally but not internally: but if it be inflicted upon an unjust cause it binds not at all. 255

10.
It is not lawfull to communicate with those whom the Church hath by a just sentence excommunicated. 260

§. III. Of Canons Ecclesiastical.

11.
The Canons of the Apostles which are of order and externall government do oblige the Conscience by being accepted in severall Churches, not by their first establishment. 266

12.
All those ritualls which were taught to the Apostles concerning ministeries, which were of divine institution, do oblige all Christendome to their observation. 269

13.
In the Rules which the Apostles gave to the Churches in things indifferent, the Church hath a liberty, but it is not to be used but for great reason, great necessity, and for the edification of their people committed to their charge. 272

14.
The Canons of the antient Generall & Provinciall Councils are then laws to the Conscience when they are bound upon us by the authority of the respective Governours of Churches. 285

15.
The Laudable customs of the Catholick Church which are in present observation do oblige the Conscience of all Christians. 287

16.
The Decrees and Canons of the Bishops of Rome oblige the Conscience of none but his own subjects. 298

Ecclesiasticall Laws that are merely such cannot be universall and perpetuall. 301

18.
Ecclesiasticall Laws of ceremonies and externall observances do not bind the Conscience beyond the cases of contempt and scandall. 313 19.

Ecclesiasticall Laws must be charitable and easie; and when they are not, they oblige not. 315 20.

Ecclesiasticall Laws must ever promote the service of God and the good of Souls, but must never put a snare or stumbling-block to Consciences. 323

§. V.

21.
The Catholick Church is a witness of Faith and a record of all necessary truths; but not the Mistress and Ruler of our Creed, that is, cannot make any laws of Faith. 350

22.
The Decrees of Generall Councils are of great use in the conduct of Conscience, but not the proper measure or last determination of matters of belief. 353

23.
Subscription to articles and forms of confession in any Particular Church is wholly of Politicall consideration. 356

CHAP. V.

Of Laws Domestick, or the power which Fathers of Families have to bind the Consciences of their Relatives.

1.
Children are bound to obey the Laws and Commandments of their Parents in all things Domesticall, and in all actions personall relating to the familie, or done within it. 359

2.
Fathers have a power to chastise their offending children, but not a power of life and death. 364

3.
A Father hath power over the goods and persons of his children so as to be maintained by them. 366

4.
The Fathers power does not extend to matter of Religion and perswasions of Faith. 369

5.
The Fathers power over the children can remit an injury done to them without their leave or consent. 371

6.
A Fathers authority cannot abide after his death, but the Sons piety to his Father must and may pass upon him some indirect obligations. 372

7.
Neither the Fathers authority nor his Sons piety can oblige them to do an action against the Laws of God, or of the Fathers, or our just superiours. 374

8.
It is not lawfull for Children to enter into any lasting course of life against the will or approbation of their Fathers or parents. 378

CHAP. VI.

Of the Interpretation, Diminution and Abrogation of Humane Laws.

When the Letter of the Law is burdensome and unjust, the meaning and charity of the Law does only oblige the Conscience. 398

When the power that made the Law does interpret the Law, the Interpretation is authenticall, and obliges the Conscience as much as the Law, and can release the bond of Conscience so far as the Interpretation extends as much as if the Law were abrogated. 407

§. III. A contrary or ceasing reason.

A Law made for a particular reason, when the reason wholly ceases, does no longer oblige the Conscience. 411

The Legislator hath authority to dispense in his his own Laws for any cause that himself prudently shall judge to be reasonable, so that no distinct interest be prejudic'd or injur'd. 423

The same power that can dispense can also commute a Duty: and as in the first it eases, so in the latter it binds the Conscience. 426

A Custome can interpret a Law, but can never abrogate it without the consent of the supreme power. 427

Abrogation of a Law by a competent, that is, the Supreme power, may be just and reasonable, though the Law it self be neither unreasonable nor unjust. 431

FOURTH BOOK.

Of the Nature and Causes of Good and Evil.

CHAP. I.

Of the Efficient Causes of all Humane Actions good or evil.

AN action is neither good nor evil, unless it be voluntary and chosen. 437

2.

The virtuall and interpretative consent of the will is imputed to Good or Evil. 455

Rules of conducting our Sports and Recreations. 473

3.

The Act of the will alone, although no externall action or event do follow, is imputed to Good or Evil by God and men. 480

4.

An Involuntary effect proceeding from a voluntary cause is imputed to the Agent as if it were voluntary and directly chosen. 489

Nothing is good or bad but what we know, or concerning which we can deliberate. 493

6.

Ignorance does alwaies excuse the fact, or diminish the malignity of it, or change the kind or nature of the Sin. 500

§. III. Of Fear and Violence, and how these can make an action Involuntary.

Fear that makes our reason useless, and suffers us not to consider, leaves the actions it produces free from crime, even though it self be culpable. 511

CHAP. II.

Of the Finall cause of Humane actions, and its influence or causality of Good and Evil.

1.

IN every good Action the means and the end must be Symbolicall; so that a good Action done for an evil end, and an evil Action done for a good end, are alike Criminall. 517

2.

To do an action of it self lawfull for temporall regards, for ends of profit, pleasure, or honour, is not unlawfull, except it be accidentally. 520

3.

The end and intention of a Law is under the Commandement as much as the Action it self commanded in order to the end. 525

The Rule of Conſcience.

THE FIRST BOOK.

Of Conſcience, the kindes of it, and the general Rules of conducting them.

CHAP. I.
The Rule of Conſcience in general.

RULE I.

Conſcience is the minde of a Man governed by a Rule, and meaſured by the proportions of good and evil, in order to practice; viz. to conduct all our relations, and all our entercourſe between God, our Neighbours, and our Selves: that is, in all moral actions.

GOD governs the world by ſeveral attributes and emanations from himſelf. The nature of things is ſupported by his power, the events of things are ordered by his providence, and the actions of reaſonable creatures are governed by Laws, and theſe Laws are put into a mans ſoul or minde as into a Treaſury or Repoſitory: ſome in his very nature, ſome by after actions, by education and poſitive ſanction, by learning and cuſtome: ſo that it was well ſaid of S. Bernard, Conſcientia candor eſt lucis æternæ, & ſpeculum ſine macula Dei Majeſtatis, & imago bonitatis illius. Conſcience is the brightneſs and ſplendor of the eternal light, a ſpotleſs mirror of the Divine Majeſty, and the image of the goodneſs of God. It is higher which Tatianus ſaid of Conſcience, μόνον τὸ συνείδησιν Θεὸν, Conſcience is God unto us; which ſaying he had from Menander,

Lib. de interiori domo.

βεβηλοῖς ἅπασι συνείδησις Θεὸς, and it had in it this truth, That God who is every where in ſeveral manners, hath the appellative of his own attributes and effects in the ſeveral manners of his preſence.

Jupiter eſt quodcunque vides, quocunque moveris.

2. That providence which governs all the world is nothing else but God present by his providence: and God is in our hearts by his Laws: he rules in us by his Substitute our conscience. God sits there and gives us laws; and as God
Exod. 7. 1. said to Moses, I have made thee a God to Pharaoh, that is, to give him Laws, and to minister in the execution of those Laws, and to inflict angry sentences upon him; so hath God done to us. He hath given us Conscience to be in Gods stead to us, to give us Laws, and to exact obedience to those Laws, to punish them that prevaricate, and to reward the obedient. And therefore Conscience is called οἰκεῖος φύλαξ, ἔνοικος Θεός, ἔπιτοπος δαίμων, The Houshold Guardian, The Domestick God, The Spirit or Angel of the place: and when we call God to witness, we onely mean, that our conscience is right, and that God
Lib. 6. de vero cultu. cap. 24. and Gods Vicar, our conscience knows it. So Lactantius: Meminerit Deum se habere testem, id est, ut ego arbitror, mentem suam, quâ nihil homini dedit Deus ipse divinius. Let him remember that he hath God for his witness, that is, as I suppose, his mind; then which God hath given to man nothing that is more divine. In summe, It is the image of God; and as in the mysterious Trinity, we adore the will, memory and understanding, and Theology contemplates three persons in the analogies, proportions and correspondencies of them: so in this also we see plainly that Conscience is that likeness of God in which he was pleased to make man. For although conscience be primarily founded in the understanding, as it is the Lawgiver, and Dictator; and the rule and dominion of conscience, fundatur in intellectu, is established in the understanding part; yet it is also Memory, when it accuses or excuses, when it makes joyful and sorrowful; and there is in it some mixture of will, as I shall discourse in the sequel; so that conscience is a result of all, of Understanding, Will, and Memory.

3. But these high and great expressions are better in the Spirit then in the letter; they have in them something of institution, and something of design, they tell us that Conscience is a guard and a guide, a rule and a law set over us by God, and they are spoken to make us afraid to sin against our conscience, because by so doing we sin against God; he having put a double bridle upon us, society and solitude, that is, company, and our selves, or rather, God and Man; it being now impossible for us to sin in any circumstances, but we shall have a reprover: ἵνα μήτε μάρωσις ἐπεγείρῃ σε πρὸς ὃ μὴ πρέπον, μήτε ἡσυχία ἐναποδέχηται σε πρὸς τὸ ἁμαρτεῖν, as Hierocles said well; that neither company may give countenance or excuse to sin, or solitariness may give confidence or warranty; for as we are ashamed to sin in company, so we ought to fear our conscience, which is Gods Watchman and Intelligencer.

4. To which purpose it was soberly spoken of Tertullian, Conscientia optima
Lib. de testimon. animæ. testis Divinitatis: our conscience is the best argument in the world to prove there is a God: For conscience is Gods deputy; and the inferiour must suppose a superiour; and God and our conscience are like relative terms, it not being imaginable why some persons in some cases should be amaz'd and troubled in their minds for their having done a secret turpitude, or cruelty; but that conscience is present with a message from God, and the men feel inward causes of fear, when they are secure from without; that is, they are forc'd to fear God, when they are safe from men. And it is impossible that any man should be an Atheist, if he have any conscience: and for this reason it is, there have been so few Atheists in the world, because it is so hard for men to lose their conscience wholly.

Question.

Queſt.

5. SOme diſpute whether it be poſſible or no for any man to be totally without conſcience. Tertullians ſentence in this article is this, Poteſt obumbrari quia non eſt Deus: extingui non poteſt quia à Deo eſt. It is not God, and therefore may be clouded: but it is from God, and therefore cannot be deſtroyed. But I know a man may wholly loſe the uſe of his reaſon; ſome men are mad, and ſome are natural fools, and ſome are ſots, and ſtupid; ſuch men as theſe loſe their conſcience, as they loſe their reaſon: and as ſome mad men may have a fancy that there is no Sun; ſo ſome fools may ſay there is no God; and as they can believe that, ſo they can loſe their conſcience, and believe this. But as he that hath reaſon or his eyes cannot deny but there is ſuch a thing as the Sun, ſo neither can he that hath conſcience deny there is a God. For as the Sun is preſent by his light which we ſee daily, ſo is God by our conſcience which we feel continually: we feel one as certainly as the other.

6. But it is to be obſerved, that conſcience is ſometimes taken for the practical intellective faculty; ſo we ſay the law of nature, and the fear of God is written in the conſcience of every man.

2. Sometimes it is taken for the habitual perſwaſion and belief of the principles written there; ſo we ſay, He is a good man, and makes conſcience of his ways. And thus we alſo ſay, and it is true, that a wicked perſon is of a profligate and loſt conſcience. He hath no conſcience in him. That is, he hath loſt the habit, or that uſual perſwaſion and recourſe to conſcience by which good men govern their actions.

3. Or the word conſcience is uſed effectively, for any ſingle operation and action of conſcience: ſo we ſpeak of particulars, I make a conſcience of taking up arms in this cauſe. Of the firſt and laſt acceptation of the word Conſcience, there is no doubt; for the laſt may, and the firſt can never be loſt: But for the ſecond it may be loſt more or leſs, as any other habit can; though this with more difficulty then any thing elſe, becauſe it is founded ſo immediately in nature, and is ſo exerciſed in all the actions and entercourſes of our life, and is ſo aſſiſted by the grace of God, that it is next to impoſſible to loſe the habit intirely; and that faculty that ſhall to eternal ages doe the offices which are the laſt, and ſuch as ſuppoſe ſome preceding actions, I mean to torment and afflict them for not having obeyed the former acts of dictate and command, cannot be ſuppoſed to die in the principle, when it ſhall be eternal in the emanation; for the worm ſhall never die.

7. For, that men doe things againſt their conſcience, is no otherwiſe then as they doe things againſt their reaſon; but a man may as well ceaſe to be a man, as to be wholly without conſcience. For the drunkard will be ſober, and his conſcience will be awake next morning: This is a perpetual pulſe, and though it may be interrupted, yet if the man be alive, it will beat before he dies; and ſo long as we beleeve a God, ſo long our conſcience will at leaſt teach us, if it does not alſo ſmite us: But as God ſometimes lets a man go on in ſin and does not puniſh him, ſo does conſcience; but in this caſe, unleſs the man be ſmitten and awakened before he dies, both God & the conſcience reſerve their wrath to be inflicted in hell. It is one and the ſame thing; Gods wrath, and an evil guilty conſcience: For by the ſame hand by which God gives his law, by the ſame he puniſhes them that tranſgreſs the law. God gave the old law by the miniſtery of Angels, and when the people broke it, he ſent evil angels among them; Pſal. 78. 49.

them; now God gives us a law in our conſciences, and there he hath eſtabliſhed the penalty; This is the worm that never dies; let it be trod upon never ſo much here, it will turn again. It cannot die here, and it ſhall be alive for ever.

But by explicating the parts of the Rule, we ſhall the beſt underſtand the Nature, Uſe, and Offices of Conſcience.

Conſcience is the minde of a Man——

7. When God ſent the B. Jeſus into the world to perfect all righteouſneſs, and to teach the world all his Fathers will, it was ſaid, and done, I will give my laws in your hearts, and in your mindes will I write them; that is, you ſhall be governed by the law of natural and eſſential equity and reaſon, by that law which is put into every mans nature: and beſides this, whatſoever elſe ſhall be ſuperinduc'd ſhall be written in your minds by the Spirit, who ſhall write all the laws of Chriſtianity in the Tables of your conſciences. He ſhall make you to underſtand them, to perceive their reliſh, to remember them becauſe you love them, and becauſe you need them, and cannot be happy without them: he ſhall call them to your minde, and inſpire new arguments and inducements to their obſervation, and make it all as naturall to us, as what we were born with.

Heb. 10. 16. Jer. 31. 33.

8. Our minde being thus furniſhed with a holy Rule, and conducted by a divine Guide, is called Conſcience; and is the ſame thing which in Scripture is ſometimes called, *The heart; there being in the Hebrew tongue, no proper word for Conſcience, but in ſtead of it they uſe the word לֵבָב the heart; Oftententimes alſo thine own heart knoweth, that is, thy conſcience knoweth, that thou thy ſelf haſt curſed others: ſo in the New Teſtament, Beloved, if our hearts condemne us not, then have we peace towards God; viz. If in our own conſciences we are not condemned. Sometimes it is called *Spirit, the third ingredient of the conſtitution of a Chriſtian; the Spirit, diſtinct from Soul and Body. For as our Body ſhall be ſpiritual in the reſurrection, therefore becauſe all its offices ſhall intirely miniſter to the ſpirit, and converſe with ſpirits, ſo may that part of the ſoul which is wholly furniſhed, taught and conducted by the ſpirit of grace, and whoſe work it is wholly to ſerve the ſpirit, by a juſt proportion of reaſon be called the Spirit. This is that which is affirmed by S. Paul, The word of God ſharper then a two edged ſword, dividing the ſoul and the ſpirit; that is, the ſoul is the ſpirit ſeparated by the word of God, inſtructed by it, and by relation to it, is called, the ſpirit. And this is the ſenſe of Origen, Teſtimonio "ſanè conſcientiæ uti Apoſtolus dicit eos qui deſcriptam continent in cordibus legem, &c. The Apoſtle ſays, that they uſe the teſtimony of conſcience, who have the "law written in their hearts. Hence it is neceſſary to enquire what that is which the "Apoſtle cals conſcience, whether it be any other ſubſtance then the heart or ſoul? "For of this it is otherwhere ſaid, that it reprehends, but is not reprehended, and "that it judges a man, but it ſelf is judged of no man: as John ſaith, If our con-"ſcience condemne us not, then have we confidence towards God. And again, Paul "himſelf ſaith in another place, Our glorying is this, even the teſtimony of our con-"ſcience; becauſe therefore I ſee ſo great a liberty of it, that in good things it is "always glad and rejoyces, but in evil things it is not reproved, but reproves and "corrects the ſoul it ſelf to which it does adhere: I doe ſuppoſe that this is the "very ſpirit which by the Apoſtle is ſaid to be with the ſoul, as a pædagogue and

9. Thus, Conſcience is the Minde, and God writing his laws in our mindes is, informing our conſcience, and furniſhing it with laws and rules, and meaſures, and it is called by S. Paul, νόμος τοῦ νοός, the law of the minde; and though it is once made a diſtinct thing from the minde (as in thoſe words, Their mindes and conſciences are defiled) yet it happens in this word as in divers others, that it is ſometimes taken largely, ſometimes ſpecifically and more determinately: The minde is all the whole underſtanding part, it is the memory; ſo Peter called to minde the word that Jeſus ſpake, that is, he remembred it. It is, the ſignification or meaning, the purpoſe or reſolution. No man knoweth the minde of the ſpirit, but the ſpirit. It is the diſcurſive or reaſoning part; Mary caſt in her minde what manner of ſalutation this ſhould be. It is the aſſenting and determining part; let every man be fully perſwaded in his own minde: and it is alſo taken for Conſcience, or that Treaſure of rules which are in order to practice. And therefore when S. Paul intended to expreſs the anger of God puniſhing evil men with evil conſciences and falſe perſwaſions in order to criminal actions and evil worſhippings, he ſaid, God gave them over εἰς νοῦν ἀδόκιμον, to a reprobate minde, that is, to a conſcience evil perſwaded, furniſhed with falſe practical principles; but the return to holineſs, and the improvement of a holy conſcience is called, a being renewed in the ſpirit of our minde, ἀνακαίνωσις τοῦ νοός, the renovation of the minde.

Rom. 7. 23. Titus 3. 15. Marc. 14. 72. Philip. 2. 5. 1 Cor. 2. 16. Luc. 1. 29. Rom. 14. 5. Rom. 1. 28. Epheſ 4. 23. Rom. 12. 2.

10. Now there are two ways by which God reigns in the minde of a man, 1. Faith, and 2. Conſcience. Faith contains all the treaſures of Divine knowledge and ſpeculation. Conſcience is the treaſury of divine Commandements and rules in practical things. Faith tells us why; Conſcience tells us what we are to doe. Faith is the meaſure of our perſwaſions; Conſcience is the meaſure of our actions. And as Faith is a gift of God, ſo is Conſcience; that is, as the underſtanding of a man is taught by the Spirit of God in Scripture, what to beleeve, how to diſtinguiſh truth from errors; ſo is the Conſcience inſtructed to diſtinguiſh good and evil, how to pleaſe God, how to doe juſtice and charity to our neighbour, and how to treat our ſelves; ſo that when the revelations of Chriſt and the Commandements of God are fully recorded in our mindes, then we are perfectly inſtructed to every good work.

Governed by a Rule ——

11. S. Bernard comparing the Conſcience to a houſe, ſays it ſtands upon ſeven pillars. 1. Good will. 2. Memory of Gods benefits. 3. A clean heart. 4. A free ſpirit. 5. A right ſoul. 6. A devout minde. 7. An enlightned reaſon. Theſe indeed are ſome of them the fruits and effects, ſome of them are the annexes and appendages of a good conſcience, but not the foundations or pillars upon which Conſcience is built. For as for the firſt

De interiori domo cap. 7.

Good will.

12. Conſcience relies not at all upon the will directly. For though a Conſcience is good, or bad, pure or impure; and ſo the Doctors of Myſtick Theology divide and handle it, yet a conſcience is not made ſo by the will, formally, but by the understanding. For that is a good conscience, which is rightly taught in the word of life; that is impure and defiled, which hath entertained evil and ungodly principles; such is theirs, who follow false lights, evil teachers, men of corrupt minds. For the conscience is a Judge and a Guide, a Monitor and a Witness, which are offices of the knowing, not of the choosing faculty. Spiritum correctorem, & pædagogum animæ, so Origen[a] calls it. The instructor of the soul, the spirit, the corrector. Naturale judicatorium, or naturalis vis judicandi, so S. Basil. The natural power of judging, or natures judgement seat. Lucem intellectus nostri, so Damascen calsit, The light of our understanding. The conscience does accuse or excuse a man before God, which the will cannot. If it could, we should all stand upright at doomesday, or at least those would be acquitted, who fain would doe well, but miss, who do the things they love not, and love those they doe not; that is, they who strive to enter in, but shall not be able. But to accuse or excuse is the office of a faculty which can neither will nor choose, that is, of the conscience; which is properly a record, a book, and a judgement seat.

[a] Ubi sup. In Psal. 48.

13. But I said, Conscience relies not upon the will [directly] yet it cannnot be denied, but the will hath force upon the conscience collaterally and indirectly. For the evil will perverts the understanding, and makes it beleeve false principles; deceiving and being deceived is the lot of false Prophets; and they that are given over to beleeve a lie, will live in a lie, and doe actions relative to that false doctrine which evil manners first perswaded and introduc'd. For although it cannot be that Hereticks should sin in the article against the actual light of their consciences, because he that wittingly and willingly sins against a known truth is not properly a Heretick but a Blasphemer, and sins against the Holy Ghost; and he that sees a Heretick run to the stake or to the gallows, or the Donatist kill himself, or the Circumcellian break his own neck with as much confidence to bear witness to his heresie, as any of the blessed Martyrs to give testimony to Christianity it self, cannot but think he heartily beleeves, what so willingly he dies for; yet either hereticks do sin voluntarily, and so distinguish from simple errors, or else they are the same thing, and either every simple error is damnable, or no heresie. It must therefore be observed, that

14. The will of man is cause of its actions either mediately or immediately. Some are the next products of our will; such are Pride, Ambition, Prejudice, and these blinde the understanding, and make an evil and a corrupted conscience, making it an incompetent judge of truth and error, good and evil. So that the corruption of conscience in a heretick is voluntary in the principle, but miserable and involuntary in the product; it may proceed from the will efficiently, but it is formally a depravation of the understanding.

15. And therefore our wils also must be humble and apt, and desirous to learn, and willing to obey. Obedite & intelligetis, by humility and obedience we shall be best instructed. Not that by this means the conscience shall receive direct aids, but because by this means it will be left in its own aptnesses and dispositions, and when it is not hindred, the word of God will enter and dwel upon the conscience. And in this sense it is that some say that [Conscience is the inclination and propension of the will corresponding to practical knowledge] Will and Conscience are like the cognati sensus, the Touch and the Tast; or the Teeth and the Eares, affected and assisted by some common objects, whose effect is united united in matter and ſome reall events, and diſtinguiſhed by their formalities, or metaphyſical beings.

2. Memory of Gods benefits,

16. Is indeed a good ingagement to make us dutiful, and ſo may incline the will; but it hath no other force upon the conſcience but that it re-minds us of a ſpecial obligation to thankfulneſs, which is a new and proper tie of duty; but it works onely by a principle that is already in the conſcience, viz. that we are ſpecially oblig'd to our gracious lords; and the obedience that is due to God as our lord doubles upon us by love and zeal when we remember him to be our bountiful Patron, and our gracious Father.

3. A clean heart,

17. May be an effect and emanation from a holy Conſcience; but conſcience in it ſelf may be either good or bad, or it may be good when the heart is not clean, as it is in all the worſt men who actually ſin againſt conſcience, doing that which conſcience forbids them. In theſe men the principles are holy, the inſtruction perfect, the law remaining, the perſwaſions uncancell'd; but againſt all this torrent, there is a whirlwinde of paſſions and filthy reſolutions, and wilfulneſs, which corrupt the heart, while as yet the head is uncorrupted in the direct rules of conſcience. But yet ſometimes a clean conſcience and a clean heart are the ſame; and a good conſcience is taken for holineſs, ſo S. Paul uſes the word, holding faith and a good conſcience, which ſome having put away have made ſhipwrack, ὅτι τ θεοθεν ἠκυσαν συνειδησιν ἀπιςια κατεμιαναν, ſo Clemens Alexandrinus explicates the place; they have by infidelity polluted their divine and holy conſcience: but S. Paul ſeems to argue otherwiſe, and that they laying aſide a good conſcience fell into infidelity; their hearts and conſcience were firſt corrupted, and then they turn'd hereticks. But this ſenſe of a good conſcience is that which in Myſtick Divinity is more properly handled, in which ſenſe alſo it is ſometimes uſed in the law. Idem eſt conſcientia quod vir bonus intrinſecè, ſaid Ungarellus [a] out of Baldus [b]; and from thence Aretine [c] gathered this concluſion, that if any thing be committed to the conſcience of any one, they muſt ſtand to his determination & ab eâ appellari non poteſt; there lies no appeal, quia vir bonus pro quo ſumitur conſcientia non poteſt mentiri & falſum dicere vel judicare. A good man, for whom the word conſcience is uſed, cannot lie, or give a falſe judgement or teſtimony: of this ſort of conſcience it is ſaid by Ben Sirach, Bonam ſubſtantiam habet cui non eſt peccatum in conſcientiâ. It is a mans wealth to have no ſin in our conſcience. But in our preſent and future diſcourſes, the word conſcience is underſtood in the Philoſophical ſenſe, not in the Myſtical, that is, not for the conſcience as it is inveſted with the accidents of good or bad, but as it abſtracts from both, but is capable of either.

4. A free ſpirit,

18. Is the bleſſing and effect of an obedient will to a well inſtructed conſcience, and more properly and peculiarly to the grace of chaſtity, to honeſty and ſimplicity; a ſlaviſh, morous, a childiſh and a trifling ſpirit being the puniſhment inflicted upon David before he repented of his fact with Bathſheba. But there is alſo a freedom which is properly the privilege, or the affection of conſcience, and is of great uſefulneſs to all its nobler operations; and that is, a being clear from prejudice and prepoſſeſſion, a purſuing of truths with holy purpoſes, an inquiring after them with a ſingle eye, not infected with any ſickneſs or unreaſonableneſs. This is the ſame thing with that which he diſtinctly the understanding. For that is a good conscience, which is rightly taught in the word of life; that is impure and defiled, which hath entertained evil and ungodly principles; such is theirs, who follow false lights, evil teachers, men of corrupt minds. For the conscience is a Judge and a Guide, a Monitor and a Witness, which are offices of the knowing, not of the choosing faculty. Spiritum correctorem, & pædagogum animæ, so Origen[a] calls it. The instructor of the soul, the spirit, the corrector. Naturale judicatorium, or naturalis vis judicandi, so S. Basil. The natural power of judging, or natures judgement seat. Lucem intellectus nostri, so Damascen calls it, The light of our understanding. The conscience does accuse or excuse a man before God, which the will cannot. If it could, we should all stand upright at doomesday, or at least those would be acquitted, who fain would doe well, but miss, who do the things they love not, and love those they doe not; that is, they who strive to enter in, but shall not be able. But to accuse or excuse is the office of a faculty which can neither will nor choose, that is, of the conscience; which is properly a record, a book, and a judgement seat.

[a] Ubi sup. In Psal. 48.

13. But I said, Conscience relies not upon the will [directly] yet it cannnot be denied, but the will hath force upon the conscience collaterally and indirectly. For the evil will perverts the understanding, and makes it beleeve false principles; deceiving and being deceived is the lot of false Prophets; and they that are given over to beleeve a lie, will live in a lie, and doe actions relative to that false doctrine which evil manners first perswaded and introduc'd. For although it cannot be that Hereticks should sin in the article against the actual light of their consciences, because he that wittingly and willingly sins against a known truth is not properly a Heretick but a Blasphemer, and sins against the Holy Ghost; and he that sees a Heretick run to the stake or to the gallows, or the Donatist kill himself, or the Circumcellian break his own neck with as much confidence to bear witness to his heresie, as any of the blessed Martyrs to give testimony to Christianity it self, cannot but think he heartily beleeves, what so willingly he dies for; yet either hereticks do sin voluntarily, and so distinguish from simple errors, or else they are the same thing, and either every simple error is damnable, or no heresie. It must therefore be observed, that

14. The will of man is cause of its actions either mediately or immediately. Some are the next products of our will; such are Pride, Ambition, Prejudice, and these blinde the understanding, and make an evil and a corrupted conscience, making it an incompetent judge of truth and error, good and evil. So that the corruption of conscience in a heretick is voluntary in the principle, but miserable and involuntary in the product; it may proceed from the will efficiently, but it is formally a depravation of the understanding.

15. And therefore our wils also must be humble and apt, and desirous to learn, and willing to obey. Obedite & intelligetis, by humility and obedience we shall be best instructed. Not that by this means the conscience shall receive direct aids, but because by this means it will be left in its own aptnesses and dispositions, and when it is not hindred, the word of God will enter and dwel upon the conscience. And in this sense it is that some say that [Conscience is the inclination and propension of the will corresponding to practical knowledge] Will and Conscience are like the cognati sensus, the Touch and the Tast; or the Teeth and the Eares, affected and assisted by some common objects, whose effect is united united in matter and ſome reall events, and diſtinguiſhed by their formalities, or metaphyſical beings.

2. Memory of Gods benefits,

16. Is indeed a good ingagement to make us dutiful, and ſo may incline the will; but it hath no other force upon the conſcience but that it re-minds us of a ſpecial obligation to thankfulneſs, which is a new and proper tie of duty; but it works onely by a principle that is already in the conſcience, viz. that we are ſpecially oblig'd to our gracious lords; and the obedience that is due to God as our lord doubles upon us by love and zeal when we remember him to be our bountiful Patron, and our gracious Father.

3. A clean heart,

17. May be an effect and emanation from a holy Conſcience; but conſcience in it ſelf may be either good or bad, or it may be good when the heart is not clean, as it is in all the worſt men who actually ſin againſt conſcience, doing that which conſcience forbids them. In theſe men the principles are holy, the inſtruction perfect, the law remaining, the perſwaſions uncancell'd; but againſt all this torrent, there is a whirlwinde of paſſions and filthy reſolutions, and wilfulneſs, which corrupt the heart, while as yet the head is uncorrupted in the direct rules of conſcience. But yet ſometimes a clean conſcience and a clean heart are the ſame; and a good conſcience is taken for holineſs, ſo S. Paul uſes the word, holding faith and a good conſcience, which ſome having put away have made ſhipwrack, ὅπ τ θεσθεν ἧκσαν συνειδησιν ἀπισια καπεμιαναν, ſo Clemens Alexandrinus explicates the place; they have by infidelity polluted their divine and holy conſcience: but S. Paul ſeems to argue otherwiſe, and that they laying aſide a good conſcience fell into infidelity; their hearts and conſcience were firſt corrupted, and then they turn'd hereticks. But this ſenſe of a good conſcience is that which in Myſtick Divinity is more properly handled, in which ſenſe alſo it is ſometimes uſed in the law. Idem eſt conſcientia quod vir bonus intrinſecè, ſaid Ungarellus [a] out of Baldus [b]; and from thence Arctine gathered this concluſion, that if any thing be committed to the conſcience of any one, they muſt ſtand to his determination & ab eâ appellari non poteſt; there lies no appeal, quia vir bonus pro quo ſumitur conſcientia non poteſt mentiri & falſum dicere vel judicare. A good man, for whom the word conſcience is uſed, cannot lie, or give a falſe judgement or teſtimony: of this ſort of conſcience it is ſaid by Ben Sirach, Bonam ſubſtantiam habet cui non eſt peccatum in conſcientiâ. It is a mans wealth to have no ſin in our conſcience. But in our preſent and future diſcourſes, the word conſcience is underſtood in the Philoſophical ſenſe, not in the Myſtical, that is, not for the conſcience as it is inveſted with the accidents of good or bad, but as it abſtracts from both, but is capable of either.

4. A free ſpirit,

18. Is the bleſſing and effect of an obedient will to a well inſtructed conſcience, and more properly and peculiarly to the grace of chaſtity, to honeſty and ſimplicity; a ſlaviſh, morous, a childiſh and a trifling ſpirit being the puniſhment inflicted upon David before he repented of his fact with Bathſheba. But there is alſo a freedom which is properly the privilege, or the affection of conſcience, and is of great uſefulneſs to all its nobler operations; and that is, a being clear from prejudice and prepoſſeſſion, a purſuing of truths with holy purpoſes, an inquiring after them with a ſingle eye, not infected with any ſickneſs or unreaſonableneſs. This is the ſame thing with that which he diſtinctly

cals [A right ſoul] To this is appendant alſo, that the conſcience cannot be conſtrained, it is of it ſelf a free ſpirit, and is ſubject to no commands, but thoſe of reaſon and religion. God onely is the Lord of our conſcience, and the conſcience is not to ſubject it ſelf any more to the Empire of ſin, to the law of Moſes, to a ſervile ſpirit, but to the laws of God alone, and the obedience of Jeſus, willingly, chearfully, and in all inſtances, whether the Commandement be conveyed by the holy Jeſus, or by his Vicegerents. But of this I ſhall afterwards give particular accounts.

5. A devout minde,

19. May procure more light to the conſcience, and aſſiſtances from the ſpirit of wiſdome in caſes of difficulty, and is a good remedy againſt a doubting and a ſcrupulous conſcience; but this is but indirect, and by the intermiſſion of other more immediate and proper entercourſes.

20. 6. But the laſt is perfectly the foundation of conſcience.

An enlightned Reaſon.

To which if we adde what S. Bernard before cals a right ſoul, that is, an honeſt heart, full of ſimplicity and hearty attention, and ready aſſent, we have all that by which the conſcience is informed and reformed, inſtructed and preſerved in its juſt meaſures, ſtrengths, and relations. For the Rule of Conſcience is all that notice of things and rules by which God would have good and evil to be meaſured, that is, the will of God communicated to us by any means, by reaſon, and by enlightning, that is, natural and inſtructed. So that conſcience is τὸ φυσικὸς, and θεοδίδακτος, it is principled by creation, and it is inſtructed or illuminated in the regeneration. For God being the fountain of all good, and good being nothing but a conformity to him, or to his will, what meaſures he makes, are to limit us. No man can make meaſures of good and evil, any more then he can make the good it ſelf. Men ſometimes give the inſtance in which the good is meaſured; but the meaſure it ſelf is the will of God. For therefore it is good to obey humane laws, becauſe it is Gods will we ſhould; and although the man makes the law to which we are to give obedience, yet that is not the rule. The rule is the Commandement of God, for by it obedience is made a duty.

Meaſured by the proportions of good and evil——

21. That is, of that which God hath declared to be good or evil reſpectively, the conſcience is to be informed. God hath taken care that his laws ſhall be publiſhed to all his ſubjects, he hath written them where they muſt needs read them, not in tables of ſtone or phylacteries on the forehead, but in a ſecret Table: The conſcience or minde of a man is the φυλακτήριον, the preſerver of the Court Rols of heaven. But I added this clauſe, to the former of [a Rule] becauſe the expreſs line of Gods rule is not the adequate meaſure of conſcience: but there are analogies and proportions, and commenſurations of things with things, which make the meaſure full and equal. For he does not always keep a good conſcienee who keeps onely the words of a Divine law, but the proportions alſo and the reaſons of it, the ſimilitudes and correſpondencies in like inſtances, are the meaſures of conſcience.

22. The whole meaſure and rule of conſcience is, The law of God, or Gods will, ſignified to us by nature, or revelation, and by the ſeveral manners and times times and parts of its communication it hath obtained ſeveral names. The law of Nature. * The conſent of Nations. * Right Reaſon. * The Decalogue. * The Sermon of Chriſt. * The Canons of the Apoſtles. * The laws Eccleſiaſtical and Civil of Princes and Governours. * Fame, or the publick reputation of things, expreſſed by Proverbs and other inſtances and meaſures of publick honeſty. This is ſo Euripides cals it, all the rule that teaches us good or evil. Theſe being the full meaſures of right and wrong, of lawful and unlawful, will be the Rule of Conſcience, and the ſubject of the preſent Books.

Κανὼν τῶ καλῶ, τὸ γ' αἰσχρὸν μαθὼν,

In order to practice——

23. In this, conſcience differs from knowledge, which is in order to ſpeculation, and ineffective notices. And it differs from faith, becauſe although faith is alſo in order to practice, yet not directly and immediately: it is a collection of propoſitions, the belief of which makes it neceſſary to live well, and reaſonable and choſen. But before the propoſitions of faith paſs into action, they muſt be tranſmitted through another principle, and that is conſcience. That Jeſus Chriſt is the Son of God, and our Lord, and our Maſter, is a propoſition of faith, and from thence if we paſs on to practice, we firſt take in another propoſition; If he be our lord, where is his fear? and this is a ſentence, or virtual propoſition of conſcience. And from hence we may underſtand the full meaning of the word [Conſcience.] Συνείδησις, and Conſcientia, and ſo our Engliſh word Conſcience have in them Science or Knowledge: the ſeat of it is the Underſtanding, the act of it is Knowing, but there muſt be a knowing of more together.

24. Hugo de S: Victore ſays, that Conſcientia eſt cordis ſcientia, Conſcience is the knowledge of the heart. It is ſo, but certainly this was not the ἔτυμον and original of the word. But there is truth in the following period. Cor noſcit ſe & alia. Quando autem ſe noſcit appellatur conſcientia, quando præter ſe, alia noſcit, appellatur ſcientia. Knowledge hath for its object any thing without; but when the heart knows it ſelf, then it is conſcience. So it is uſed in Authors ſacred and prophane. Nihil mihi conſcius ſum, ſaith S. Paul; I know nothing by my ſelf; ut alios lateas, tute tibi conſcius eris: and

——hic murus aheneus eſto,
Nil conſcire ſibi—— ſo Cicero to Marcus Rutilius uſes it; Cùm & mihi conſcius eſſem quanti te facerem; When I my ſelf was conſcious to my ſelf how much I did value thee. But this acception of the word conſcience is true, but not full and adequate; for it onely ſignifies conſcience as it is a Witneſs, not as a Guide. Therefore it is more reaſonable which Aquinas and the Schoolmen generally uſe: that conſcience is a conjunction of the univerſal practical law with the particular moral action: and ſo it is ſcientia cum rebus facti, and then it takes in that which is called συντήρησις, or the general repoſitory of moral principles or meaſures of good, and the particular caſes as reduced to practice. Such as was the caſe of S. Peter when he denied his Lord: He knew that he ought not to have done it, and his conſcience being ſufficiently taught his duty to his Lord, he alſo knew that he had done it, and then there followed a remorſe, a biting, or gnawing of his ſpirit, grief, and ſhame, and a conſequent weeping: when all all theſe acts meet together, it is the full proceſs of conſcience.

1. The συντήρησις or the firſt act of conſcience, S. Hierome cals Scintillam conſcientiæ, the ſpark or fire put into the heart of man.

2. The συνείδησις, which is ſpecifically called conſcience of the deed done, is the bringing fuel to this fire.

3. And when they are thus laid together, they will either ſhine or burn; acquit or condemne. But this complication of acts is conſcience. The firſt is Science, practical ſcience; but annex the ſecond: or it and the third, and then it is conſcience. When Davids heart ſmote him, that is, upon his adultery and murder, his conſcience thus diſcours'd. Adultery and Murder are high violations of the Divine Law, they provoke God to anger, without whom I cannot live, whoſe anger is worſe then death. This is practical knowledge, or the principles of conſcience; but the following acts made it up into conſcience. For he remembred that he had betrayed Uriah and humbled Bathſheba, and then he begs of God for pardon; ſtanding condemn'd in his own breaſt, he hopes to be forgiven by Gods ſentence. But the whole proceſs of conſcience is in two practical Syllogiſms, in which the method is ever this. The συντήρησις or Repoſitory of practical principles begins, and where that leaves, the conſcience or the witneſs and Judge of moral actions begins, like Jacob laying hold upon his elder brothers heel. The firſt is this:

Whatſoever is injurious ought not to be done,
But to commit adultery is injurious,
Therefore it ought not to be done:

This is the Rule of conſcience, or the firſt act of conſcience as it is a Rule and a Guide, and is taken for the συντήρησις, or practical repoſitory. But when an action is done or about to be done, conſcience takes the concluſion of the former Syllogiſm, and applies it to her particular caſe.

Adultery ought not to be done,
This action I go about, or which I have done, is adultery,
Therefore it ought not to be done, or to have been done.

This is the full proceeding of this Court; after which many conſequent ſolemnities and actions do paſs, of ſentence, and preparatory torments and execution.

25. But this I am to admoniſh, that although this which I have thus defin'd, is the proper and full ſence of the word Conſcience according to art and proper acceptation, yet in Scripture it is uſed indifferently for an act of conſcience, or any of its parts, and does not always ſignify in its latitude and integrity, but yet it all tends to the ſame ſignification; and though the name be given to the faculty, to the habit, to the act, to the object, to the effect, to every emanation from the minde in things practical, yet ſtill it ſuppoſes the ſame thing: viz. that conſcience is the guide of all our moral actions; and by giving the name to ſo many acts and parts and effluxes from it, it warrants the definition of it when it is united in its own proper and integral conſtitution.

Acts 23.1. & 24.16. Rom. 13.5. 1 Cor. 8.10. & 19.12. 1 Tim. 1.5.19. & 3.9. 2 Tim. 1.3. Titus 1.15. 1 Pet. 2.19. 3.16. Heb. 13.18.

To conduct all our relations and entercourſes between God, our Neighbours and our Selves; that is, in all moral actions.

26. This is the final cauſe of conſcience: and by this it is diſtinguiſhed from prudence, which is alſo a practical knowledge and reduc'd to particular and circumſtantiate actions. But 1. Prudence conſiſts in the things of the world, or relative to the world; Conſcience in the things of God, or relating to him.

2. Pru-

2. Prudence is about affairs as they are of advantage or diſadvantage: conſcience is imployed about them as they are honeſt or diſhoneſt. 3. Prudence regards the circumſtances of actions whether moral or civil: conſcience onely regards moral actions in their ſubſtance or eſſential proprieties. 4. Prudence intends to doe actions dexterouſly and proſperouſly: conſcience is to conduct them juſtly and according to the Commandement. 5. There are many actions in which prudence is not at all concerned as being wholly indifferent to this or that for matter of advantage; but there is no action but muſt paſs under the file and cenſure of Conſcience; for if we can ſuppoſe any action in all its circumſtances to be wholly indifferent to good or bad; yet none is ſo to lawful or unlawful, the very indifferent, being therefore lawful becauſe it is indifferent, and therefore to be conſidered by conſcience, either actually or habitually: For in this ſenſe even our natural actions in their time and place, are alſo moral, and where they are not primarily moral, yet they come under conſcience, as being permitted, and innocent; but where ever they are relative to another perſon, they put on ſome more degrees of morality, and are of proper cogniſance in this Court.

Qui didicit patriæ quid debeat, & quid amicis:
Quo ſit amore parens, quo Frater amandus, & Hoſpes:
Quid ſit Conſcripti, quid Judicis officium: quæ
Partes in bellum miſſi Ducis: ille profectò
Reddere perſonæ ſcit convenientia cuique.

Horat. de arte Poet.

That is the full effect of conſcience, to conduct all our relations, all our moral actions.

RULE 2.

The duty and offices of Conſcience are to dictate, and to teſtify or bear witneſs; to accuſe or excuſe; to looſe or binde.

THE firſt and laſt are the direct acts and offices of Conſcience: the other are reflex or conſequent actions, but direct offices. The firſt act which is,

To dictate

Is of that which Divines call the σωτήρησις, or the phylactery, the keeper of the records of the laws, and by it we are taught our duty: God having written it in our hearts by Nature and by the Spirit, leaves it there, ever plac'd before the eye of conſcience as S. Bernard cals it) to be read and uſed for directions in all caſes of diſpute, of queſtion or action: this is that which S. Paul cals the work of the law written in our hearts, and therefore it is, that to ſin againſt our conſcience is ſo totally inexcuſable, and according to the degree of that violence which is done againſt the conſcience, puts on degrees. For conſcience dictates whatſoever it is perſwaded of, and will not ſuffer a man to do otherwiſe then it ſuggeſts and tels us: Rom. 2. 15.

Αἰ γὰρ πῶς αὐτόν με μὸ ὠμὸν ἐδμὸς ἀνείη
Ὠμὸ ἀπαμενόμενον κρέα ἔδμεναι·

Iliad. χ.

ſaid Achilles of Hector when he was violently angry with him; I would my conſcience would give me leave to eat thy very fleſh.

Its

2. Its univerſal dictates are ever the moſt certain, and thoſe are the firſt principles of juſtice and religion; and whatſoever elſe can be infallibly and immediately inferr'd from thence, are her dictates alſo, but not primely and directly, but tranſmitted by the hands of reaſon. The ſame reaſon alſo there is in clear revelation. For whatſoever is put into the conſcience immediately by God, is plac'd there to the ſame purpoſe, and with the ſame efficiency and perſwaſion as is all that which is natural. And the conſcience properly dictates nothing elſe, but prime natural reaſon, and immediate revelation; whatſoever comes after theſe two, is reach'd forth to us by two hands, one whereof alone is miniſtred by conſcience. The reaſon is this: Becauſe all that law by which God governs us is written in our hearts, put there by God immediately, that is, antecedently to all our actions, becauſe it is that by which all our actions are to be guided, even our diſcourſings and arguings are to be guided by conſcience, if the argument be moral: now the ways by which God ſpeaks to us immediately, are onely Nature and the Spirit: Nature is that principle which taught all men from the beginning until now; all that prime practical reaſon which is perfective of humane nature, and in which all mankinde agrees. Either the perfections, or the renovations, or the ſuperadditions to this are taught us by the Holy Spirit, and all this being written in the conſcience by the finger of God is brought forth upon all occaſions of action; and whatſoever is done againſt any thing ſo plac'd, is directly and violently againſt the conſcience; but when from thence reaſon ſpins a longer thred, and draws it out from the clue of natural principles or expreſs revelation, that alſo returns upon the conſcience and is plac'd there as light upon a wall, but not as the ſtones that are there: but yet whatever is done againſt that light is alſo againſt conſcience but not ſo as the other. Juſt as it is in nature and accident. To eat poiſon, and filthineſs is againſt every mans health and ſtomack; but if by an ἰδιοσυγκρασια a propriety of temper or an evil habit, or accidental inordination, wine, or fiſh makes a man ſick, then theſe are againſt his nature too, but not ſo as poiſon is, or ſtones. Whatever comes into the conſcience primarily, or conſequently, right or wrong, is brought forth upon occaſion of action, and is part of her dictate: but as a man ſpeaks ſome things of his own knowledge, ſome things by hearſay; ſo does conſcience, ſomethings ſhe tels from God and her ſelf, ſome things from reaſon and her ſelf, or other accidental notices: Theſe and theſe do integrate and complete her ſermons, but they have ſeveral influence and obligation according to their proper efficiency. But of this I ſhall give full accounts in the ſecond Book.

To teſtifie.

3. Conſcience bears witneſs of our actions; ſo S. Paul, their conſcience bearing witneſs: and in this ſenſe, conſcience is a practical memory. For as the practical knowledge, or notices ſubjected in the underſtanding make the underſtanding to be conſcience; ſo the actions of our life recorded in the memory and brought forth to practical judgements, change the memory alſo into conſcience. τὸ γὰρ γένος τ ἀνθρωπων παντη διαφέρον & τ ἀλλων ζωων, ἡ μόνοις αὐτοῖς μέτεστι τ λογισμῶ φαινεσθαι ὡς ἐοικε καὶ τ ἀγνοηθέντων αὐτοῖς τ παρειρημένων διαφορᾶν, καὶ δεῖν ὅτι τῶν ἀλλων ζωων. ἀλλ' ὑπομιμνήσκεσθαι τὰ γινόμενα καὶ δυσαρεστεῖσθαι τοῖς πραχθεῖσι. Man differing from brute beaſts by the uſe of reaſon, it is not likely he ſhould be a ſtranger to his own actions as the beaſts are, but that the evil which is done ſhould be recalled to their minde with the ſignification of ſome diſpleaſure. So Polybius diſcourſes of the reaſon and the manner of conſcience.

Every

4. Every knowing faculty is the ſeat of conſcience, and the ſame faculty when it is furniſhed with ſpeculative notions retains its natural and proper name of Underſtanding, or Memory; but as the ſame is inſtructed with notices in order to judgements practical, ſo it takes the Chriſtian name of Conſcience. The Volitive or chooſing faculty cannot, but the intellectual may. And this is that Book which at Doomſday ſhall be brought forth and laid open to all the world. The Memory chang'd into Conſcience preſerves the notices of ſome things, and ſhall be reminded of others, and ſhall doe that work intirely and perfectly, which now it does imperfectly and by parts, according to the words of S. Paul, Then ſhall we know as we are known, that is, as God knows us now, ſo then ſhall we ſee and know our ſelves. Nullum theatrum virtuti conſcientiâ majus, ſhall then be highly verified. Our conſcience will be the great Scene or Theatre upon which ſhall be repreſented all our actions good and bad. It is Gods Book, the Book of life or death. According to the words of S. Bernard, Ex his quæ ſcripta erunt in libris noſtris judicabimur: & ideò ſcribi debent ſecundùm exemplar libri vitæ, & ſi ſic ſcripti non ſunt, ſaltem corrigendi ſunt. We ſhall be judged by that which is written in our own books (the books of conſcience) and therefore they ought to be written according to the copy of the book of life; and if they be not ſo written, yet they ought to be ſo corrected.

5. Conſequently to theſe the conſcience does

Accuſe or Excuſe.

So S. Paul joyns them as conſequent to the former; Their conſcience bearing witneſs, and their thoughts in the mean time accuſing or excuſing one another. Si optimorum conſiliorum atque factorum teſtis in omni vita nobis conſcientia fuerit, ſine ullo metu ſumma cum honeſtate vivemus. If our conſcience be the witneſs that in our life we do good deeds, and follow ſober counſels, we ſhall live in great honeſty and without fear. Δικαστὴν Θεὸς ἐπέστησε καὶ δικαιότατον ἅμα καὶ οἰκειότατον, ὅ συνειδὸς αὐτὸ, καὶ καὶ ὀρθὸν λογον, ſaid Hierocles, God hath conſtituted a moſt righteous and domeſtick Judge, the Conſcience and right Reaſon; καὶ αὐτὸν ἑαυτῷ ὂν πάντων μάλιστα αἰδεῖσθαι προσεπαιδεύθημεν, Every man ought moſt of all to fear himſelf, becauſe it is impoſſible but we ſhould know what we have done amiſs, and it concerns us alſo to make righteous judgement, for we cannot eſcape our ſelves. Μηδέποτε μηδὲν αἰσχρὸν ποιήσας ἔλπιζε λήσειν· καὶ γὰρ ἂν τοὺς ἄλλους λάθῃς, σεαυτῷ γε συνειδήσεις, ſaid Iſocrates. Etſi à cæteris ſilentium eſt, tamen ipſe ſibimet conſcius eſt poſſe ſe meritò increpari, ſo Apuleius renders it. Though others hold their peace, yet there is one within that will not.

Rom. 2. 15.

Cicero pro Cluentio.

Nec facile eſt placidam ac pacatam degere vitam,
Qui violat factis communia fœdera pacis:
Etſi fallit enim Divum genus, Humanúmque;
Perpetuò tamen id fore clam diffidere debet.

Lucretius.

It is hard to be concealed from God and man too, and although we think our ſelves ſafe for a while, yet we have ſomething within that tels us ὁτὶ ἔστι λάθρα τι ποιῶν, he that does any thing is eſpied, and cannot doe it privately. Quîcum in tenebris? was the old Proverb; Who was with you in the dark? And therefore it was that Epicurus affirm'd it to be impoſſible for a man to be concealed always. Upon the miſtake of which he was accuſed by Plutarch and others, to have ſuppoſed it lawful to doe any injuſtice ſecretly; whereas his deſign was to obſtruct that gate of iniquity, and to make men beleeve that even that ſin which was committed moſt ſecretly, would ſome time or other be diſcovered and brought to puniſhment; all which is to be done by the extraregular events of providence, and the certain accuſations and diſcoveries of Conſcience.

6. For Conſcience is the Looking-glaſs of the ſoul, ſo it was called by Periphanes in Plautus;

In Epidico.

Non oris causâ modò homines æquum fuit
Sibi habere ſpeculum, ubi os contemplarent ſuum;
Sed qui perſpicere poſſent cor ſapientiæ:
Igitur perſpicere poſſent ut cordis copiam
Ubi id inſpexiſſent, cogitarent poſtea
Vitam ut vixiſſent olim in adoleſcentia.

And a man looking into his Conſcience, inſtructed with the word of God its proper rule, is by S. James compar'd to a man beholding his natural face in a glaſs; and that the Apoſtle deſcribes Conſcience in that ſimilitude, is to be gathered from the word ἔμφυτον λόγον, verbum inſitum, the ingraffed word, the word of God written in our hearts, which who ſo looks on, and compares his actions with his rule, may ſee what he is: but he that neglects this word and follows not this rule, did indeed ſee his face, but hath forgotten what manner of man he was, that is, what he was fram'd in the works of the new Creation, when he was newly form'd and created unto righteouſneſs and true holineſs.

James 1. 21, 23, 24.

7. This accuſation and watchfulneſs, and vocal, clamorous guards of Conſcience are in perpetual attendance, and though they may ſleep, yet they are quickly awakened, and make the evil man reſtleſs. Τὸ ἀδικεῖν ἐν ἅπασι δεινὸν ἀθλίως καὶ ἀσεφόβως ζῶν ὁ πάντα χρόνον, ὅτι καὶ λαθεῖν ἀδύνατον ἔστι· ὅδεν ὁ μέλλον. ἀεὶ φόβος ἐν κύκλῳ. ὅτου δὲ χαίρειν, ἐπὶ διαρρεῖν δεῖ τοῖς πᾶσι, ſaid Epicurus, which is very well rendred by Seneca, Ideo non prodeſt latentibus, quòd latendi etiamſi felicitatem habeant, fiduciam non habent. They that live unjuſtly, always live miſerably and fearfully; becauſe although their crime be ſecret, yet they cannot be confident that it ſhall be ſo: meaning, that becauſe their conſcience does accuſe them, they perceive they are diſcovered, and pervious to an eye, which what effect it will have in the publication of the crime here and hereafter, is not matter of knowledge, but cannot chooſe but be matter of fear for ever.

Juven. Sat. 10.

——————fiet adulter
Publicus, & pœnas metuet quaſcunque mariti
Irati debent, nec erit felicior aſtro
Martis, ut in laqueos nunquam incidat——

If any chance makes the fact private, yet no providence or watchfulneſs can give ſecurity, becauſe within there dwels a principle of fear that can never die, till repentance kills it. And therefore Chilon in Laërtius ſaid upon this account, that loſs is rather to be choſen then filthy gain; becauſe that loſs brings ſorrow but once, but injuſtice brings a perpetual fear and pain.

Pers. Sat. 3.

Anne magis Siculi gemuerunt æra juvenci,
Et magis auratis pendens laquearibus enſis
Purpureas ſubter cervices terruit? Imus,
Imus præcipites, quam ſi ſibi dicat, & intus
Palleat infelix quod proxima neſciat uxor.

The wife that lies by his ſide knows not at what the guilty man looks pale, but ſomething that is within the boſome knows; and no pompouſneſs of condition can ſecure the man, and no witty cruelty can equal the torment. For that that alſo, although it be not directly the office of conſcience, yet it is the act and effect of conſcience; when it ſelf is injur'd, it will never let any thing elſe be quiet.

To looſe or binde,

8. Is the reflex act of conſcience. Upon viewing the records, or the συντήρησις, the Legiſlative part of conſcience, it binds to duty; upon viewing the act, it binds to puniſhment, or conſigns to comfort; and in both regards it is called by Origen, affectuum corrector, atque animæ pædagogus, the corrector of the affections, and the teacher of the ſoul. Which kinde of ſimilitude Epictetus in Stobæus followed alſo, Parentes pueros nos pædagogo tradiderunt, qui ubique obſervaret ne læderemur, Deus autem clam viros inſitæ conſcientiæ cuſtodiendos tradidit; quæ quidem cuſtodia nequaquam contemnenda eſt. As our parents have delivered us to a guardian who did watch leſt we did or ſuffered miſchief; ſo hath God committed us to the cuſtody of our conſcience that is planted within us; and this cuſtody is at no hand to be neglected.

9. The binding to duty is ſo an effect of conſcience, that it cannot be ſeparated from it; but the binding to puniſhment is an act of conſcience alſo as it is a Judge, and is intended to affright a ſinner, and to puniſh him: but it is ſuch a puniſhment as is the beginning of hell torments, and unleſs the wound be cured will never end till eternity it ſelf ſhall go into a grave:

Illo nocens ſe damnat quo peccat die, Apud Publianum.

the ſame day that a man ſins, on the ſame day he is condemn'd; and when Menelaus in the Tragedy did ask,

Ορέστα τλήμων τὶς σ' ἀπόλλυσιν νόσος;

what diſeaſe kill'd poor Oreſtes? he was anſwer'd,

Η συνέσις, ὅτι συνοἶδα δεινὰ εἰργασμένος·

His diſeaſe was nothing but an evil conſcience; he had done vile things, and had an amazed ſpirit that diſtracted him, and ſo he died. Curas ultrices Virgil cals the wounds of an evil conſcience, Revenging cares. Nihil eſt miſerius quàm animus hominis conſcius ſaid he in the Comedy; nothing is more miſerable then an evil conſcience, and the being pain'd with it, is called τῷ συνειδότι ἀπάγχεσθαι, to be choked or ſtrangled with an evil conſcience; by S Chryſoſtome (who in his 22. Homily upon the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians, ſpeaks much and excellently to the ſame purpoſe;) and there are ſome that fancy that this was the cauſe of Judas death; The horrors of his conſcience were ſuch that his ſpirits were confounded, and reſtleſs, and uneaſy; and ſtriving to go from their priſon ſtopp'd at the gates of emanation, and ſtifled him. It did that, or as bad; it either choak'd him, or brought him to a haltar, as it hath done many beſides him. Plautus. And although I may truly ſay as he did, no tongue is able to expreſs the evils which are felt by a troubled conſcience, or a wounded ſpirit, yet the heads of them are viſible and notorious to all men.

Non mihi ſi linguæ centum——
Omnia pœnarum percurrere nomina poſſem,

10. 1. The firſt is that which Nazianzen cals τὰς ἐν αὐτοῖς τοῖς δεινοῖς ἐξαγορεύσεις, accuſations and vexings of a man when he is in miſery; then when he needs moſt comfort, he ſhall by his evil conſcience be moſt diſquieted. A ſickneſs awakes a dull ſleeping conſcience, and when it is awaken'd it will make that the man ſhall not ſleep. So Antiochus when his Lieutenant Lyſias was beaten 1 Mace. 6. 12.

ten by the Jews, he fell ſick with grief, and then his conſcience upbraided him; but now (ſaid he) I remember the evils that I did at Jeruſalem; quia invenerunt me mala iſta, ſo the Latin Bible reads it; becauſe theſe evils now have found me out. For when a man is proſperous, it is eaſie for him to ſtop the mouth of conſcience, to bribe or to abuſe it, to fill it with noiſe, and to divert it with buſineſs, to outvie it with temporal gayeties, or to be flattered into weak opinions and ſentences; but when a man is ſmitten of God, and deveſted of all the outſides and hypocriſies of ſin, and that conſcience is disintangled from its fetters and fooliſh pretenſions, then it ſpeaks its own ſenſe, it ever ſpeaks loudeſt when the man is poor, or ſick, or miſerable. This was well explicated by S. Ambroſe, Dum ſumus in quadam delinquendi libidine, nebulis quibuſdam conſcientiæ mens obducitur, nè videat eorum quæ concupiſcit deformitatem. Sed cùm omnis nebula tranſierit, gravia tormenta exercentur in quodam malè conſcii ſecretario. A man is ſometimes ſo ſurpris'd with the falſe fires and glarings of temptation, that he cannot ſee the ſecret turpitude and deformity. But when the cloud and vail is off, then comes the tormentor from within:

Æneid. 12. ——acuúntque metum mortalibus ægris,
Si quando lethum horrificum, morbóſque Deûm Rex
Molitur, meritas aut bello territat urbes.

Then the calamity ſwels, and conſcience increaſes the trouble, when God ſends warre, or ſickneſs, or death. It was Sauls caſe, when he loſt that fatal battel in which the Ark was taken, he called to the Amalekite, Sta ſuper me & interfice me, fall upon me and ſlay me; quoniam tenent me anguſtiæ, I am in a great ſtrait. He was indeed; for his ſon was ſlain, and his army routed, and his enemies were round about: But then conſcience ſtept in and told him of the evil that he had done in cauſing fourſcore of the Lords Prieſts to be ſlain; and therefore Abulenſis reads the words thus, Fall upon me and ſlay me, quoniam tenent me oræ veſtimenti Sacerdotalis, I am intangled in the fringes of the Prieſts garments. Videbatur ſibi Saul quòd propinquus morti videret Sacerdotes Dei accuſantes eum in judicio coram Deo. He thought he ſaw the Prieſts of the Lord accuſing him before God. And this hath been an old opinion of the world, that in the days of their calamity wicked perſons are accus'd by thoſe whom they have injur'd. Not much unlike to which is that of Plato, deſcribing the torments of wicked ſouls, ἔοικε γὰρ καλεῖσιν· οἱ μὲν ὃς ἀπέκτειναν, οἱ δ' ὃς ὕβρισαν· καλέσαντες δ' ἱκετεύουσι τὸς ἠδικημένους δοῦναί σφισι συγγνώμην, They roar and cry out. Some calling on them whom they kill'd, ſome on thoſe they have calumniated; and calling they pray them whom they have injured to give them pardon. Then every buſh is a wild beaſt, and every ſhadow is a ghoſt, and every gloworm is a dead mans candle, and every lantern is a ſpirit.

——pallidúmque viſâ
Matris lampade reſpicit Neronem.

When Nero was diſtreſſed, he ſaw his mothers tapor and grew pale with it.

11. 2. The ſecond effect is ſhame, which conſcience never fails to inflict ſecretly, there being a ſecret turpitude and baſeneſs in ſin, which cannot be better expreſs'd then by its oppoſition and contradiction to conſcience. Conſcience when it is right makes a man bold; qui ambulat ſimpliciter, ambulat confidenter, he that walks honeſtly, walks confidently, becauſe he hath innocence and he hath reaſon on his ſide. But he that ſins, ſins againſt reaſon, in which the honour and the nobleneſs of a man does conſiſt; and therefore ſhame muſt muſt needs come in the deſtitution of them. For as by reaſon men naturally rule, ſo when they are fallen from it, unleſs by ſome accidental courages they be ſupported, they fall into the ſtate of ſlaves and ſneaking people. And upon this account it was that Plato ſaid, Si ſcirem Deos mihi condonaturos, & homines ignoraturos, adhuc peccare erubeſcerem propter ſolam peccati turpitudinem. If I were ſure God would pardon me, and men would not know my ſin, yet I ſhould be aſhamed to ſin, becauſe of its eſſential baſeneſs: The Miſtreſſes of our vile affections are ſo ugly, we cannot endure to kiſs them but through a vail; either the vail of excuſe, or pretence, or darkneſs; ſomething to hide their uglineſs; and yet even theſe alſo are ſo thin that the filthineſs and ſhame is not hid. Bona conſcientia turbam advocat, mala autem in ſolitudine anxia atque ſollicita eſt, ſaid Seneca. An evil conſcience is aſham'd of light, and afraid of darkneſs; and therefore nothing can ſecure it. But being aſham'd before Judges, and aſſemblies, it flies from them into ſolitudes, and when it is there, the ſhame is chang'd into fear, and therefore from thence it runs abroad into ſocieties of merry criminals, and drinking ſanctuaries, which is nothing but a ſhutting the eyes, and hiding the head, while the body is expoſed to a more certain danger. It cannot be avoided, it was and is and will eternally be true, Perjurii pœna Divina exitium, humana dedecus eſto. Which S Paul perfectly renders, The things whereof ye are now aſhamed; the end of theſe things is death. Death is the puniſhment which God inflicts, and ſhame is that which comes from man.

Rom. 6. 21.

12. 3. There is another effect which cannot be well told by him that feels it, or by him that ſees it, what it is; becauſe it is a thing without limit and without order. It is a diſtraction of minde, indeterminate, divided thoughts, flying every thing, and purſuing nothing. It was the caſe of Nebuchadnezzar, οἱ λογισμοὶ αὐτῦ διεταράσσον αὐτόν, his thoughts troubled him. Varios vultus, diſpariléſque ſenſus; like the Sophiſters who in their purſuit of vainglory diſpleaſed the people, and were hiſſed from their Pulpits; nothing could amaze them more; they were troubled like men of a diſturbed conſcience. The reaſon is, they are fallen into an evil condition which they did not expect; they are abus'd in their hopes, they are fallen into a ſad ſtate of things, but they know not yet what it is, nor where they are, nor whither it will bear them, nor how to get out of it. This indeed is commonly the firſt part of the great evil; ſhame goes along with the ſin, in the very acting it, but as ſoon as it is acted, then begins this confuſion, they thought of nothing but pleaſure before, but as ſoon as they have finiſhed, then they begin to taſt the wormwood and the colliquintida; perfecto demum ſcelere, magnitudo ejus intellecta eſt, ſaid Tacitus. While they were doing it, they thought it little, or they thought it none, becauſe their fancy and their paſſion rul'd; but when that is ſatisfied and burſt with a filthy plethory, then they underſtand how great their ſin is, but are diſtracted in their thoughts, for they underſtand not how great their calamity ſhall be.

A. Gell. l. 5. c. 2.

Lib. 14. Annal.

Occultum quatiente animum tortore flagellum, the ſecret tormentor ſhakes the minde, and diſſolves it into indiſcrimination and confuſion. The man is like one taken in a lie, or ſurpris'd in a ſhameful act of luſt, or theft; at firſt he knows not what to ſay, or think, or do, and his ſpirits huddle together, and fain would go ſome where, but they know not whither, and doe ſomething, but they know not what.

13. This confuſion and firſt amazement of the conſcience in ſome vile natures, and baſer perſons proceeds to impudence, and hardneſs of face.

when they are diſcover'd they rub their foreheads hard, and conſider it cannot be worſe, and therefore in their way they make the beſt of it; that is, they will not ſubmit to the judgement of conſcience, nor ſuffer her infliction, but take the fortune of the Banditi, or of an outlaw, rather then by the rule of ſubjects ſuffer the penalty of the Law, and the ſeverity of the Judge. But Conſcience hath no hand in this, and whatſoever of this nature happens, it is in deſpite of conſcience; and if it proceeds upon that method, it goes on to obſtinacy, hardneſs of heart, a reſolution never to repent, a hatred of God, and reprobation. For if conſcience be permitted to do its work, this confuſion when it comes to be ſtated, and that the man hath time to conſider, it paſſes on to fear; and that is properly the next effect.

14. 4. An evil or a guilty conſcience is diſpos'd for fear, ſhame and fear cannot be far aſunder:

Epicharm: Ἐνθα δὲ θεὸς, ἐνταῦθα καὶ αἰδώς.

Sin makes us aſham'd before men, and afraid of God: an evil conſcience makes man a coward, timorous as a child in a Churchporch at midnight; it makes the ſtrongeſt men to tremble like the keepers of the houſe of an old mans Tabernacle.

Ὁ συνιστορῶν αὐτῷ τι, κἂν ᾖ θεὸς αὐτὸς,
Ἡ σύνεσις αὐτὸν δειλότατον ἐν ποιεῖ, ſaid Menander, No ſtrength of body, no confidence of ſpirit is a defenſative againſt an evil conſcience which will intimidate the courage of the moſt perfect Warriour.

Qui terret, plus iſte timet, ſors iſta tyrannis
Convenit, invideant claris, fortéſque trucident,
Muniti gladiis vivant, ſeptíque venenis
Ancipites habeant arces, trepidíque minentur.

De 4 Honor. Conſul. So Claudian deſcribes the ſtate of Tyrants and injurious perſons, they do evil and fear worſe, they oppreſs brave men, and are afraid of mean fellows; they are encompaſſed with ſwords, and dwell amongſt poyſons, they have towers with back doors and many outlets, and they threaten much, but themſelves are moſt afraid. We read of Belteſhazzar, his knees beat againſt each other upon the arreſt made on him by the hand on the wall, which wrote the ſentence of God in a ſtrange character, becauſe he would not reade the writing in his conſcience. This fear is very great and very laſting even in this world: and is rarely well deſcrib'd by Lucretius:

Cerberus & Furiæ——
——neque ſunt uſquam, neque poſſunt eſſe profectò:
Sed metus in vitâ pœnarum pro malefactis
Eſt inſignibus inſignis; ſceleríſque luela
Carcer, & horribilis de ſaxo jacta deorſum,
Verbera. Carnifices, robur, pix, lumina, tædæ,
Quæ tamen etſi abſunt, & mens ſibi conſcia facti
Præmetuens adhibet ſtimulos, torrétque flagellis;

Which deſcription of the evil and intollerable pains and fears of conſcience is exceeded by the Author of the wiſdome of Solomon, Indiſciplinatæ animæ erraverunt. That is the ground of their miſery; The ſouls were refractory to diſcipline, and have erred. They oppreſs the holy Nation. The effect was, they became priſoners

Prisoners of darkness, and fettered with the bands of a long night; fugitivi perpetuæ providentiæ jacuerunt, they became outlaws from the divine providence. And while they supposed to lie hid in their secret sins, they were scattered under a dark vail of forgetfulness; paventes horrendè, & cum admiratione nimia perturbati, they did fear horribly, and disturbed with a wonderful amazement. For neither might the corner that held them keep them from fear, but a sound descending did trouble them; & personæ tristes apparentes pavorem illis præstabant, sad apparitions did affright them; a fire appeared to them very formidable; & timore percussi ejus quæ non videbatur faciei; they were affrighted with the apprehensions of what they saw not: and all the way in that excellent description, there is nothing but fear, and affrightment, horrid amazement and confusion; pleni timore, and tremebundi peribant, full of fear, and they perished trembling; and then follows the philosophy and rational account of all this. Frequenter enim præoccupant pessima redarguente conscientiâ. When their conscience reproves them, they are prepossess'd with fearful expectations. For wickedness condemn'd by her own witness is very timorous. Cùm enim sit timida nequitia, dat testimonium condemnata: Conscience gives witness and gives sentence, and when wickedness is condemn'd it is full of affrightment. For fear is præsumptionis adjutorium, the allay of confidence and præsumption, and the promoter of its own apprehensions, and betrays the succours that reason yeelds. For indeed in this case, no reason can dispute a man out of his misery, for there is nothing left to comfort the conscience, so long as it is devested of its innocence. The Prophet Jeremy instances this in the case of Pashur who oppressed the Prophets of the Lord, putting them in Prison and forbidding them to preach in the name of the Lord: Thy name shall be no more called Pashur but Mager Missabib, [that is, fear round about] for I will make thee a terror unto thy self. Jer. 20. 4.

15. This fear of its own nature is apt to increase, for indeed it may be infinite.

Nec videt interea quis terminus esse malorum
Possit, nec quæ sit pœnarum denique finis.
Atque eadem metuunt magis, hæc nè in morte gravescant.
Hinc Acherusia fit stultorum denique vita. Lucret.

He that fears in this case, knows not the greatness and measure of the evil which he fears; it may arrive to infinite, and it may be any thing, and it may be every thing, and therefore there is,

16. 5. An appendant perpetuity and restlessness; a man of an evil conscience is never at quiet. Impietas enim malum infinitum est, quod nunquam extingui potest, said Philo: He is put to so many shifts to excuse his crime before men, and cannot excuse it to God or to himself, and then he is forc'd to use arts of forgetfulness, that he may not remember his sorrow; he runs to weakness for excuse, and to sin for a comfort, and to the methods and paths of hell for sanctuary, and rols himself in his uneasy chains of fire, and changes from side to side upon his gridiron till the flesh drop from the bones on every side. This is the Poets vultur, De profugis.

Immortale jecur tundens, fœcundáque pœnis
Viscera, rimatúrque epulis, habitátque sub alto
Pectore, nec fibris requies datur ulla renatis.

It gnaws perpetually, and consumes not, being like the fire of hell, it does never devour, but torments for ever.

6. This

17. 6. This fear and torment, which is inflicted by conſcience does not only increaſe at our death, but after death is the beginning of hell. For theſe are the fire of hell; ὀδυνῶμαι ἐν τῇ φλογὶ ταύτῃ, I am tormented in this flame, ſo ſaid Dives when he was in torments; that is, he had the torments of an evil conſcience, for hell it ſelf is not to be opened till the day of judgement; but the ſharpeſt pain is uſually expreſſed by fire, and particularly the troubles of minde are ſo ſignified. Urit animum meum; This burns, that is, this exceedingly troubles my minde; and uro hominem in the Comedy, I vex him ſufficiently, I burn him; loris non ureris, thou art not tormented with ſcourgings.

Juvenal. Pœna autem vehemens, & multò ſævior illis
Quos & Cæditius gravis invenit, & Rhadamanthus, Nocte dieque ſuum geſtare in pectore teſtem.

This is a part of hell fire, the ſmoke of it aſcends night and day; and it is a preparatory to the horrible ſentence of Doomſday, as the being tormented in priſon is, to the day of condemnation and execution. The conſcience in the ſtate of ſeparation does accuſe perpetually, and with an inſupportable amazement fears the revelation of the day of the Lord.

Martial. Et cum fateri Furia juſſerit verum,
Cogente clamet conſcientia ſcripſi.

The fury within will compel him to confeſs, and then he is prepared for the horrible ſentence, as they who upon the rack accuſe themſelves, and then they are carried to execution. Menippus in Lucian ſays that the ſouls of them that are dead are accuſed by the ſhadows of their bodies. Νεκυομαντεία. Αὐτίκα τοίνυν ἐπειδὰν ἀποθάνωμεν κατηγοροῦσι τε καὶ καταμάρτυρουσι καὶ διελέγχουσι τὰ πεπραγμένα ἡμῖν αἱ σκιαὶ τοῦ βίου· and theſe he ſays are ἀξιόπιστοι worthy of belief, becauſe they are always preſent, and never parted from the bodies; meaning that a mans conſcience which is inſeparable as a ſhadow, is a ſtrong accuſer and a perfect witneſs: and this will never leave them till it carries them to hell, and then the fear is chang'd into deſpair, and indignation, and hatred of God, and eternal blaſphemy. This is the full progreſs of an evil conſcience, in its acts of binding.

Queſt.

18. BUT if it be inquired by what inſtrument conſcience does thus torment a man, and take vengeance of him for his ſins, whether it hath a proper efficiency in it ſelf, and that it gives torment, as it underſtands, by an exerciſe of ſome natural power; * or whether it be by an act of God inflicting it, * or by opinion and fancy, * by being perſwaded of ſome future events which ſhall be certainly conſequent to the ſin, or by Religion and belief, * or laſtly by deception and meer illuſion, and upon being affrighted with bugbears? I anſwer,

19. That it does or may afflict a man by all theſe. For its nature is to be inquiſitive and buſie, querulous and complaining; and to doe ſo is as natural to it, as for a man to be grieved when any thing troubles him. But becauſe men have a thouſand little arts to ſtifle the voice of conſcience, or at leaſt that themſelves may not hear it; God oftentimes awakens a man by a ſudden daſh of thunder and lightning, and makes the conſcience ſick, and troubleſome; juſt as upon other accidents a man is made ſad, or hardned, or impudent, or fooliſh, or reſtleſs: and ſometimes every dream, or ſad ſtory that the man hath heard, the flying of birds, and the hiſſing of ſerpents, or the fall of waters, or the beating of a watch, or the noiſe of a cricket, or a ſuperſtitious tale, is ſuffered to doe the man a miſchief and to increaſe his fear.

—Ergo

——Ergo exercentur pœnis, veterúmque malorum
Supplicia expendunt.

This the Poets and Prieſts expreſſed by their Adraſtea, Nemeſis, Minos, Æacus and Rhadamanth, not that theſe things were real, ſaid one of them; but yet to their pains and fears they gave names, and they put on perſons, and a phantaſtick cauſe may have a real event, and therefore muſt come from ſome further principle: and if an evil man be affrighted with a meteor or a bird, by the chattering of ſwallows (like the young Greek in Plutarch) or by his own ſhadow (as Oreſtes was) it is no ſign that the fear is vain, but that God is the Author of conſcience, and will beyond the powers of nature, and the arts of concealment ſet up a Tribunal, and a Gibbet, and a Rack in the Court of Conſcience. And therefore we finde this evil threatned by God to fall upon ſinners. They that are left alive of you in the land of your captivity, I will ſend fainting in their hearts, in the land of their enemy, and the ſound of a leaf ſhall chace them: and again The Lord ſhall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and ſorrow of minde, and thy life ſhall hang in doubt before thee, and thou ſhalt fear day and night, and ſhalt have no aſſurance of thy life: and this very fear ends in death it ſelf; it is a mortal fear ſometimes; for when the Prophet Iſaiah had told concerning Jeruſalem, Thy ſlain men are not ſlain with the ſword, nor dead in battle; to the inquiry of thoſe who ask how then were they ſlain? the anſwer is made by a learned gloſs upon the place, Homines hi non expectato adventu hoſtis, velut transfoſsi exanimantur metu: They were dead with fear, ſlain with the affrightments of their own conſcience, as if they were transfixed by the ſpear of their enemies. Quid ergo nos à Diis immortalibus divinitùs expectemus, niſi errationibus finem faciamus, ſaid Q. Metellus in A. Gellius: There is no avoiding puniſhment, unleſs we will avoid ſin; ſince even a ſhadow as well as ſubſtances may become a Nemeſis, when it is let looſe by God, and conducted by conſcience.

—neque ſunt uſquam, neque poſſunt eſſe profectò,

Æſchyl. — Levit. 26. 36. — Deuter. 28. 65. — Iſai. 22. 2. — Lib. 1. c. 6.

20. But the great inſtrument of bringing this to paſs is that certainty of perſwaſion which is natural in all men, and is taught to all men, and is in the ſanction of all laws expreſly affirmed by God, that evil ſhall be to them that doe evil;

Θεὸς ἀτίζων τὸς θεοτίσ, δυσὶ δίκλοις,
He that diſhonours God ſhall not eſcape puniſhment: both in this life,

Ultrix Erinnys impio dignum parat
Lethum Tyranno——

Senec. Oct. Act. 3.

and after this life, for ſo they reckon'd, that Adulterers, Rebels, and Traytors ſhould be kept in priſons in fearful expectation of horrid pains;

Quique ob adulterium cæſi, quique arma ſecuti
Impia, nec veriti Dominorum fallere dextras, Incluſi pœnam expectant——

all this is our conſcience, which in this kind of actions and events, is nothing but the certain expectation and fear of the Divine vengeance.

Queſt.

21. BUT then why is the conſcience more afraid in ſome ſins then in others, ſince in ſins of the greateſt malignity we finde great difference of fear and apprehenſion, when becauſe they are of extreme malignity there can be no difference in their demerit?

22. I anſwer; Although all ſins be damnable, yet not onely in the ſeveral degrees of ſin, but in the higheſt of all there is great difference; partly proceeding ding from the Divine threatnings, partly from fame and opinion, partly from other cauſes.

For 1. there are ſome ſins which are called peccata clamantia, crying ſins; that is, ſuch which cry aloud for vengeance; ſuch which God not onely hath ſpecially threatned with horrid plagues, but ſuch which doe ſeldome eſcape vengeance in this life, but for their particular miſchief are hedged about with thorns leſt by their frequency they become intolerable. Such are Sacrilege, Oppreſſion of widows and Orphans, Murder, Sodomy, and the like. Now if any man fals into any of theſe crimes, he ſees an Angel with a ſword drawn ſtand before him; he remembers the angry words of God, and cals to minde that ſo few have eſcaped a ſevere judgement here, that Gods anger did converſe with men, and was cloth'd with our circumſtances, and walk'd round about us; and leſs then all this is enough to ſcare an evil conſcience.

But 2. there are ſome certain defenſatives and natural guards which God hath plac'd in men againſt ſome ſins; ſuch as are a natural abhorrency againſt unnatural luſts. A natural pity againſt Murder, and Oppreſſion: the double hedge of ſacredneſs and religion againſt Sacrilege. He therefore that commits any of theſe ſins does ſo much violence to thoſe defenſatives, which were plac'd either in or upon his heart, that ſuch an act is a natural diſeaſe, and vexes the conſcience not onely by a moral but by a natural inſtrument.

3 There are in theſe crying ſins certain accidents and appendages of horror which are apt to amaze a mans minde: as in Murder there is the circumſtance and ſtate of death, which when a man ſees and ſees alone, and ſees that himſelf hath acted, it muſt needs affright him; ſince naturally moſt men abhorre to be alone with a dead corpſe; ſo alſo in Oppreſſion of widows, a man meets with ſo many ſad ſpectacles, and hears ſo many groans, and clamorous complaints, ſuch importunities, and ſuch prayers, and ſuch fearful curſings, and perpetual weepings, that if a man were to uſe any artifice to trouble a mans ſpirit, he could not dreſs his Scene with more advantage.

4. Fame hath a great influence into this effect, and there cannot eaſily be a great ſhame amongſt men, but there muſt be a great fear of vengeance from God; and the ſhame does but antidate the Divine anger, and the man feels himſelf entring into it, when he is enwrapped within the other. A man committing a foul ſin, which hath a ſpecial diſhonour and ſingular diſreputation among men, is like a wolf eſpied amongſt the ſheep: The outcry and noiſes among the ſhepherds make him flie for his life, when he hears a vengeance comming. And beſides in this caſe, it is a great matter that he perceives all the world hates him for his crime, and that which every one decries muſt needs be very hateful and formidable, and prepar'd for trouble.

5. It cannot be denied, but Opinion alſo hath ſome hand in this affair; and ſome men are affrighted from their cradle in ſome inſtances, and permitted or conniv'd at in others; and the fears of childhood are not ſhaken from the conſcience in old age: as we ſee the perſwaſions of childhood in moral actions are permanent, ſo is the fear and hope which were the ſanction and eſtabliſhment of thoſe perſwaſions. Education and Society, and Country Cuſtomes, and States of life, and the Religion or Sect of the mans profeſſing, have influence into their portions of this effect.

23. The conſequent of this diſcourſe is this; That we cannot take any direct accounts of the greatneſs or horror of a ſin by the affrightment of conſcience. For it is with the affrightments of conſcience as it is in temporal judgements; ſometimes they come not at all, and when they doe, they come irreguirregularly, and when they doe not, the man does not eſcape. But in ſome ſins God does ſtrike more frequently then in others, and in ſome ſins men uſually are more affrighted then in others. The outward judgement and the inward fear are intended to be deleteries of the ſin, and inſtruments of repentance; but as ſome great ſins eſcape the rod of God in this life, ſo are ſuch ſinners oftentimes free from great affrightments. But as he who is not ſmitten of God, yet knows that he is always liable to Gods anger, and if he repents not, it will certainly fall upon him hereafter: ſo it is in conſcience, he that fears not, hath never the leſs cauſe to fear, but oftentimes a greater, and therefore is to ſuſpect and alter his condition, as being of a deep and ſecret danger: and he that does fear, muſt alter his condition, as being highly troubleſome. But in both caſes, conſcience does the work of a Monitor and a Judge. In ſome caſes, conſcience is like an eloquent and a fair ſpoken Judge, which declaims not againſt the criminal, but condemnes him juſtly: In others, the Judge is more angry, and affrights the priſoner more, but the event is the ſame. For in thoſe ſins where the conſcience affrights, and in thoſe in which ſhe affrights not, ſuppoſing the ſins equal but of differing natures, there is no other difference; but that conſcience is a Clock, which in one man ſtrikes aloud and gives warning, and in another the hand points ſilently to the figure, but ſtrikes not; but by this he may as ſurely ſee what the other hears, viz. that his hours paſs away, and death haſtens, and after death comes judgement.

24. But by the meaſures of binding, we may judge of the looſing, or abſolution, which is part of the judgement of conſcience, and this is the greateſt pleaſure in the world; a good conſcience is the moſt certain, cleareſt, and undiſturbed felicity. Lectulus reſperſus floribus bona eſt conſcientia, bonis refecta operibus. No bed ſo ſoft, no flowers ſo ſweet, ſo florid and delicious as a good conſcience, in which ſprings all that is delectable, all that may ſuſtain and recreate our ſpirits. Nullâ re tam lætari ſoleo quàm officiorum meorum conſcientiâ. I am pleaſed in nothing ſo much as in the remembrances and conſcience of my duty, ſaid Cicero. Upon this pillow and on this bed, Chriſt ſlept ſoundly in a ſtorm, and S. Peter in Priſon ſo faſt that the brightneſs of an Angel could not awake him, or make him to riſe up without a blow on his ſide. This refreſhed the ſorrows of Hezekiah when he was ſmitten with the plague, and not only brought pleaſure for what was paſt, and ſo doubled the good of it, but it alſo added ſomething to the number of his years,

Μονον ᾧ τοῦτο φασ' ἀμιλλᾶσθαι βίῳ,
Γνώμην δικαίαν καὶ γαληνὸν ἦτορ πατρός.

Eu. Iph. Taur.

Vivere bis vitâ poſſe priore frui;

Ampliat ætatis ſpacium ſibi vir bonus—.

And this made Paul and Silas ſing in Priſon and in an Earthquake; and that I may ſumme up all the good things in the world, I borrow the expreſſion of S. Bernard, Bona conſcientia non ſolùm ſufficit ad ſolatium ſed etiam ad coronam: It is here a perpetual comfort, it will be hereafter an eternal crown.

25. This very thing Epicurus obſerv'd wiſely, and in his great deſign for pleaſure commended Juſtice as the ſureſt inſtrument to procure it. So Antiphon, Conſcium eſſe ſibi in vitâ nullius criminis, multum voluptatis parit: and Cato in Cicero, Conſcientia benè actæ vitæ multorúmque benefactorum recordatio jucundiſſima eſt: Nothing is a greater pleaſure then a good conſcience; for there is peace and no diſturbance; καρπὸς μέγιστος ἀζαραξία: Quietneſs is the beſt fruit, fruit, and that grows onely upon the tree in the midſt of Paradiſe, upon the ſtock of a holy Heart or Conſcience. Onely care is to be taken, that boldneſs be not miſtaken for peace, and hardneſs of heart for a good conſcience. It is eaſie to obſerve the difference, and no man can be innocently abuſed in this affair. Peace is the fruit of a holy conſcience. But no man can ſay, I am at peace, therefore I have a holy conſcience. But, I have lived innocently, or I walk carefully with my God, and I have examined my conſcience ſeverely, and that accuſes me not; therefore this peace is a holy peace, and no illuſion. A man may argue thus: I am in health, and therefore the ſleep I take is natural and healthful. But not thus: I am heavy to ſleep, therefore I am in health, for his dulneſs may be a lethargy. A man may be quiet, becauſe he inquires not, or becauſe he underſtands not, or becauſe he cares not, or becauſe he is abuſed in the notices of his condition. But the true peace of conſcience is thus to be diſcerned.

Signs of true peace.

1. Peace of conſcience is a reſt after a ſevere inquiry. When Hezekiah was upon his deathbed as he ſuppoſed, he examined his ſtate of life, and found it had been innocent in the great lines and periods of it; and he was juſtly confident.

2. Peace of conſcience can never be in wicked perſons, of notorious evil lives. It is a fruit of holineſs, and therefore what quietneſs ſoever is in perſons of evil lives, it is to be attributed to any other cauſe, rather than innocence; and therefore is to be called any thing rather than juſt peace. The adulterous woman eateth and wipeth her mouth, and ſaith, I have done no wickedneſs. And Pilate waſhed his hands, when he was dipping them in the moſt innocent, the beſt and pureſt bloud of the world. But S. Paul had peace, becauſe he really had fought a good fight. And it is but a fond way to ask a ſign how to diſcern, when the Sun ſhines. If the Sun ſhines we may eaſily perceive it, and then the beams we ſee are the Sunbeams; but it is not a ſure argument to ſay, I ſee a light, therefore the Sun ſhines; for he may eſpy onely a tallow candle, or a gloworm.

Prov. 30. 20.

3. That reſt which is onely in the days of proſperity, is not a juſt and a holy peace, but that which is in the days of ſorrow and affliction. The noiſe and madneſs of wine, the tranſportations of proſperity, the forgetfulneſs of riches, and the voice of flatterers outcry conſcience, and put it to ſilence; and there is no reaſon to commend a womans ſilence and modeſty when her mouth is ſtop'd. But in the days of ſorrow, then conſcience is vocal, and her muffler is off;

Eccluſ. 13. 26.

> —Invigilant animo, ſceleriſque patrati
> Supplicium exercent curæ, tunc plurima verſat
> Peſſimus in dubiis augur timor——

Statius lib. 7. Theb.

and then a man naturally ſearches every where for comfort; and if his heart then condemnes him not, it is great oddes but it is a holy peace.

4. Peace of minde is not to be uſed as a ſign that God hath pardoned our ſins, but is onely of uſe in queſtions of particular fact. What evils have I done? what good have I done? The peace that comes after this examination is holy and good. But if I have peace in theſe particulars, then have I peace towards God alſo, as to theſe particulars: But whether I have pardon for other ſins which I have committed, is another conſideration, and is always more uncertain. But even here alſo a peace of conſcience is a bleſſing that is given given to all holy penitents more or leſs, at ſome time or other, according as their repentance proceeds, and their hope is exerciſed: But it is not to be judged of by ſenſe, and eaſe, but by its proper cauſes: It never comes but after fear, and labour, and prayers, and watchfulneſs, and aſſiduity; and then what ſucceeds is a bleſſing, and a fair indication of a bigger.

5. True peace of conſcience is always joyned with a holy fear; a fear to offend, and a fear of the Divine diſpleaſure for what we have offended; and the reaſon is, becauſe all peace that is ſo allayed is a peace after enquiry, a peace obtained by juſt inſtruments, relying upon proper grounds; it is rational, and holy, and humble; neither careleſneſs, nor preſumption is in it.

6. True peace of conſcience relies not upon popular noiſes, and is not a ſleep procured by the tongues of flatterers, or opinions of men, but is a peace from within, relying upon God and its own juſt meaſures. It is an excellent diſcourſe which Seneca hath, Eſt aliquando gratus qui ingratus videtur, quæ mala interpres opinio in contrarium deducit. Hic quid aliud ſequitur, quàm ipſam conſcientiam quæ etiam obruta delectat, quæ concioni ac famæ reclamat, & in ſe omnia reponit, & cùm ingentem ex altera parte turbam contra-ſentientium aſpexit, non numerat ſuffragia, ſed unâ ſententiâ vincit? "Some men are thankful, who "yet ſeem unthankful, being wronged by evil interpretation. But ſuch a man "what elſe does he follow but his conſcience, which pleaſes him, though it be "overborn with ſlander, and when ſhe ſees a multitude of men that think "otherwiſe, ſhe regards not, nor reckons ſuffrages by the poll, but is victori-"ous by her ſingle ſentence? But the excellency and great effect of this peace he afterwards deſcribes: Si verò bonam fidem perfidiæ ſuppliciis affici videt, non deſcendit è faſtigio, ſed ſupra pœnam ſuam conſiſtit. Habeo inquit quod volui, quod petii. Non pœnitet, nec pœnitebit: nec ullâ iniquitate me eò fortuna perducet, ut hanc vocem audiam, Quid mihi volui? Quid mihi nunc prodeſt bona voluntas? prodeſt & in equuleo, prodeſt & in igne, qui ſi ſingulis membris admoveatur, & paulatim unum corpus circumeat; licèt ipſum corpus plenum bonâ conſcientiâ ſtillet, placebit illi ignis per quem bona fides collucebit. A good conſcience loſes nothing of its confidence and peace for all the tortures of the world. The rack, the fire ſhall not make it to repent and ſay, what have I purchas'd? But its excellency and integrity ſhall be reſplendent in the very flames. And this is the meaning of the Proverb uſed by the Levantines, Heaven and Hell are ſeated in the heart of man. As his conſcience is, ſo he is happy, or extremely miſerable. What other men ſay of us, is no more then what other men dream of us, ſaid S. Gregory Nazianzene; It is our conſcience that accuſes or condemnes to all real events and purpoſes.

Lib. 4. de benefic. c. 21.

26. And now all this is nothing but a perſwaſion partly natural, partly habitual, of this propoſition which all the Nations, and all the men in the world have always entertained as the band of all their Religion, and private tranſactions of juſtice and decency, Deum Remuneratorem eſſe, that God is a juſt Rewarder of all actions. I ſumme up the premiſes in the words of the Orator; Magna vis eſt conſcientiæ, Judices, & magna in utramque partem: ut neque timeant qui nihil commiſerint, & pœnam ſemper ante oculos verſari putent, qui peccarint. On either ſide conſcience is mighty and powerful, to ſecure the innocent, and to afflict the criminal.

Cicero pro Milone.

27. But beyond theſe offices now deſcribed, Conſcience does ſometimes only [Counſell] a thing to be done; that is, according to its inſtruction, ſo it miniſters to holineſs. If God hath put a law into our minds, conſcience will force obedience, or make us to ſuffer for our diſobedience; but if a propoſition tending to holineſs and its advantages be intruſted to the conduct of conſcience, then it preſſes it by all its proper inducements, by which it was laid up there, and leaves the ſpirit of a man to his liberty; but if it be not followed, it upbraids our weakneſſes, and chides our follies, and reproves our deſpiſing holy degrees, and greater excellencies of glory laid up for loving and willing ſpirits. Such as is that of Clemens Alexandrinus in the matter of an Evangelical Counſel; Οὐχ ἁμάρτανει μὲν ὁ ἁπλῶς καὶ οὕτως· ἐ γὰρ κωλύεται τοῦτο ποιεῖν ὑπὸ τοῦ κατὰ τὸ εὐαγγέλιον πολιτεύεσθαι· οὐ μὴν ἐφικνεῖται τῆς κατὰ τὸ εὐαγγέλιον πολιτείας κατ' ἐξοχὴν τελειότητος, He that does ſo and ſo, ſins not; for he is not forbidden by the law of the Goſpel; but yet he fals ſhort of the perfection that is deſigned and propounded to voluntary and obedient perſons. To ſumme up this.

28. When S. Paul had reproved the endleſs genealogies of the Gnoſticks and Platoniſts, making circles of the ſame things, or of divers whoſe difference they underſtood not; as Intelligence, Fear, Majeſty, Foundation, Wiſdome, Magnificence, Mercy, Victory, Kingdome, Foundation, God, and ſuch unintelligible ſtuff which would make fools ſtare, and wiſe men at a loſs; he ſubjoyns a ſhort, but a more diſcernible genealogy, and conjugation of things to our purpoſe. The end of the Commandement is love out of a pure heart, and a good conſcience, and faith unfeigned: that is, out of an unfeigned faith proceeds a good conſcience; that is, abſtinence from ſin; and from thence comes purity of heart, or a ſeparation from the trifling regards of the world, and all affections to ſin; and theſe all end in charity: that is, in peace, and joy, and the fruition and love of God, in Unions and Contemplations in the boſome of Eternity. So that faith is the firſt mover in the underſtanding part, and the next is conſcience, and they both purify the heart from falſe perſwaſions, and evil affections; and then they joyn to the production of love and of felicity.

Thus farre is the Nature and Offices of Conſcience: It will concern us next, to conſider by what General meaſures we are to treat our Conſcience that it may be uſeful to us in all the intentions of it, and in the deſigns of God.

Be careful that prejudice or paſsion, fancy and affection, error or illuſion, be not miſtaken for Conſcience.

1. NOthing is more uſual, then to pretend Conſcience to all the actions of men which are publick, and whoſe nature cannot be concealed. If arms be taken up in a violent warre; inquire of both ſides, why they ingage on that part reſpectively? they anſwer, becauſe of their Conſcience. Ask a Schiſmatick why he refuſes to joyn in the Communion of the Church? he tels you, it is againſt his Conſcience: And the diſobedient refuſe to ſubmit to Laws; and they alſo in many caſes pretend Conſcience. Nay, ſome men ſuſpect their brother of a crime and are perſwaded (as they ſay) in Conſcience that he did it: and their Conſcience tels them that Titius did ſteal their goods, or that Caia is an adultereſs. And ſo Suſpicion, and Jealouſie, and Diſobedience, and Rebellion, bellion are become Conſcience; in which there is neither knowledge, nor revelation, nor truth, nor charity, nor reaſon, nor religion. Quod volumus ſanctum eſt, was the Proverb of Tichonius and the Donatiſts.

Nemo ſuæ mentis motus non æſtimat æquos,
Quódque volunt homines ſe bene velle putant.

Proſper Epigr. de cohibenda ira.

Every mans way ſeems right in his own eyes; and what they think is not againſt Conſcience, they think or pretend to think, it is an effect of Conſcience, and ſo their fond perſwaſions and fancies are made ſacred, and Conſcience is pretended, and themſelves and every man elſe is abuſed. But in theſe caſes and the like, men have found a ſweetneſs in it to ſerve their ends upon Religion, and becauſe Conſcience is the Religious Underſtanding, or the Minde of a man as it ſtands dreſs'd in and for Religion, they think that ſome ſacredneſs or authority paſſes upon their paſſion or deſign, if they call it Conſcience.

2. But by this Rule it is intended that we ſhould obſerve the ſtrict meaſures of Conſcience. For an illuſion may make a Conſcience, that is, may oblige by its directive and compulſive power. Conſcience is like a King whoſe power and authority is regular, whatſoever counſel he follows. And although he may command fond things, being abuſed by flatterers, or miſ-information, yet the commandement iſſues from a juſt authority, and therefore equally paſſes into a Law; ſo it is in Conſcience. If error or paſſion dictates, the King is miſ-informed, but the inferiors are bound to obey; and we may no more diſobey our Conſcience commanding of evil things, then we may diſobey our King injoyning things imprudent and inconvenient. But therefore this Rule gives caution to obſerve the information and inducement, and if we can diſcern the abuſe, then the evil is avoided. For this Governour [Conſcience] is tied to Laws, as Kings are to the Laws of God and Nations, to Juſtice and Charity; and a mans Conſcience cannot be malicious: his Will may, but if the error be diſcovered, the Conſcience, that is, the practical underſtanding cannot. For it is impoſſible for a man to beleeve what himſelf finds to be an error: and when we perceive our Conſcience to be miſguided, the deception is at an end. And therefore to make up this Rule complete, we ought to be ſtrict and united to our rule, for by that onely we can be guided, and by the proportions to it we can diſcern right and wrong, when we walk ſafely, and when we walk by falſe fires. Concerning which, beſides the direct ſurvey of the rule and action, and the comparing each other, we may in caſes of doubt and ſuſpicion be helped by the following meaſures:

Advices for the practice of the former Rule.

3. 1. We are to ſuſpect our Conſcience to be miſ-informed when we are not willing to inquire into the particulars. He that ſearches, deſires to finde, and ſo farre takes the right courſe; for truth can never hurt a man, though it may prejudice his vice, and his affected folly. In the inquiries after truth, every man ſhould have a travellers indifferency, wholly careleſs whether this or that be the right way, ſo he may finde it. For we are not to chooſe the way becauſe it looks fair, but becauſe it leads ſurely. And to this purpoſe, the moſt hearty and particular inqueſt is moſt prudent and effective. But we are afraid of truth when we will not enquire, that is, when the truth is againſt our intereſt or paſſion, our luſt or folly, that is, ſeemingly againſt us, in the preſent indiſpoſition of our affairs.

4. 2. He that reſolves upon the concluſion before the premiſes, inquiring into particulars to confirm his opinion at aventures, not to ſhake it if it be falſe, or to eſtabliſh it onely in caſe it be true, unleſs he be defended by chance, is ſure to miſtake, or at leaſt can never be ſure whether he does or no.

This is to be underſtood in all caſes to be ſo unleſs the particular unknown be ſecured by a general that is known. He that beleeves Chriſts advocation and interceſſion for us in heaven upon the ſtock of Scripture, cannot be prejudic'd by this rule, although in the inquiries of probation, and arguments of the doctrine, he reſolve to beleeve nothing that ſhall make againſt his Concluſion; becauſe he is aſcertain'd by a propoſition that cannot fail him. The reaſon of this exception is this, becauſe in all diſcourſes which are not perfectly demonſtrative, there is one lame ſupporter, which muſt be help'd out by the better leg; and the weaker part does its office well enough, if it can bring us to a place where we may reſt our ſelves and rely. He that cannot chooſe for himſelf, hath choſen well enough if he can chooſe one that can chooſe for him; and when he hath, he may prudently rely upon ſuch a perſon in all particulars, where he himſelf cannot judge, and the other can, or he thinks he can, and cannot well know the contrary. It is eaſier to judge of the general lines of duty, then of minutes and particulars: and Travellers that are not well skill'd in all the little turnings of the ways, may confidently rely upon a Guide whom they chooſe out of the natives of the place; and if he underſtands the coaſt of the Country, he may well harden his face againſt any vile perſon that goes about wittily to perſwade him he muſt goe the contrary way, though he cannot anſwer his arguments to the contrary. A man may prudently and piouſly hold a concluſion which he cannot defend againſt a witty adverſary, if he have one ſtrong hold upon which he may rely for the whole queſtion; becauſe he derives his concluſion from the beſt ground he hath, and takes the wiſeſt courſe he can, and uſes the beſt means he can get, and chooſes the ſafeſt ways that are in his power. No man is bound to do better then his beſt.

5. 3. Illuſion cannot be diſtinguiſhed from Conſcience, if in our ſearch we take a wrong courſe and uſe incompetent inſtruments. He that will chooſe to follow the multitude which eaſily erres, rather then the wiſe Guides of ſouls; and a man that is his partner in the Queſtion rather then him that is diſ-intereſs'd, and them that ſpeak by chance, rather then them who have ſtudied the Queſtion, and a man of another Profeſſion, rather then him whoſe office and imployment it is to anſwer, hath no reaſon to be confident he ſhall be well inſtructed. John Nider tels an apologue well enough to this purpoſe: Two brethren travelling together, whereof one was eſteemed wiſe, and the other little better then a fool, came to a place where the way parted. The fooliſh brother eſpying one of them to be fair and pleaſant, and the other dirty and uneaven, would needs go that way, though his wiſer brother told him, that in all reaſon that muſt needs be the wrong way; but he followed his own eyes, not his brothers reaſon: and his brother being more kinde then wiſe, though againſt his reaſon, followed his fooliſh brother; they went on till they fell into the hands of theeves, who robb'd them and impriſoned them, till they could redeem themſelves with a ſumme of money. Theſe brothers accuſe each other before the King as author of each others evil. The wiſer complained that his brother would not obey him, though he was known to be wiſer, and ſpake reaſon. The other complain'd of him for following him that was a fool, affirming that he would have return'd back if he had ſeen his wiſe brother confident, fident, and to have followed his own reaſon. The King condemn'd them both; the fool becauſe he did not follow the direction of the wiſe, and the wiſe becauſe he did follow the wilfulneſs of the fool. So will God deal with us at the day of Judgement in the ſcrutinies of Conſcience. If appetite refuſes to follow reaſon, and reaſon does not refuſe to follow appetite, they have both of them taken incompetent courſes, and ſhall periſh together. It was wiſely ſaid of Brutus to Cicero, Malo tuum judicium, quàm ex altera parte omnium iſtorum. Tu enim à certo ſenſu & vero judicas de nobis, quod iſti nè faciant, ſummâ malevolentiâ & livore impediuntur. I preferre thy judgement ſingly, before all theirs, becauſe thou judgeſt by intuition of the thing; they cannot doe that, being hindred by envy and ill will. The particulars of reducing this advice to practice in all ſpeciall caſes, I ſhall afterwards enumerate; for the preſent, I ſay this onely, that a man may conſent to an evil authority, and reſt in a falſe perſwaſion, and be conducted by an abuſed conſcience, ſo long as the Legiſlative Reaſon is not conjoyn'd to the Judge Conſcience, that is, while by unapt inſtruments we ſuffer our perſwaſions to be determined.

Lib. 11. famil epiſt.

6. 4. That determination is to be ſuſpected that does apparently ſerve an intereſt, and but obſcurely ſerve a pious end, when that appears, and nothing elſe appears, the reſolution or councel is to be conſidered warily before it be purſued. It is a great allay to the confidence of the bold talkers in the Church of Rome, and hinders their gain and market of proſelytes from among the wiſe and pious very much; that moſt of their propoſitions for which they contend ſo earneſtly againſt the other parts of Chriſtendome, do evidently ſerve the ends of covetouſneſs and ambition, of power and riches, and therefore ſtand vehemently ſuſpected of deſign and art, rather then of piety or truth of the article, or deſigns upon heaven. I inſtance in the Popes power over Princes and all the world; his power of diſpenſation; the exemption of the Clergy from juriſdiction of ſecular Princes; the doctrine of Purgatory and Indulgencies, by which once the Friers were ſet awork to raiſe a portion for a Lady, the Neece of Pope Leo the tenth; the doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation, by the effects and conſequence of which, the Prieſts are made greater then Angels, and next to God; and ſo is alſo that heap of doctrines, by the particulars of which the Eccleſiaſtical power is far advanced beyond the authority of any warrant from Scripture, and is made highly inſtrumental for procuring abſolute obedience to the Papacy. In theſe things every man with half an eye can ſee the temporal advantage; but how piety and truth ſhall thrive in the mean while, no eye hath yet been ſo illuminate as to perceive. It was the advice of Ben Sirach, Conſult not with a woman touching her of whom ſhe is jealous, neither with a coward in matters of warre, nor with a Merchant concerning exchange, nor with a buyer of ſelling, nor with an envious man of thankfulneſs, nor with an unmerciful man touching kindneſs, nor with the ſlothful for any work, nor with the hireling for a year of finiſhing work, nor with an idle ſervant of much buſineſs; hearken not unto theſe in any matter of counſel. Theſe will counſel by their intereſt, not for thy advantage.

Utile quod nobis do tibi conſilium,

Ecclus. 37. 11.

But it is poſſible that both truth and intereſt may be conjoyn'd; and when a Prieſt preaches to the people the neceſſity of paying Tithes, where they are by Law appointed, or when a poor man pleads for charity, or a man in debt urges the excellency of forgetfulneſs; the truth which they diſcourſe of, cannot be prejudiced by their proper concernments. For if the propoſi-tion serves the ends in Religion, in providing for their personal necessities, their need makes the instances still the more religious, and the things may otherwise be proved. But when the end of piety is obscure, or the truth of the proposition is uncertain, then observe the biass; and if the mans zeal be bigger then the certainty of the proposition, it is to be estimated by the interest, and to be used accordingly.

But this is not to prejudice him that gives the counsel, for although the Counsel is to be suspected, yet the man is not, unless by some other indications he betray himself. For he may be heartily and innocently perswaded of the thing he counsels, and the more easily and aptly beleeve that against which himself did less watch, because he quickly perceiv'd it could not be against himself.

« Adde to this, the Counsel is the less to be suspected if it be ask'd, then « if it be offer'd. But this is a consideration of Prudence, not of Conscience directly.

7. 5. If the proposition serve or maintain a vice, or lessen a vertue, it is certainly not Conscience, but error and abuse; because no truth of God can serve Gods Enemy directly, or by its own force and perswasion. But this is to be understood onely in case, the answer does directly minister to sin, not if it does so onely accidentally. Q. Furius is married to Valeria, but she being fierce and imperious, quarrelsome and loud, and he peevish and fretful, turns her away that he might have peace and live in patience. But being admonished by Hortensius the Orator to take her again, he asked counsel of the Priests, and they advise him to receive her. He answers, that then he cannot live innocently, but in a perpetual state of temptation, in which he daily fals. The Priest replies, that it is his own fault; let him learn patience, and prudence; for his fault in this instance is no warranty to make him neglect a duty in another; and he answered rightly. If he had counsell'd him to drink intemperately to make him forget his sorrow, or to break her bones to make her silent, or to keep company with harlots to vex her into compliance, his counsel had ministred directly to sin, and might not be received.

8. 6. Besides the evidence of the thing, and a direct conformity to the Rule, to be judg'd by every sober person, or by himself in his wits, there is ordinarily no other collateral assurance, but an honest hearty endevour in our proportion, to make as wise inquiries as we can, and to get the best helps which are to be had by us, and to obey the best we doe make use of. To which (because a deception may tacitly creep upon our very simplicity) if we adde a hearty prayer, we shall certainly be guided thorough the labyrinth, and secured against our selves, and our own secret follies. This is the counsel of the son of Sirach; Above all this; pray to the most high, that he will direct thy way in truth.

Eccles 37. 15.

RULE 4.

The Conscience of a vicious man is an evil Judge, and an imperfect Rule.

1. THat I mean the Superiour and Inferiour part of Conscience, is therefore plain, because the Rule notes how the acts of Conscience may be made invalid both as it is a Ruler, and as it is a Judge. But according to the several offices this truth hath some variety.

2. 1. The ſuperiour part of Conſcience, or the συντήρησις repoſitory of practical principles (which for uſe and brevity ſake, I ſhall call the phylactery) or the Keeper of Records; that is, that part which contains in it all the natural and reaſonable principles of good actions, (ſuch as are, God is to be worſhipped, Doe to others as they ſhould doe to thee, The pledge is to be reſtored, By doing harm to others thou muſt not procure thy own good, and the like) is always a certain and regular Judge in the prime principles of reaſon and religion, ſo long as a man is in his wits, and hath the natural uſe of reaſon. For thoſe things which are firſt imprinted, which are univerſal principles, which are conſented to by all men without a Teacher, thoſe which Ariſtotle cals γονὰς ἐννοίας, thoſe are always the laſt removed, and never without the greateſt violence and perturbation in the world. But it is poſſible for a man to forget his Name and his Nature: a Lycanthropy made Nebuchadnezar to doe ſo, and a Fever made a learned Greek doe ſo: but ſo long as a mans reaſon is whole, not deſtroyed by its proper diſeaſe; that is, ſo long as a man hath the uſe of reaſon, and can and will diſcourſe, ſo long his conſcience will teach him the general precepts of duty; for they are imprinted in his nature, and there is nothing natural to the ſoul, if reaſon be not; and no reaſon is, unleſs its firſt principles be, and thoſe firſt principles are moſt provided for, which are the moſt perfective of a man, and neceſſary to his well being, and thoſe are ſuch which concern the entercourſe between God and Man, and between men in the firſt and greateſt lines of their ſociety. The very opening of this chain is a ſufficient proof, it is not neceſſary to intricate it by offering more teſtimony.

3. 2. But then theſe general principles are either to be conſidered as they are habitually incumbent on the minde, or as actually applied to practice. In the former ſenſe they can never be totally extinguiſhed, for they are natural and will return when ever a man ceaſes from ſuffering his greateſt violence; and thoſe violences which are ſo deſtructive of nature as this muſt be, that makes a man forget his being, will fall off upon every accident and change. Difficile eſt perſonam diu ſuſtinere. But then when theſe principles come to be applied to practice, a ſtrong vice and a malicious heart can draw a veil over them, that they ſhall not then appear to diſorder the ſenſual reſolution. A ſhort madneſs, and a violent paſſion, or a fit of drunkenneſs, can make a man ſecurely ſin by incogitancy, even when the action is in the matter of an univerſal principle. No man can be brought to that paſs, as to beleeve that God ought not to be honoured; but ſuppoſing there is a God, it is unavoidable, that this God muſt be honoured: but a tranſient and unnatural violence intervening in a particular caſe, ſuſpends the application of that principle, and makes the man not to conſider his Rule; and there he omits to worſhip and honour this God in many particulars to which the principle is applicable. But this Diſcourſe is coincident with that Queſtion, Whether Conſcience may be totally loſt? of which I have already given accounts. That and this will give light to each other. In Rule 1. numb. 5. & ſeq.

4. 3. But further, there are alſo ſome principles which are indeed naturally known, that is, by principles of natural reaſon: but becauſe they are not the immediate principles of our creation and proper being, they have the ſame truth, and the ſame ſeat, and the ſame certainty; but not the ſame prime evidence, and connaturality to the ſoul; and therefore theſe may be loſt, or obſcured to all purpoſes of uſefulneſs, and their contradictories may be admitted into the rule of Conſcience. Of this nature, I reckon, that Fornication, violent and crafty contracts with many arts of deception, and overreaching our Brother, theft, incest in some kindes, drunkennesse, and the like, are to be avoided. For concerning these, it is certain that some whole Nations have so abused their Conscience by evil manners, that the Law in their minde hath been cancell'd, and these things have pass'd for lawful. And to this day, that Duels may be fought by private persons and authority, is a thing so practised by a whole sort of men, that it is believ'd, and the practice, and the belief of the lawfulness of it are interchangeably daughter and mother to each other. These are such of whom

Rom. 1. 28. the Apostle speaks, they are given over to believe a lie, they are delivered to a reprobate minde. And this often happens, and particularly in those cases wherein one sin is inferr'd by another naturally, or morally, or by withdrawing of the Divine grace.

5. 4. Wherever the Superiour or the Ruling part of Conscience is an imperfect Rule; in the same cases the Inferior is an evil Judge, that is, acquits the criminal, or condemnes the innocent, calling good evil, and evil good: which is to be understood when the perswasion of the erring conscience is permanent and hearty, not sudden, and by the rapid violence of a passion; for in this case the conscience condemnes as soon as that is acted, to which before the action it was cousened and betrayed: but it proceeds onely in abiding and lasting errors. And this is the cause why so many orders of persons continue in a course of sin with delight, and uninterrupted pleasure, thinking Rebellion to be a just defence, Sacrilege a lawful title, while other men that are otherwise and justly perswaded wonder at their peace, and hate their practices. Our blessed Lord foretold concerning the Persecutors of the Church, that they should think they did God good service. But such men have an evil portion, they sing in the fire, and go dancing to their graves, and sleep on till they be awakened in hell. And on the other side, this is because of superstition, and scruples, and sometimes of despairing and unreasonable fears, when the Conscience is abused by thinking that to be a sin, which is none.

All Consciences are to walk by the same Rule, and that which is just to one, is so to all, in the like circumstances.

1. IF all men were governed by the same Laws, and had the same interest, and the same degrees of understanding, they would perceive the truth of this Conclusion. But men are infinitely differenced by their own acts and relations, by their Understandings and proper Oeconomy, by their superinduc'd differences and orders, by interest and mistake, by ignorance and malice, by sects and deceptions. And this makes that two men may be damned for doing two contradictories: as a Jew may perish for not keeping of his Sabbath, and a Christian for keeping it; an Iconoclast for breaking images, and another for worshipping them: for eating, and for not eating; for receiving the holy Communion, and for not receiving it; for comming to Church, or staying at home.

2. But this variety is not directly of Gods making, but of Mans. God commands us to walk by the same rule, and to this end, Τὸ ἀυτὸ φρονεῖν, to be be of the ſame minde; and this is ἀκρίβεια ζωειδήσεως, the exactneſs of our Conſcience; which precept were impoſſible to be obſerved, if there were not one rule, and this rule alſo very eaſy. For ſome men have but a ſmall portion of reaſon and diſcretion, and they cannot help it; and yet the precept is incumbent upon them all alike; and therefore as the rule is one, ſo it is plain and eaſy, and written in every mans heart; and as every mans reaſon is the ſame thing, ſo is every mans conſcience; and this comes to be altered, juſt as that.

3. Neither is the unity of the Rule prejudic'd by the infinite difference of caſes For as a river ſpringing from the mountains of the Eaſt is tempted by the levels of the ground and the uneaſineſs of its paſſage, to make ſome turns backward toward its head, even while it intends Weſtward; ſo are the caſes of Conſcience branch'd out into inſtances, ſometimes of contrary proceedings, who are to be determin'd to croſs effects, but ſtill upon the ſame account. For in all things of the world the obligation is uniform, and it is of the ſame perſwaſion.

The caſe is this:

4. Autolycus robb'd the gardens of Trebonius, and ask'd him forgiveneſs and had it. But when Trebonius was choſen Conſul, and Autolycus robb'd him again, and was taken by others, and as a theef brought before him, he ask'd forgiveneſs again; but Trebonius condemn'd him to the Gallies: for he who being a private man was bound to forgive a repenting treſpaſſer, being a Magiſtrate was bound not to forgive him; and both theſe were upon the ſame account. A man may forgive an injury done to himſelf, becauſe it is his own right, and he may alone meddle in it; but an injury done to the Commonwealth, She onely could forgive, not her Miniſter. So,

5. He that faſted upon a Saturday in Ionia or Smyrna was a Schiſmatick; and ſo was he who did not faſt at Milan or Rome upon the ſame day, both upon the ſame reaſon;

Cùm fueris Romæ, Romano vivito more, becauſe he was to conform to the cuſtome of Smyrna, as well as to that of Milan, in the reſpective Dioceſſes.
Cùm fueris alibi, vivito ſicut ibi.

6. To kill a man in ſome caſes defiles a land; in others it cleanſes it, and puts away bloud from the people: and it was plain in the caſe of circumciſion. S. Paul did it, and did it not; both becauſe he ought, and becauſe he ought not; and all upon the ſame account and law of charity. And therefore all inquiries, and all contentions, and queſtions ſhould be relations to the Rule, and be tried by nothing but a plain meaſure of Juſtice and Religion, and not ſtand or fall by relations to ſeparate propoſitions and diſtinct regards. For that is one and eaſy; theſe are infinite, uncertain, and contradictory. τοῦτ' ἔστι δ' αἴτιον τοῖς ἀνθρώποις πάντων τῶν κακῶν δ' τὰς προλήψεις τὰς κοινὰς μὴ δύασθαι ἐφαρμόζειν ἑκάστοις. It is a very great cauſe of miſchief not to be able to deduce general propoſitions, and fit them to particular caſes, ſaid Arrianus. But becauſe all men cannot, therefore there will be an eternal neceſſity of ſpiritual guides, whoſe imployment, and the buſineſs of their life muſt be to make themſelves able reſpondere de jure, to anſwer in matters of law, and they alſo muſt be truly informed in the matters of fact. In Epict. lib. 3. c. 26.

In Conſcience that which is firſt is trueſt, eaſieſt, and moſt uſeful.

1. THere are ſome practices, which at the firſt ſight, and by the very name and nature of the things themſelves, ſeem as directly unreaſonable and againſt a Commandement, as any other thing of the fouleſt reproach; and yet object the ſin to the owners, and they will tell ſo many fine ſtories, and ſtruggle, and diſtinguiſh, and ſtate the queſtion in a new manner, and chop it into fragments, and diſguiſe the whole affair, that they do not onely content and beleeve themſelves, but alſo leſſen the confidence of the adverſary, and make a plain rule an uneaſy leſſon. I inſtance in the queſtion of images, the making of ſome of which, and the worſhipping of any, does at the firſt ſight as plainly daſh againſt the ſecond Commandement, as adultery does againſt the ſixth. But if you examine the practice of the Roman Church, and eſtimate them by the more wary determination of the Article in Trent, and weigh it by the diſtinctions and laborious devices of its Patrons, and beleeve their pretences and ſhews, it muſt needs be that you will abate ſomething of the reproof; and yet all the while the worſhip of images goes forward: and if you lay the Commandement over againſt the devices and diſtinctions, it will not be eaſy to tell what the Commandement does mean; and yet becauſe it was given to the meaneſt underſtandings, and was fitted for them, either the Conſcience is left without a clear rule, or that ſenſe is to be followed which ſtands neareſt the light, that which is next to the natural and proper ſenſe of the words. For it is certain God put no diſguiſes upon his own Commandements, and the words are meant plainly and heartily; and the further you remove from their firſt ſenſe, the more you have loſt the purpoſe of your rule. In matters of conſcience, that is the beſt ſenſe which every wiſe man takes in before he hath ſullied his underſtanding with the diſguiſes of ſophiſters, and intereſſed perſons; for then they ſpeak without prejudice and art, that is, ſo as they ſhould ſpeak, who intend to guide wiſe men, and all men.

2. But this is to be underſtood otherwiſe, when the firſt ſenſe of the words hath in its letter a prejudice open and eaſy to be ſeen; ſuch as is that of putting out the right eie, or cutting off the hand. The face is a vizor and a metaphor, and the heart of it onely is the Commandement, and that is to be underſtood by the meaſures of this rule, that is, the prime and moſt natural ſignification is the beſt, that which is of neareſt correſpondency to the metaphor and the deſign of the Speaker, and the occaſion and matter of the diſcourſe.

3. But in all things where the precept is given in the proper ſtyle of laws, and the vail is off, and the words are plain, he that takes the firſt ſenſe is the likelieſt to be well guided. If a war be commenced between a King and his People, he that is willing to reade his duty, may ſee it in the words of Chriſt and of three Apoſtles, and it is eaſy to know our duty; but when we are ingaged againſt our Prince, it is certain we are hugely put to it to make it lawful, and when our conſcience muſt ſtruggle for its rule, it is not ſo well as when it takes that which lies eaſy before us. Truth is eaſy, error is intricate and hard. If none but witty men could underſtand their duty, the ignorant and ideot could not be ſaved; but in the event of things it will be found, that this mans Conſcience was better guided while ſimplicity held the taper, then by all the falſe fires of art, and witty diſtinctions. Qui ambulat ſimpliciter, ambulat conſidenter, ſaith Solomon. It is ſafer to walk upon plain ground, then with tricks and devices to dance upon the ropes.

RULE 7.

Conſcience by its ſeveral habitudes and relations, or tendencies toward its proper object, is divided into ſeveral kindes.

1. Conſcience in reſpect of its information, or as it relates to its object, taken materially, and in the nature of the thing, is either True or Falſe, Right or Wrong. True when it is rightly informed, and proceeds juſtly. Falſe when it is deceived. Between theſe as participating of either extreme, ſtands the probable Conſcience; which if we conſider as it relates to its object, is ſometimes right, and ſometimes wrong, and ſo may be reduc'd to either, according as it is in the event of things. For in two contradictories which are both probable, as if one be, both are, if one part be true, the other is falſe; and the conſcience of the ſeveral men holding the oppoſite parts, muſt be ſo too, that is, right and wrong, deceiv'd and not deceiv'd reſpectively. The diviſion then of Conſcience in reſpect of its object is tripartite.

2. For in all queſtions, if notice can be certainly had, he that gets the notice, hath a True Conſcience: He that miſſes it, hath a Falſe or Erring Conſcience. But if the notices that can be had be uncertain, imperfectly revealed, or weakly tranſmitted, or underſtood by halfs, or not well repreſented; becauſe the underſtanding cannot be ſure, the conſcience can be but probable. But according as the underſtanding is fortunate, or the man wiſe and diligent, and honeſt enough to take the right ſide of the probability, ſo the conſcience takes its place in the Extreme, and is reduc'd to Right or Wrong accordingly.

3. But to be Right or Wrong, is wholly extrinſecal to the formal obligation of Conſcience, as it is a Judge and a Guide, and to the conſequent duty of the Man. For an erring conſcience binds as much as the right conſcience, directly and immediately, and collaterally more; that is, the man who hath an erring conſcience is tied to more and other duties, then he that is in the right. The conſcience binds becauſe it is heartily perſwaded, not becauſe it is truly informed; not becauſe it is right, but becauſe it thinks ſo.

4. It does indeed concern the duty of Conſcience, and its felicity, to ſee that it be rightly inſtructed, but as to the conſequence of the action, it is all one: this muſt follow whatſoever goes before. And therefore although it concerns the man as much as his felicity, and all his hopes comes to, to take care that his conſcience be not abuſed in the matter of duty; yet a Right and a Wrong conſcience are not made diſtinct Guides and different Judges. Since therefore we are to conſider and treat of Conſcience, as it is the Guide of our actions, and Judge of our perſons, we are to take it in other aſpects, then by a direct face towards its object; the relation to which alone, cannot diverſify its kinde, kinde, ſo much as to become an univerſal Rule to us in all caſes and emergencies.

Now becauſe intellectual habits imployed about the ſame general object, have no way to make them of different natures, but by their formal tendencies, and different manners of being affected with the ſame object; we are in order to the perfect diviſion and aſſignation of the kinds of conſcience, to conſider the Right Conſcience, either as it is Sure, or as it is onely Confident, but not Sure. For an Erring conſcience and the Unerring are the ſame Judge, and the ſame Guide, as to the Authority, and Perſwaſion, and as to the effect upon the perſon: but yet they differ infinitely in their Rule; and the perſons under their conduct differ as much in their ſtate and condition. But our Conſcience is not a good Guide unleſs we be truly informed and know it. For if we be truly informed and know it not, it is an uncertain and an imperfect Guide. But if we be confident and yet deceived, the uncertainty and hæſitation is taken off, but we are ſtill very miſerable. For we are like an erring Traveller, who being out of the way, and thinking himſelf right, ſpurs his horſe and runs full ſpeed: he that comes behinde, is nearer to his journeys end.

6. That therefore is the firſt kinde of Conſcience; The Right Sure Conſcience; and this alone is fit to be our Guide; but this alone is not our Judge.

7. 2. Oppoſite to this is the Confident or Erring Conſcience; that is, ſuch which indeed is miſ-informed, but yet aſſents to its object with the ſame confidence as does the Right and Sure; but yet upon differing grounds, motives, and inducements: which becauſe they are always criminal, although the aſſent is peremptory and confident, yet the deception is voluntary and vicious in its cauſe; and therefore the preſent confidence cannot warrant the action, it onely makes the ſinner bold. So that theſe two differ in their manner of entring into the aſſent; the one entring by the door, the other by the breaches of the wall. Good will, and Bad, Vertue and Vice, Duty and Sin, keeping the ſeveral keys of the perſwaſion and conſent.

8. This Erring Conſcience I therefore affirm to be always Voluntary and Vicious in its principle, becauſe all Gods laws are plain in all matter of neceſſary duty: and when all men are to be guided, learned and unlearned, the Rule is plain and eaſy, becauſe it is neceſſary it ſhould be ſo. But therefore if there happen any invincible ignorance, or involuntary deception, it is there where the Rule is not plain, and then the Matter is but probable, and then the Conſcience is according. And this makes the third kinde of Conſcience, in reſpect of the different manner of being affected with the object.

9. 3. The Probable Conſcience is made by that manner of aſſent to the object, which is indeed without fear, but not without imperfection. The thing it ſelf is of that nature, that it cannot properly make faith or certainty of adherence; and the underſtanding conſiders it as it is repreſented without any prejudice or prepoſſeſſion; and then the thing muſt be beleeved as it deſerves and no more: but becauſe it does not deſerve a full aſſent, it hath but an imperfect one; but it is perfect enough in its kinde, that is, it is as much as it ought to be, as much as the thing deſerves. Theſe are all the kinds of Conſcience that are perfect.

10. 4. But ſometimes the ſtate and acts of conſcience are imperfect; as the viſion of an evil eye, or the motion of a broken arm, or the act of an imperfect or abuſed underſtanding: ſo the conſcience in ſome caſes is carried to its object but with an imperfect aſſent, and operates with a lame and deficient principle: and the cauſes of it are the vicious or abuſed affections, accidents or incidents to the Conſcience. Sometimes it happens that the arguments of both the ſides in a queſtion ſeem ſo indifferent, that the conſcience being affrighted and abuſed by fear and weakneſs dares not determine, and conſequently dares not doe any thing; and if it be conſtrain'd to act, it is determin'd from without, not by it ſelf, but by accidents and perſwaſion, by importunity or force, by intereſt or fear: and what ever the ingredient be, yet when it does act, it acts with fear, becauſe it reflects upon it ſelf, and conſiders it hath no warrant, and therefore whatever it does becomes a ſin. This is the calamity of a doubting Conſcience. * This doubting does not always proceed from the equality of the parts of the queſtion, but ſometimes wholly from want of knowing any thing of it: as if we were put to declare whether there were more men or women in the world? whether the number of the ſtarres were even or odde? ſometimes from inconſideration, ſometimes from ſurpriſe, ſometimes from confuſion and diſeaſe; but from what principle ſoever it be, there is always ſome fear in it. This Conſcience can neither be a good Guide, nor a good Judge: we cannot doe any thing by its conduct, nor be judg'd by it; for all that can be done before or after it, is not by it, but by the ſuppletories of the perfect conſcience.

11. 5. A leſs degree of this evil, is that which by the Maſters of moral Theology is called, The ſcrupulous Conſcience, which is not a diſtinct kinde of conſcience as is uſually ſuppoſed, but differs from the doubting Conſcience onely in the degrees of the evil. The doubt is leſs, and the fear is not ſo violent as to make it unlawful to doe any thing: ſomething of the doubt is taken off, and the man can proceed to action without ſin, but not without trouble; he is uneaſy and timorous even when he is moſt innocent; and the cauſes of this, are not onely portions of the ſame weakneſſes which cauſe the doubting Conſcience; but ſometimes Superſtition, and Melancholy, and Puſillanimity and mean opinions of God are ingredients into this imperfect aſſent: and in ſuch caſes, although the ſcrupulous man may act without ſin, and produce his part of the determination, yet his ſcruple is not innocent, but ſometimes criminal, but always calamitous. This is like a mote in the eye, but a doubt is like a beam.

12. This Conſcience may be a right Guide, but dares not be a Judge: it is like a Guide in the dark that knows the way, but fears every buſh; and becauſe he may erre, thinks he does. The effect of this imperfection is nothing but a heartleſs and uncomfortable proceeding in our duty, and what elſe the Devil can make of it, by heightning the evil and abuſing the man, who ſits upon a ſure foundation, but dares not truſt it: he cannot rely upon that, which yet he cannot disbeleeve.

13. 6. There are ſome other affections of Conſcience, and accidental appendages; but becauſe they doe not vary the manner of its being affected with its proper object, they cannot diverſify Conſcience into ſeveral kinds, as it is a Guide and Judge of Humane actions. But becauſe they have no direct influence upon our ſouls, and relate not to duty, but are to be conducted by rules of the other kinds, I ſhall here onely enumerate their kinds, and permit to Preachers to diſcourſe of their natures, and collateral obligations to duty, of their remedies and aſſiſtances, their advantages and diſadvantages reſpectively. Theſe alſo are five: 1. The tender Conſcience. 2. The hardned or obdurate. 3. The quiet. 4. The reſtleſs or diſturbed. 5. And laſtly, The perverſe Conſcience.

science. Concerning which, I shall at present say this onely: That the two first are seated principally in the Will, but have a mixture of Conscience, as Docibility hath of Understanding. The two next are seated in the fancy, or the affections, and are not properly plac'd in the Conscience, any more then love or desire; but yet from Conscience they have their birth. And for the last, it is a heap of irregular principles, and irregular defects, and is the same in Conscience, as deformity is in the body, or peevishness in the affections.

CHAP. II.

Of the Right or Sure Conscience.

RULE 1.

A right Conscience is that which guides our actions by right and proportion'd means to a right end.

THE end is, Gods glory, or any honest purpose of Justice or Religion, Charity or Civil conversation. Whatsoever is good for us, or our neighbours, in any sense perfective of our being as God purposed it, all that is our end. The means ought to be such as are apt instruments to procure it. If a man intends to live a severe life, and to attend Religion, his End is just and fair, and so far his Conscience is right: but if his Conscience suggest to him, that he to obtain his end should erect Colleges of Women; and in the midst of Feasts, and Songs, and Society, he should Preach the Melancholy Lectures of the Cross, it is not right; because the end is reach'd at by a contrary hand. But when it tels him, that to obtain continence he must fast and pray, watch diligently, and observe prudently, labour and read, and deny his appetite in its daily attempts upon him, then it is a right Conscience. For a right Conscience is nothing but right Reason reduc'd to practise, and conducting Moral actions. Now all that right Reason can be defin'd by, is the propounding a good end, and good means to that end.

RULE 2.

In a right Conscience, the practical judgement, that is, the last determination to an action, ought to be sure and evident.

1. THIS is plain in all the great lines of duty, in actions determinable by the prime principles of natural Reason, or Divine revelation; but it is true also in all actions conducted by a right and perfect Conscience. This relies upon all that account on which it is forbidden to doe actions of danger, or doubt, lest we perish in the danger, which are to be handled in their proper place. But for the present we are to observe, that in the question of actions, whose rule is not notorious and primely evident, there is or may be a double judgement.

The

2. The firſt judges the thing probable by reaſon of the differing opinions of men wiſe and pious; but in this there is a fear or ſuſpicion of the contrary, and therefore in the direct act nothing is certain. 2. But there is alſo a reflex act of judgement; which upon conſideration that it is certain that a probable action may lawfully be done; or elſe, that that which is but probable in the nature of the thing (ſo farre as we perceive it) may yet by the ſuperadding of ſome circumſtances, and prudential conſiderations, or by equity, or neceſſity become more then probable in the particular; although (I ſay) the Conſcience be uncertain in the direct act, yet it may be certain, right, and determin'd in the reflex and ſecond act of judgement; and if it be, it is innocent and ſafe, it is that which we call the Right-ſure Conſcience.

3. For in moral things there cannot ordinarily be a demonſtrative, or Mathematical certainty; and in Morality we call that certain, that is, a thing to be followed and choſen, which oftentimes is but very highly probable; and many things doe not attain that degree; and therefore, becauſe it is very often impoſſible, it is certainly not neceſſary that the direct judgement ſhould be ſure and evident in all caſes. Τὸ μὲν γὰρ ὁπόσιπτον ἀπόδειξιν· τέχνη δ' καὶ φρόνησις τυγχάνουσιν ὄσαι περὶ τὰ ἐνδεχόμενα ἄλλως ἔχειν, Science is of thoſe things which can be demonſtrated; but prudence [and conſcience] of things which are thus, or may be otherwiſe. But if it be not ſupplied in the reflex and ſecond act of judgement, ſo that the conſcience be either certain in the object, or in the act, the whole progreſs is a danger, and the product is criminal; the conſcience is doubtful, and the action is a ſin. Ariſtot. Ethic. lib. 6. cap. 6.

4. It is in this as is uſually taught concerning the Divine knowledge of things contingent; which although they are in their own nature fallible and contingent, yet are known certainly and infallibly by God, and according to the nature of the things, even beyond what they are in their natural, proper, and next cauſes: and there is a rare, and ſecret expreſſion of Chriſts incarnation uſed by S. Paul [in whom dwelleth all the fulneſs of the Godhead bodily] that is, the manner is contrary to the thing; the Godhead that is wholly incorpereal dwels in him corporally. After the like manner of ſignification is the preſent certainty I ſpeak of. If it be not certain in the object, it muſt be certain in the faculty, that is, at leaſt it muſt be a certain perſwaſion, though of an uncertain article: and we muſt be certain and fully perſwaded that the thing may be done by us lawfully, though whether the thing it ſelf be lawful, is at moſt but highly probable.

5. So that in effect it comes but to this: The knowledge that is here required, is but the fulneſs of perſwaſion, which is and ought to be in a Right Conſcience: οἶδα καὶ πέπεισμαι, I know and am perſwaded in the Lord Jeſus; ſo S. Paul. Rom. 14. 14. Our knowledge here, which is but in part, muſt yet be a full confidence for the matters of duty. The Concluſions then are theſe:

1. There muſt be a certainty of adherence in the actions of a right Conſcience.
2. It muſt alſo for the matter of it too, at leaſt be on the right ſide of the probability.

The conſcience muſt be confident, and it muſt alſo have reaſon enough ſo to be: or at leaſt, ſo much as can ſecure the confidence from illuſion; although poſſibly the Confidence may be greater then the Evidence, and the Concluſion bigger then the Premiſes. Thus the good ſimple man that about the time of the Nicene Councel confuted the ſtubborn and ſubtle Philoſopher by a confident ſaying over his Creed: and the holy and innocent ideot, or plain eaſy people of the Laity, that cannot prove Chriſtianity by any demonſtrations, but by that of a holy life, and obedience unto death; they beleeve it ſo, that they put all their hopes upon it, and will moſt willingly prove it again by dying for it, if God ſhall call them. This is one of the excellencies of faith; and in all caſes where the mercies of God have conducted the man into the right, it is not ſubject to illuſion. But for that particular, I mean, that we be in the right, we are to take all that care which God hath put into our power; of which I have already ſaid ſomething, and ſhall give fuller accounts in its proper place.

The practical judgement of a right Conſcience is always agreeable to the ſpeculative determination of the Underſtanding.

1. THIS Rule is intended againſt thoſe whoſe underſtanding is right in the propoſition, and yet declines in the application; it is true in theſi, but not in hypotheſi; it is not true when it comes to be their caſe: and ſo it is in all that ſin againſt their conſcience, and uſe little arts to evade the clamor of the ſin. They are right in the rule, and crooked in the meaſuring; whoſe folly is apparent in this, becauſe they deny in particular what they affirm in the general; and it is true in all, but not in ſome. David was redargued wittily by Nathan upon this account; he laid the caſe in a remote Scene: Titius, or Sempronius, a certain rich man, I know not who, ſome body or other robb'd the poor man of his Ewe lamb. Therefore ſaid David he ſhall die who ever he be. Yea, but you are the man: what then? ſhall he die ſtill? This is a new arreſt; it could not be denied, his own mouth had already given the ſentence.

2. And this is an uſual, but a moſt effective Art to make the conſcience right in the particular, by propounding the caſe ſeparate from its own circumſtances, and then to remove it to its own place is no hard matter. It was an ingenious device of Eraſiſtratus the Phyſician, of which Appian tells: "When "yong Antiochus almoſt died for love of Stratonica his Father Seleucus his Wife, "the Phyſician told the paſſionate and indulgent Father, that his ſon was ſick "of a diſeaſe, which he had indeed diſcovered, but found it alſo to be incu- "rable. Seleucus with ſorrow asking what it was? Eraſiſtratus anſwered, He "loves my wife. But then the old Kings hopes began to revive, and he "turn'd wooer in the behalf of his ſon, begging of the Phyſician who was his "Counſellor and his friend, for pity ſake, for friendſhip and humanity to give "his wife in exchange or redemption for the yong Kings life. Eraſiſtratus re- "plied, Sir you ask a thing too unreaſonable and great; and though you are "his Father, your ſelf would not do it, if it were your own caſe; and therefore "why ſhould I? when Seleucus ſwore by all his Country gods that he would "doe it as willingly as he would live; Eraſiſtratus drew the curtain of the de- "vice, and applied it to him, by telling, that the cure of his ſon depended upon "his giving the Queen Stratonica to him, which he did; and afterwards made "it as lawful as he could, by a Law poſtnate to that inſolent example, and "confirm'd it by military ſuffrages.

De bellis Syriacis.

In

3. In all caſes we are to conſider the rule, not the relation; the law, not the perſon: for if it be one thing in the propoſition, and another in the aſſumption, it muſt be falſe in one place or the other, and then the Conſcience is but an ill Guide, and an ill Judge.

4. This rule is not to extend to the exception of particular caſes; nor to take away privileges, pardons, equity. For that which is faſt in the propoſition, may become looſe in the particular by many intervening cauſes, of which I am to give account in its due place. For the preſent, this is certain, that, Whatſoever particular is of the ſame account with the general, not ſeparate, or let looſe by that hand which firſt bound it, is to be eſtimated as the general. But this Rule is to goe further alſo.

5. For hitherto, I have called the act of particular Conſcience directing to a ſingle and circumſtantiate action by the name of Practical judgement: and the general dictate of the συντήρησις, or Phylactery, or upper Conſcience, teaching the kinds of good actions, by the name of Speculative judgement. But the rule alſo is true, and ſo to be underſtood, when practical and ſpeculative are taken in their firſt and proper ſenſe. If in Philoſophy we diſcourſe that the True God, being a Spirit without ſhape or figure, cannot be repreſented by an image; although this be onely a ſpeculation, and demonſtrable in natural Philoſophy, and no rule of Conſcience; yet when Conſcience is to make a judgement concerning the picturing of God the Father, it muſt not determine practically againſt that ſpeculation. * That an idol is nothing, is demonſtrable in Metaphyſicks; and therefore that we are to make nothing of it, is a practical truth: and although the firſt propoſition be not directly plac'd in the upper region of conſcience, but is one of the prime Metaphyſical propoſitions, not properly Theological, according to thoſe words of S. Paul, Concerning things ſacrific'd to idols, we know ὅτι πάντες γνῶσιν ἔχομεν that we all have knowledge; and we know that an idol is nothing in the world; meaning, that this knowledge needs no revelation to atteſt it; we by our own reaſon and principles of demonſtration know that; yet, the lower, or particular practical Conſcience muſt never determine againſt that extrinſecal, and therefore (as to Conſcience) accidental meaſure. 1 Cor. 8. 1, 4.

6. For whatſoever is true in one Science, is true alſo in another, and when we have wiſely ſpeculated concerning the dimenſions of bodies, their circumſcriptions, the acts of ſenſe, the certainty of their healthful perceptions, the commenſuration of a place and a body: we muſt not eſteem theſe to be unconcerning propoſitions, if ever we come to uſe them in Divinity: and therefore we muſt not worſhip that which our ſenſes tell us to be a thing below worſhip; nor beleeve that infinite which we ſee meaſured; nor eſteem that greater then the heavens which I ſee and feel goes into my mouth. If Philoſophy gives a skin, Divinity does not flea it off: and truth cannot be contrary to truth; and God would not in Nature teach us any thing to miſguide us in the regions of Grace.

7. The Caution for conducting this propoſition is onely this: That we be as ſure of our ſpeculation, as of any other rule which we ordinarily follow; and that we do not take vain Philoſophy, for true ſpeculations. He that guides his conſcience by a principle of Zeno's Philoſophy, becauſe he hath been bred in the Stoical ſect, and reſolves to underſtand his Religion to the ſenſe of his Maſters Theoremes, does ill. The Chriſtian Religion ſuffered much prejudice at firſt by the weak diſputings of the Greeks; and they would not admit a Religion againſt the Academy, or the Cynicks, or the Athenian Schools; and the Chriſtian Schools drew ſome of their articles thorough the limbecks of Plato's Philoſophy, and to this day the reliſh remains upon ſome of them. And Baronius complains of Origen, that, In Paganorum commentis enutritus, eáque propagare in animo habens, divinas ſe utique Scripturas interpretari ſimulavit: ut hoc modo nefariam doctrinam ſuam ſacrarum literarum monumentis malignè admiſcens, Paganicum & Manichaicum errorem ſuum atque Arrianam veſaniam induceret. He mingled the Gentile Philoſophy with Chriſtian Religion, and by analogy to that, expounded this, and how many Diſciples he had, all the world knows. Nay not onely from the doctrine, but from the practiſes and rites of the Pagan Religion, many Chriſtians did derive their rites, and they in time gave authority and birth to ſome doctrines. Vigilias anniverſarias habes apud Suetonium. Luſtralem aquam, aſperſionem ſepulchrorum, lumina in iiſdem parare, Sabbatho lucernam accendere, cereos in populum diſtribuere. The ſtaff, the ring, the Mitre, and many other cuſtomes, ſome good, ſome onely tolerable, the Chriſtians took from the Gentiles; and what effect it might have, and what influence it hath had in ſome doctrines, is too notorious to diſſemble. Thomas Aquinas did a little change the Scene, and blended Ariſtotle ſo with School Divinity, that ſomething of the purity was loſt, while much of our Religion was exacted and conducted by the rules of a miſtaken Philoſophy. But if their ſpeculations had been right, Chriſtianity would at firſt have entred without reproof, as being the moſt reaſonable Religion of the world, and moſt conſonant to the wiſeſt and moſt ſublime ſpeculations; and it would alſo have continued pure, if it had been ſtill drawn from the fountains of our Saviour thorough the limbecks of the Evangeliſts and Apoſtles, without the mixture of the ſalt waters of that Philoſophy, which every Phyſician and witty man now adays thinks he hath reaſon and obſervation enough eaſily to reprove. But men have reſolved to verify their Sect rather then the truth; but if of this particular we be careful, we muſt then alſo verify every ſpeculation in all things where it can relate to practice, and is not altered by circumſtances.

8. As an appendage, and for the fuller explication of this Rule, it is a worthy inquiry which is by ſome men made, concerning the uſe of our reaſon in our Religion. For ſome men finding reaſon to be that guide which God hath given us, and concreated with us, know that Religion which is ſuperinduc'd, and comes after it, cannot prejudice that nobleſt part of this Creation. But then, becauſe ſome articles which are ſaid to be of faith, cannot be made to appear conſonant to their reaſon, they ſtick to this, and let that go. Here is a juſt cauſe of complaint. But therefore others ſay, that reaſon is a good guide in things reaſonable and humane, but our reaſon is blinde in things Divine, and therefore is of little or no uſe in Religion. Here we are to beleeve, not to diſpute. There are on both ſides fair pretences, which when we have examined, we may finde what part of truth each ſide aims at, and joyn them both in practiſe. They that ſpeak againſt reaſon, ſpeak thus.

9. 1. There is to every ſtate and to every part of man given a proportionable light to guide him in that way where he ought, and is appointed to walk. In the darkneſſes of this world, and in the actions of common life, the Sun and Moon in their proper ſeaſons are to give us light: In the actions of humane mane entercourſe, and the notions tending to it, reaſon is our eye, and to it are notices proportion'd, drawn from nature and experience, even from all the principles with which our rational faculties uſually doe converſe. But becauſe a man is deſign'd to the knowledge of God, and of things ſpiritual, there muſt ſpring a new light from heaven, and he muſt have new capacities, and new illuminations; that is, new eyes, and a new light: For here the eye of Reaſon is too weak, and the natural man is not capable of the things of the Spirit, becauſe they are ſpiritually diſcerned. Faith is the eye, and the Holy Spirit gives the light, and the word of God is the lantern, and the ſpiritual not the rational man can perceive the things of God. Secreta Dei, Deo meo, & filiis domus ejus. God and Gods ſecret ones onely know Gods ſecrets.

10. 2. And therefore we finde in Holy Scripture that to obey God, and to love him, is the way to underſtand the myſteries of the kingdome. Obedite & intelligetis, If ye will obey, then ſhall ye underſtand: and it was a rare ſaying of our bleſſed Saviour, and is of great uſe and confidence to all who inquire after the truth of God, in the midſt of theſe ſad diviſions of Chriſtendome; If any man will doe his will he ſhall know whether the doctrine be of God or no. It is not fineneſs of diſcourſe, nor the ſharpneſs of arguments, or the witty rencontres of diſputing men that can penetrate into the myſteries of faith: the poor humble man that prays, and inquires ſimply, and liſtens attentively, and ſucks in greedily, and obeys diligently, he is the man that ſhall know the minde of the Spirit. And therefore S. Paul obſerves that the Sermons of the Croſs were fooliſhneſs to the Greeks; and conſequently, by way of upbraiding, he inquires, Where is the wiſe man, where is the Scribe, where is the diſputer of the world? God hath made the wiſdome of the world fooliſhneſs; that is, God hath confounded reaſon, that faith may come in her place. John 7. 17. 1 Cor. 1. 20.

11. 3. For there are ſome things in our Religion ſo myſterious, that they are above all our reaſon; and well may we admire but cannot underſtand them: and therefore the Spirit of God is ſent into the world to bring our underſtanding into the obedience of Chriſt; we muſt obey and not enquire, and every proud thought muſt be ſubmitted to him who is the wiſdome of the Father, who hath in the holy Scriptures taught us all his Fathers will. 2 Cor. 10. 5.

12. 4. And therefore as to this nothing can be added from the ſtock of nature, or principles of naturall reaſon, ſo if it did need a ſupply, reaſon could ill doe it. For the object of our faith muſt be certain and infallible; but no mans reaſon is ſo, and therefore to put new wine into broken bottles is no gain, or real advantage; and although right reaſon is not to be gainſaid, yet what is right reaſon is ſo uncertain, that in the midſt of all diſputes, every man pretends to it, but who hath it no man can tell, and therefore it cannot be a guide or meaſure of faith.

13. 5. But above all, if we will pretend to reaſon in Religion, we have but one great reaſon that we can be obliged to; and that is, to beleeve that whatſoever God hath ſaid is true: ſo that our biggeſt reaſon in Religion, is to ſubmit our reaſon, that is, not to uſe our reaſon in particular inquiries, but to captivate it in the whole. And if there be any particular inquiries, let them ſeem what they will to my reaſon it matters not; I am to follow God, not man; I may be deceived by my ſelf, but never by God. It is therefore ſufficient to me that it is in the Scriptures. I will inquire no further. This therefore is a concluding argument; This is in Scripture, therefore this is true: and this is againſt Scripture, therefore it is abſurd, and unreaſonable.

14. 6. After all, experience is our competent guide and warning to us: For we ſee when witty men uſe their reaſon againſt God that gave it, they in purſuit of reaſon go beyond Religion; and when by reaſon they look for God, they miſs him; for he is not to be found but by faith, which when they diſpute for, they finde not; becauſe ſhe is built and perſwaded by other mediums, then all Schools of Philoſophy to this day have taught. And it was becauſe of reaſon, that the Religion of Jeſus was ſo long oppos'd and hinder'd to poſſeſs the world. The Philoſophers would uſe their reaſon, and their reaſon would not admit this new Religion: and therefore S. Paul being to remove every ſtone that hindered, bad them to beware of vain Philoſophy; which does not diſtniguiſh one kinde of Philoſophy from another, but marks all Philoſophy. It is all vain, when the enquiries are into religious myſteries.

15. 7. For is it not certain that ſome principles of reaſon are againſt ſome principles of faith and Scripture? and it is but reaſon, that we ſhould hear reaſon where ever we finde it; and yet we are to have no entercourſe with Devils, though we were ſure they would tell us of hidden treaſures, or ſecrets of Philoſophy: and upon this account it is that all Genethliacal predictions, and Judicial Aſtrology is decried by all religious perſons; for though there be great pretenſions of reaſon and art, yet they being againſt religion and revelation are intolerable. In theſe and the like caſes, reaſon muſt put on her muffler, and we muſt be wholly conducted by revelation.

16. Theſe are the pretences againſt the uſe of reaſon in queſtions of Religion; concerning which the ſame account may be given, as is by the Pyrrhonians and Scepticks concerning their arguments againſt the certainty of ſciences. Theſe reaſons are like Phyſick, which if it uncertainly purges out the Humor, it moſt certainly purges out it ſelf: and theſe arguments either cannot prevail againſt the uſe of reaſon in Religion, or if they doe, they prevail againſt themſelves: For either it is againſt Religion to rely upon reaſon in Religion, or it is not: If it be not, then reaſon may without danger to Religion be ſafely relied upon in all ſuch enquiries. But if it be againſt Religion to rely upon reaſon, then certainly theſe reaſons intended to prove it ſo, are not to be relied upon; or elſe this is no queſtion of Religion. For if this be a queſtion of Religion, why are ſo many reaſons us'd in it? If it be no queſtion of Religion, then we may for all theſe reaſons to the contrary, ſtill uſe our reaſon in Religion without prejudice to it. And if theſe reaſons conclude right, then we may for theſe reaſons ſake truſt the propoſition which ſays, that in Religion reaſon is to be us'd; but if theſe reaſons doe not conclude right, then there is no danger, but that reaſon may ſtill be us'd, theſe arguments to the contrary notwithſtanding.

17. But there is more in it then ſo. This foregoing diſcourſe, or to the like purpoſe, is uſed by two ſorts of perſons; The one is by thoſe, who in deſtitution of particular arguments, make their laſt recourſe unto authority of men. For by how much more they preſs their own peremptory affirmative, by ſo much the leſs will they endure your reaſons and arguments for the negative. But to theſe men I ſhall onely ſay, Let God be true, and every man a liar: and therefore if we truſt men concerning God, we doe not truſt God concerning men; that is, if we ſpeak of God as men pleaſe, we doe not think of men as God hath taught us; viz. That they are weak, and that they are liars: and they who have by artifices, and little devices, acquir'd to themſelves a reputation, take the leſs care for proving what they ſay, by how much the greater credulity that is, by which men have given themſelves up to be poſſeſs'd by others. And if I would have my ſaying to prevail whether it be right or wrong, I ſhall the leſs endure that any man ſhould uſe his own reaſon againſt me. And this is one of the great evils for which the Church of Rome hath given Chriſtendome a great cauſe to complain of her, who not onely preſſes men to beleeve or to ſubmit to what ſhe ſays upon her own authority, without enduring them to examine whether ſhe ſays true or no, but alſo requires as great an aſſent to what ſhe cannot prove, as to what ſhe can; requiring an adherence not leſs then the greateſt, even to thoſe things which ſhe onely pretends to be able to prove by prudential motives. Indeed in theſe caſes if they can obtain of men to bring their faith, they are ſafe; but to come accompanied with their reaſon too, that is dangerous.

18. The other ſort of men, is of thoſe who doe the ſame thing under another cover; for they not having obtain'd the advantages of Union or Government, cannot pretend to a privileged authority, but reſolving to obtrude their fancies upon the world, and yet not being able to prove what they ſay, pretend the Spirit of God to be the author of all their theoremes. If they could prove him to be their author, the thing were at an end, and all the world were bound to lay their necks under that pleaſant yoke; but becauſe they cannot prove any thing, therefore it is that they pretend the Spirit for every thing: and if the noiſe of ſo ſacred a Name will perſwade you, you are within the ſnare; if it will not, you are within their hatred. But it is impoſſible that theſe men can prevail, becauſe there are ſo many of them; It is as if there were twenty Mountebanks in the Piazza, and all ſaying they had the onely Antidote in the world for Poiſon; and that what was not theirs, was not at all, and yet all pretend ſeverally. For all men cannot have the Spirit, unleſs all men ſpeak the ſame thing: It were poſſible that even in Union they might be deceivers; but in Diviſion they cannot be right; and therefore ſince all theſe men pretend the Spirit, and yet all ſpeak ſeverall things and contradictory, they doe well to deſire of us not to uſe our reaſon, for if we doe, they can never hope to prevail; if we doe not, they may perſwade, as they meet with fools, that were not poſſeſs'd before.

19. Between theſe two there is a third that pretends to no authority on one hand, nor Enthuſiaſm on the other; but offers to prove what he ſays, but deſires not his arguments to be examined by reaſon, upon pretence that he urges Scripture; that is in effect, he muſt interpret it; but your reaſon ſhall not be judge whether he ſays right or wrong: for if you judge his interpretation, he ſays you judge of his argument, and make reaſon Umpire in queſtions of faith: and thus his ſect is continued, and the ſyſtemes of Divinity rely upon a certain number of propoſitions from generation to generation, and the Scholar ſhall be no wiſer then his Maſter for ever; becauſe he is taught to examine the doctrines of his Maſter by his Maſters arguments, and by no other. In effect, they all agree in this, they would rule all the world by Religion, and they would have no body wiſer then themſelves, but be fools and ſlaves, till their turn come to uſe others as bad as they have been uſed themſelves: and therefore as the wolves offered peace to the ſheep upon condition they would put away their dogs; ſo doe theſe men allow us to be Chriſtians and Diſciples, if we will lay aſide our reaſon, which is that guard of our ſouls, whereby alone we can be defended againſt their tyrannies and pretenſions.

20. That I may therefore ſpeak cloſe to the enquiry, I premiſe theſe conſiderations:

1. It is a weak and a trifling principle, which ſuppoſes faith and reaſon to be oppoſite: For faith is but one way, by which our reaſon is inſtructed, and acquires the proper notices of things. For our reaſon or underſtanding apprehends things three ſeveral ways: The firſt is called νόησις, or the firſt notices of things abſtract, of principles and the primò intelligibilia; ſuch as are, The whole is greater then the half of the whole; Good is to be choſen; God is to be loved: Nothing can be and not be at the ſame time; for theſe are objects of the ſimple underſtanding, congenite notices, concreated with the underſtanding. The ſecond is called Διάνοησις, or diſcourſe, that is, ſuch conſequents and emanations which the underſtanding draws from her firſt principles. And the third is πίστις, that is, ſuch things which the underſtanding aſſents to upon the report, teſtimony, and affirmation of others, viz. by arguments extrinſecal to the nature of the thing, and by collateral and indirect principles. For example, I naturally know that an idol or a falſe God is nothing; this is νόησις, or the act of abſtract and immaterial reaſon. From hence I inferre, that an idol is not to be worſhipped: This my reaſon knows by Διάνοησις, or illation and inference, from the firſt principle. But therefore that all monuments of idolatry are to be deſtroyed was known to the Jews by πίστις, for it was not primely known, nor by the direct force of any thing that was primely known; but I know it from God by the teſtimony of Moſes, into the notice of which I am brought by collateral arguments, by tradition, by miracle, by voices from heaven, and the like.

21. 2. Theſe three ways of knowing, are in all faculties ſacred and prophane: for faith and reaſon doe not divide Theology and Philoſophy, but in every Science reaſon hath notices all theſe ways. For in natural Philoſophy there are prime principles, and there are concluſions drawn from thence, and propoſitions which we beleeve from the authority of Plato, or Socrates, or Ariſtotle; and ſo it is in Theology; for every thing in Scripture is not in the divided ſenſe, a matter of faith: That the Sun is to rule the day, the Moon and the Stars to govern the night, I ſee and feel; That God is good, that he is one, are prime principles: that nothing but good is to be ſpoken of this good God, reaſon draws by a διάνοησις or diſcourſe and illation: but that this good God will chaſtiſe his ſons and ſervants, and that afflictions ſent upon us are the iſſues of his goodneſs, or that this one God, is alſo three in perſon, this is known by πίστις, or by beleef; for it is not a prime truth, nor yet naturally inferred from a prime truth, but told by God, and therefore is an object of faith; reaſon knows it by teſtimony, and by indirect and collateral probations.

22. 3. Reaſon knows all things as they are to be known, and enters into its notices by inſtruments fitted to the nature of things. Our ſtock of principles is more limited then our ſtock of words; and as there are more things then words, ſo there are more ways of knowing, then by principles direct and natural. Now as God teaches us many things by natural principles, many by experience, many at firſt, many more in time; ſome by the rules of one faculty, ſome by the rules of another; ſo there are ſome things which deſcend upon us immediately from heaven, and they communicate with no principle, with no matter, with no concluſion here below. Now as in the other things we muſt come to notices of things, by deriving them from their proper fountains; ſo muſt we doe in theſe. He that ſhould goe to revelation to prove that nine and nine makes eighteen, would be a fool; and he would be no leſs, that goes about to prove a Trinity of perſons by natural reaſon. Every thing muſt be derived from its own fountain. But becauſe theſe things which are derivatives from heaven, and communicate not at all with principles of Philoſophy, or Geometry, yet have their proper fountains, and theſe fountains are too high for us to ſearch into their bottome, we muſt plainly take all emanations from them, juſt as they deſcend. For in this caſe, all that is to be done, is to enquire from whence they come. If they come from natural principles, I ſearch for them by direct arguments: If they come from higher, I ſearch for them by indirect arguments; that is, I enquire onely for matter of fact, whether they come thence or no. But here my reaſon is ſet on work; firſt, I enquire into the teſtimony or ways of probation, if they be worth beleeving in what they ſay, my reaſon ſucks it in. As if I be told that God ſaid [there are three and one in heaven] I ask, who ſaid it? is he credible, why? If I finde that all things ſatisfy my reaſon, I beleeve him ſaying that God ſaid ſo; and then πίστις or faith enters. I beleeve the thing alſo, not becauſe I can prove it directly, for I cannot, but I can prove it indirectly; teſtimony and authority is my argument, and that is ſufficient. The Apoſtles entred into much of their faith by their ſenſes, they ſaw many articles of their Creed; but as they which ſaw and beleeved were bleſſed, ſo they which ſee not, but are argued and diſputed into their faith, and beleeve what they finde reaſonable to beleeve, ſhall have the reward of their faith, while they wiſely follow their reaſon.

23. 4. Now in all this, here is no difference in my reaſon, ſave that as it does not prove a Geometrical propoſition by moral Philoſophy, ſo neither does it prove a revelation by a natural argument, but into one and the other it enters by principles proper to the inquiſition; and faith and reaſon are not oppoſed at all. Faith and natural reaſon are ſeveral things, and Arithmetical and Moral reaſons are as differing, but it is reaſon that carries me to objects of faith, and faith is my reaſon ſo diſpoſed, ſo uſed, ſo inſtructed.

24. That into the greateſt myſteriouſneſs of our Religion, and the deepeſt articles of faith we enter by our reaſon: Not that we can prove every one of them by natural reaſon, for to ſay that, were as vain, as to ſay we ought to prove them by Arithmetick or Rules of Muſick; but whoſoever beleeves wiſely and not by chance, enters into his faith by the hand of reaſon; that is, he hath cauſes and reaſons why he beleeves. He indeed that hath reaſons inſufficient and incompetent, beleeves indeed not wiſely, but for ſome reaſon or other he does it; but he that hath none, does not beleeve at all: For the underſtanding is a rational faculty, and therefore every act of the underſtanding is an act of the rational faculty, and that is an act of reaſon; as viſion is of the viſive faculty: And faith, which is an act or habit of the underſtanding conſenting to certain propoſitions for the authority of the ſpeaker, is alſo as much an act of reaſon, as to diſcourſe in a propoſition of Ariſtotle. For faith aſſenting to a propoſition for a reaſon drawn à teſtimonio, is as very a diſcourſe, as to aſſent to a propoſition for a reaſon drawn from the nature of things. It is not leſs an act of reaſon, becauſe it uſes another topick. And all this is plain and certain, when we diſcourſe of faith formally in its proper and natural capacity, that is, as it is a reception of propoſitions à teſtimonio.

Indeed

25. Indeed if we conſider faith as it is a habit infuſed by God, and by Gods holy Spirit, ſo there is ſomething more in it then thus: For ſo, faith is a vital principle, a magazine of ſecret truths, which we could never have found out by natural reaſon, that is, by all that reaſon which is born with us, and by all that reaſon that grows with us, and by all ſecular experiences and converſations with the world; but of ſuch things which God onely teaches, by ways ſupernatural and divine.

26. Now here is the cloſe and ſecret of the Queſtion, Whether or no faith in this ſenſe, and materially taken, be contrary to our worldly or natural reaſon, or whether is any or all the propoſitions of faith to be exacted, interpreted, and underſtood according to this reaſon materially taken? that is, are not our reaſons which we rightly follow in natural Philoſophy, in Metaphyſicks, in other Arts and Sciences, ſometimes contrary to faith? and if they be, whether ſhall be followed? or can it in any ſenſe be an article of faith, if it be contrary to right reaſon? I anſwer to this, by ſeveral propoſitions.

27. 1. Right Reaſon (meaning our right reaſon, or humane reaſon) is not the affirmative or poſitive meaſure of things Divine, or of articles and myſteries of faith; and the reaſons are plain: 1. Becauſe many of them depend upon the free will of God, for which, till he gives us reaſons, we are to be ſtill and ſilent, admiring the ſecret, and adoring the wiſdome, and expecting till the curtain be drawn, or till Elias come and tell us all things. But he that will inquire and pry into the reaſon of the Myſtery, and becauſe he cannot perceive it, will disbeleeve the thing, or undervalue it, and ſay it is not at all, becauſe he does not underſtand the reaſon of it, and why it ſhould be ſo, may as well ſay that his Prince does not raiſe an Army in time of peace, becauſe he does not know a reaſon why he ſhould; or that God never did ſuffer a brave Prince to die ignobly, becauſe it was a thouſand pities he ſhould. There is a ragione di ſtato, and a ragione di regno, and a ragione di cielo, after which none but fools will inquire, and none but the humble ſhall ever finde.

28. Who can tell why the Devil, who is a wiſe and intelligent creature, ſhould ſo ſpitefully, and for no end but for miſchief, tempt ſo many ſouls to ruine, when he knows it can doe him no good, no pleaſure, but phantaſtick? or who can tell why he ſhould be delighted in a pleaſure that can be nothing but phantaſtick, when he knows things by intuition, not by phantaſm, and hath no low conceit of things as we have? or why he ſhould doe ſo many things againſt God, whom he knows he cannot hurt, and againſt ſouls, whoſe ruine cannot adde one moment of pleaſure to him? and if it makes any change, it is infinitely to the worſe: That theſe things are ſo, our Religion tels us; but our reaſon cannot reach it why it is ſo, or how: Whoſe reaſon can give an account why, or underſtand it to be reaſonable, that God ſhould permit evil for good ends, when he hates that evil, and can produce that good without that evil? and yet that he does ſo we are taught by our Religion: Whoſe reaſon can make it intelligible, that God who delights not in the death of a ſinner, but he and his Chriſt, and all their Angels rejoyce infinitely in the ſalvation of a ſinner, yet that he ſhould not cauſe that every ſinner ſhould be ſaved, working in him a mighty and a prevailing grace, without which grace he ſhall not in the event of things be ſaved, and yet this grace is wholly his own production.

Why does not he work in us all to will and to doe, not onely that we can will, but that we ſhall will? for if the actual willing be any thing, it is his creation; we can create nothing, we cannot will unleſs he effect it in us, and why he does not doe that which ſo well pleaſes him, and for the want of the doing of which he is ſo diſpleaſed, and yet he alone is to doe it ſome way or other; humane reaſon cannot give a wiſe or a probable account.

Proſp. de præd. l. 3. cap. 8.

Where is the wiſe Diſcourſer, that can tell how it can be, that God foreknows certainly what I ſhall doe ten years hence, and yet it is free to me at that time, to will or not to will, to doe or not to doe that thing? Where is the diſcerning Searcher of ſecrets, that can give the reaſon why God ſhould determine for ſo many ages before, that Judas ſhould betray Chriſt, and yet that God ſhould kill him eternally for effecting the Divine purpoſe, and fore-determined counſel? Well may we wonder that God ſhould waſh a ſoul with water, and with bread and wine nouriſh us up to immortality, and make real impreſſes upon our ſpirits by the bloud of the vine, and the kidneys of wheat; but who can tell why he ſhould chooſe ſuch mean inſtruments to effect ſuch glorious promiſes? ſince even the greateſt things of this world had not been diſproportionable inſtruments to ſuch effects, nor yet too great for our underſtanding; and that we are fain to ſtoop to make theſe mean elements be even with our faith, and with our underſtanding. Who can divine, and give us the cauſe, or underſtand the reaſon, why God ſhould give us ſo great rewards for ſuch nothings, and yet damne men for ſuch inſignificant miſchiefs, for thoughts, for words, for ſecret wiſhes, that effect no evil abroad, but onely might have done, or it may be were reſolved to be unactive? For if the goodneſs of God be ſo overflowing in ſome caſes, we in our reaſon ſhould not expect, that in ſuch a great goodneſs, there ſhould be ſo great an aptneſs to deſtroy men greatly for little things: and if all mankinde ſhould joyn in ſearch, it could never be told, why God ſhould adjudge the Heathen or the Iſraelites to an eternal hell, of which he never gave them warning, nor created fears great enough, to produce caution equal to their danger; and who can give a reaſon why for temporal and tranſient actions of ſin, the world is to expect never ceaſing torments in hell to eternal ages? That theſe things are thus, we are taught in Scripture, but here our reaſon is not inſtructed to tell why or how; and therefore our reaſon is not the poſitive meaſure of myſteries, and we muſt beleeve what we can not underſtand.

29. Thus are they to be blamed, who make intricacies and circles in myſterious articles, becauſe they cannot wade thorough them; it is not to be underſtood why God ſhould ſend his holy Son from his boſome to redeem us, to pay our price; nor to be told why God ſhould exact a price of himſelf for his own creature; nor to be made intelligible to us, why he who loved us ſo well, as to ſend his Son to ſave us, ſhould at the ſame time ſo hate us, as to reſolve to damne us, unleſs his Son ſhould come and ſave us. But the Socinians who conclude that this was not thus, becauſe they know not how it can be thus, are highly to be reproved for their exceſs in the inquiries of reaſon, not where ſhe is not a competent Judge, but where ſhe is not competently inſtructed; and that is the ſecond reaſon.

30. 2. The reaſon of man is a right Judge always when ſhe is truly informed; but in many things ſhe knows nothing but the face of the article: the myſteries of faith are oftentimes like Cherubims heads placed over the Propitiatory, where you may ſee a clear and a bright face and golden wings, but there is no body to be handled; there is light and ſplendor upon the brow, but you may not graſp it; and though you ſee the revelation clear, and the article plain, yet the reaſon of it we cannot ſee at all; that is, the whole knowledge which we can have here is dark and obſcure; We ſee as in a glaſs darkly, ſaith S. Paul, that is, we can ſee what, but not why, and what we doe ſee is the leaſt part of that which does not appear; but in theſe caſes our underſtanding is to ſubmit, and wholly to be obedient, but not to inquire further. Delicata eſt illa obedientia quæ cauſas quærit. If the underſtanding will not conſent to a revelation, until it ſee a reaſon of the propoſition, it does not obey at all, for it will not ſubmit, till it cannot chooſe. In theſe caſes, Reaſon and Religion are like Leah and Rachel: Reaſon is fruitful indeed, and brings forth the firſt-born, but ſhe is blear-ey'd, and oftentimes knows not the ſecrets of her Lord; but Rachel produces two children, Faith and Piety, and Obedience is Midwife to them both, and Modeſty is the Nurſe.

31. From hence it follows, that we cannot ſafely conclude thus, This is agreeable to right reaſon, therefore this is ſo in Scripture, or in the counſel of God; not that one reaſon can be againſt another, when all things are equal, but that the ſtate of things, and of diſcourſes is imperfect; and though it be right reaſon in ſuch a conſtitution of affairs, yet it is not ſo in others; that a man may repel force by force, is right reaſon, and a natural right, but yet it follows not, that it can be lawful for a private Chriſtian to doe it, or that Chriſt hath not forbidden us to ſtrike him that ſtrikes us: The reaſon of the difference is this; In nature it is juſt that it be ſo, becauſe we are permitted onely to natures proviſions, and ſhe hath made us equal, and the condition of all men indifferent; and therefore we have the ſame power over another, that he hath over us; beſides, we will doe it naturally, and till a Law forbad it, it could not be amiſs, and there was no reaſon in nature to reſtrain it, but much to warrant it. But ſince the Law of God hath forbidden it, he hath made other proviſions for our indempnity, and where he permits us to be defenceleſs (as in caſes of Martyrdome and the like) he hath promiſed a reward to make infinite amends: So that we may repel force by force, ſays Nature, we may not, ſays Chriſt, and yet they are not two contradictory propoſitions. For nature ſays

we may, when otherwiſe we have no ſecurity, and no reward for ſuffering; but Chriſt hath given both the defence of Laws and Authority, and the reward of heaven, and therefore in this caſe it is reaſonable. And thus we cannot conclude, This man is a wicked man becauſe he is afflicted, or his cauſe is evil becauſe it does not thrive; although it be right reaſon, that good men ought to be happy and proſperous; becauſe although reaſon ſays right in it, yet no reaſon can wiſely conclude, that therefore ſo it ſhould be in this world, when faith and reaſon too tell us it may be better hereafter. The reſult is this, every thing that is above our underſtanding, is not therefore to be ſuſpected or disbeleeved, neither is any thing to be admitted that is againſt Scripture, though it be agreeable to right reaſon, until all information is brought in, by which the ſentence is to be made.

32. For as it happens in dreams and madneſs, where the argument is good, and the diſcourſe reaſonable oftentimes; but becauſe it is inferred from weak phantaſms, and trifling and imperfect notices of things, and obſcure apprehenſions, therefore it is not onely deſultorious and light, but inſignificant, and farre from miniſtring to knowledge: ſo it is in our reaſon as to matters of Religion, it argues well and wiſely, but becauſe it is from trifling, or falſe, or uncertain principles, and unſure information, it oftentimes is but a witty nothing: reaſon is an excellent limbeck, and will extract rare quinteſſences, but if you put in nothing but muſhromes, or eggeſhels, or the juice of coloquintida, or the filthy gingran, you muſt expect productions accordingly, uſeleſs or unpleaſant, dangerous or damnable.

33. 2. Although right reaſon is not the poſitive and affirmative meaſure of any article, yet it is the negative meaſure of every one. So that, whatſoever is contradictory to right reaſon, is at no hand to be admitted as a myſtery of faith, and this is certain upon an infinite account.

34. 1. Becauſe nothing can be true and falſe at the ſame time, otherwiſe it would follow that there could be two truths contrary to each other: for if the affirmative be true, and the negative true too, then the affirmative is true and is not true, which were a perfect contradiction, and we were bound to beleeve a lie, and hate a truth; and yet at the ſame time, obey what we hate, and conſent to what we disbeleeve: No man can ſerve two ſuch Maſters.

35. 2. Out of truth nothing can follow but truth; whatſoever therefore is truth, this is therefore ſafe to be followed, becauſe no error can be the product of it. It follows therefore, that by beleeving one truth, no man can be tied to disbeleeve another. Whatſoever therefore is contrary to right reaſon, or to a certain truth in any faculty, cannot be a truth, for one truth is not contrary to another: if therefore any propoſition be ſaid to be the doctrine of Scripture, and confeſſed to be againſt right reaſon, it is certainly not the doctrine of Scripture, becauſe it cannot be true, and yet be againſt what is true.

36. 3. All truths are emanations and derivatives from God, and therefore whatſoever is contrary to any truth, in any faculty whatſoever, is againſt the truth of God, and God cannot be contrary to himſelf; for as God is one, ſo truth is one; for truth is Gods eldeſt daughter, and ſo like himſelf, that God may as well be multiplied, as abſtracted truth.

37. 4. And for this reaſon God does not onely prove our Religion, and Jeſus Chriſt prove his Miſſion by Miracles, by Holineſs, by verification of Prophecies, and prediction of future Contingencies, and voices from heaven, and apparition of Angels, and Reſurrection from the grave, and fulfilling all that was ſaid of him by the Prophets, that our faith might enter into us by diſcourſe, and dwell by love, and be nurſed and ſupported by reaſon: but alſo God is pleaſed to verify his own proceedings, and his own propoſitions, by diſcourſes meerly like ours, when we ſpeak according to right reaſon. Thus God convinces the peeviſh people that ſpake evil of him, by arguing concerning the juſtice of his ways, and expoſes his proceedings to be argued by the ſame meaſures and proportions by which he judges us, and we judge one another.

Iſa. 1. 18. & 5. 3. Ezek. 18. 25.

38. 5. For indeed how can it be poſſibly otherwiſe? how can we confeſs God to be juſt if we underſtand it not? but how can we underſtand him ſo, but by the meaſures of juſtice? and how ſhall we know that, if there be two Juſtices, one that we know, and one that we know not, one contrary to another? if they be contrary, they are not juſtice; for juſtice can be no more oppoſed by juſtice, then truth to truth: if they be not contrary, then that which we underſtand to be juſt in us, is juſt in God, and that which is juſt once, is juſt for ever in the ſame caſe, and circumſtances: and indeed how is it that we are in all things of excellency and vertue to be like God, and to be meek like Chriſt, to be humble as he is humble, and to be pure like God, to be juſt after his example, to be merciful as our heavenly Father is merciful? If there is but one Mercy, and one Juſtice, and one Meekneſs, then the meaſure of theſe, and the reaſon is eternally the ſame. If there be two, either they are not eſſential to God, or elſe not imitable by us: And then how can we glorify God, and ſpeak honour of his Name, and exalt his juſtice, and magnify his truth, and ſincerity, and ſimplicity, if truth, and ſimplicity, and juſtice, and mercy in him is not that thing which we underſtand, and which we are to imitate? To give an example. I have promiſed to give my friend a 100. pounds on the Calends of March: The day comes, and he expects the donative; but I ſend him anſwer, that I did promiſe ſo by an open promiſe and ſignification, and I had an inclination to doe ſo; but I have alſo a ſecret will to keep my money, and inſtead of that to give him a 100. blows upon his back: if he reproaches me for an unjuſt and a falſe perſon; I have nothing to anſwer, for I beleeve he would hardly take it for good paiment to be anſwered with a diſtinction, and told; I have two wils, an open, and a ſecret will, and they are contrary to each other: he would tell me that I were a falſe perſon for having two wills, and thoſe two wills were indeed but one, nothing but a will to deceive and abuſe him. Now this is reaſon, right reaſon, the reaſon of all the world, the meaſure of all mankinde, the meaſure that God hath given us to underſtand, and to walk, to live, and to practiſe by. And we cannot underſtand what is meant by hypocriſy, and diſſembling, if to ſpeak one thing and not to mean it, be not that hypocriſy. Now put caſe God ſhould call us to give him the glory of his juſtice and ſincerity, of the truth of his promiſes, and the equity of his ways, and ſhould tell us, That we periſh by our own fault, and if we will die, it is becauſe we will, not becauſe we muſt; becauſe we chooſe it, not becauſe he forces us; for he calls us, and offers us life and ſalvation, and gives us powers, and time and advantages, and deſires it really, and endevours it paſſionately, and effects it materially, ſo farre as it concerns his portion: This is a certain evidence of his truth and juſtice; But if we can reply and ſay, It is true, O God, that thou doſt call us, but doſt never intend we ſhould come, that thy open will is loving ving and plauſible, but thy ſecret will is cruell, decretory and deſtructive to us whom thou haſt reprobated; that thy open will is ineffective, but thy ſecret will onely is operative, and productive of a material event, and therefore although we are taught to ſay, Thou art juſt, and true in all thy ſayings, yet certainly it is not that juſtice which thou haſt commanded us to imitate and practiſe, it is not that ſincerity which we can ſafely uſe to one another, and therefore either we men are not juſt when we think we are, or elſe thou art not juſt who doeſt and ſpeakeſt contrary things, or elſe there are two contrary things which may be called juſtice.

39. For let it be conſidered as to the preſent inſtance; God cannot have two wills, it is againſt the unity of God, and the ſimplicity of God. If there were two Divine wills, there were two Gods; and if it be one will, then it cannot at the ſame time will contrary things; and if it does not, then when God ſays one thing, and yet he wills it not, it is becauſe he onely wills to ſay it, and not to doe it; and if to ſay this thing of the good, the juſt, the true, the righteous Judge of all the world be not blaſphemy, I know not what is.

40. The purpoſe of this inſtance is to exemplify, that in all vertues and excellencies there is a perfect unity: and becauſe all is originally and eſſentially in God, and from him derived to us, and all our good, our mercy, our truth, our juſtice is but an imitation of his, it follows demonſtratively, that what is unjuſt in men, and what is falſhood in our entercourſes, is therefore falſe or unjuſt, becauſe it is contrary to the eternal pattern: and therefore whatſoever our reaſon does rightly call unjuſt, or hypocriſy, or falſhood muſt needs be infinitely farre from God; and thoſe propoſitions which aſperſe God with any thing of this nature, are ſo farre from being the word of God, or an article of faith, or a myſtery of religion, that it is blaſphemous and falſe, hateful to God and good men.

41. In theſe things there is the greater certainty, becauſe there is the leſs variety and no myſtery; theſe things which in God we adore as Attributes, being the lines of our Duty, the limits and ſcores we are to walk by; therefore as our reaſon is here beſt inſtructed, ſo it cannot eaſily be deceived, and we can better tell what is right reaſon in theſe things, then in queſtions not ſo immediately relative to duty and morality.

42. But yet this Rule alſo holds in every thing where reaſon is, or can be right; but with ſome little difference of expreſſion, but generally thus:

43. 1. Whatſoever right reaſon ſays cannot be done, we cannot pretend from Scripture, that it belongs to Gods Almightineſs to doe it; it is no part of the Divine Omnipotency, to doe things contradictory; for that is not to be done which is not, and it is no part of power to doe that which is not an act or effect of power. Now in every contradictory, one part is a non-entity, a nothing, and therefore by power cannot be produced; and to ſuppoſe it producible or poſſible to be effected by an Almighty power, is to ſuppoſe an Almighty power to be no power, or to doe that which is not the effect of power.

44. But I need ſay no more of this, for all men grant it, and all ſects and varieties of Chriſtians indevour to clear their articles from inferring contradictions, as implicitely confeſſing, that it cannot be true to which any thing that is true is contradictory. Onely ſome men are forced by their intereſt and opinions to ſay, that although to humane reaſon ſome of their articles ſeem to have in them contradictions, yet it is the defect of their reaſon, and their faith is the more excellent, by how much reaſon is more at a loſs. So doe the Lutherans about the Ubiquity of Chriſts body, and the Papiſts about Tranſubſtantiation, and the Calviniſts about abſolute Reprobation, as being reſolved upon the propoſitions, though heaven and earth confute them. For if men can be ſafe from argument with ſuch a little artifice as this, then no error can be confuted, then there is nothing ſo abſurd but may be maintained, and a mans reaſon is uſeleſs in inquiry and in probation; and (which is to me very conſiderable) no man can in any article be a heretick or ſin againſt his conſcience. For to ſpeak againſt the words of Scripture, is not directly againſt our conſcience, there are many ways to eſcape, by interpretation or authority; but to profeſs an article againſt our reaſon, is immediately againſt our conſcience; for reaſon and conſcience dwell under the ſame roof, and eat the ſame portions of meat, and drink the ſame chalice: The authority of Scripture is ſuperinduced, but right reaſon is the eternal word of God; The kingdome of God that is within us; and the beſt portions of Scripture, even the Law of Jeſus Chriſt, which in moral things is the eternal law of Nature, is written in our hearts, is reaſon, and that wiſdome to which we cannot chooſe but aſſent, and therefore in whatſoever he goes againſt his reaſon, he muſt needs goe againſt his conſcience, becauſe he goes againſt that, by which he ſuppoſes God did intend to govern him, reaſon not having been placed in us as a ſnare and a temptation, but as a light and a ſtarre to lead us by day and night. It is no wonder that men maintain abſurd propoſitions, who will not hear great reaſon againſt them, but are willing to take excuſes and pretences for the juſtification of them.

45. 2. This is not to be underſtood, as if God could doe nothing but what we can with our reaſon comprehend or know how. For God can doe every thing, but we cannot underſtand every thing: and therefore infinite things there are, or may be, which our reaſon cannot maſter; they are above our underſtanding, but are to be entertained by faith. It is not to be ſaid or beleeved that God can doe what right reaſon ſays cannot be: but it muſt be ſaid and beleeved that God can doe thoſe things to which our underſtanding cannot by all its powers miniſtred here below, attain. For ſince God is omnipotent, unleſs we were omniſcient, we could not underſtand all that he can doe; but although we know but little, yet we know ſome propoſitions which are truths taught us by God, and they are the meaſures whereby we are to ſpeak and beleeve concerning the works of God.

46. For it is to be conſidered, whatſoever is above our underſtanding, is not againſt it: ſupra and ſecundùm may conſiſt together in ſeveral degrees: Thus we underſtand the Divine power of working miracles, and we beleeve and know God hath done many: and although we know not how our dead bones ſhall live again, yet our reaſon tels us, that it is within the power of God to effect it; and therefore our faith need not be troubled to beleeve it. But if a thing be againſt our underſtanding, it is againſt the work of God, and againſt a truth of God, and therefore is no part, and it can be no effect of the Divine power: Many things in nature are above our underſtanding, and no wonder if many things in grace are ſo too; The peace of God paſſeth all underſtanding, yet we feel ſomething of it, and hope for more, and long for all, and beleeve what we yet cannot perceive. But I conſider further:

There

47. There are ſome things in reaſon which are certainly true, and ſome things which reaſon does infallibly condemne: our bleſſed Saviours argument was certain, A ſpirit hath not fleſh and bones as ye perceive me to have; therefore I am no ſpirit: and S. Johns argument was certain, That which we have ſeen with our eyes, and heard with our ears, and which our hands have handled of the word of life, that we preach, that is, we are to beleeve what we ſee and hear and feel; and as this is true in the whole Religion, ſo it is true in every article of it. If right ſenſe and right reaſon tell us clearly, that is, tell us ſo that there is no abſurdneſs, or contradiction, or unreaſonableneſs in it, we are to beleeve it, as we are to beleeve God; and if an Angel from heaven ſhould tell us any thing againſt theſe propoſitions, I doe not doubt but we would reject him. Now if we inquire what things are certainly true or falſe; I muſt anſwer that in the firſt place I reckon, prime principles and contradictions. In the next place, thoſe things which are manifeſtly abſurd: but if it be asked further, which things are manifeſtly abſurd, and what it is to be manifeſtly abſurd? there can no more anſwer be given to this, then to him who asks, how ſhall I know whether I am in light or in darkneſs? If therefore it be poſſible for men to dote in ſuch things as theſe, their reaſon is uſeleſs in its greateſt force and higheſt powers: It muſt therefore be certain, that if the parts of a contradiction, or a right reaſon be put in bar againſt a propoſition, it muſt not pretend to be an article of faith; and to pretend Gods omnipotency againſt it, is to pretend his power againſt his truth: God can deliver us from our enemies, when to humane reaſon it ſeems impoſſible, that is, when we are deſtitute of all natural help, and proper cauſes and probabilities of eſcape, by what we ſee or feel; that is, when it is impoſsible to men, it may be poſsible with God; but then the faith which beleeves that God can doe it, is alſo very right reaſon: and if we hope he will doe it, there is more then faith in it, but there is nothing in it beyond reaſon, except love alſo be there.

48. The reſult is this: 1. Our reaſon is below many of the works, and below all the power of God, and therefore cannot perceive all that God hath, or can, or will doe, no more then an Owl can ſtare upon the body of the Sun, or tel us what ſtrange things are in that immenſe globe of fire. But when any thing that is poſſible is revealed, reaſon can conſent; but if reaſon cannot conſent to it when it is told of it, then it is nothing, it hath no being, it hath no poſſibility; whatſoever is in our underſtanding is in being: for that which is not, is not intelligible, and to what reaſon cannot conſent, in that no being can be ſuppoſed.

49. 2. Not onely what is impoſſible to reaſon is poſſible in faith, but if any thing be really abſurd or unreaſonable, that is, againſt ſome truth, in which humane reaſon is really inſtructed, that is a ſufficient preſumption againſt a propoſition, that it cannot be an article of faith. For even this very thing (I mean) an avoiding of an abſurdity, or an inconvenience, is the onely meaſure and rule of interpreting very many places of Scripture. For why does not every Chriſtian pull out his right eye, or cut off his hand, and leg, that he might enter into heaven halt and blinde? why doe not we beleeve that Chriſt is a door, and a vine, and a ſtone, ſince theſe things are dogmatically affirmed in Scripture? but that we expound Scriptures as we confute them who deny principles, by declaring that ſuch ſenſes, or opinions introduce evil and fooliſh conſequents, againſt ſome other truth in ſome faculty or other in which humane reaſon is rightly taught. Now the meaſure and the limit of this, is that very thing which is the reaſon of this, and all the preceding diſcourſe,

One truth cannot be againſt another; if therefore your opinion or interpretation be againſt a truth, it is falſe, and no part of faith. A commandement cannot be againſt a revelation, a privilege cannot be againſt a promiſe, a threatning cannot mean againſt an article, a right cannot be againſt a duty; for all reaſon, and all right, and all truth, and all faith, and all commandements are from God, and therefore partake of his unity and his ſimplicity.

50. 3. This is to be enlarged with this advice, that in all queſtions of the ſenſe of Scripture, the ordinary way is to be preſumed before the extraordinary, and if the plain way be poſſible, and reaſonable, and uſeful, and the extraordinary of no other uſe, but to make wonder and ſtrangeneſs to the beleef of the underſtanding, we are to preſume for that, and to let this alone, becauſe that hath the advantage of reaſon, it being more reaſonable that God will keep the methods of his own creation, and bring us to him by ways with which we are acquainted, and by which we can better underſtand our way to him, then that he will doe a miracle to no purpoſe, and without neceſſity; God never doing any thing for the oſtentation, but very many things for the manifeſtation of his power, for his wiſdome and his power declare each other, and in every thing where he ſhews his mightineſs, he alſo ſhews his wiſdome, that is, he never does any thing without great reaſon. And therefore the Romans doctrine of the holy Sacrament ſuffers an intolerable prejudice, becauſe it ſuppoſes daily heaps and conjugations of miracles, wholly to no purpoſe; ſince the real body can be taken by them to whom it does no good; and all the good can be conveyed to us, though the body be onely taken in a ſpiritual ſenſe; all the good being conveyed by moral inſtruments, and to ſpiritual effect; and therefore the ordinary way, and the ſenſe which the Church of England gives, is infinitely to be preferred, becauſe it ſuppoſes no violences and effects of miracles, no cramps and convulſions to reaſon: and a man may receive the holy Sacrament, and diſcourſe of all its effects, and myſteriouſneſſes, though he doe not talk like a mad man, or a man going out of his wits, and a ſtranger to all the Reaſon and Philoſophy of the world; and therefore it is remarkable, that there is in our faith no article, but what is poſſible to be effected by the ordinary power of God; That a Virgin ſhould conceive is ſo poſſible to Gods power, that it is poſſible in nature ſay the Arabians; but however, he that made the Virgin out of nothing, can make her produce ſomething out of ſomething: and for the reſurrection of the dead, it is certainly leſs then the Creation, and it is like that which we ſee every year, in the reſurrection of plants and dead corn, and is in many degrees imitable by Art, which can out of aſhes raiſe a flower. And for all the other articles of our Creed, they are ſo far from being miraculous and ſtrange to reaſon, that the greateſt wonder is, that our beleef is ſo ſimple and facile, and that we ſhall receive ſo great and prodigious events hereafter, by inſtruments ſo fitted to the weakeſt capacities of men here below. Indeed ſome men have ſo ſcorn'd the ſimplicity of the Goſpel, that becauſe they thought it honourable to have every thing ſtrange and unintelligible, they have put in devices and dreams of miracles of their own, and have ſo explicated them, that as without many miracles they could not be verified, ſo without one, they can hardly be underſtood. That which is eaſy to reaſon, and moſt intelligible, is more like the plainneſs, and truth, and innocence, and wiſdome of the Goſpel, then that which is bones to Philoſophy, and iron to the teeth of babes.

51. But this is to be practiſed with caution; for every mans reaſon is not right, and every mans reaſon is not to be truſted: and therefore,

4. As

4. As abſurd fooliſh things are not to be obtruded, under the pretence of being myſteries, ſo neither muſt miſtaken Philoſophy, and falſe notices of things be pretended for reaſon. There are miſtakes on all hands, ſome Chriſtians explicate their myſteries, and mince them into ſo many minutes, and niceties, and ſpeak of them more then they are taught, more then is ſaid in the Scriptures, or the firſt Creeds, that the article which in its own ſimplicity was indeed myſterious, and not to be comprehended by our dark and leſs inſtructed reaſon, but yet was not impoſſible to be beleeved, is made impoſſible to be underſtood by the appendages, and expoſed to ſcorn and violences by hereticks and misbeleevers; ſo is the Incarnation of the Son of God, the myſterious Trinity, the preſence of Chriſt in the holy Sacrament. For ſo long as the myſteries are ſignified in ſimple, wiſe, and general terms, reaſon can eſpy no particular impoſſibilities in them: but when men will explicate what they cannot underſtand, and intricate what they pretend to explicate, and ſuperinduce new clauſes to the article, and by entring within the cloud, doe leſs ſee the light, they finde reaſon amazed, where ſhe could eaſily have ſubmitted, and clouds brought upon the main article, and many times the body it ſelf is ſuppoſed to be a phantaſm, becauſe of its tinſel and fairy dreſſing: and on the other ſide, he that would examine an article of faith, by a propoſition in Philoſophy, muſt be careful that his Philoſophy be as right as he pretends. For as it will be hard to expect, that right reaſon ſhould ſubmit to a falſe article, upon pretence it is revealed, ſo it will be as hard to diſtruſt an article, becauſe it is againſt a falſe propoſition, which I was taught in thoſe Schools of learning who ſpeak things by cuſtome, or by chance, or becauſe they are taught, and becauſe they are not ſuffered to be examined. Whoever offers at a reproof of reaſon, muſt be ſure that he is right in the article, and that muſt be upon the ſtrength of ſtronger reaſon; and he that offers by reaſon to reprove a pretended article, muſt be ſure his reaſon muſt be greater then the reverence of that pretenſion.

52. And therefore holy Scriptures command us in thoſe caſes to ſuch purpoſes, as not onely teach us what to doe in it, but alſo confirm the main inquiry; for therefore we are commanded to try all things: Suppoſe that be meant that we try them by Scriptures; how can we ſo try them, but by comparing line with line, by conſidering the conſequents of every pretence, the analogy of faith, the meaſures of juſtice, the laws of nature, eſſential right, and prime principles? and all this is nothing but by making our faith the limit of our reaſon, in matters of duty to God; and reaſon the miniſter of faith, and things that concern our duty. The ſame is intended by thoſe other words of another Apoſtle, Beloved, beleeve not every ſpirit, but try if the ſpirits be of God; how can this be tried? by Scripture? yea; but how if the Queſtion be of the ſenſe of Scripture, as it is generally at this day? Then it muſt be tried by ſomething extrinſecal to the Queſtion, and whatſoever you can call to judgement, reaſon muſt ſtill be your Sollicitor and your Advocate and your Judge; onely reaſon is not always the Law, ſometimes it is, for ſo our bleſſed Saviour was pleaſed to ſay, Why of your ſelves doe you not judge that which is reaſonable? for ſo δίκαιον there is uſed, that which is fitting and conſonant to reaſon; and in proportion to this it was, that ſo much of the Religion of Jeſus was clothed with Parables, as if the theoremes and propoſitions themſelves were clothed with fleſh and bloud, and converſed after the manner of men, to whom reaſon is the Law, and the Rule, the Guide and the Judge, the meaſure of good and evil for this life, and for that which is to come. The conſequent is this: Luke 12. 57.

He

He that ſays thus, This doctrine is againſt the word of God, and therefore it is abſurd and againſt reaſon, may as it fals out ſay true; but his propoſition will be of no uſe, becauſe reaſon is before revelation, and that this is revealed by God, muſt be proved by reaſon. But,

54. He that ſays, This is abſurd, or this is againſt reaſon, therefore this is againſt the word of God, if he ſays true in the antecedent, ſays true in the conſequent, and the argument is uſeful in the whole, it being the beſt way to interpret difficult Scriptures, and to eſtabliſh right ſenſes, and to confute confident hereſies. For when both ſides agree that theſe are the words of God, and the queſtion of faith is concerning the meaning of the words, nothing is an article of faith, or a part of the religion, but what can be proved by reaſons to be the ſenſe and intentions of God. Reaſon is never to be pretended againſt the clear ſenſe of Scripture, becauſe by reaſon it is that we came to perceive that to be the clear ſenſe of Scripture. And againſt Reaſon, reaſon cannot be pretended; but againſt the words of Scripture produced in a queſtion, there may be great cauſe to bring reaſon; for nothing ſeems plainer then thoſe words of S. James, Above all things my brethren, ſwear not at all; and yet reaſon interpoſes and tels us, that plain words muſt not be underſtood againſt plain reaſon and plain neceſſity: For if oaths before Magiſtrates were not permitted and allowed, it were neceſſary to examine all men by torture; and yet neither ſo could they ſo well be ſecured of truth as they can by ſwearing. What is more plain then the words of S. Paul? νεκρώσατε τὰ μέλη ὑμῶν τὰ ὄντα ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, mortify or kill your members, that are upon the earth; and yet reaſon tels us, that we muſt not hurt or deſtroy one limb, and where ever the effect would be intolerable, there the ſenſe is ſtill unreaſonable; and therefore not a part of faith, ſo long as it is an enemy to reaſon, which is the elder ſiſter, and the guide and guardian of the yonger.

55. For as when the Tables of the Law were broken by Moſes, God would make no new ones, but bade Moſes provide ſome ſtones of his own, and he would write them over: ſo it is in our Religion, when God with the finger of his Spirit, writes the Religion and the Laws of Jeſus Chriſt, he writes them in the tables of our reaſon, that is, in the tables of our hearts. Homo cordatus, a wiſe, rational man, ſober, and humble, and diſcurſive hath the beſt faith, but the ἄτοποι (as S. Paul cals them) the unreaſonable, they are ſuch who have no faith, 2 Theſſ. 3. 2. For the Chriſtian Religion is called by S. Paul λογικὴ λατρεία, a reaſonable worſhip; and the word of God is called by S. Peter γάλα λογικὸν ἄδολον, the reaſonable and uncrafty milk; it is full of reaſon, but it hath no tricks, it is rational, but not crafty, it is wiſe and holy: And he that pretends there are ſome things in our Religion, which right reaſon cannot digeſt and admit, makes it impoſſible to reduce Atheiſts, or to convert Jews and Heathens. But if reaſon invites them in, reaſon can entertain them all the day.

And now to the arguments brought againſt the uſe of reaſon; the anſwers may eaſily be gathered from the premiſes:

56. To the firſt I anſwer, That reaſon is the eye of the ſoul in all things, natural, moral and religious; and faith is the light of that eye, in things pertaining to God; for it is true, that naturall reaſon cannot teach us the things of God, that is, reaſon inſtructed onely by this world, which S. Paul cals the natural man, cannot diſcern the things of the Spirit, for they are ſpiritually diſcerned: that is, that they are taught and perceived by the aids of Gods Spirit, by revelation lation and divine aſſiſtances and grace: but though natural reaſon cannot, yet it is falſe to ſay that reaſon cannot; for reaſon illuminated can perceive the things of God; that is, when reaſon is taught in that faculty, under that Maſter, and by thoſe rules which are proper for ſpiritual things, then reaſon can doe all its intentions.

57. To the ſecond I anſwer, that therefore humility and piety are the beſt diſpoſitions, to the underſtanding the ſecrets of the Goſpel:

1. Becauſe theſe doe remove thoſe prejudices and obſtructions which are bars and fetters to reaſon; and the humble man does beſt underſtand, becauſe the proud man will not inquire, or he will not labour, or he will not underſtand any propoſition that makes it neceſſary for him to lay aſide his imployment or his vanity, his intereſt or his vice.

2. Theſe are indeed excellent diſpoſitions to underſtanding, the beſt moral inſtruments, but not the beſt natural: If you are to diſpute againſt a Heathen, a good reaſon will ſooner convince him then an humble thought; If you be to convert a few, an argument from the old Prophets is better to him then three or four acts of a gracious comportment.

3. Sometimes by way of bleſſing and reward. God gives underſtanding to good perſons, which to the evil he denies, but this which effects any thing by way of Divine bleſſing, is not to be ſuppoſed the beſt natural inſtrument. Thus the Divines ſay that the fire of hell ſhall torment ſouls, tanquam inſtrumentum Divinæ voluntatis, as the inſtrument in the hand of a voluntary, and almighty agent, but not as a thing apportioned properly to ſuch an event, for the worm of conſcience is more apt to that purpoſe.

4. And when we compare man with man, ſo it is true that the pious man ſhould be ſooner inſtructed then the impious, cæteris paribus, but if we compare diſcourſe and piety, reaſon & humility, they excel each other in their ſeveral kinds, as wooll is better then a diamond, and yet a diamond is to be preferred before a bag of wool; they operate to the ſame purpoſe of underſtanding in ſeveral manners: And whereas it is ſaid in the argument, that the doctrine of the Croſs was fooliſhneſs to the Greeks, it is true, but nothing to the preſent queſtion. For therefore it was fooliſhneſs to them, becauſe they had not been taught in the ſecrets of God, they were not inſtructed how God would by a way ſo contrary to fleſh and bloud, cauſe the ſpirits of juſt men to be made perfect. And they who were wiſe by Plato's Philoſophy, and onely well skill'd in Ariſtotle, could doe nothing in the Schools of Jeſus, becauſe they were not inſtructed in thoſe truths by which ſuch proceedings were to be meaſured; but ſtill, reaſon is the great wheel, though according as the motion was intended, new weights muſt be proportioned accordingly.

58. The third objection preſſes upon the point of duty, and becauſe the Scripture requires obedience of underſtanding, and ſubmitting our moſt imperious faculties, therefore reaſon is to be excluded: To this I anſwer, that we muſt ſubmit our underſtanding to God, is very true, but that is onely when God ſpeaks. But becauſe we heard him not, and are onely told that God did ſpeak, our reaſon muſt examine whether it be fit to beleeve them that tell us ſo; for ſome men have ſpoken falſly, and we have great reaſon to beleeve God, when all the reaſon in the world commands us to ſuſpect the offerings of ſome men: and although we ought for the greateſt reaſons ſubmit to God, yet we muſt judge and diſcern the ſayings of God, from the pretences of men; and how that can be done without uſing our reaſon in the inquiries of Religion, gion is not yet discovered, but for the obedience of understanding, it consists in these particulars.

The particulars in which obedience of Understanding consists.

59. 1. That we submit to God onely and not to man; that is, to God where ever it appears reasonable to be beleeved that he hath spoken, but never to man unless he hath authority from reason or religion to command our conformity.

60. 2. That those things which by the abuse and pretence of reason are passed into a fictitious and usurped authority, make no part of our Religion; for because we are commanded to submit our understanding to God, therefore we must call no man Master upon earth; therefore it is certain that we must not beleeve the reports or opinions of men against a revelation of God. He that communicates with holy bread onely, and gives not the chalice to all Gods people that require the holy Communion, does openly adhere to a fond custome and authority of abused men, and leaves the expres, cleareſt, undeniable institution of God.

61. 3. When reason and revelation seem to disagree, let us so order our selves that so long as we beleeve this to be a revelation, no pretence of reason may change our beleef from it: if right or sufficient reason can perswade us that this is not a revelation, well and good; but if reason leaves us in the actual perswasion that it is so, we must force our reason to comply with this, since no reason does force us to quit this wholly; and if we cannot quit our reason or satisfie it, let us carry our selves with modesty, and confess the revelation, though with profession of our ignorance and unskilfulness to reconcile the two litigants.

62. 4. That whatsoever is clearly and plainly told us, we obey it, and rest in it, and not measure it by the rules of folly and weak Philosophy, or the sayings of men in which error may be ingredient; but when things are unequal, that is, when we can doubt concerning our reason, and cannot doubt concerning the revelation, we make no question but preferre this before that.

63. 5. That in particular inquiries, we so order our selves as to make this the general measure, that we never doe violence to the word of God, or suspect that, but resolve rather to call our selves liars, then that Religion should receive detriment; and rather quit our arguments then hazard an article; that is, that when all things are equal, we rather preferre the pretence of revelation, then the pretences of reason, for the reverence of that and the suspicion of this. Beyond this we can doe no more.

64. To the fourth I answer, that it is true, reason is fallible, or rather to speak properly, ratiocination, or the using of reason is subject to abuse and deception; for reason it self is not fallible: but if reason, that is, reasonings be fallible, so are the pretences of revelation subject to abuse; and what are we now the nearer? Some reasons are but probable, and some are certain and confessed, and so it is in the sense of Scriptures, some are plain and need no interpreter, no discourse, no art, no reasonings to draw out their sense; but many are intricate and obscure, secret and mysterious; and to use a fallible reasoning to draw out an obscure and uncertain sense of Scripture, is sometimes times the beſt way we have, and then we muſt make the beſt of it we can: but the uſe of reaſoning is not onely to finde out truth the beſt we can, but ſometimes we are as ſure of it; as of light; but then and always our reaſon (ſuch as it is) muſt lead us into ſuch proportions of faith as they can: according as our reaſon or motives are, ſo ordinary is the degree of our faith.

65. To the fifth I need give no other anſwer but this, that it confeſſes the main queſtion: For if this be the greateſt reaſon in the world, God hath ſaid it, therefore it is true, it follows, that all our faith relies upon this one reaſon; but becauſe this reaſon is of no uſe to us till the minor propoſition be proved, and that it appear that God hath ſaid it, and that in the inquiry after that, we are to uſe all our reaſon; the conſequent is, that in the firſt and laſt, reaſon lends legs to faith, and nothing can be wiſely beleeved, but what can by ſome rational inducement be proved. As for the laſt propoſition in the objection, This is againſt Scripture, therefore it is abſurd and unreaſonable, I have already made it appear to be an imprudent and uſeleſs affirmative.

66. The ſixth Objection complains of them that by weak reaſonings loſe their Religion, but this is nothing againſt right reaſoning: For becauſe Mountebanks and old women kill men by vile Phyſick, therefore is it true, that the wiſe diſcourſes of Phyſicians cannot miniſter to health? half-witted people talk againſt God, and make objections againſt Religion, and themſelves have not wit or will enough to anſwer them and they intending to make reaſon to be the poſitive and affirmative meaſure of Religion, are wholly miſtaken, and abuſe themſelves and others. 2. We are not to exact every thing in Religion according to our weak reaſonings; but whatſoever is certain in reaſon, Religion cannot contradict that; but what is uncertain, or imperfect, Religion oftentimes does inſtruct and amend it. But there are many myſteries of Religion contrary to reaſon, corrupted with evil manners, and many are contrary to reaſon, corrupted with falſe propoſitions; now theſe men make objections, which upon their own principles they can never anſwer: but that which ſeems impoſſible to vicious perſons is reaſon to good men, and that which children and fools cannot anſwer, amongſt wiſe men hath no difficulty; and the ignorant, and the unſtable, wreſt ſome Scriptures to their own damnation: but concerning the new Atheiſts that pretend to wit, it is not their reaſon, but their want of reaſon that makes them ſuch, for if either they had more learning, or did beleeve themſelves to have leſs, they could never be Atheiſts.

67. To the laſt I anſwer, that it is reaſon we ſhould hear reaſon whereever we finde it, if there be no greater evil brought by the teacher then he can bring good; But if an heretick preaches good things, it is not always lawful to hear them, unleſs when we are out of danger of his abuſes alſo. And thus truth from the devil may be heard, if we were out of his danger; but becauſe he tels truth to evil purpoſes, and makes wiſe ſayings to become craft, it is not ſafe to hear him. 2. But beſides this, although it is lawful to beleeve a truth which the devil tels us, yet it is not lawful to goe to School to the devil, or to make inquiries of him, becauſe he that does ſo, makes him his Maſter, and gives ſomething of Gods portion to Gods enemy. As for Judicial Aſtrology and Genethliacal predictions, for my part I therefore reprove them, not becauſe their reaſon is againſt Religion, for certainly it cannot be; but becauſe I think they have not reaſon enough in what they ſay; they goe upon weak principles which they cannot prove; they reduce them to practice by impoſſible mediums: they draw concluſions with artleſs and unskilful heads, they argue about things with which they have little converſation, they cannot make ſcientifical progreſs in their profeſſion, but out of greedineſs to doe ſomething; they uſually, at leaſt are juſtly ſuſpected to take in auxiliaries from the ſpirits of Darkneſs; they have always ſpoken uncertainly, and moſt part falſly; and have always lived ſcandalouſly in their profeſſion: they have by all Religions been cried down, truſted by none but fools, and ſuperſtitious people; and therefore although the art may be very lawful, if the ſtarres were upon the earth, or the men were in heaven, if they had skill in what they profeſs, and reaſon in all their pretences, and after all that their principles were certain, and that the ſtarres did really ſignify future events, and that thoſe events were not overruled by every thing in heaven and in earth, by God, and by our own will and wiſdome, yet becauſe here is ſo little reaſon, and leſs certainty, and nothing but confidence and illuſion, therefore it is that Religion permits them not; and it is not the reaſon in this art, that is againſt Religion, but the folly or the knavery of it, and the dangerous and horrid conſequents, which they feel that run a whoring after ſuch Idols of imagination.

RULE 4.

A judgement of nature, or inclination, is not ſufficient to make a ſure Conſcience.

1. BEcauſe this Rule is of good uſe, not onely for making judgement concerning the ſtates of ſome men, but alſo in order to many practices, it will not be loſt labour to conſider, that there are three degrees of practical judgement.

2. The firſt is called an inclination, or the firſt natural conſonancy between the faculty or diſpoſition of man, and ſome certain actions. All men are naturally pitiful in ſome degree, unleſs their nature be lame and imperfect: As we ſay all men naturally can ſee, and it is true, if they have good eyes: ſo all men naturally are pitiful, unleſs they have no bowels: But ſome more, ſome leſs. And therefore there is in their natures a conveniency, or agreeing between their diſpoſitions and acts of charity. In the firſt or loweſt ſort there is an aptneſs to it. 2. In the ſweeter and better natures there is a virtual charity. 3. But in thoſe that conſider and chooſe, and obſerve the Commandement, or the proportions of right reaſon, there is in theſe onely a formal, deliberative, compound or practical judgement.

3. Now concerning the firſt ſort, that is, the natural diſpoſition or firſt propenſity, it is but a remote diſpoſition towards a right conſcience and a practical judgement; becauſe it may be reſcinded, or diverted by a thouſand accidents, and is nothing elſe but a relique of the ſhipwrack which Adam and all the world have made, and may paſs into nothing as ſuddenly as it came. He that ſees two Cocks fight, though he have no intereſt in either, will aſſiſt one of them at leaſt by an ineffective pity and deſire: but this paſſes no further then to natural effects, or the changes or affections of a load-ſtone; it may produce ſomething in nature, but nothing in manners.

4. Concerning the ſecond, that is, a virtual judgement, that is, a natural inclination paſſing forth into habit or cuſtome, and delight in the actions of ſome vertues;

tues; it is certain that it is one part of the grace of God, and a more promoted and immediate diſpoſition to the vertue of its kinde then the former. Some men are naturally very merciful, and ſome are abſtemious, and ſome are continent: and theſe in the courſe of their life take in every argument and accidental motive, and the diſpoſition ſwells, and the nature is confirm'd. But ſtill it is but nature. The man, it may be, is chaſt, becauſe he hates the immodeſty of thoſe addreſſes which prepare to uncleanneſs; or he loves his quiet, or fears the accidents of his Enemy-crime; or there was a terror infus'd into him by the ſight of a ſad ſpectacle, the evil reward of an adulterous perſon.

——quoſdam mœchos dum Mugilis intrat.

Concerning this kinde of virtual judgement, or confirm'd nature, I have two things to ſay:

5. 1. That this virtual judgement can produce love or hatred to certain objects, ineffective complacencies or diſreliſhes reſpectively, proper antipathies and averſations from a whole kinde of objects; ſuch as was that hatred that Tamerlan had to Zercon, or ſome men to Cats. And thus much we cannot deny to be produc'd by the operation and ſimple apprehenſion of our ſenſes by pictures and all impreſſions of fancy: Cum opinamur difficile aliquid aut terribile ſtatim compatimur. Secundùm imaginem autem ſimiliter nos habemus. We finde effects and impreſſes according to the very images of things we ſee, and by their prime apprehenſions; and therefore much rather may theſe actus imperati, or more natural and proper effects and affections of will be entertain'd or produc'd reſpectively. Men at firſt ſight fall in love with women, and that againſt their reaſon and reſolution, and counſel, and intereſt, and they cannot help it; and ſo they may doe with ſome actions of virtue. And as in the firſt caſe they are rather miſerable then vicious; ſo in this they are rather fortunate then vertuous: and they may be commended as we praiſe a fair face, or a ſtrong arm, an athletick health, or a good conſtitution; and it is indeed a very good diſpoſition and a facilitation of a vertuous choice. But,

Vide Ariſtot. de anima lib. 3. text. 154.

6. 2. This virtual judgement, which is nothing but nature confirm'd by accidents, is not a ſtate of good by which a man is acceptable to God. Neither is it a ſufficient principle of a good life, nor indeed of the actions of its own kinde. 1. Not of good life, becauſe it may be in a ſingle inſtance; and it can never be in all. The man that is good natur'd, that is, naturally meek, and loving, goes the furtheſt upon this account; but without the conjunction of other vertues, it is a great way off from that good ſtate whither naturally it can but tend and incline: and we ſee ſome good things are made to ſerve ſome evil; and by temperance, and a moderate diet, ſome preſerve their health, that they may not preſerve their chaſtity: and they may be habitually proud, becauſe they are naturally chaſt: and then this chaſtity is no virtue, but a diſpoſition and an aptneſs onely. In this ſenſe that of S. James may be affirmed, He that offends in one, is guilty of all; that is, if his inclinations, and his accidentally acquir'd habits be ſuch as to admit a mixture, they are not genuine and gracious: ſuch are theſe that are the effects of a nature fitted towards a particular virtue. It muſt be a higher principle that makes an intire piety; nature and the habits growing upon her ſtock, cannot doe it. Alexander was a continent Prince, and the captive beauties of Perſia were ſecur'd by it in their Honours; but by rage he deſtroyed his friend, and by drunkenneſs he deſtroyed himſelf.

2. But neither is this virtual judgement a ſufficient principle of the actions of its own kinde; for this natural ſtrength is nothing but an uneaſineſs and unaptneſs to ſuffer by common temptations; but place the man where he can be tempted, and this good diſpoſition ſecures him not, becauſe there may be ſomething in nature bigger then it.

7. It remains then, that to the conſtitution of a Right and Sure Conſcience, there is requir'd a formal judgement, that is, a deliberation of the underſtanding, and a choice of the will, that being inſtructed, and this inclined by the grace of God: tantóque laudabilior munificentia noſtra fore videbatur, quòd ad illam non impetu quodam ſed conſilio trahebamur, ſaid Secundus: then it is right and good, then when it is not violent, neceſſary, or natural, but when it is choſen. This makes a Right and Sure Conſcience, becauſe the grace of God hath an univerſal influence into all the courſe of our actions. For he that ſaid, Doe not kill, ſaid alſo, Doe not ſteal: and if he obeys in one inſtance, for that reaſon muſt obey in all, or be condemn'd by himſelf, and then the Conſcience is right in the principle and fountain, though defil'd in the iſſue and emanation. For he that is condemn'd by his own Conſcience, hath the law written and the characters ſtill fair, legible, and read; but then the fault is in ſomething elſe; the will is corrupted. The ſumme is this:

Lib. 1. cp. 8.

8. It is not enough that the Conſcience be taught by nature, but it muſt be taught by God, conducted by reaſon, made operative by diſcourſe, aſſiſted by choice, inſtructed by laws and ſober principles: and then it is Right, and it may be Sure.

Rule 5.

When two motives concurre to the determination of an action, whereof one is vertuous, and the other ſecular, a Right Conſcience is not prejudic'd by that mixture.

1. He that faſts to puniſh himſelf for his ſins, and at the ſame time intends his health, though it will be very often impoſſible for him to tell himſelf which was the final and prevailing motive and ingredient into the perſwaſion, yet it is no detriment to his conſcience; the religious motive alone did ſuffice to make it to be an act of a good conſcience; and if the mixture of the other could change this, it could not be lawful to uſe, or in any degree to be perſwaded by the promiſes of thoſe temporal bleſſings which are recorded in both Teſtaments, and to which there is a natural deſire, and proper inclination. But this alſo is with ſome difference.

2. 2. If the ſecular ingredient be the ſtronger, it is in the ſame degree as it prevails over the vertuous or religious, a diminution of the worthineſs of the action; but if it be a ſecular bleſſing under a promiſe, it does not alter the whole kinde of the action. The reaſon is this: Becauſe whatever God hath promiſed, is therefore deſirable and good, becauſe he hath promiſed it, or he hath promiſed it becauſe it is of it ſelf good, and uſeful to us; and therefore whatever we may innocently deſire, we may innocently intend: but if it be mingled mingled with a religious and ſpiritual intereſt, it ought not to ſit down in the higheſt place, becauſe a more worthy is there preſent, leſt we be found to be paſſionate for the things of this life, and indifferent for God and for Religion.

3. 3. If the ſecular or temporal ingredient be not under a promiſe, and yet be the prime and chief motive, the whole caſe is altered: the conſcience is not right, it is natural inclination, not conſcience, it is ſenſe or intereſt, not duty. * He that gives alms with a purpoſe to pleaſe his Prince, who is charitable and religious, although his purpoſe be innocent, yet becauſe it is an end which God hath not encouraged by propounding it as a reward of charity, the whole deliberation is turn'd to be a ſecular action, and paſſes without a reward. Our bleſſed Saviour hath by an inſtance of his own, determin'd this caſe. When thou makeſt a feaſt call not the rich, who can make thee recompence, but call the poor, and thou ſhalt have reward in heaven. To call the rich to a feaſt is no ſin, but to call them is to loſe the reward of charity, by changing the whole nature of the action from charity to civility, from Religion to prudence.

4. And this hath no other exception or variety in it, but when the mixture is of a thing that is ſo purely natural, that it is alſo neceſſary: Thus to eat upon a feſtival day to ſatisfy a long hunger, to be honeſtly imployed to get a living, doe not ceaſe to be religious, though that which is temporal be the firſt and the greateſt cauſe of the action or undertaking. But the reaſon of this difference (if any be apprehended) is becauſe this natural end is alſo a duty, and tacitly under a promiſe.

Queſt.

5. IT is uſually requir'd, that all that enter into the holy Offices of the Miniſtery ſhould ſo primely and principally deſign the glory of God, that all other conſiderations ſhould ſcarce be ingredients into the reſolution, and yet if it be inquired how far this is obligatory, and obſerve how little it is attended to in the firſt preparations to the Order, the very needs of moſt men will make the Queſtion material.

6. But I anſwer to the Queſtion, in proportion to the ſenſe of the preſent Rule.

1. Where ever a religious act by Gods appointment may ſerve a temporal end and a ſpiritual, to attend either is lawful; but it is ſtill more excellent, by how much preference and greater zeal, we more ſerve the more excellent. Therefore although it be better to undertake the ſacred function wholly for ends ſpiritual, yet it is lawful to enter into it with an actual deſign to make that calling the means of our natural and neceſſary ſupport. The reaſon is:

7. Becauſe it is lawfull to intend what God hath offered and propounded. The end which God hath made, cannot be evil, and therefore it cannot be evil to chooſe that inſtrument to that end, which by Gods appointment is to miniſter to that end. Now ſince God hath ordained that they who preach the Goſpel ſhould live of the Goſpel, it cannot be unlawful to deſign that in order to this.

8. 2. If our temporal ſupport and maintenance be the firſt and immediate deſign, it makes not the whole undertaking to be unlawful. For all callings, and all ſtates, and all actions, are to be directed or done to the glory of God; according to that ſaying of S. Paul, Whether ye eat or drink, or whatſoever ye doe, doe all to the glory of God: and that one calling ſhould be more for Gods glory then another, is by reaſon of the matter and imployment; but in every one, for its portion ſtill, Gods glory muſt be the principal, and yet no man queſtions but it is lawful for any man to bring his ſon up to the moſt gainful trade, if in other things there be no objection: and therefore why this may not be the firſt moving conſideration in the ſuſception of, or deſignation to the calling Eccleſiaſtical, cannot have any reaſon in the nature of the thing: For if in all things Gods glory muſt be the principal end, and yet in ſome Callings the temporal advantage is the firſt mover, then it may be ſo in all; the intention of Gods glory notwithſtanding: for if it hinders not in that, it hinders not in this. But yet,

9. 3. It is a great imperfection actually to think of nothing but the temporal advantages, of which God hath in that Calling made proviſions; but I ſay, it is not always a ſin to make them the firſt mover in the deſigning the perſon to that Calling.

10. But therefore this is onely tolerable in thoſe perſons, who at great diſtance deſign the Calling; as when they firſt ſtudy to make themſelves capable of it, then it is tolerable, becauſe they are bound to provide for themſelves in all juſt ways, and ſtanding at ſo great diſtances from it, cannot behold the beauties which are in interiori domo; the duty which is on them, is to doe that which is their proper work, that is, to fit themſelves with abilities and skill to conduct it, and therefore their intention muſt be fitted accordingly, and move by the moſt powerful and prevailing motive, ſo it be lawful. He that applies himſelf to learn letters, hath an intention proportionable to his perſon and capacity when he firſt enters, and as he grows in powers, ſo muſt he alſo in purpoſes; ſo that as he paſſes on to perfection, he may alſo have intentions more noble and more perfect: and a man in any Calling may firſt deſign to ſerve that end that ſtands next him, and yet when he is poſſeſt of that, look on further to the intention of the thing, and its own utmoſt capacity. But therefore,

11. 4. Whoſoever does actually enter into Orders, muſt take care that his principal end be the glory of God, and the good of ſouls. The reaſons are theſe:

12. 1. Becauſe no man is fit for that Office, but he that is ſpiritual in his perſon, as well as his Office: he muſt be a deſpiſer of the world, a light to others, an example to the flock, a great denier of himſelf, of a celeſtial minde, he muſt minde heavenly things; with which diſpoſitions it cannot conſiſt, that he who is called to the lot of God, ſhould place his chief affections in ſecular advantages.

13. 2. This is that of which the Apoſtle was a glorious precedent, We ſeek not yours, but you; for the Parents lay up for the children, not children for their Parents: meaning, that between the ſpiritual and the natural paternity, there is ſo much proportion, that when it is for the good of the children, they muſt all quit their temporal advantages; but becauſe this is to be done for the ſpiritual, it follows, this muſt be chief.

2 Cor. 12. 14.

14. And this I ſuppoſe is alſo enjoyned by another Apoſtle, Feeding the flock of God, not for filthy lucre ſake, ἀπὸ προθύμως, that is, but of a prompt, ready minde; a minde moved by intrinſick arguments of fair deſign, not drawn by the outward cords of vanity and gain.

1 Pet. 5. 2.

3. The

15. 3. The work of the Calling being principally and immediately for the good of ſouls, and for the glory of God, it cannot be purſued as the nature of the work requires, if that be not principally intended, which is principally to be procured; All that which is neceſſary in order to it muſt alſo be taken care of: Thus the Miniſters of Religion may attend their health, and muſt look to their neceſſary ſupport, and may defend themſelves againſt all impediments of their offices in juſt and proportionable ways: but becauſe all theſe have further purpoſes, although they ſtanding neareſt may be firſt regarded by an actual care, at ſome times, and in ſome circumſtances, and by actual attention; yet habitually, and principally, and conſtantly, the glory of God, and the good of ſouls muſt be in the heart, and in the purpoſe of every action.

16. But the principality and preheminence of this intention is no otherwiſe to be judged of, either by our ſelves or others, then by theſe following ſignifications.

17. 1. No man can in any ſenſe principally, that is, as he ought, intend the good of ſouls, who enters into the ſacred Miniſtery wihout thoſe juſt meaſures of preparation and diſpoſition, which are required by the Church, and the nature of the thing it ſelf; that is, that he be well inſtructed in the holy Scriptures, and be fit to teach, to exhort, to reprove. For he who undertakes a work which can ſerve Gods end and his own in ſeveral capacities, and is not ſufficiently inſtructed to ſerve the ends of God, it is apparent that what he undertakes is for his own end.

2. His intentions cannot be right, who by any indirect arts does enter, for that which does not begin at God, cannot be for God: Non enim ambitione, vel pretio, ſed probatæ vitæ & diſciplinarum teſtimonio, ad honoris & Sacerdotii inſignia oportet promoveri, ſaid the Emperour Theodoſius. He therefore who ſymoniacally enters, fixes his eye and heart upon that which he values to be worth money, not upon the ſpiritual imployment, between which and money there can be no more proportion, then between contemplation and a cartrope; they are not things of the ſame nature; and he that comes into the field with an Elephant, cannot be ſuppoſed to intend to hunt a hare: neither can he be ſuppoſed to intend principally the miniſtery of ſouls, who comes to that office inſtructed onely with a bag of money.

18. 3. He may be ſuppoſed principally to intend the Miniſtery of ſouls, and in it the glory of God, who ſo attends to the execution of his office, that it doe really and ſufficiently miniſter to the thing. For ſince the Calling is by God really deſigned to that end, and if the Miniſters be not wanting to themſelves, they are ſufficiently enabled and aſſiſted to that purpoſe; he that zealouſly and wiſely miniſters in the office, hath given a moſt real teſtimony of his fair intention, becauſe he does that thing ſo as thoſe intentions onely can be effected. The thing it ſelf is ſufficient for the end if God bleſſes it; he therefore that does the thing, does actuate the intention of God, and ſanctifies his own: But this is to be underſtood with the addition of the following caution.

19. 4. He may be confident that his intentions for Gods glory and the good of ſouls are right and principal, who ſo conjoyns his other leſſer ends with the conduct of the greater, that they ſhall always be made to give place to the greater. That is, who ſtill purſues the intereſt of ſouls, and the work of his Miniſtery, when the hopes of maintenance, or honour, or ſecular regards doe fail, tal. For he that for carnal or ſecular regards will either quit or neglect his Miniſtery, it is certain, his carnal or ſecular ends were his chief motive and incentive in the work. It was the caſe of Demas who was S. Pauls Miniſter and work-fellow in the ſervice of the Goſpel, but he left him, becauſe he loved the preſent world; concerning which, it is to be conſidered, that this lapſe and receſſion of Demas from the aſſiſtances of S. Paul, did not proceed from that love of the world which S. John ſpeaks of, and is criminal, and forbidden to all Chriſtians, which whoſoever hath, the love of the Father dwels not in him, but is to be underſtood of ſuch a love, which to other Chriſtians is not unlawful, but was (in thoſe times eſpecially) inconſiſtent with the duty of Evangeliſts, in thoſe great neceſſities of the Church: Demas was a good man, but weak in his ſpirit, and too ſecular in his relations, but he returned to his ſtation, and did the work of an Evangeliſt, a while after, as appears in the Epiſtle to the Coloſsians and Philemon; but for the preſent he was too blame. For he would ſecure his relations and his intereſts with too great a caution and diligence, and leave the other, to attend this. Such as now adays is too great care of our eſtates, ſecular negotiations, merchandizes, civil imployments, not miniſtring directly unto Religion, and the advantages of its miniſtration. For our great King the Lord Jeſus, hath given to all Chriſtians ſome imployment, but to ſome more, to ſome leſs, and in their own proportion they muſt give a return: and in a Miniſter of the Goſpel, every inordination of carefulneſs, and every exceſs of attendance to ſecular affairs, and every unneceſſary avocation from, or neglect of his great work is criminal, and many things are exceſſes in them, which are not in others, becauſe the Miniſterial office requires more attendance and converſation with ſpiritual things, then that of others.

20. 5. If ever the Miniſter of holy things, for hope or fear, for gain or intereſt deſert his ſtation, when he is perſecuted, or when he is not perſecuted, it is too much to be preſumed, that he did not begin for God, who for man will quit Gods ſervice. They that wander till they finde a rich ſeat, doe all that they doe for the riches of the place, not for the employment: Si non ubi ſedeas locus eſt, eſt ubi ambules, ſaid he in the Comedy; the calling of theſe men is not fixed but ambulatory: and if that which fixes them be temporal advantages, then that which moved them principally is not ſpiritual employment.

21. For it is conſiderable, that if it be unlawful to undertake the holy Calling, without a Divine vocation to it, then to forſake it without a Divine permiſſion muſt be criminal. He that calls to come, calls to continue, where the need is laſting, and the office perpetual. But to leave the Calling when the revenue is gone, to quit the Altar when it hath no offering, to let the ſouls wander, when they bring no gifts, is to deſpiſe the Religion, and to love onely the fat of the ſacrifices: For the Altar indeed does ſanctify the gift, but not the gift the Altar; and he hath but a light opinion of an eternal Crown of glory, or thinks God but an ill paymaſter, that will not doe him ſervice upon the ſtock of his promiſes, and will not feed the flock, though he have no other reward but to be feaſted in the eternal Supper of the Lamb: Who are hirelings, but they who fly when the Wolf comes? and woe be to that Evangeliſt who upon any ſecular regard neglects to preach the Goſpel; woe be to him, to whom it ſhall be ſaid at the day of Judgement, I was hungry, and my flock was hungry, and ye fed neither it nor me.

But this is to be underſtood with theſe liberties:

22. 1. That it be no prejudice to thoſe Eccleſiaſticks, who in time of Perſecution,

tion, doe ſo attend to their Miniſteries, that no material part of it be omitted, or ſlightly performed, and yet take from it ſuch portions of time as are neceſſary for their labour, or ſupport by any juſt and honeſt imployment. Thus S. Paul wrought in the Trade of a Tent-maker, becauſe he would not be a burthen to the Church of Corinth; and when the Church is ſtripp'd naked of her robes, and the bread of propoſition are ſtollen from her table by Souldiers, there is no peradventure but the Eccleſiaſtical offices are ſo to be attended to, that the natural duty and neceſſity be not neglected.

23. 2. That it be no prejudice to Eccleſiaſticks in the days of peace or war, to change their ſtation from Biſhoprick to Biſhoprick, from Church to Church, where God, or the Church, where Charity or Neceſſity, where Prudence or Obedience calls. Indeed it hath been fiercely taught, that Eccleſiaſticks ought never, and upon no pretence to deſert their Church, and goe to another any more then a man may forſake his wife; and for this a Decretal of P. Euariſtus is pretended, and is recorded in the Canon Law. c. Sicut vir. Can.7.q.1. Sicut vir non debet adulterare uxorem ſuam, ita nec Epiſcopus Eccleſiam ſuam, ut illam dimittat ad quam fuit ſacratus: and therefore when Euſebius the Biſhop of Cæſarea was called to be Biſhop of Antioch, he refuſed it pertinaciouſly, and for it was highly commended by the Emperour; and S. Hierome in his Epiſtle to Oceanus tels, In Nicænâ Synodo à Patribus decretum eſt, nè de alia in aliam Eccleſiam Epiſcopus transferatur, nè virginalis pauperculæ ſocietate contemptâ ditioris adulteræ quærat amplexus. Something indeed like it was decreed by the fifteenth and ſixteenth Canons of the Nicene Councel; and it was an uſual puniſhment amongſt the holy Primitives, Careat Cathedrâ propriâ qui ambit alienam. But theſe things though they be true and right, yet are not a contradictory to the preſent caſe. For,

24. 1. Euariſtus (it is clear) forbad tranſlations and removes from Church to Church, ambitus cauſâ, for ambition or covetouſneſs, and therefore it is by him expreſly permitted in their proper caſes and limits; that is, [in inevitabili neceſſitate, aut Apoſtolicâ, vel regulari mutatione] when there is inevitable neceſſity, or the command and authority of a ſuperiour power: and yet upon peruſal of the Decree I finde, that Euariſtus his intent was, that a Biſhop ſhould not thruſt his Church from him by way of divorce, and excommunication, and take another, as appears not onely by the correſponding part of the Decree, viz. That neither muſt the Church take in another Biſhop or Husband upon him to whom already ſhe is eſpouſed; but by the expreſſion uſed in the beginning of it, dimittere Eccleſiam Epiſcopus non debet; and it is compared to the adultery of a man that puts away his wife, and marries another; and alſo it appears more yet by the gloſs, which ſeems to render the ſame ſenſe of it, and wholly diſcourſes of the unlawfulneſs to excommunicate a Church or a City, leſt the innocent ſhould ſuffer with the criminal: for when a Church is excommunicated, though all thoſe perſons die upon whom the ſentence fell, yet the Church is the ſame under other perſons their ſucceſſors, and therefore all the way it does injuſtice, by involving the new ariſing innocents, and at laſt is wholly unjuſt by including all and onely innocent perſons. But which way ſoever this Decree be underſtood, it comes not home to a prohibition of our caſe.

25. 2. As for Euſebius, it is a clear caſe he impoſed upon the good Emperour, who knew not the ſecret cauſe of Euſebius his denial to remove from Cæſarea to Antioch. For he having engaged the Emperour before time to write in his behalf, behalf, that he might be permitted to enjoy that Bishoprick, was not willing to seem guilty of levity and easiness of change. But that was not all, he was a secret favourer of the Arrians, and therefore was unwilling to goe to that Church where his predecessor Eustathius had been famous for opposing that pest.

2. To that of S. Ferome out of the Nicene Council, I answer, That the prohibition is onely of such, as without authority, upon their own head, for their own evil purposes, and with injury to their own Churches did it: and of covetousness it is, that S. Ferome notes and reproves the practice: To despise our charge because it is poor, is to love the money more then the souls, and therefore this is not to be done by any one of his own choice; but if it be done by the command or election of our Superiour, it is to be presumed it is for the advantage of the Church in matter of direct reason, or collateral assistances, and therefore hath in it no cause of reproof.

26. And to this purpose the whole affair is very excellently stated by the 14. Canon of the Apostles; A bishop must not leave his own Parish or Diocess, and invade that of another man, nisi forte quis cum rationabili causa compellatur, tanquam qui possit, ibidem constitutus plus lucri conferre, & in causa religionis aliquid profectus prospicere. If there be a reasonable cause he may; and the cause is reasonable, if by going he may doe more good, or advantage to Religion: but of this he is not to be Judge himself, but must be judged by his Superiours; & hoc non a semetipso pertentet, sed multorum Episcoporum judicio, & maxima supplicatione perficiat; he must not doe it on his own head, but by the sentence and desire of the Bishops.

27. There needs no more to be added to this, but that if a greater revenue be annexed to another charge, and that it be in rem Ecclesiæ, that the more worthy person should be advanced thither, to enable his better ministeries by those secular assistances which our infirmity needs, there is nothing to be said against it, but that if he be the man he is taken for, he knows how to use those advantages to Gods glory, and the good of souls, and the services of the Church; and if he does so, his intentions are to be presumed pure and holy, because the good of souls is the principal.

28. Upon the supposition of these causes, we finde that the practice of the ancient Bishops and Clerks in their translations was approved. Origen did first serve God in the Church of Alexandria, afterwards he went to Cæsarea, to Antioch, to Tyre, and S. Gregory Nazianzen changed his Episcopal See eight times. Nay the Apostles themselves did so: S. Peter was first Bishop of Antioch, afterwards of Rome: and the necessity and utility of the Churches called S. Paul to an ambulatory Government and Episcopacy, though at last he also was fixed at Rome, and he removed Timothy and Titus from Church to Church as the need and uses of the Church required. But in this, our call must be from God, or from our Superiours, not from levity or pride, covetousness, or negligence. Concerning which, who please further to be satisfied, may read S. Athanasius his Epistle to Dracontius, of old; and of late, Chytræus in Epistolis p 150. & 678. and Conradus Porta in his Formalia. This onely; If every man were indispensably tied to abide where he is first called to minister, then it were not lawful for an inferiour Minister to desire the good work of a Bishop; which because it is not to be administred in the same place or charge, according to the universal discipline of the Church for very many many ages, muſt ſuppoſe that there can be a reaſonable cauſe to change our charges, becauſe the Apoſtle commends that deſire which ſuppoſes that change.

29. Theſe being the limits and meaſures of the Rule, it would be very good if we were able to diſcern concerning the ſecrets of our intentions, and the cauſes of actions. It is true, that becauſe men confound their actions and deliberations, it will be impoſſible to tell in many caſes what motive is the principal ingredient. Sed ut tunc communibus magis commodis quam privatæ jactantiæ ſtudebamus, quum intentionem, effectúmque muneris noſtri vellemus intelligi; ita nunc in ratione edendi, veremur nè fortè non aliorum utilitatibus, ſed propriæ laudi ſerviſſe videamur. It is hard for a wiſe and a gallant man, who does publick actions of greateſt worthineſs deſerving honour, to tell certainly whether he is more pleaſed in the honours that men doe him, or in the knowledge that he hath done them benefits. But yet in very many caſes, we may at leaſt gueſs probably which is the prevailing ingredient, by theſe following meaſures; beſides thoſe which I have noted and applied to the ſpecial caſe of undertaking the calling Eccleſiaſtical. Plin. li. 2. ep. 3. Vide Rule of Holy Living. Chap. 1. §. 2.

Signes of difference, whereby we may in a mixt and complicated intention, diſcern which is the principal ingredient.

30. 1. Whatſoever came in after the determination was made, though it adde much the greater confidence, and makes the reſolution ſharper and more active, yet it is not to be reckoned as the prevailing ingredient; for though it adde degrees, yet the whoſe determination was perfected before. The widow Fulvia was oppreſſed by Attilius; ſhe complains to Secundus the Lawyer. He conſiders whether he ſhould be Advocate for his friend Attilius, or for the oppreſſed Fulvia; and at laſt determines on the ſide of piety and charity, and reſolves to releeve the Widow, but with ſome abatement of his ſpirit and confidence, becauſe it is againſt his friend: but Charity prevails. As he goes to Court he meets with Caninius, who glorioufly commends the advocation, and by ſuperadding that ſpurre made his diffidence and imperfect reſolution, confident and clear. In this caſe the whole action is to be attributed to Piety, not to the love of Fame; for this onely added ſome moments, but that made the determination.

31. 2. When the determination is almoſt made, and wants ſome weight to finiſh it, whatſoever then ſupervenes and caſts the ſcales, is not to be accounted the prevailing ingredient, but that which made moſt in the ſuſpenſion and time of deliberation, and brought it forward. It is like buying and ſelling: not the laſt Maravidis that was ſtood upon was the greateſt argument of parting with the goods; but that farthing added to the bigger ſumme, made it bigge enough: and a childs finger may thruſt a load forward, which being haled by mighty men ſtands ſtill for want of a little aſſiſtance.

32. 3. That is the prevailing ingredient in the determination which is moſt valued, not which moſt pleaſes; that which is rationally preferred, not that which delights the ſenſes. If the man had rather loſe the ſenſual then the intellectual good, though in that his fancy is more delighted, yet this is the ſtronger, and greater in the Divine acceptance, though poſſibly in nature it be leſs active, becauſe leſs pleaſing to thoſe faculties, which whether we will or no, will be very much concerned in all the entercourſes of this life. * He that keeps keeps a feſtival in gratitude and ſpiritual joy to doe God glory, and to give him thanks, and in the preparation to the action is hugely pleas'd by conſidering the muſick, the company, the feſtivity and innocent refreſhments, and in his fancy, leaps at this, but his reſolution walks on by that, hath not ſpoil'd the regularity of his Conſcience by the intertexture of the ſenſual with the ſpiritual, ſo long as it remains innocent. For though this flames brighteſt, yet the other burns hotteſt, and will laſt longer then the other. But of this there is no other ſign, but that firſt we be infinitely careful to preſcribe meaſures and limits to the ſecular joy, that it may be perfectly ſubordinate to, and complying with the ſpiritual and religious: and ſecondly, if we are willing to ſuppreſs the light flame, rather then extinguiſh the ſolid fire.

33. 4. Then the holy and pious ingredient is overpowred by the mixture of the ſecular, when an inſtrument toward the end is choſen more proportionable to this, then to that. Cæcilius to doe a real not a phantaſtick benefit to his Tenants, erected a Library in his Villa, and promiſed a yearly revenue for their childrens education, and nobler inſtitution: And thus farre judgement ought to be made, that he intended piety rather then fame; for to his fame, Plays and Spectacles would (as the Roman humour then was) have ſerved better: but when in the acting his reſolution he prais'd that his pious purpoſe, and told them he did it for a pious, not a vainglorious end, however the intention might be right, this publication was not right: But, when he appointed that anniverſary orations ſhould be made in the praiſe of his pious foundation, he a little too openly diſcovered what was the bigger wheel in that motion. For he that ſerves a ſecret piety by a publick Panegyrick, diſorders the piety by diſmantling the ſecret: it may ſtill be piety, but it will be leſſen'd by the publication; though this publication be no otherwiſe criminal, then becauſe it is vain. Meminimus quanto majore animo honeſtatis fructus in conſcientia quàm in fama reponatur. Sequi enim gloria non appeti debet: nec ſi caſu aliquo non ſequatur, idcirco quod gloriam meruit minus pulchrum eſt: Hi verò qui benefacta ſua verbis adornant, non ideò prædicare quia fecerint, ſed ut prædicarent, feciſſe creduntur; which is the very thing which I affirm in this particular. If the intermediate or conſequent actions ſerve the collateral or ſecular end, moſt viſibly it is to be ſuppoſed, that this was the greater motive, and had too great an influence into the deliberation.

Plin. li. 1. ep. 8.

34. But becauſe the heart of man is ſo intricate, trifling, and various, in moſt caſes it muſt be ſufficient for us to know, that if the mixture be innocent, the whole deliberation is ſecur'd in the kinde of it, and for degrees we muſt doe as well as we can.

35. But on the other ſide, if the ſecular end mixt with the ſpiritual, and religious, the juſt and the honeſt, be unlawful, and yet intended, though in a leſs degree, though but accidentally and by an after conſent; the conſcience is neither ſure nor right, but is diſhonour'd and defil'd: for the whole deliberation is made criminal by mingling with forbidden purpoſes. He that takes up arms under his Prince in a juſt warre, and at the ſame time intends revenge againſt his private enemy, caſually engag'd on the adverſe party, loſes the reward of his obedience, and changes it for the devilliſh pleaſures of revenge.

Concerning the meaſure and conduct of our intentions, there are ſome other things to be ſaid, but becauſe they are extrinſecal to the chief purpoſe of this Rule, they are properly to be conſidered under their own head.

Rule

RULE 6.

An argument not ſufficient nor competent, though it doe perſwade us to a thing in it ſelf good, is not the ground of a right, nor a ſufficient warrant for a ſure Conſcience.

1. HE that goes to publick Prayers becauſe it is the cuſtome, or communicates at Eaſter to avoid a cenſure, hath done an act in it ſelf good, but his motive was neither competent, nor ſufficient to make the action religious, or to manifeſt and declare the Conſcience to be ſure and right: For Conſcience is the repoſitory of practical reaſons: and as in civil actions, we count him a fool who wears clothes onely becauſe they coſt him nothing, or walks becauſe he would ſee his ſhadow move upon the wall: ſo it is in moral. When the reaſon is incompetent, the action is by chance, neither prudent, nor choſen, alterable by a trifle, tending to a cheap end, proceeding by a regardleſs motion: and Conſcience might as well be ſeated in the fancy, or in the foot, as in the underſtanding, if its nature and proper deſign were not to be conducted with reaſons proportionable to ſuch actions which tend to an end perfective of man, and productive of felicity.

2. This Rule is ſo to be underſtood, that it be not requir'd of all men to have reaſons equally good for the ſame determinations, but ſufficient and reaſonable in themſelves, and apt to lead them in their proper capacities and diſpoſitions, that is, reaſons proportionable to that kinde of things in which the determination is inſtanc'd, viz. a religious reaſon for an action of Religion; a prudent reaſon for a civil action: but if it be in its proper kinde, it is ſufficient if it be probable, provided always, that it makes a ſure minde, and a full perſwaſion.

3. He that beleeves Chriſtian Religion, becauſe the men are charitable and chaſt, and ſo taught to be, and commanded by the Religion, is brought into a good place by a ſingle taper; but he came in by no falſe light, and he is there where he ought to be. He did not ſee the way in ſo brightly as S. Paul did, who was conducted in by an Angel from heaven, with a bright flame in his hand; but he made ſhift to ſee his way in: and becauſe the light that guided him came from heaven, his conſcience was rightly inſtructed, and if it perſwaded him heartily, his conſcience is as ſure as it is right.

Queſt.

4. UPon the account and conſequence of this Rule it is proper to inquire, Whether it be lawful, and ingenuous to goe about to perſwade a man to the beleef of a true propoſition, by arguments with which himſelf is not perſwaded, and which he beleeves are not ſufficient? The caſe is this:

5. Girolami a learned Prieſt of Ferrara, finds that many of his Pariſhioners are infected with Judaiſm, by reaſon of their converſation with the Jewiſh Merchants. He ſtudies the Jewiſh Books to diſcover the weakneſs of their arguments, and to convince them upon their own grounds. But finding his Pariſhioners mov'd onely by popular arguments, and not capable of underſtanding the ſecrets of the old Prophets, the Synchroniſms, nor the computation of Daniels weeks, the infinite heaps of reaſons by which Chriſtianity ſtands firm in defiance of all pretenſions to the contrary; ſees it neceſſary to perſwade them by things as eaſy as thoſe are by which they were abus'd. But then he conſiders; If they were by error led into error, it is not fit that by error alſo they ſhould be led out of it into truth: for God needs not to be ſerved with a lie, and evil muſt not be done that good may be thence procured. But if I goe by a falſe argument to cozen them into truth, I tell a lie to recover them from a lie, and it is a diſparagement to the cauſe of God, that it muſt be ſupported by the Devil. But having diſcours'd thus farre, he conſideis further; Every argument which I am able to anſwer, I know cannot conclude in the queſtion; for if it be to be anſwered, it is at moſt but a ſpecious outſide of reaſon; and he that knows this, or beleeves it ſo, either muſt not uſe that inſtrument of perſwaſion, or if he does, he muſt reſolve to abuſe the mans underſtanding before he can ſet it right: and this he beleeves to be againſt the honour of truth, and the rules of charity, and the ſimplicity and ingenuity of the ſpirit of a Chriſtian.

To this Queſtion I anſwer by ſeveral Propoſitions.

6. 1. It is not lawful to tell a lie for God and for truth; becauſe God will not be ſerved by that which he hates, and there are no defects in truth which need ſuch violent remedies. Therefore Girolami might not to perſwade his Judaizing Pariſhoners tell them a tale of a Viſion, or pretend a Tradition which is not, or falſify a Record, becauſe theſe are direct arts of the Devil, this is a doing evil for a good end: and every ſingle lie is equally hated by God, and where there is a difference, it is made by complication, or the mixing of ſomething elſe with the lie: and becauſe God hath created and communicated to mankinde, not onely ſufficient but abundant juſtifications of whatſoever he hath commanded us to beleeve, therefore he hates infinitely to have his glorious Oeconomy of faith and truth to be diſordered and diſcompoſed by the productions of hell. For every lie is of the Devil.

7. 2. It is lawful to uſe an argument cui poteſt ſubeſſe falſum, ſuch which I know is not certain, but yet I actually beleeve it to be true. That is though the argument be not demonſtrative but probable onely, yet I may ſafely uſe it, if I beleeve my ſelf to be on the right ſide of the probability. For a real truth, and a ſuppoſed truth are all one as to the innocence of my purpoſes. And he that knows how little certainty there is in humane diſcourſes, and how we know in part, and propheſie in part, and that of every thing whereof we know a little, we are ignorant in much more, muſt either be content with ſuch proportions as the things will bear, or as himſelf can get, or elſe he muſt never ſeek to alter or to perſwade any man to be of his opinion. For the greateſt part of diſcourſes that are in the whole world, is nothing but a heap of probable inducements, plauſibilities, and witty entertainments: and the throng of notices is not unlike the accidents of a battel, in which every man tels a new tale, ſomething that he ſaw, mingled with a great many things which he ſaw not, his eyes and his fear joyning together equally in the inſtruction and the illuſion, theſe make up the ſtories. And in the obſervation of things, there is infinitely more variety then in faces, and in the contingencies of the world. Let ten thouſand men read the ſame Books, and they ſhall all make ſeveral uſes, draw ſeveral notes, and underſtand them to ſeveral effects and purpoſes.

Know-

Knowledge is infinite, and out of this infinity every one ſnatches ſome things real, and ſome images of things; and there are ſo many cognoſcitive faculties above and below, and powers miniſtring to knowledge, and all theſe have ſo many ways of being abuſed, or hindred, and of being imperfect; and the degrees of imperfection, poſitive, and privative, and negative, are alſo themſelves abſolutely ſo infinite, that to arrive at probabilities in moſt things is no ſmall progreſſion. But we muſt be content to make uſe of that, both for our ſelves and others.

8. Upon this account we may quote Scriptures to thoſe ſenſes which they can well ſerve in a queſtion, and in which they are us'd by learned men, though we ſuppoſe the principal intention be of a different thing, ſo it be not contrary. For all learned men know that in Scripture many ſayings are full of potential ſignifications, beſides what are on the face of the words, or in the heart of the deſign: and therefore although we may not alledge Scriptures in a ſenſe contrary to what we beleeve it meant; yet to any thing beſides its firſt meaning, we may, if the analogy will bear it; and if by learned men it be ſo uſed, that is in effect, becauſe for ought we know it may be ſo indeed.

9. 3. If a man ſuppoſe his arguments ſufficient and competent to perſwade, though they be neither fitting to perſwade, nor at all ſufficient, he may yet lawfully uſe them. For in this caſe though himſelf be deceived, yet becauſe it is upon the ſtrength of thoſe arguments he relies, he can be tied to uſe no better then he hath: And ſince his conſcience is heartily perſwaded, though it be in error, yet that which follows that perſwaſion is innocent (if it be not mingled with deſign) though it may be that which went before was not ſo.

10. 4. In the perſwaſion of a truth, it is lawful to uſe ſuch arguments whoſe ſtrength is wholly made prevailing by the weakneſs of him that is to be perſwaded. Such as are arguments ad hominem, that is, proportionable to the doctrines, cuſtomes, uſages, beleef, and credulity of the man. The reaſons are theſe:

1. Becauſe ignorant perſons are not capable of ſuch arguments as may demonſtrate the queſtion; and he that goes about to draw a child to him, may pull him by the long ſleeve of his coat, and need not to hire a yoke of Oxen.

2. That which will demonſtrate a truth to one perſon, poſſibly will never move another. Becauſe our reaſon does not conſiſt in a Mathematical point: and the heart of reaſon, that vital and moſt ſenſible part, in which onely it can be conquered fairly, is an ambulatory eſſence, and not fixed; it wanders up and down like a floating Iland, or like that which we call the life bloud; and it is not often very eaſy to hit that white by which onely our reaſon is brought to perfect aſſent: and this needs no other proof but our daily experience, and common notices of things. That which at one time is not regarded, at another time is a prevailing motive; and I have obſerved that a diſcourſe at one time hath been lightly regarded, or been onely pleaſing to the ear, which a year or two after hath made great impreſſions of piety upon the ſpirit of the hearers. And therefore, that I can anſwer the argument, it is not enough to make me think it neceſſary to lay it aſide or to deſpiſe it; there may be ſomething in him that hears me, that can make the argument to become perfect and effectual; and the want of that it may be in me, makes me apt to ſlight it. And beſides that ſome pretended anſwers are illuſions rather then ſolutions it may be, that beyond my anſwer, a wiſer man may make a reply, and confirm the argument ſo as I know not: and therefore if it be truth you perſwade, it were altogether as good, and I am ſure much more eaſy to let the man you perſwade, enter at the firſt and broadeſt gate of the true propoſition, then after having paſs'd thorough a great many turnings and labyrinths, at laſt come but to the ſame place where he might firſt have entred. There are ſome witty men that can anſwer any thing; but ſuppoſe they could not, yet it would be impoſſible that men ſhould be tied in all caſes to ſpeak nothing but demonſtrations.

3. Some men are to be wrought upon not by direct argument, but by artifices and back blows; they are eaſy enough to beleeve the truth, if they could; and therefore you muſt, to perſwade them, remove their prejudices and prepoſſeſſions; and to this purpoſe, it will not be neceſſary to bring thoſe things which are proper to the queſtion, but things accidental and extrinſecal. They who were prejudic'd at our bleſſed Saviour becauſe he was of Galilee, needed no other argument to make them to beleeve in him, but to confute that fooliſh Proverb, Out of Galilee comes no good: and yet he that from thence thinks the queſtion of his being the Meſſias ſufficiently concluded, is very farre from underſtanding the effect and powers of argument.

4. The hindrances of beleef are ſeated in ſeveral faculties, in our fancy, in our will, in our appetite: now in theſe caſes there is no way to perſwade, but by arguing ſo as to prevail with that faculty. If any man ſhould ſay that our bleſſed Saviour is not yet come in the fleſh, upon a fooliſh fancy that he beleeves not, that God would honour ſuch a wicked nation with ſo great a glory, as that the Saviour of the world ſhould be born of them; he needs no argument to perſwade him to be a Chriſtian, but by having it prov'd to him, that it was not onely likely, but really ſo, and neceſſary it ſhould be ſo, not onely for the verification of the Prophecies of him, but for divers congruities in the nature and circumſtances of things. Here the argument is to confute the fancy onely, not the reaſon.

5. Sometimes the judgement is right, but the affections are perverſe; and then, not demonſtrations, but popular arguments are not onely lawful, but uſeful, and ſufficient. For reaſons of abſtracted ſpeculation move not the lower man. Make the people in love with your propoſition, and cauſe them to hate the contrary, and you have done all that they are capable of. When ſome Divines in Germany were forced for their own defence to gain the people to their party, they diſputed againſt the abſolute decree of reprobation, by telling them that their Adverſaries doctrine did teach that God did drag the pretty children from their Mothers breaſts, and throw many of them into the eternal portion of Devils: This mov'd the women, who follow reaſon as far as they can be made in love with it, and their underſtanding is oftentimes more then in their heart then in their head. And there are thouſands of people, men and women, who beleeve upon no other account then this, neither can they be taught otherwiſe. When S. Paul would perſwade the Jews to reaſon, and from laying violent hands upon him; he was not to attempt it by offering undeniably to prove that he did well by going to the Gentiles, ſince God had rejected the Jews, excepting a remnant onely: but he perſwaded them by telling them he did nothing againſt the Law of Moſes and the Temple.

6. There are ſome fondneſſes, and ſtrange adherencies to trifles in moſt people, humors of the Nation, love of the advantage of their families, relations to ſects, or dignities, natural ſympathies and antipathies, in a correſpondency to which, all thoſe arguments which are dreſs'd, are like to prevail, and cannot otherwiſe doe it. For when a mans underſtanding is mingled with intereſt, his arguments muſt have ſomething of this, or elſe they will never ſtirre that: and therefore all our arguments cannot be freed from ſuch allays.

7. In

7. In all the diſcourſes of men, not onely Orators, but Philoſophers, and even in their ſevereſt diſcourſes, all the good and all the wiſe men of the world heap together many arguments, who yet cannot ſuppoſe them all certain; but yet they therefore innocently uſe them, becauſe as there are ſeveral capacities of men to be dealt withal; ſo there are ſeveral notices of things; and that may be highly concluding, which it may be is not well repreſented, and therefore not fancied or obſerved by him that uſes it; and to another it becomes effective becauſe he does.

8. The holy Spirit of God himſelf in his entercourſes with men is pleas'd to deſcend to our capacities, and to uſe arguments taken from our own principles, and which prevail more by ſilencing us, rather then demonſtrating the thing. Thus S. Paul in his arguments for the Reſurrection uſes this; If Chriſt be not riſen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is alſo vain. There are ſome, even too many now adays, and many more then, who would have granted both the antecedent and the conſequent; but becauſe the Corinthians diſavowed the conſequent, they were forced to admit the antecedent. And at laſt, thouſands of perſons could never be drawn from their error, if we might not make uſe of arguments, weak like their capacities, and more proportionable to their Underſtanding then to the Queſtion. 1 Cor. 15. 14.

There are two Cautions to be added to make the Rule perfect:

1. That if the Diſciple relying upon his Maſters authority, more then his own ability to judge, ask the Doctor, whether upon his knowledge and faith that argument does evict the queſtion; if the Doctor himſelf does not beleeve it, he muſt then put no more force upon it by his affirmation and authority, then he thinks it does in nature bear; but muſt give prudent accounts of the whole queſtion in compliance to the preſent neceſſity of the demander.

Of the ſame conſideration it is, when a queſtion being diſputed between two parties, the ſtanders by expect the trueſt and moſt proper account of things. In this caſe, all openneſs and ingenuity is to be uſed according to our own ſenſe of things, not according to what may comply with any mans weakneſs; and the not doing ſo is want of ingenuity, and the worthineſs of Chriſtian charity, and a perfect deceiving them who expect and deſire ſuch things as ought to be finally relied upon.

2. In all arguments which are to prevail by the weakneſs, or advantages taken from the man, he that goes about to perſwade, muſt not ſay any thing that he knows to be falſe; but he muſt comply and twiſt about the mans weakneſs, ſo as to be innocent all the way. Let him take him that is weak and wrap him in ſwadling clothes, but not encompaſs him with ſnakes: But yet this hath one looſe and permiſſion that may be uſed.

11. 3. It is lawful for a man in perſwading another to a truth, to make uſe of a falſe propoſition, which he that is to be perſwaded already doth beleeve: that is, a man may juſtly diſpute upon the ſuppoſition, not upon the conceſſion and granting of an error. Thus S. Paul diſputed with the Corinthians, and to induce them into a beleef of the reſurrection, made uſe of a fooliſh cuſtome among them in uſe, of being baptized for the dead. For the Chriſtian Church hath but two Sacraments, Baptiſm and the Lords Supper; at the beginning ſome of the Chriſtians uſed Baptiſm, and in ſucceeding ages, they uſed to celebrate the Lords Supper for the dead, and doe to this day in the Church of Rome. Upon this fond cuſtome of theirs, S. Paul thus argues: If there be no reſurrection, then it is to no purpoſe that you are baptized for the dead; but that is to purpoſe (as you ſuppoſe) therefore there is a reſurrection. Thus prayer for the dead, and invocation of Saints, according to the principles taught in the Primitive Church, might have been made uſe of againſt each other. If all men are imperfect till the day of Judgement, and till then enter not into heaven, then you cannot with confidence make prayers to them, who for ought you know, need your help more: But if all that die well, that is, if all that die in the Lord doe inſtantly enjoy the Beatifical viſion, and ſo are in a condition to be prayed to, then they need not to be prayed for. As for the middle place, they in thoſe ages knew no ſuch thing, as men have ſince dream'd of. As God in ſome caſes makes uſe of a prepared wickedneſs, though he infers none, much leſs does he make any to be neceſſary and unavoidable; ſo may good men and wiſe make uſe of a prepared error, a falſhood already beleev'd; but they muſt neither teach, nor betray any one into it.

The objections mentioned in the ſtate of this queſtion, are already anſwered in the ſtating the propoſitions.

But now ariſes another queſtion, and the ſolution will follow upon the ſame grounds.

Queſt.

12. WHether it be lawful for a good end for Preachers to affright men with Panick terrors, and to create fears that have no ground; as to tell them if they be liars, their faces will be deformed; if they be perjur'd, the devil will haunt them in viſible ſhapes; if they be ſacrilegious, they ſhall have the leproſy; or any thing whereby weak and ignorant people can be moſt wrought upon?

I anſwer briefly:

13. 1. There are terrors enough in the new Teſtament to affright any man from his ſins, who can be wrought upon by fear: and if all that Moſes and the Prophets ſay, and all that Chriſt and his Apoſtles publiſhed be not ſufficient, then nothing can be. For I am ſure, nothing can be a greater, or more formidable evil then hell; and no terrors can bring greater affrightment, then thoſe which are the proper portion of the damned. But the meaſures of the permiſſion and liberty that can be uſed, are theſe:

14. 1. A Preacher or Governour may affright thoſe that are under them, and deterre them from ſin, by threatning them with any thing which probably may happen. So he may denounce a curſe upon the eſtate of ſacrilegious perſons, robbers of Churches, oppreſſors of Prieſts, and Widows, and Orphans; and particularly, whatſoever the Widow or Orphan in the bitterneſs of their ſouls doe pray, may happen upon ſuch evil perſons; or what the Church in the inſtruments of donation have expreſſed: as, to die childleſs; to be afflicted with the gout; to have an ambulatory life, the fortune of a penny, ſince for that he forſakes God and his religion; a diſtracted minde or fancy, or any thing of this nature. For ſince the curſes of this life and of the other are indefinitely threatned to all ſinners, and ſome particularly to certain ſins, as want is to the deteiners of Tithes, a wandring fortune to Church-robbers; it is not unreaſonable, and therefore it is lawful to make uſe of ſuch particulars as are moſt likely to be effective upon the conſciences of ſinners.

Malachi 3. 8, &c. Pſa. 83. 13.

15. 2. It is lawful to affright men with the threatning of any thing that is poſſible to happen in the ordinary effects of providence. For every ſin is againſt an an infinite God, and his anger is ſometimes the greateſt, and can produce what evil he pleaſe; and he uſes to arm all his creatures againſt ſinners, and ſometimes ſtrikes a ſtroke with his own hand, and creates a prodigy of example to perpetuate a fear upon men to all ages.

But this is to be admitted with theſe Cautions:

1. It muſt be done ſo as to be limited within thoſe ways which need not ſuppoſe a miracle to have them effected. Thus to threaten a ſinner in England, that if he prophanes the holy Sacrament, a Tigre ſhall meet him in the Church-yard and tear him, is ſo improbable and unreaſonable, that it is therefore not to be done, leſt the authority, and the counſel, and the threatning become ridiculous: but we have warrant to threaten him with diſeaſes, and ſharp ſickneſſes, and temporal death; and the warrant is deriv'd from a precedent in Scripture, Gods dealing with the Corinthian Communicants. 1 Cor. 11. 30.

2. He who thus intends to diſſwade, muſt in prudence be careful that he be not too decretory and determinate in the particular; but either wholly inſtance in general threatnings, or with exceptive and cautious terms in the particular; as, Take heed leſt ſuch an evil happen: or, It is likely it may, and we have no ſecurity for a minute againſt it; and ſo God hath done to others.

3. Let theſe be onely threatnings, not propheſies, leſt the whole diſpenſation become contemptible; and therefore let all ſuch threatnings be underſtood with a proviſion, that if ſuch things doe not happen, the man hath not eſcaped Gods anger, but is reſerv'd for worſe. God walketh upon the face of the waters, and his footſteps are not ſeen; but however, evil is the portion of the ſinner.

16. 3. In all thoſe threatnings which are according to the analogy of the Goſpel, or the ſtate of things and perſons with which we have entercourſe, we may take all that liberty that can by apt inſtruments concurre to the work of God; dreſſing them with circumſtances of terror and affrightment, and repreſenting ſpiritual events by metaphors, apologues and inſtances of nature. Thus our bleſſed Lord expreſſing the torments of hell, ſignifies the greatneſs of them by ſuch things which in nature are moſt terrible; as brimſtone and fire, the worm of conſcience, weeping and wailing, and gnaſhing of teeth. But this I ſay muſt ever be kept within the limits of analogy to what is reveal'd, and muſt not make excurſions to extraregular and ridiculous ſignifications. Such as is the fancy of ſome Divines in the Romane Church, and particularly of Cornelius à lapide, that the ſouls of the damned ſhall be roll'd up in bundles like a heap and involv'd circles of ſnakes, and in hell ſhall ſink down like a ſtone into the bottomeleſs pit, falling ſtill downward for ever and ever. This is not well; but let the expreſſions be according to the proportions of what is reveal'd. The Divines in ſeveral ages have taken great liberty in this affair, which I know no reaſon to reprove, if ſome of their tragical expreſſions did not, or were not apt to paſs into dogmatical affirmatives, and opinions of reality in ſuch inventions. In Apocal.

17. 4. If any extraregular example hath ever happened, that may be made uſe of to affright men from the ſame or the like ſins, and ſo paſs into a regular warning. Thus, though it but once happened, that God puniſhed rebellion by cauſing the earth to open and ſwallow up the Rebels againſt their Prince and Prieſt, Moſes and Aaron, that is, it is but once recorded in holy Scripture; yet God hath the ſame power now, and the ſame anger againſt Rebel-

Rebellion; and as he can, ſo we are not ſure that he will not oftentimes doe the ſame. Whatſoever hath happ'ned and can happen, we ought to fear leſt in the like caſes it ſhould happen. And therefore this is a proper inſtrument of a juſt fear, and apt rightly to miniſter to a ſure and a right Conſcience.

18. 5. If any prodigy of accident and judgement hath happened, though it be poſſible it may be done for the manifeſtation of the Divine glory, yet becauſe it is ten thouſand to one, but it is becauſe of ſin too; this may be made uſe of to affright ſinners, although there be no indication for what ſin that judgement happened. Thus the ruine of the Greek Monarchy finiſhed upon the day of Pentecoſt: the fearful and prodigious ſwallowing up the Cities of the Coloſsians and Laodiceans; the burning Towns and Villages by eruption of fire from mountains; the ſudden cataracts of water breaking from the Indian hills; the ſudden deaths and madneſs of many people; the horrible ruine and deſolation of families and kingdomes, may be indifferently uſed and propounded to all ſorts of perſons, where there is need of ſuch violent courſes: and provided that they be charitably and prudently applied, may effect fear and caution in ſome ſinners, who otherwiſe would be too ready for gaieties and unſafe liberties.

19. 6. To children and fools, and all thoſe whoſe underſtanding is but a little better, it hath been in all ages practiſed, that they be affrighted with Mormoes and Bugbears, that they may be cozen'd into good. But this is therefore permitted, becauſe other things which are real, certain, or probable, cannot be underſtood or perceiv'd by them: and therefore theſe things are not to be permitted, where it can well be otherwiſe. If it cannot, it is fit that their underſtandings ſhould be conducted thither where they ought to goe, and by ſuch inſtruments as can be uſeful.

Rule 7.

A Conſcience determin'd by the counſel of wiſe men, even againſt its own inclinations, may be ſure and right.

FOR in many caſes the counſel of wiſe men is the beſt argument; and if the conſcience was firſt inclined by a weaker, every change to a better is a degree of certainty: In this caſe, to perſiſt in the firſt inclination of conſcience, is obſtinacy, not conſtancy: But on the other ſide, to change our firſt perſwaſion when it is well built, for the counſel of men of another perſwaſion, though wiſer then our ſelves, is levity, not humility. This Rule is practicable onely in ſuch caſes where the Conſcience obſerves the weakneſs of its firſt inducement, or juſtly ſuſpects it, and hath not reaſon ſo much to ſuſpect the ſentence of wiſer men. How it is further to be reduc'd to practice, is more properly to be conſidered in the third Chapter, and thither I referre it.

He that ſins againſt a right and a ſure Conſcience, whatever the inſtance be, commits a great ſin, but not a double one.

1. HIS ſin is indeed the greater, becauſe it is leſs excuſable and more bold. For the more light there is in a regular underſtanding, the more malice there is in an irregular will. If I had not come to them (ſaid Chriſt) they had not had ſin; but now have they no cover for their ſin: that is, becauſe they are ſufficiently taught their duty. It is not an aggravation of ſin, barely to ſay, it was done againſt our conſcience: for all ſins are ſo, either directly or indirectly, mediately or immediately, in the principle or in the emanation. But thus; the more ſure and confident the conſcience is, the ſin receives the greater degree. It is an aggravation of it, that it was done againſt a clear light, and a full underſtanding, and a perfect, contrary determination. John 15.22.

2. But even then it does not make it to be a diſtinct ſin. Whatſoever is not of faith is ſin (ſaid the Apoſtle) but he did not ſay it was two. It is a tranſcendent paſſing upon every ſinful action, that it is againſt a known law, and a contrary reaſon and perſwaſion; but if this could make the act to be doubly irregular, by the ſame reaſon, every ſubſtance muſt be two, viz. by having a being, and a ſubſtantial being. And the proper reaſon of this is, becauſe the conſcience obliges and ties us by the band of the Commandement, the ſame individual band, and no other. The conſcience is therefore againſt the act, becauſe the Commandement is againſt it; the Conſcience being Gods remembrancer, the record, and the regiſter of the Law. A theef does not ſin againſt the Law and the Judge ſeverally; neither does the Magiſtrate puniſh him one way, and the Law another. The conſcience hath no law of its own, but the law of God is the Rule of it. Therefore where there is but one obligation to the duty, there can be but one deformity in the prevarication. But,

3. In ſins where there is a double formality, there indeed in one action there may be two ſins, becauſe there is a double law: as he that kills his Father ſins twice, he is impious and unjuſt; he breaks the laws of piety and juſtice; he ſins againſt the fifth and the ſixth Commandements at once; he is a murderer, and he is ungrateful, and he is impious. But in ſins of a ſingle nature there is but a ſingle relation. For the Conſcience and the Law is the Rule and the Parchment; and he that ſins againſt the one, therefore alſo ſins againſt the other, becauſe they both terminate but one relation.

4. But although he does not commit two ſins, yet he commits one great one, there being nothing that can render an action culpable or imputable in the meaſures of juſtice, but its being a deviation from, or a contradiction to the Rule. It is againſt my conſcience, that is, againſt my illuminated and inſtructed reaſon, therefore it is a ſin: this is a demonſtration, becauſe it is againſt God, and againſt my ſelf; againſt my reaſon, and his illumination; and that is, againſt all bands Divine and Humane.

5. BUT then what ſhall a Judge doe, who knows the witneſſes in a criminal cauſe to have ſworn falſly? The caſe is this: Conopus a Spartan Judge, walking abroad near the gardens of Oneſicritus, eſpies him killing of his ſlave Aſotus; who to palliate the fact, himſelf accuſes another of his ſervants [Orgilus] and compell'd ſome to ſwear it as he affirm'd. The proceſs was made, advocates entertain'd by Oneſicritus, and the poor Orgilus convict by teſtimony and legal proof. Conopus the Judge knows the whole proceſs to be injurious, but knows not what to doe, becauſe he remembers that he is bound to judge according to allegation and proof, and yet to doe juſtice and judgement, which in this caſe is impoſſible. He therefore inquires for an expedient, or a peremptory reſolution on either hand: Since he offends againſt the Laws of Sparta, the order of law and his own life, if he acquits one who is legally convicted; and yet if he condemnes him whom he knows to be innocent, he ſins againſt God, and Nature, and againſt his own Conſcience.

6. That a Judge not onely may, but is oblig'd to proceed according to the proceſs of Law, and not to his own private Conſcience, is confidently affirmed by Aquinas, by his Maſter, and by his Scholars, and of late defended earneſtly by Didacus Covarruvias a learned man indeed and a great Lawyer; and they doe it upon this account:

7. 1. For there is a double perſon or capacity in a Judge; He is a private perſon, and hath ſpecial obligations and duties incumbent upon him in that capacity; and his conſcience hath a proper information, and gives him laws, and hath no ſuperiour but God: and as he is ſuch an one, he muſt proceed upon the notices and perſwaſions of his Conſcience, guided by its own meaſures. But as he is a Judge, he is to doe the office of a Judge, and to receive information by witneſſes and ſolemnities of Law, and is not to bring his own private conſcience to become the publick meaſure. Not Attilius Regulus, but the Conſul muſt give ſentence: and ſince he is bound to receive his information from witneſſes, as they prove, ſo the Law preſumes; whoſe Miniſter becauſe he is, if there be any fault, it is in the Law, not in the Judge, and in this caſe, the Judge does not goe againſt his conſcience, becauſe by oath he is bound to goe according to Law. He indeed goes againſt his private knowledge; but that does not give Law to a Judge, whoſe knowledge is to be guided by other inſtruments. 2. * And it is here as in caſe of execution of ſentences, which is another miniſtery of Law. Ordinarius tenetur obſequi Delegato, etſi ſciat ſententiam illam injuſtam, exequi nihilominùs tenetur eandem, ſaid Innocentius III. The Executioner is not to refuſe his office, though he know the Judge to have condemned an innocent; for elſe he might be his Judges Judge, and that not for himſelf alone, but alſo for the publick intereſt: For if an Executioner upon his perſwaſion that the Judge did proceed unjuſtly againſt the life of an innocent, ſhall refuſe to put him to death, he judges the ſentence of the Judge over again, and declares publickly againſt it, and denies to the Commonwealth the effect of his duty: ſo does a Judge, if he acquits him whom the Law condemnes, upon the account of his private knowledge. 3. * It is like ſpeaking oracles againſt publick authority from a private ſpirit. 4. * Which thing if it were permitted, the whole order and frame of Judicatures would be altered, and a door opened for a private and an arbitrary proceeding: and the Judge if he were not juſt, might defame all witneſſes, and acquit any any criminal, and transferre the fault to an innocent and unsuspected, and so really doe that which he but pretends to avoid. * And the case would be the same, if he were a man confident and opionative. For he might seem to himself to be as sure of his own reason, as of his own sense; and his conscience might be as effectively determined by his argument as by his eyes; and then by the same reason he might think himself bound to judge against the sentence of the Law according to his own perswasion, as to judge against the forms of Law, and proceedings of the Court according to his own sense. * And therefore not onely in Civil but in the Ecclesiastical Courts we finde it practised otherwise: and a Priest may not refuse to communicate him whom he knows to have been absolved upon a false allegation, and unworthily; but must administer Sacraments to him according to the publick voice, not to his own private notice: for it would be intolerable, if that which is just in publick should be rescinded by a private pretence, whether materially just or no; not onely because there are other measures of the publick and private, and that to have that overborn by this would destroy all Government; but because if this private pretence be admitted, it may as well be falsly as truly pretended: And therefore since real justice by this means cannot be secured, and that unless it were, nothing could make amends for the publick disorder, it follows that the publick order must be kept, and the private notice laid aside. * For the Judge lays aside the affections of a man, when he goes to the seat of judgement; and he lays aside his own reason, and submits to the reason of the Law; and his own will, relinquishing that to satisfy the Law; and therefore he must bring nothing of a private man with him, but his own abilities fitted for the publick. * And let no man in this case pretend to a zeal for truth and righteousness; for since in Judicatures, legal or seeming truth is all that can be secured, and with this the Laws are satisfied, we are sure we may proceed upon the testimony of concurring witnesses, because they doe speak legal truth, and that being a proportionable conduct to legal persons, is a perfect rule for the conscience of a Judge; according to the words of our blessed Saviour quoted out of Moses Law, It is written in your Law, The testimony of two men is true, that is, it is to be accepted as if it were true, and proceedings are to be accordingly. In pursuance and verification of this, are those words of S. Ambrose, Bonus Judex nihil ex arbitrio suo facit, & domesticæ propositio voluntatis, sed juxta leges & jura pronunciat, scitis juris obtemperat, non indulget propriæ voluntati, nihil paratum & meditatum domo defert, sed sicut audit, ità judicat. "A good Judge does nothing of his will, or the purpose of his "private choice, but pronounces according to Laws and publick right, he "obeys the sanctions of the Law, giving no way to his own will, he brings "nothing from home prepared and deliberated, but as he hears, so he judges. This testimony is of the more value, because S. Ambrose had been a Judge and a Ruler himself in Civil affairs, and therefore spake according to the sense of those excellent Laws, which almost all the civil world have since admitted. * And the thing is confessed in the parallel cases: For a Judge may not proceed upon the evidence of an instrument which he hath privately perused, if it be not produc'd in Court, though he by that could be inabled to doe justice to the oppressed party; for he does not know it as a Judge, but as a private man; and though that be a distinction without a real difference of subject, yet in effect it means, that the Laws doe not permit a Judge to take notice of any private information, which might prove an inlet to all manner of violence and robbery. * And therefore if a Priest hearing the Confession of Caius, understands that Titius was the complice of Caius his crime, he may not refuse to abſolve Titius, though he doe not confeſs the fact in which he took part with Caius; becauſe he is to proceed by the method of that Court where he

11. ſits Judge. For private and perſonal notice is not ſufficient. * And if I doe privately know that my neighbour is excommunicate, I am not bound to refuſe him my ſociety, till I know it legally; and therefore much leſs may a Judge doe a publick act upon private notice, when we may not doe even a pri-
12. vate act referring to Law without a publick notice. * And all this is confirm'd by the authority of Ulpian, Veritas rerum erroribus geſtarum non vitiatur, &
L. 1. Licitas. §. veritas. ideo Præſes provinciæ id ſequatur quod convenit eum ex fide eorum quæ probabuntur. The truth of things is not prejudic'd by errors in matters of fact: and therefore let the Preſident of the Province follow that which is fitting for
13. him, proceeding by the faith of thoſe things which ſhall be proved. * For ſince no man muſt judge by his own private authority, he muſt not judge by
14. his own private knowledge. * And to what purpoſe ſhall he call in witneſſes to give him publick information, if when they have done ſo, he by his private may reject the publick?

8. But if after all this you inquire what ſhall become of the Judge as a man, and what of his private conſcience? theſe men anſwer; That the Judge muſt uſe what ingenious and fair artifices he can to ſave the innocent, or to doe juſtice according to truth, but yet ſo as he may not prevaricate the duty of a Judge: he may uſe the prudence of a friend and a private man: let him by various and witty interrogatories, in which he may be helped by the advantage of his private knowing the ſecret, make ways to entrap the falſe witneſſes, as Daniel did to the two Elders in the caſe of Suſanna: or let him referre the cauſe to the ſupreme power, or reſign his office, or make a deputation to another, or reprieve the injur'd man, or leave a private way for him to eſcape, or uſe his power of interpretation, or finde ſome way to elude the unjuſt hand of juſtice, which in this caſe does him wrong by doing right. But if none of theſe ways, nor any other like them can preſerve the innocent man, or the Judges private conſcience, he muſt doe juſtice according to Law, ſtanding upright as a publick perſon, but not ſtooping to particulars, or twiſting himſelf by his private notices.

9. This is the ſumme of what is or can be ſaid in this opinion; and though they ſpeak probably and well, yet I anſwer otherwiſe, and I ſuppoſe, for reaſons very conſiderable. Therefore,

To the Queſtion I anſwer, That a Judge in this caſe may not doe any publick act againſt his private conſcience; he may not condemne an innocent whom he knows to be ſo, though he be prov'd criminal by falſe witneſſes. And my reaſons are theſe:

10. 1. Innocentem & juſtum non occides (ſaid God) to ſlay an innocent perſon
Exod. 23. 7. is abſolutely and indiſpenſably evil. Upon which ground I argue; That which is in its own nature eſſentially and abſolutely evil, may not be done for any good, for any pretence, for any neceſſity, nor by any command of man. Since therefore in the preſent caſe, the man is ſuppoſed innocent, he ought not to be deli vered to death for any end in the world; nor by any authority, much leſs for the preſervation of the forms of Courts, or to prevent a poſſible evil that may accidentally and by abuſe ariſe; eſpecially ſince the Queſtion here is not matter of prudence or policy, but of juſtice and conſcience; nor yet of the publick intereſt, but of the Judges duty; nor at all, what the Laws

Laws actually doe conſtitute and appoint, but what the Judge may really practiſe. Now, in all caſes, if a man dies, it muſt be by the merit of the cauſe, or for ſome publick end. The firſt is not ſuppos'd in this queſtion, becauſe the man is ſuppoſed innocent; and if the latter be pretended, it is an open profeſſion of doing evil that good may come of it. And if it be anſwered, that this is true, if the man did appear to be innocent, but in Law he appears otherwiſe. I reply, that it is true, to the Law he does ſo, but not to the Judge; and therefore though the Law can condemne him, yet ſhe cannot doe it by that Judge. He muſt not doe it, becauſe it being by an unavoidable defect, or error, that the Law may doe it, and if the Law could be rightly informed, ſhe would not, ſhe could not doe it, it follows that the Judge who is rightly informed can no more doe it then the Law it ſelf, if ſhe had the ſame information.

11. 2. To judge according to forms and proceſſes of Law, is but of humane poſitive right and conſtitution; for the Law may command a Judge to proceed according to his own knowledge, if ſhe will truſt him and his knowledge: and in all arbitrary Courts it is ſo; and in the ſupreme power it is always ſo, if it be abſolute. But not to condemne the innocent, is of Divine and eternal right, and therefore cannot be prejudic'd by that which only is humane. And indeed if we look into the nature and cauſes of things, we ſhall finde, that the reaſon why Judges are tied to forms and proceſſes of Laws, to teſtimonies and judicial proofs, is, becauſe the Judge is ſuppoſed not to know the matters brought before him, till they appear in the forms of Law. For if a Judge did know mens hearts, and the ſecrets of things and cauſes, ſuppoſing him to be honeſt, he were the fitteſt perſon in the world to be a Judge, and can proceed ſummarily, and needs no witneſſes. But this is the way of the Divine judgement, who proceeds upon his own knowledge, though for the declaration of his juſtice to men, he ſometimes ſeems to uſe proceſſes, and meaſures of humane inquiry; as in the caſe of Sodome, and the like. And in proportion, if God ſhould reveal to a Judge the truth of every cauſe that lies before him, I think no man doubts, but he might ſafely proceed to judgement upon that account. This was the caſe of Daniel and Suſanna. For ſhe was convicted and proved guilty by concurrent witneſſes; God revealed the truth to Daniel, and he arreſted judgement upon that account. Upon examination of the witneſſes he findes them diſagree in the circumſtances; but this was no legal conviction of their falſhood in the main; but it was therefore ſufficient, becauſe Daniel came in the manner of a Prophet, and knew the truth from God, not by forms of Law. Now it matters not (as to the juſtice of the proceeding) which way the truth be known; for the way of receiving it is but extrinſecal to the main queſtion: and as Daniel being made Judge by God, might not have conſented to the death of Suſanna, though not onely the two Elders, but ten more had ſworn that they had ſeen Suſanna ſin: ſo neither can a Judge, to whom God by ſome ſpecial act of providence in behalf of truth and innocence hath made known the matter, proceed to ſentence againſt that knowledge, which he by Divine diſpenſation hath received.

12. 3. If a King or Senate, or any ſupreme power receive teſtimony of a matter of fact concerning any of their Council, whom they know to be innocent; as if it be legally proved that Sempronius robb'd a man upon the Kalends of March, a hundred miles from the place where the King or Senate ſaw him ſitting all that day; that they may not deliver him to death appears therefore becauſe they being accountable to none but God, muſt judge by his meaſures, that is, ſo as to preſerve the innocent, and not by thoſe meaſures which mens neceſſity, and imperfection, and weakneſſes have made regularly neceſſary. But that which is regularly neceſſary, may irregularly, and by accident in ſome caſes be unjuſt, and in thoſe, the ſupreme power muſt make proviſions where it can, and it can when it knows the truth of the particular. For ſince the Legiſlative power can diſpenſe in the adminiſtration of its own Laws upon particular neceſſities, or charity upon the affirmation and petition of him that needs it: much more muſt it diſpenſe with the forms of proceedings in a caſe of ſuch neceſſity, and juſtice, and charity, and that upon their own knowledges. The affirmation of the argument is, that Princes and Senates may, and muſt doe this; that it is neceſſary, and therefore alſo juſt in them to doe ſo. The conſequent of the argument is this: That therefore if private Judges may not doe ſo, it is becauſe they have no authority to doe ſo, but are compell'd by their Princes to proceed by forms: and if this be all, it declares the neceſſity of ſuch proceedings to be onely upon mans authority; and ſo, though by Law he may be bound to doe ſo, yet our inquiry being what he is tied to doe in conſcience, the Law cannot prevail above conſcience, the ſubordinate above the ſuperiour, there being in this caſe, a knowledge of the fact, and the law of God for the right.

13. 4. For the caſe is this; God ſays, Thou ſhalt not ſlay the innocent, and the Judge does certainly know, that the accuſed man is truly innocent: The concluſion is, therefore this man muſt not die. Againſt this, the argument oppoſed is this: Humane authority ſays, Thou ſhalt ſlay him that is convicted of a fault, whether by true or falſe witneſſes: Here are witneſſes which doe convict him, and I know them to be falſe: The concluſion is, Therefore this man muſt die. Which of theſe two arguments ought to prevail, I think needs not much inquiry.

14. 5. And what if Titius be accuſed for killing Regulus, whom the Conſul at that time hath living in his houſe, or hath lately ſent abroad; would not all the world hoot at him, if he ſhould deliver Titius to the Tormentors for killing the man whom the Judge knows to be at home, it may be dreſſing of his dinner, or abroad gathering his rents? But if this be ſo abſurd (as it is indeed extremely) it follows that he may uſe his private knowledge againſt a falſe teſtimony that is publick. Or how if he ſees the fact done before him in the Court? a purſe cut, or a ſtone thrown at his brother Judge, as it happened at Ludlow not many years ſince? The Judge proceeded to ſentence upon intuition of the fact, and ſtayed not for the ſolemnities of Law. Or put caſe that there be depoſitions offered on both ſides, for and againſt the innocent, either directly, or indirectly. If in this caſe the Judges private knowledge may determine for either, it follows that his private knowledge can be admitted as the inſtrument of juſtice; and if it may, it muſt: for nothing can hinder him to doe it, but becauſe he may not. But that he may, appears in the now alledged inſtances.

15. 6. Adrianus puts another caſe, in which it is alſo without contradiction evident that private notice is to be preferred before publick ſolemnity where there is an error in this and none in that. The caſe I chooſe to expreſs in this narrative. Viretta a naughty woman pretends to be wife to Coloro an Italian Gentleman, and brings a Prieſt and witneſſes whom ſhe had ſuborned, to prove the marriage. The Judge gives ſentence for Viretta, and commands Coloro to pay the duties of a husband to her, and to uſe her as a wife. He knows the the contrary, and that he is husband to Vittoria Moriſini, and therefore pays her all his duty, and neglects the other; and he is bound to it, becauſe no mans error or malice can alter the Laws of God, and from paying that duty which he knows is due by the Laws of God, he cannot be excuſed by any formal error ariſing in the adminiſtration of the Laws of man. The ſame is the Judges caſe. For if the Law commands him to doe an act againſt a known private duty, he is ſo to follow the duty he knows he ows to God in preſerving the innocent, as Coloro is bound to preſerve his duty to his wife, and the Judge may no more commit murder then Coloro may commit adultery; but neither of them can be reſcued but by their private conſcience, therefore they may uſe that. And there is no eſcape in this inſtance, becauſe the Subject is as much bound to ſubmit to the ſentence of the Law, as the Judge is to the forms of it; and that which ſecures one, ſecures both.

16. 7. The evils that may be conſequent to the ſtrict adherence to the forms and proofs of Law againſt the Judges conſcience may be ſo great as to be intolerable, and much greater then can be ſuppoſed to be conſequent to the following a certain unſolemne truth. And there is no man, but put the caſe ſo as himſelf and his party may be involved in ruine by falſe witneſs, and he will grant that himſelf is by all means to be preſerved. Put caſe a whole order of the Clergy, of Monks, of Lawyers, ſhould be accuſed falſly and oppreſſed by evil men, as the Knights Templars were accuſed fiercely, and ſo were the Religious in Henry the eighths time: If the King had known that the Monks, and the Pope had known that the Templars had been innocent, no man ought to have perſwaded them to condemne the guiltleſs. For if the King had proceeded againſt them to confiſcation, making uſe of his advantage gotten by the ſin of vile men, the effect had been, that he would rather have gotten money by a lie, then have done juſtice to the oppreſſed according to his conſcience. And indeed becauſe it is not to be ſuppoſed but all the world would have given ſentence for themſelves in their own caſe, it is to be ſuppoſed that the contrary opinion is but the ſentence of men in proſperity, or of unexperienced Scholars who care not what load they put upon others to verify their own opinion. And what Chriſtian will not condemne Pilate for condemning the moſt holy Jeſus, according to the teſtimonies of his falſe accuſers, and againſt his own conſcience? And let the caſe be put, that the witneſſes had agreed, and proved foul things againſt the unſpotted Lamb of God, and made all clear in forms of Law, and that Pilate had known the Lord to be innocent and injur'd, could the water in the baſin have waſhed him clean, if he had againſt his conſcience in compliance with the ſolemne perjurers have condemn'd him who was purer then the Angels? In this caſe the effect had been intolerable, for which no pretence of neceſſity, or legal formalities could have made recompence.

17. 8. A Law founded upon preſumption binds not in the Court of Conſcience, when the preſumption is found to be an error. The Law preſumes that the heir entring upon an eſtate, if he makes not an Inventory, does it to conceal the goods and defraud the Creditors. But if an heir does ſo by negligence or ignorance, or an impertinent fear, or upon ill counſel, or be betrayed to doe ſo; If the Creditor knows that the goods are not ſufficient, he may not in conſcience take the advantage the Law gives him, but is bound to doe charity and juſtice by the meaſures of his private knowledge, and not by the meaſures of the Law to doe violence and oppreſſion, which was the thing in queſtion.

18. 9. To the verification of the ſentence of death upon an accuſed perſon there are required, 1. A reality of the Crime. 2. A power in the Judge. 3. And equity in the Law. Now if divers men ſhould ſwear that the Judge hath a competent power, nay though they threaten him with death if he does not, yet he may not exerciſe any ſuch power, which himſelf privately knows that he hath not. So alſo if he knows the fact does not deſerve death, though men ſwear it, or a higher power declare it, or another competent Judge affirm it, yet a Judge muſt not conſent to it, if himſelf knows it to be unjuſt. And I have read of an excellent Prince, who becauſe he did conſent to the forms and proceſſes of Law made by his Senate againſt the braveſt of his Subjects, againſt his own conſcience and knowledge, repented of it all the days of his life, and was not pardon'd for it till the day of his death; and the firſt confidence he had of pardon was upon the account of S. Pauls words, He that is dead is juſtified from ſins. But then, ſince the defect of either of theſe two makes it unlawful for a Judge to proceed according to the forms of Law, and ties him to follow his conſcience even againſt allegation and proof, much more muſt it be ſo if there be no reality of fact in the accuſed party; becauſe in the deſtitution of this, the Laws themſelves have no power, and therefore they can give none to a Judge their Miniſter. Juſtis lex non eſt poſita; The Law was not made for the innocent, but to defend them, and therefore hath no power to deſtroy them; and then the Judge can have none, and ſo cannot in that caſe be tied to proceed according to formalities, and therefore muſt proceed according to his conſcience, or not at all. For,

19. 10. If a Law were made that a Judge ſhould be bound to condemne an innocent perſon, though he knows him to be ſo, and to be accuſed by calumny, and ſupplanted by perjury, it were an unjuſt Law, as all men (that I know of) grant, and indeed muſt grant. For it were a Law made to incourage perjurers and oppreſſors, to diſcourage innocence: a Law made againſt the intention of Laws, which is, to defend the right, and puniſh the wrong doer: it were a Law diſabling the Judge to reſcue the oppreſſed, and a Law expreſly diſowning the cauſe of the afflicted: and if any Judge ſhould undertake his office upon ſuch terms, he ſhould openly profeſs that if the caſe happened, he would doe againſt his conſcience. And all Laws going the beſt way they can to finde out truth, would never diſable a Judge to make uſe of it when he had found it out, and aſſiſted the inquiry of the Laws by a fortunate diſcovery. For the examining of witneſſes being but a means to finde out truth, cannot poſſibly be ſo adhered to, as to be preferred before the end to which it is deſign'd, that were as if a man ſhould rather love to ſeek then finde. Since therefore no Law ever was, or can be ſo unreaſonable as to decree that a Judge ſhall not in ſuch a caſe directly relieve the innocent, but proceed to his condemnation, it follows that he can have no obligation to doe ſo, and then the obligation of his conſcience can upon no pretence be declined. The Law does not intend to oblige the Judge in that caſe, becauſe no Law can be made expreſly to doe ſo; He therefore being free from the Law in that caſe, ſtands bound to his private conſcience, without excuſe. Nay, the Canon Law expreſly enjoyns that a Judge ſhould give ſentence according to his own conſcience, as appears in c. 1. de re Judic. in 6. & in clem. 1. §. verùm de hæret.

20. 11. Suppoſe a Judge ſhould ſuborn falſe witneſſes againſt an innocent; either he is bound not to proceed according to allegation and proof, but according to his ſecret conſcience, or elſe he is bound to goe on in his crime, and effect that which he had maliciouſly deſigned. For it is not enough that he is bound to disingage the witneſſes and take off the ſubornation: for ſuppoſe the perſons already appearing will not ceaſe, leſt they ſhould be ſham'd and ruin'd, but will take confidence from their crime, and perſeverance from their publication, then there is no remedy for the innocent, neither can the Judge reſcue him from himſelf, nor give over ſinning, unleſs he proceed by his private certain meaſures, and not by thoſe which are falſe and publick. For to ſay he may be ſorry for his fault and yet proceed in it, is to make him an hypocrite: if he confeſſes that he ſuborned the witneſſes, and yet proceed to condemne the innocent, he is ridiculous, and makes the Law put on the face of tyranny and unreaſonable violence and oppreſſion. So that either he muſt goe on and ſin to the end without remedy, or he muſt be admitted to proceed by his private conſcience, and that in his caſe would be juſtice and penitence beſides.

21. 12. Laſtly, all Laws being intended for the good of the Subjects, are bound not onely to comply with their ordinary caſes by ordinary proviſions, but for their accidental needs by the extraordinary. And ſo we finde it, that all Laws yeeld in particulars, when the Law is injurious in the ſpecial caſes, and this is the ground of all Chancery, becauſe ſummum jus, ſumma injuria; and Solomon adviſed well, Noli eſſe juſtus nimiùm, be not over righteous; and the juſtice of God being ὑπείκεια, gentleneſs and favour, equity and mercy, ours is beſt when we follow the beſt precedent; now ſince no caſe is more favourable then the preſent, the Laws are unjuſt that will not bend and ſtoop to the miſeries of the oppreſſed; and therefore the Judge having no hindrance, he is tied by a double band to releeve the oppreſſed innocent, by his direct ſentence (where it can be admitted) or by his open declaration, and quantum in ſe eſt, but at no hand to conſent to his condemnation.

22. I conclude therefore with that rule of the Canon Law, Melius eſt ſcandalum naſci quàm ut veritas deſeratur; It is better that a ſcandal ſhould be ſuffered, and an offence done to the forms and methods of judicial proceedings, then that truth ſhould be betrayed and forſaken; and what was ſaid in the prophecie concerning our bleſſed Saviour, Non ſecundùm auditum aurium arguet, he ſhall not reprove according as he hears, but according as he knows, is alſo true of Judges in this caſe; they doe judge moſt perfectly when in truth and in defence of the innocent, they follow the pattern of the Divine judgement and not the imperfection of the humane, that is, they are to judge by the eyes, not by the eares; C. penult. de reg. jur.

Segniùs irritant animos demiſſa per aures
Quàm quæ ſunt oculis commiſſa fidelibus——

That is a ſure ſentence that can rely upon ocular demonſtration; for our eyes are a better guard of innocence then the tongues of Sycophants, and our conſciences are ſurer informers then the forms of Law; and ſince no Law hath declar'd againſt it, the conſcience is at perfect liberty; and yet if it were not, we are certain it is better to obey God then men; the conſcience is no mans ſervant, it is Gods onely. Conſcience is Gods Angel: Grieve not the Angel leſt he ſmite thee, doe nothing againſt him, leſt he forſake thee. Viro bono fixum in omni vita eſt, tranſverſum unguem à recta conſcientia non diſcedere, ſaid Cicero; Every good man is perfectly resolved not to depart from his right conscience a hairs bredth during his whole life.

23. And now to the pretences which are made on the other side, there will be the less need of a reply, if we consider that they onely prove that a Judge is tied to observe the forms of judicial process, and to proceed according to allegation and proof, ordinarily and regularly, as supposing that this is the best ordinary way of information, as it is most certainly. But as the Law, using the best she hath, would not yet refuse a Prophet from heaven, or a miracle to bring truth from her retirements, or her vail, so neither will she refuse any better way that can be offered; but whatever the Law would doe, yet the question now being concerning the Judge, it is certain that the Judge in the case now put, hath a surer way of evidence; and therefore as the Law, if she had a surer way of evidence, ought not to goe against so clear a light, so neither can the Judge. And the arguments onely proceeding upon the usual suppositions conclude that regularly Judges must doe as usually they can doe, that is, proceed according to proof, because they can have no better way, but they cannot be drawn to this extraregular and rare contingency. For though most men are brought in upon suspicion or private accusation, yet the Apostle says that some mens sins are manifest, going before unto judgement: and when this happens, the Judge must not goe in inquest after what he sees. And the same arguments may as well be urged against all dispensations and remissions, against favour and Chancery, and destroy all equity, and all Religion, as to destroy all conscience when it is certain and infallible. But I shall say something to the particulars.

24. 1. It is true that a Judge hath a double capacity, and he hath offices proportionable; some as a man, some as Judge; that is, he hath some natural and essential obligations, some which are superinduc'd upon his office. And therefore I refuse to use this distinction as it is commonly used, and so made more subject to mistake and abuse. In this case the Judge is not to be considered as a publick man, and a private man; for private is as much superinduc'd as publick; and all his other relations are as much to yeeld to his essential duty, as that of a Judge: such as are the relation of a Husband, of a Father, of a Tutor, of a Master; and amongst these, the more private is often tied to yeeld to the more publick. But therefore in this case the Judge is to be considered as a Judge and as a Man; and in this case the duties are sometimes disparate, but never contrary; and when there is a dispute, the superinduc'd must yeeld to that which is original; for whatsoever is his duty as a man, the Judge may not prevaricate; for it is the man that is the Judge, in the man that office is subjected, and the office of a Judge is bound upon him by the conscience of the man. If the Judge had two consciences, and two real persons, then it were to be granted that they were to be served and attended to in their several callings; but it is not so, they are but two persons in fiction of Law, but materially, and to all real events, the same: it is the same conscience ministring to divers duties: And therefore as the Judge is always that man, so his conscience is the conscience of that man; and because as a man he must not goe against his conscience, so when that man is a Judge he must not goe against the mans conscience, for the Judge is still that man rul'd by that conscience. The essential duty of a man cannot by any superinduc'd formality be dispensed with. Now to goe according to our conscience and knowledge is the essential rule and duty of a man, which he cannot put off by being a Judge. The new office superinduces induces new obligations, but none contrary, no more then he can ceaſe being a man by being a Judge. Certè prior anima quam litera, & prior ſermo quàm liber, & prior ſenſus quàm ſtylus, & prior homo quàm philoſophus & poëta: He is firſt a Man, and then a Philoſopher, a Poet, or a Judge; and that which is firſt cannot be prejudic'd by what is ſuperinduc'd. And if the Judge goe againſt the conſcience of the man, pretending to doe according to the conſcience of the Judge, the man ſhall be damned, and where the Judge ſhall then appear any child can tell. If the Biſhop of Bayeux as Earl of Kent will rebel againſt his Prince, the Earl of Kent ſhall loſe his head, though the Biſhop of Bayeux may plead his Clergy. For in this there is a great miſtake. To be a man and to be a Judge are not to be compar'd as two diſtinct capacities of equal conſideration. To be a Biſhop and to be a Judge are properly ſuch, and have diſtinct meaſures; but to be a man is the ſubject of the two capacities, and cannot be laid aſide as either of the other may; and therefore the diſtinction is vain and ſophiſtical, and if it could be admitted in Metaphyſicks (in which yet, it appears to have an error) yet it can never be ſuffered to paſs to real events. This being the ground of all the contrary opinion, and being found falſe, the ſuperſtructure muſt alſo fall to the ground. To the ſpecial caſes this I anſwer:

Tertul. lib. de teſtim. animæ

25. 2. An Executioner may not refuſe to doe his office though the Judge hath given an unjuſt ſentence: it is true onely when the matter is dubious, or not known, or intolerable. But if the Judge commands the Hangman to ſlay a Prophet alive, or to crucify Chriſt, or to ſtrike his King thorough with a ſword, I doubt not but the adverſaries themſelves will think he is not obliged to obey. Indeed this ought not eaſily to be drawn into a rule, leſt ſuch people turn it into a pretence. But if the Executioner be ſure, and the matter be notorious and ſuch as cannot deceive him, his hand ought not to be upon an innocent. For as Receivers are to Thieves, ſo are Executioners to unjuſt Judges. When the fact is notorious, and the injuſtice evident, then it is ſuch as all men can ſee it; and then, as if there were no Receivers there would be no Thieves; ſo if there were no Executioners of unjuſt ſentences, the Judge would be apt to reverſe his ſentence.

26. 3. Now whereas it is pretended that if a private notice were admitted againſt publick evidence, it were like a private ſpirit againſt a publick article, and would open a way to every pretenſion, it would diſſolve the forms of judicatures, and introduce many evils: I anſwer, that if all this were true, and that for this there could be no remedy, nor yet any recompence in the ſpecial caſes, it would follow that the Law were prudent if it did refuſe to admit ſuch a proceeding, unleſs ſhe had ſome reaſon to truſt the Judge: But this were nothing to the Judge. For the Law therefore refuſes his teſtimony, becauſe ſhe hath that which ſhe preſumes is better, and becauſe ſhe not knowing the ſecret follows the beſt way ſhe hath. But the Judge knows the ſecret, and he is not deceived, and he does not make pretences, for the caſe ſuppoſes him to ſpeak according to his conſcience; and therefore although tht Law in prudence does not beleeve him, yet he cannot but beleeve himſelf, and therefore in duty to God muſt proceed accordingly, or muſt not proceed at all.

27. 4. Neither is this like a private ſpirit againſt a publick article; becauſe this conſcience of the Judge does not impoſe upon the publick, who hath power to admit or to refuſe his ſentence; but it is onely for himſelf, and although his conſcience ought not to be the publick meaſure, yet it ought to be his own. I doe not doubt but the Law may goe againſt the Judges conſcience, but the Judge himſelf may not goe againſt his own.

28. 5. And this we ſee verified in the matter of a private evidence; for though the Judge hath ſeen it in a chamber, yet he muſt not judge by it in the Court, the Law will not ſuffer him to doe ſo; but yet for himſelf he may ſo farre make uſe of it, as to be perſwaded in his conſcience, and to underſtand on which ſide the right ſtands, and to favour it in all the ways that are permitted him. But the caſe here being not matter of life and death, the Law hath power to diſpoſe of eſtates, and the conſcience of the Judge is not obliged to take more care of a mans money or land then himſelf does, but it can be obliged to take care of mens lives when the injured perſon is not able. A man may give away his eſtate, but he may not give his life away; and therefore he may loſe his eſtate by ſuch ways, by which he ought not to be permitted to loſe his life. Adde to this, that a Judge having ſeen an Inſtrument in private which could much clear the cauſe depending, may not upon that account proceed to ſentence, becauſe it may be the adverſe party can give an anſwer to it, and make it invalid; whereas in matters of fact of which the Judge is conſcious there is no uncertainty, nor fallibility. And laſtly, the ſuffering party in the queſtion of money or lands ſuffers no inconvenience, but what is outweighed to the publick by the order of juſtice and ſolemnities of Law, and the man that loſes to day for want of producing his evidence, may produce it to morrow and recover it. But in matter of life and death, nothing can make recompence to the oppreſſed innocent, and if he ſuffers to day, he cannot plead an error in the indictment to morrow. For theſe and many other conſiderations the caſe is wholly different.

29. 6. By ſome of theſe things we may alſo anſwer to the inſtance of a confident and opinionative Judge. He may not preferre his private opinion before the ſentence of the Law, and bring it into open judgement. 1. Becauſe he himſelf may be deceived in his opinion, and his confidence is no argument that he is not deceived. 2. Becauſe if the ſentence and decree of the Law be leſs reaſonable, yet the Judge without ſin may proceed to it, becauſe the more reaſonable is not in his choice, and the leſs reaſonable is not abſolutely and ſimply unjuſt. 3. In matters of prudence and civil government there is no demonſtration of reaſon, but the Legiſlative power may determine for the publick intereſt as is preſently apprehended, and may refuſe the better counſel, and yet doe well enough; for that which is ſimply the better is not in theſe caſes neceſſary; and in ſuch things a mans reaſon ought not to be ſo confident, as he is of what he ſees, or what is matter of faith; and therefore in theſe onely he is to be guided by his own, in the other he muſt proceed by the publick meaſures. And as in all things not demonſtratively certain or evident the Executioner is bound to obey the Judge; ſo is the Judge bound to obey the Law; and the preſumption will lie for the Law againſt the Judge, as it will lie for the Judge againſt the Officer. 4. And yet after all, I doe not doubt but if a Judges conſcience were effectively determin'd againſt a Law, and that he did beleeve it to be unjuſt and unlawful, he ought to follow his conſcience. As if a Judge did beleeve it to be a ſin to put a man to death for ſtealing 13.d ob. he might not condemne ſuch a theef to the Gallows. And he is not excuſed by ſaying, It is not the Judge but the Law that does amiſs. For if the Judge beleeve the Law to be unjuſt, he makes himſelf a partner in the injuſtice by miniſtring to an unjuſt Law againſt his conſcience. For not onely he that that commands evil to be done is guilty, but he that obeys ſuch a command. In this caſe, either the Judge muſt lay aſide his opinion or his office, for his conſcience muſt not be laid aſide.

30. 7. The inſtance of a Prieſt and an excommunicate perſon unworthily abſolved will no way conclude this Queſtion. 1. Becauſe the caſe is infinitely differing between condemning an innocent, and acquitting the guilty. If any man pretends he is ſatisfied in conſcience that the accuſed perſon is criminal, though it cannot be legally proved, yet there is no wrong done, if the accuſed man be let free; an inconvenience there may be, but the Judge muſt not be permitted to deſtroy by his private conſcience, againſt or without legal conviction, becauſe the evil may be intolerable if it be permitted, and the injuſtice may be frequent and unſufferable; but if it be denied, there may ſometimes happen an inconvenience by permitting a Criminal to live, but there can be no injuſtice done. It may have excuſe, and it may have reaſon, and it may have neceſſity that a Judge refuſe to conſent to the death of an innocent, but that he ſhould againſt his conſcience kill him can have no warrant; and if he be not innocent, there may be reaſon to let him alone, but none to condemne him if he be. Conſcience can oblige a Judge to an unſolemne abſolution, but not to an illegal and unſolemne condemnation. This ſhould have been conſidered in the Earl of Straffords Caſe. The Law hath power to forgive the criminal, but not to puniſh the guiltleſs. And therefore if a man be abſolved when he deſerved it not, we may ſuppoſe him pardoned, and the private Prieſt is not his Judge in that caſe. For to refuſe to communicate him is an act of publick Judicature, and to abſolve him is an act of the ſame power, and therefore muſt be diſpenſed by authority, not by uſurpation, that is, by the publick ſentence, not by the private Miniſter, ſince to give the holy Communion to ſuch a perſon is not againſt any eſſential duty of a Chriſtian. And therefore if the Prieſt knows him unworthy to communicate, he may ſeparate him ſo farre as he hath power to ſeparate him, that is, by the word of his proper Miniſtery: let him admoniſh him to abſtain, repreſent his inſufficiency, threaten him with the danger; but if he will deſpiſe all this, the private Prieſt hath no more to doe, but to pray and weep for him, and leave him to God and the Church. But of this I am to ſpeak more largely in its proper place.

31. 8. As for the caſe of the Prieſt hearing Confeſſions, though he finde Titius accuſed by Caius, yet if Titius does not accuſe himſelf, Titius is rather to be beleeved in his own caſe then Caius in another mans. Becauſe in this entercourſe every man is ſo concern'd to doe his duty, that every man is to be beleeved for himſelf and againſt himſelf, becauſe if he ſpeaks falſe himſelf onely is the loſer. 2. Caius accuſing Titius may for ought the Confeſſor knows tell a lie and abuſe him, and therefore he cannot pretend knowledge and conſcience againſt Titius; and ſo this comes not home to the preſent caſe which ſuppoſes the Judge to know the accuſed perſon to be innocent. 3. This argument ſuppoſes that a man cannot be abſolved unleſs he enumerate all his ſins to the Prieſt, which being in many caſes falſe (as I have ſhewn otherwhere) that which relies upon it can ſignify nothing. Unum neceſſar.

32. 9. Laſt of all, although the Judge muſt lay aſide his affections and his will, and his opinion when he ſits upon the ſeat of judgement, becauſe theſe are no good meaſures of Judicature, nor ought to have immediate influence upon the ſentence; yet he cannot lay aſide his knowledge, and if he lay aſide his conſcience he will make but an ill Judge. 2. And yet the Judge muſt lay his his affections and his will aſide never but when they tempt him to injuſtice. For a Judge muſt not ceaſe to be merciful when it does not make him unjuſt; nor need he ceaſe to pleaſe himſelf, ſo long as he is pleaſed to doe right: theſe if they doe hurt indeed muſt be left off, elſe not; and therefore it cannot with any colour from hence be pretended that he muſt lay aſide his knowledge when it is the onely way by which he can doe good.

33. 10. To the authority of S. Ambroſe, what I have already ſaid is a ſufficient anſwer. For he ſpeaks of a Judges office regularly and uſually, not what he is to doe in caſes extraordinary, and ſuch as is the preſent queſtion. But he that ſaid, Sicut audit, ita judicat, would no leſs have ſaid, Sicut videt, ita judicat. The ſeeing of his eyes is as ſure a meaſure as the hearing of his ears.

34. 11. As for the words of Ulpian I will give no other anſwer, then that Panormitan and Covarruvias who urge them, and who are concerned to make the moſt of them, doe yet confeſs that they make as much againſt them as for them; and that they ſay true, will appear to any ordinary underſtanding that conſiders them.

12. For although no Judge muſt doe acts of a private authority, yet he may as well uſe his own private knowledge, as he may uſe the private knowledge of the witneſſes; for their knowledge is as private as the Judges, till it be brought into open Court, and when his is brought thither, it is as publick as theirs; but however from the authority to the knowledge to argue is a plain paralogiſm; for the Prince who armed him with publick authority, did not furniſh him with a commiſſion of knowledge, but ſuppoſed that to be induced by other ways.

13. And therefore the Judge may when he hath called witneſſes reject them upon his own certain knowledge, as well as uſe arts of diſcovery, or any other collateral ways to ſecure the innocent. For it may as well be inquired concerning the Judges uſing his knowledge to the infatuating or diſcovering the falſhood of the evil witneſſes as to the rejecting them. For if he muſt abſolutely take all for granted which they ſay, then he muſt uſe no arts to invalidate their teſtimony; but if he may doe that, he may doe the other, and yet the calling in of witneſſes may be to many good purpoſes, and by the colliſion of contraries light may ariſe, and from falſhood alſo truth may be produced like a fair child from a foul mother. And after all, though this queſtion is not to be determined on either ſide by authorities, yet becauſe amongſt the writers of Caſes of Conſcience very many rely much upon the teſtimony of Authors, I think it not amiſs to ſay that this ſenſe of the queſtion which I defend was the ſentence of many eminent Divines and Lawyers, particularly, Nicolaus Lyra, Adrianus, Angelus, Navarre, Hoſtienſis, Calderinus, Panormitan, Martinus, Johannes Arboræus, Oldendorp, Corraſius, Leſsius, Breſſer and divers others; and therefore beſides the ſtrength of the reaſons, I walk the more confidently by having ſuch good company.

35. To conclude: All thoſe adviſes of prudence which are given by the adverſe party in this affair as expedients for the Judges to proceed by in ſuch caſes, I am ready to admit if they will ſecure their conſcience and the life of the innocent oppreſſed. But if they will not, but that the Judge muſt give ſentence for Law or for Conſcience, the caſe to me ſeems very clear. God is greater then our Conſcience, but our Conſcience is greater then any thing beſides. Fiat jus & pereat mundus, ſaid S. Auſtin, adhæc imagine nè naturæ ve-

RULE 9.

The goodneſs of an object is not made by Conſcience, but is accepted, declared, and publiſhed by it, and made perſonally obligatory.

1. NO object can have its denomination from the judgement of reaſon, ſave onely that from thence it may be ſaid to be underſtood to be good, to be declar'd, to be conſented to; all which ſuppoſes the object to be good, or to be ſo apprehended. Juſt as an emerald is green before the eye perceives it ſo: and if the object were not in it ſelf good, then the reaſon were deceiv'd in conſenting to it, and a deceiver in publiſhing it.

2. This is true in reſpect of the material, fundamental, and proper goodneſs of the object; for this it hath independently of the conſcience: and the rectitude of the conſcience is dependent on this, and conſequent to the perception of it. But yet there is a formal, extrinſecal, and relative goodneſs paſſed upon an object by the conſcience, by whoſe perſwaſion although an evil object doe not become naturally good, yet it becomes perſonally neceſſary; and in the ſame proportion a good object may become evil.

3. The purpoſe of this is to remonſtrate that we muſt rather look to the rule then to the preſent perſwaſion; firſt taking care that our conſcience be truly informed, before it be ſuffered to paſs a ſentence; and it is not enough that our conſcience tels us thus, unleſs God hath told the conſcience. But yet if the conſcience does declare, it ingages us, whether it be right or wrong. But this hath in it ſome variety.

4. 1. The goodneſs of an act depends upon the goodneſs of an object, that is, upon its conformity to a rational nature and the commands of God. For all acts of will and underſtanding are of themſelves indefinite and undetermined till the relation to an object be conſidered, but they become good or bad when they chooſe or refuſe that which is good or bad reſpectively. To will to doe an act of theft is bad, becauſe theft it ſelf is ſo: to be willing to commit an act of adultery is evil, becauſe all adultery is evil: and on the other ſide, to be willing to doe an act of juſtice, is therefore good becauſe juſtice it ſelf is good. And therefore Ariſtotle defines juſtice by a habitude or relation to its object. It is voluntas dandi ſuum cuique, a will of giving to every one that which is their due. And therefore our conſcience, becauſe it is to receive its information from the rule by which every action is made good or bad, and its motion from the object, is bound to take in that onely which is really and truly good, and without ſin or error cannot doe otherwiſe.

2. Al-

5. 2. Although conſcience is bound to proceed this way, yet ſometimes the younger takes the elder brother by the heel, or gets out before him, and the act gets before the object by indirect means. For though all things ſhould be thought good becauſe they are good, yet ſome things are made good becauſe they are thought ſo; and the conſcience looking out upon its object finds error dreſs'd up in the ſhape of truth, and takes it in, and adopts it into the portion of truth. And though it can never be made really and naturally good, yet by being ſuppoſed ſo by the conſcience, it is ſometimes accepted ſo by God.

6. 3. Although the rule by which good and bad is meaſured, be in it ſelf perfect, yet it is not always perfectly received by us. Good is proportionable to Reaſon; and as there is probabiliter verum, ſo there is probabiliter bonum, a probable good, as well as a probable truth: and in the inqueſt after this, we often ſhew a trick of humanity, even to be pitifully deceived; and although when it is ſo, it is an allay of the good it intends, yet it does not wholly deſtroy it: God in his goodneſs accepting at our hands for good, what we really and innocently ſuppoſe to be ſo. Juſt like the Country fellow that gave a handful of water to his Prince; he thought it a fine thing, and ſo it was accepted. For when the action and the rule are to be made even, if either of them comply and ſtoop, the equality is made. God indeed requires the ſervice of all our faculties, but calls for no exact meaſures of any but the will. For the acts of the will are perfect in their kinde, but our underſtanding is imperfect, therefore this may finde an excuſe, but that never.

7. 4. Upon this account it is that though the goodneſs or badneſs of an act depends upon the quality of the object regularly and naturally, yet the acts become irregularly or accidentally good or bad by the conſcience, becauſe the conſcience changes the object; that is, the act is good by the object really good, or ſo apprehended. The object always changes or conſtitutes the act, but the conſcience changing the object immediately, hath a mediate influence upon the act alſo, and denominates it to be ſuch as in the event it proves. But then in what degrees, and to what events this change is made is of more intricate conſideration.

What changes can be made in moral actions by the perſwaſion and force of Conſcience.

8. 1. Whatſoever is abſolutely and indiſpenſably neceſſary to be done, and commanded by God expreſly, cannot be changed by Conſcience into an evil, or into that which is unneceſſary. Becauſe in ſuch caſes where the rule is plain, eaſy, and fitted to the conſcience, all ignorance is voluntary, and ſpoils the conſequent act, but never can legitimate it. And the ſame reaſon is for things plainly and expreſly forbidden, as adultery, murder, ſacrilege, and the like; they can never become good by any act of Conſcience. And therefore in ſuch caſes it often happened that God did declare his judgement to be contrary to the opinion which men had of themſelves and of their actions. Somtimes men live contrary to their profeſſion; they profeſs the worſhip of God, but deny him in their hearts, even when they leaſt think they doe. Thus the Iſraelites having conſtrain'd Aaron to make a golden Calf proclaim'd a feaſt, To morrow is a feaſt unto Jehovah; but God ſays of them, They offered ſacrifice to Devils and not to God. And ſo it was with their children after them, who killed and perſecuted the Apoſtles and ſervants of Jeſus, and thought they did God good good ſervice. He that fals down before an idol, and thinks to doe honour to the Lord; or robs a Temple, and thinks it is for Religion, muſt ſtand or fall, not by his own fancy, but by ſentence of God, and the rule of his Law; Proteſtatio contra factum is invalid in Law. To ſtrike a mans eye out, and ſay he did it in ſport; to kill his brother, and think it is well done, becauſe done to prevent his ſin, though it may be thought charity by the man, yet it is murder before God.

Tit. 1 16.

Deuter. 32. 17.

9. 2. Where the rule is obſcure, or the application full of variety or the duty ſo intricate that the conſcience may inculpably erre, there the object can be changed by conſcience, and the acts adopted into a good or an evil portion by that influence. He that thinks it unlawful to give money to a poor Turk, hath made it to become unlawful to him, though of it ſelf it ſeems to be a pious act. So alſo it is in the uncertain application of a certain propoſition. It is certainly unlawful to commit adultery; but if Jacob ſuppoſes he lies with Rachel, and ſhe prove to be Leah, his conſcience hath not chang'd the rule, but it hath chang'd the object and the act: The object becomes his own by adoption, and the act is regular by the integrity of the will. This is that which is affirm'd by the Apoſtle, I know and am perſwaded in the Lord Jeſus, that there is nothing unclean of it ſelf, but he that thinketh it is unclean, to him it is unclean. This inſtance is in a caſe in which they might eaſily be miſtaken, and innocently abuſed by reaſon of the prepoſſeſſion of their mindes by Moſes Law; and therefore in ſuch caſes the conſcience rules. They who beleeve themſelves married, may mutually demand and pay their duty: But if they be not married, it is fornication or adultery (as it happens.) But if Conſcience ſays they are married, it is not adultery, but an act of duty, becauſe the ſame conſcience that declares for the marriage, obliges alſo to pay their duty, as a matter of neceſſity. Where ever the underſtanding is wrong, and the will is wholly right, the action is accepted, and the error pardoned.

Rom. 14. 14. Vide Chryſoſt. in hunc locum. S. Amboroſ. ib. & Theophyl. ibid.

10. 3. When the act is materially evil, the conſcience adopting it into a good portion, that is, beleeving it to be good, does not make a perfect change, but leaves an allay in the ſeveral degrees of its perſwaſion. For it is impoſſible that a right conſcience and a wrong ſhould have no difference in the effect, eſpecially if there be any thing criminal or faulty in the cauſe of the error. When two men take up arms in a differing cauſe, as ſuppoſe one for his Prince, and the other againſt him; though they be both heartily perſwaded, and act according to Conſcience, yet they doe not equally doe well or ill. The one ſhall be accepted, and it may be, the other pardoned, or excuſed in various degrees. But this which needs a pardon for one thing, is not in the whole conſtitution of it, good for any thing, nor can it be accepted to reward.

11. 4. If the conſcience dictate a thing to be neceſſary, the thing is become neceſſay, and at no hand to be declined. This was it which S. Paul ſaid, He that is circumciſed is a debtor of the whole Law; meaning, that though Chriſt had broken the yoke of Moſes, yet if conſcience did take up one end of it, and bound it upon it ſelf; the other end would be dragg'd after it, and by the act of conſcience become neceſſary. If a man inquires, whether he is bound to ſay his prayers kneeling, or whether he may doe it ſtanding, or lying, or leaning; if his conſcience be perſwaded that he muſt doe it kneeling, it is neceſſary he ſhould doe ſo, and he may not doe it in his bed: Becauſe the Conſcience is a Law-giver, and hath authority over the man, and ought to prevail, when the contrary part is onely, That they may doe otherwiſe. For whether this part be true or falſe, the matter is not ſo great, becauſe there is no danger if a man doe not make uſe of a liberty that is juſt: He can let it alone and doe well enough; and therefore to follow the other part which is ſuppoſed neceſſary, muſt needs be his ſafeſt way.

But if the Queſtion be, whether it be neceſſary to keep a Holy day, or neceſſary to let it alone; there if the Conſcience determine that for neceſſary to be done, which is neceſſary to be let alone, the man is indeed bound to follow his conſcience, but he cannot eſcape a ſin. For conſcience makes no eſſential alterations in the thing, though it makes perſonal obligations to the man; and if it be an evil ſuperſtition to keep a holy day, it cannot be made lawful, becauſe the conſcience miſtaking calls it neceſſary. And if this were otherwiſe, it were not a pin matter what a man thought, for his thinking ſo becomes his law, and every man may doe what is right in his own eyes. And therefore God was pleaſed expreſly to declare it, that if a Prophet did miſlead the people, both he and they ſhould periſh; and our bleſſed Saviour ſignified the ſame thing in a Parabolical expreſſion, If the blinde lead the blinde, they both fall into the ditch. But in this caſe there is a fault ſomewhere, and the man ſmarts under the Tyranny, not the Empire of his Conſcience; for Conſcience can have no proper authority againſt the Law of God. In this caſe that which the conſcience falſly calls neceſſary, becomes ſo relatively and perſonally (that is, he thinks ſo, and cannot innocently goe in the right way, ſo long as his guide conducts him in the wrong, and yet cannot innocently follow his guide becauſe ſhe does abuſe him) but in it ſelf, or in the Divine acceptation, it onely paſſes for a bonum, ſomething there is in it that is good, and that God may regard; there is a præparatio animi, a willingneſs to obey.

12. 5. If the Conſcience being miſtaken in a queſtion, whether an action be good or no, calls that good which is nothing but indifferent; the Conſcience alters it not, it is ſtill but lawful; but neither neceſſary nor good, but relatively and collaterally: The perſon may be pitied, and have a gift given him in acknowledgement, but the thing it ſelf cannot expect it. When the Lords of the Philiſtins, that they might deprecate the Divine judgements offered to God golden Mice and Emerods, the thing it ſelf was not at all agreeable to the way by which God choſe to be worſhipped; but their conſcience told them it was good, it therefore became lawful to them, but not good in it ſelf; and God who is the Father of mankinde ſaw their heart, and that they meant it for good, and he was pleaſed to take it ſo. But the Conſcience (I ſay) cannot make it good. For to be good or bad is wholly another conſideration then to be neceſſary or not neceſſary. This diſtinction is relative to perſons, and therefore can be made by Conſcience in the ſenſe above allowed. But good and bad is an abſtract conſideration, and relates to the materiality of the object, and is before the act of Conſcience, not after.

13. 6. If the Conſcience being miſtaken calls a thing lawful, which is not ſo in the Rule, or Law of God, there the Conſcience neither makes an alteration in the thing, nor paſſes an obligation upon the perſon. Eleonora de Ferrante was married to a Spaniſh Gentleman, who firſt uſed her ill, then left her worſe. After ſome years ſhe is courted by Andrea Philippi her Countriman, to marry him. She inquires whether ſhe may or no, and is told by ſome whom ſhe ought not eaſily to have beleeved, that ſhe may; and ſo ſhe does. But being told by her Confeſſor of her ſin and ſhame, ſhe pretends that ſhe did it bono animo, her conſcience was perſwaded ſhe might doe it, and therefore hopes to be be excuſed or pardoned. He anſwers her; That her conſcience could not make that lawful which God had forbidden, and therefore ſhe ought not to pretend conſcience; for though her conſcience did ſay it was lawful, ſhe was not bound to follow it; becauſe though ſhe muſt doe nothing that is unlawful, yet ſhe is not tied to doe every thing that is lawful: and though her conſcience can give her a Law, yet it cannot give her a Privilege. She is bound to doe what her conſcience ſays is neceſſary, though it be deceived, and if ſhe does not, ſhe ſins againſt her conſcience, which can never be permitted or excuſed. But if her conſcience tells her onely it is lawful ſo to doe; if ſhe does not doe the thing which her conſcience permits, ſhe offends it not, becauſe though it allows, yet it does not command it. If therefore ſhe does it, and there be an error in the conſcience, the ſin is as great as the error, great as the matter it ſelf; as if the fact materially be adultery, it is alſo morally ſo, and the perſwaſion of the conſcience does not excuſe it from being ſuch. The reaſon is plain; For ſince the conſcience when ſhe allows does not command, if the perſon chooſes that thing which materially is a ſin, it is in purſuance of her own deſires, not in obedience to her conſcience. It is Luſt more then Conſcience. * But yet whereas ſhe ſays ſhe hopes for pardon in this caſe, there is no queſtion but ſhe may. For ſhe ſinn'd as S. Paul did in perſecuting the Church; he did it ignorantly and ſo did ſhe. Here onely was the difference; he was nearer to pardon then ſhe; becauſe he thought he was bound to doe ſo, and therefore could not reſiſt his conſcience ſo perſwaded: ſhe onely thought ſhe might doe it, and therefore might have choſen. The conſcience hath power in obligations and neceſsities, but not ſo much, nor ſo often in permiſsions.

CHAP. III.

Of the Confident, or Erroneous Conſcience.

RULE I.

An Erroneous Conſcience commands us to doe what we ought to omit; or to omit what we ought to doe, or to doe it otherwiſe then we ſhould.

1. IN this there is no other difficulty but in the laſt clauſe. For when our bleſſed Lord had propounded an inſtance of perfection, he that not onely obeyes the counſel, but thinks it to be a Commandement, and neceſſary to be done in all times and perſons, enters into an error at the gate of Zeal, and at the ſame place lets out the excellency of his love. Chriſt hath recommended renunciation of the world, ſpiritual caſtration for the kingdome of God, dying for our Enemies, &c. he that in zeal, with charity and prudence follows theſe advices will finde his reward ſwell high; but he whoſe zealous deſire to grow towards perfection, ſhall ſo determine his practice, as that by degrees he ſhall think theſe counſels individually neceſſary, hath abuſed his conſcience, laid a ſnare for others, put fetters upon Chriſtian liberty, and is paſſed into that ſtate of doing it, that though he entred firſt by love, he is gone beyond it, and changed it into fear, and ſcruple, and ſuperſtition: he is at laſt got ſo farre that he would not doe it at all if he durſt doe otherwiſe; and he dares not, becauſe his love was zealous, and his zeal was imprudent, and his imprudence was a furious ſnare, and the paſſion of a mighty folly.

2. But an erroneous conſcience is generally abuſed by two manners of proceeding. 1. By a true application of a falſe propoſition: Thus, Whatſoever is done againſt my Conſcience is a ſin.

But to allow of Magiſtrates is againſt my Conſcience.
Therefore it is certainly a ſin that they be allowed.

The firſt propoſition is not true, unleſs it be underſtood of him onely, againſt whoſe conſcience it is done, and then it is always true, either abſolutely, or relatively, originally, or accidentally. But if it be intended to conclude, that becauſe it is againſt my conſcience to allow them, therefore it is ſimply unlawful, or unlawful to every one elſe, this is a Paralogiſm, and makes an erring conſcience. Or ſecondly, the conſcience is abuſed, and made erroneous by a falſe application of a true propoſition.

Whatſoever is forbidden by God is a ſin.
But every oath is forbidden by God.
Therefore every oath is a ſin.

Every thing here is true but the concluſion. The ſecond propoſition is true, but not univerſally. For S. James ſaying, Swear not at all, forbids all kinds of James 5. oaths materially: that is, in that ſenſe in which any is forbidden, in the ſame all are forbidden. Without juſt authority and occaſion it is not lawful to ſwear By God, therefore without ſuch authority, neither is it lawful to ſwear by a creature. So that his words mean thus; Except in ſuch a caſe ſwear not at all, that is, not with any kinde of oath; for unleſs that caſe occurres to warrant it, this or that oath is criminal as well as any: that is, it is no excuſe in common talk to ſay, it was but a ſlight oath, for you muſt not ſwear at all, viz. in ſuch circumſtances.

The cauſes of error, are

3. 1. Ignorance, either of right or fact. For no other diviſion of ignorance can concern the relation of an erring conſcience. For although a man is otherwiſe concerned in ignorance if it be vincible, otherwiſe if it be invincible, yet his will is concerned in that directly, and his conſcience but collaterally and indirectly.

4. 2. Fear whether it be puſillanimous, or ſuperſtitious, that is, whether it begin upon religion, or upon natural imbecillity, they alike abuſe the conſcience. Ignorance makes it erroneous, but takes not away its confidence, but oftentimes increaſes it: fear makes it erroneous too, and though it begins in doubting, it ends in a ſilly choice, which grows to as much confidence as it can, ſo much as to eſtabliſh the error.

5. 3. To this uſually is reduc'd a moroſe humility and abjection of minde, which becauſe it looks pitifully and ſimply, ſome men in charity think it laudable: ſo Part. 1. decret. diſt. 6. c. 4. Antoninus particularly; and it is the ſame that S. Gregory recommends, Bonarum quippe mentium eſt, ibi etiam aliquo modo culpas ſuas agnoſcere, ubi culpa non eſt. It is the ſign of a good minde to accuſe themſelves of a fault when there is

is none. Which if it relates to the preſent affairs is dangerous and illuſive. For if the queſtion be in a Caſe of conſcience, and the conſcience be determined upon its proper grounds innocently and right, there to acknowledge a fault in the conſcience or determination, is to make the Rule it ſelf crooked, to introduce eternal ſcruples and irreſolution, to diſturb our own peace, and a device to ſnatch at a reward by thruſting it from us, and to think to pleaſe God by telling of a lie. But if the ſaying relates to all the whole action in all its conjugation of circumſtances and appendages, then it may conſiſt with humility and prudence both, to ſuſpect a fault where there is none; to fear leſt we have erred by exceſs of degrees in paſsion, or by remiſneſs and ſlackneſs of action, or by obliquity of intention, or intertexture of ſome undecency, or wearineſs, or ſenſuality, or complacency, and phantaſtick deliciouſneſs, or ſomething ſecret, and we know not what: But even in this caſe, we may beſt follow S. Pauls expedient and manner of expreſſion, Nihil mihi conſcius ſum, I am guilty of nothing, my heart ſmites me not, yet I am not hereby juſtified, for God is greater then my conſcience: I may for ought I know have done ſomething amiſs, or my duty not well, but as I cannot accuſe my ſelf, ſo neither can I acquit my ſelf, but referre my ſelf to Gods equal and merciful ſentence. What goes beyond this may abuſe the conſcience, not onely by a ſecret ſcruple, but by an evil principle and falſe concluſions: and this, although it looks like modeſty, and ſeems contrary to confidence, and therefore cannot be ſo well reduc'd to this kinde of conſcience, but to the doubting, or the ſcrupulous; yet I have choſen to place it here, for the reaſon above mentioned. * It looks in at the door with a trembling eye, but being thruſt in, it becomes bold. It is like a fire-ſtick which in the hand of a child being gently mov'd, gives a volatile and unfixed light, but being more ſtrongly turn'd about by a ſwift circular motion, it becomes a conſtant wheel of fire: or like a baſhful ſinner ſneaking to his luſt, till he be diſcovered, and then he is impudent and hardned. And there are very many wiſe men who tremble in their determinations, and not being able clearly to reſolve, fall upon one part by chance, or intereſt, or paſſion, and then they are forc'd for their peace ſake to put on an accidental hardneſs, and a voluntary, not a natural confidence. But this confidence is commonly peeviſh, impatient, and proud, hating all contradiction and contradictors; becauſe it was onely an art to ſleep, and to avoid the firſt trouble, and therefore hates every thing that brings them forth from their phantaſtick ſecurities.

6. Other cauſes of an erroneous conſcience here uſually are aſſigned but inartificially I ſuppoſe, and not of preſent concernment or relation. Such as are the ſubtraction of the Divine aids, Gods leaving a man, and giving him over εἰς νοῦν ἀδόκιμον, and to beleeve a lie; perplexity, or irreſolution, ſelf-love, pride, prejudice, and paſſion; perit enim omne judicium cùm res tranſierit in affectum, quia affectus obſcurat intellectum nè rectè judicet, ſaid Seneca. When affection ſits Judge, there reaſon and truth are ſeldome admitted to plead, or if they are, yet they cannot prevail.

Impedit ira animum nè poſsit cernere verum.

But theſe are no otherwiſe cauſes of an erroneous conſcience, but as they are cauſes of ignorance, or deception; for in this caſe I reckon them to be but one; an error being nothing elſe but an ignorance of truth, which whether it be culpable or inculpable, and at what gate it enters, is of another diſquiſition, and ſhall be reſerved to its proper place.

RULE 2.

An erroneous Conſcience binds us to obedience, but not ſo as a right Conſcience does.

1. THE object can move the will no otherwiſe then as it is propounded by the underſtanding. If it be propounded as evil, the will that chooſes it under that formality is criminal and malicious. If it be propounded as good, the will that rejects it ſo propounded deſpiſes good; for it is ſo to the will, if it be ſo to the underſtanding, which is the Judge and the immediate rule of all humane actions. And he that does a good thing while he beleeves it to be evil, does chooſe the evil, and refuſe the good; for he does therefore becauſe he beleeves it evil, or though he thinks it ſo, and therefore is equally diſpoſed to chooſe a real evil; for that this is not ſo, is but extrinſecal and accidental to his choice.

2. If this were not thus, but that it were poſſible to be otherwiſe, then we might ſuppoſe that a man might doe a thing reaſonably, for which he hath no reaſon; and an humane action without the natural proceſs of humanity, that is, to chooſe by chance, and unnaturally, to chooſe for a reaſon that he hath not, and a good that appears not, which is like beholding of a thing that he ſees not. The Jew thinks it is his duty to be circumciſed, and to keep the Sabbath. While in this error he is confident, by what argument can he be mov'd to omit it? If you give him reaſons, you ſeek to cure his error, and to alter his perſwaſion; but while this perſwaſion is not altered, how can he be mov'd to omit it? If you give him no reaſons, you deſire him to omit it becauſe he thinks he ought not, and to doe an action becauſe it ſeems unreaſonable, and follow your opinion becauſe he beleeves it falſe; that is, to obey you becauſe he ought not, which is a way not poſſible to prevail with a wiſe man, or with a fool; how it may work with any ſort of madneſs, I know not.

3. But againſt this Rule, ſome contend earneſtly, in particular Guilielmus Pariſienſis, and ſome that follow him, ſaying it is impoſſible that an erring or a lying conſcience ſhould oblige a man to follow it. The thing hath great influence upon our whole life, and therefore is worth a ſtrict ſurvey.

Queſt.

WHether a falſe and an abuſed Conſcience can oblige us to purſue the error?

That it cannot theſe reaſons are or may be pretended.

1. * Becauſe it ſeems to be abſurd to ſay, that when the error it ſelf is not a ſin at all, or but a little one, that it can be a great ſin to follow a mans own humour againſt that error; If a man ſhould doe according to his error, it could at moſt be but a ſmall ſin, and therefore to goe againſt it cannot be greater. For the error can oblige no higher, then its own nature, as rivers cannot ariſe above their fountains.

4. 2. But it is a more material conſideration; If an erring conſcience obliges us to follow it, then ſome men are bound to perſecute the Church, and the high Prieſts ſinned not in crucifying Chriſt; and the zealots of the Jews did well in afflicting the Apoſtles and Diſciples of Jeſus, becauſe they did it ignorantly, and by the dictate of an erring Conſcience; and S. Paul ſays of himſelf before his converſion, I my ſelf thought I ought to doe many things againſt the Name of the Lord Jeſus; and yet he ſinned in following his erring conscience; and therefore certainly could not be bound to it: In pursuance of which,

5. 3. S. Bernard argues thus; To follow truth is always good; but if by the conscience we can be bound to follow error, and that in that case it is not good to follow truth; that is, If a good may become evil by the sentence of an erring conscience, and so great an evil as it supposes it to be, then by the same reason that which is evil, may by the like sentence become good, and so great a good as it is supposed; and then may a man be chast for committing adultery, and charitable for committing murder, and religious for worshipping idols, and pious to his Parents in denying to relieve them from the Corban; all which consequents being intolerable, the antecedent which infers them, must needs be false.

6. 4. It is true indeed, the conscience is our Guide and our Lawgiver, our Judge and our Rule; but it is not our Lord, nor in the present case is it an authentick record, but a ψευδεπίγραφον, a heap of lies and errors, and therefore cannot be a true guide, and we are not tied to follow any leader to hell. Better it is in this case to follow the conscience of a wiser and a better man then my self, it being more reasonable that we be tied to follow his right, then our own wrong conscience.

7. 5. For if still we were bound to follow our abused conscience, then we were bound to impossibilities, for then either we were not at all bound to follow God, or if we were, and yet bound to follow our conscience against God, we were bound at the same time to doe, and not to doe the same thing; to serve two Masters, which our blessed Saviour said, No man can doe.

8. 6. But therefore in this case God must be obeyed and not Man; it being impious to say that the law of our conscience should derogate from, or wholly evacuate the Law of God, by which alone we ought to be governed. For if this law of conscience takes away the obligation of the Divine Law, or if the Divine Law take away the obligation of conscience when it erres, then they must cease respectively; and the event will be this, that as long as Gods Law binds us (which is for ever) the law of an erring conscience cannot binde us.

9. 7. And there are in this, great proportions of reason. For if the will be bound to lay down all its rods and axes, all the ensigns of Empire at the foot of the throne of God, doing or refusing by the command of God against its own inclination, it will not be imagined that the conscience, that is, the practical understanding hath any such privilege indulged to it, that it can be exempt from the jurisdiction of God, or that it can oblige in defiance of his Laws.

10. 8. For it is certain, conscience is Gods creature, bound to its Lord and Maker by all the rights of duty and perfect subordination, and therefore cannot prejudice the right and power of its Lord; and no wise man obeys the orders of a Magistrate against the expres Law of his King; or the orders of a Captain against the command of his General; and therefore neither of conscience which is Gods messenger, against the purpose of the message with which God intrusted it. However, it is better to obey God then man; to follow the Law of God then to goe against it; to doe that which we should, rather then that which we should not.

11. 9. And there can be no more necessity upon us to follow our conscience teaching us, then our conscience binding us; and yet if a contract that is vicious be made, or an oath that is unlawful be uttered, the obligations of conscience ence ceaſe, becauſe they are againſt the Law of God; and how then can conſcience againſt this Law of God in any ſenſe paſs an obligation? But this rather, that as we are bound not to commit a crime, ſo not to follow an error and a lie.

12. 10. For it is impoſſible that our opinion, or falſly perſwaded conſcience ſhould make any alteration in the thing; If it was evil in it ſelf, it is ſo ſtill; and my thinking that Mercury is not poyſon, nor Hellebore purgative, cannot make an Antidote and deletery againſt them, if I have upon that confidence taken them into my ſtomach; and the Sun is bigger then the Earth, though I fooliſhly think it no wider then a Buſhel. And therefore in ſuch caſes the conſcience can have no power, and can binde us to nothing but to lay our error down: Becauſe as to him that is in error, it were madneſs to bid him erre more; ſo to him that hath an erring conſcience, it were equally evil to bid him purſue, and actuate and conſummate his error; which yet he were bound to doe, if an erring conſcience could binde him.

13. 11. Laſtly if an erring conſcience binds us to obedience, it either binds us by its own independent, ingenite power, or by a power deriv'd from God. If by a power deriv'd from God, then God commands us to beleeve a lie, to commit a ſin, to run after falſe fires and illuſions, which to affirm, ſeems to be blaſphemy; but if it binds us by its own power, then our conſcience can make Gods Law to become unlawful to us, and we ſhall be ſtronger then God, and a mans ſelf becomes his own rule; and he that is deceiv'd by a falſe opinion is a Lawgiver to himſelf, and error ſhall be the meaſure of good and evil.

14. Theſe are the arguments which are uſed by ſeveral perſons reſpectively in verification of the opinion of Pariſienſis, which I have not onely heap'd here together, but added ſome and improved the reſt, that by the colliſion of theſe with their anſwers, the truth might be made more uſeful and evident; and divers collateral things incident to the main queſtion might be ſpoken of; and thoſe arguments remain valid which I brought for the affirmative in the firſt and ſecond paragraphs of this Rule. To the firſt therefore I anſwer:

15. 1. That it is not the error that binds us to follow it, but the conſcience in error; and therefore although the error can have no force greater then its own nature and proper energy, yet our conſcience can binde beyond the force of error. As if a General commands a Souldier to turn to the right hand under pain of death; if he miſtaking turn to the left, the event is greater then can be effected by the intentional relations of right or left hand, but depends upon the reaſon, and the command, the power and empire of the General.

16. 2. To the ſecond, I anſwer, That it follows not, becauſe the erring conſcience binds, therefore the obedience is not a ſin. For ſuch is or may be the infelicity of an abuſed conſcience, that if it goes forward, it enters into folly, if it reſiſts, it enters into madneſs, if it flies, it daſhes its head againſt a wall, or falls from a rock, if it flies not, it is torn in peeces by a Bear; and the very inſtances make it clear; the Rulers of the Jews and S. Paul were both called to repent of that which they did in obedience to their erring conſcience, which cannot legitimate impiety, but onely make the one or the other inſtance to be unavoidable.

17. 3. To that which S. Bernard objects, the anſwer is eaſy upon another account; for conſcience may make a good thing evil to it, becauſe beſides the good-goodneſs of the object to make an action lawful there is required the faith and perſwaſion of the Agent; and if this be wanting, as it is in an erring conſcience that beleeves not the goodneſs of it, the action is evil, by reaſon of the deſtitution of an integral part. For, Bonum ex integra cauſa, malum ex qualibet particulari, and by the ſame reaſon, conſcience cannot make an evil thing good, becauſe beſides the perſwaſion of conſcience, there is required the goodneſs of the object, which if it be wanting, one ingredient cannot make it good, all muſt enter into the conſtitution of good, though the want of one is enough to ſpoil it.

18. 4. To the fourth I anſwer, That becauſe the conſcience is in error, and the principle within it is a ψευδεπίγραφον, a falſe record, therefore it is true, that we are not abſolutely tied to follow its conduct, but we are tied to lay the error aſide, that we may follow it in ſtreight ways; but in the preſent conſtitution of affairs it is miſerable, and becauſe we muſt follow our leader, that is, all that can goe before us; we doe goe to hell, or to miſchief, not that we are by God bound to do this, but only to doe that; and it is by our own fault that we are bound to fall into an evil portion, God binds us to follow our conſcience, we ſpoil it by ſome folly or other, and then we follow it; the evil appendage is our own, the Law by which God bound us was holy. Nature requires of us to drink at our meals: But if we have corrupted all our beaurage, we muſt drink unwholſome draughts, but yet nature did not binde us to this misfortune.

19. 5. And therefore the anſwer to the next objection provides us of a remedy againſt the former. We are bound abſolutely to follow the Law of God; but we are bound to follow the contrary law of conſcience erring, conditionally and by accident, that is, becauſe we have made our rule crooked which God had made ſtreight. For to be abſolutely and irreſpectively bound to follow God, and yet reſpectively and by accident to be bound to follow the contrary conſcience, are not incompoſſibilities, or the parts of a contradiction, becauſe they are not ad idem, not in the ſame regards. But then, ſince it is impoſſible that both theſe ſhould be actually followed, therefore God does not command us to follow our conſcience and not to follow it at the ſame time, but to follow our conſcience, and to lay aſide the error, and then both parts are reconcil'd; for God and the conſcience are but accidentally oppoſed, and God commanding us to follow our conſcience; took care that at the ſame time we ſhould follow God too, and therefore God taught our conſcience, but when we get other teachers, we make it impoſſible to obey God. Let us ſubmit our conſcience to God, that is, lay aſide our error, and then God and Conſcience are not two Maſters, but one, that is, God; and Conſcience is his Deputy and ſubordinate. And in order to this, it is not ill adviſed in the fourth objection, to follow the right conſcience of a wiſer man; to doe ſo is a good expedient for the laying down our error; but it is not directly obligatory, ſo long as the error is confident; for I muſt not follow a wiſer man in his right, if I beleeve him to be in the wrong, and if I beleeve him to be in the right, and he really be ſo, then I have laid aſide my error, and indeed to doe this is our duty; but this cannot be done till the error be diſcovered, till then I muſt follow my own conſcience, not the conſcience of another man.

20. 6. To the ſixth I anſwer, That the law of Conſcience cannot derogate from the Law of God, when they are placed in the eye of reaſon over againſt each other; that is, when the Conſcience ſees the Law of God, no law, no perſwaperſwaſion, no humor, no opinion can derogate from it. But an erring confident conſcience beleeves that it follows God when it does not. So that the law of God hath here a double effect. The Law of God apprehended by the Conſcience binds him to action: But the Law of God real and proper binds the man to lay aſide his error. For he that goes againſt the matter and the inſtance of the Law of God, does yet at the ſame time obey the ſanction and authority, becauſe he proceeds to action in obedience to, and in reverence of the Law of God. The wife of Amphitruo was kinde to her lord, when ſhe entertain'd Jupiter in his ſemblance; and for Soſia's ſake Mercury was made much of: and becauſe the error is dreſs'd like truth, for truths ſake we hugge and entertain the error. So here. The Law of God is not deſpiſed, much leſs evacuated by following the dictate of Conſcience, becauſe it is for the ſake of Gods Law that this conſcience is followed. And therefore ſince by accident they are made oppoſite; the event of it cannot be that one muſt ceaſe, for both may and muſt ſtand, but nothing muſt ceaſe but the error.

21. 7. And therefore although the will muſt ceaſe from its own pleaſure, when Gods will is known to be clear againſt it, yet the underſtanding muſt not ceaſe from that which it ſuppoſes to be the will of God, till the error be diſcovered, but when it is, then it muſt as much ceaſe from its own ways as the will muſt, for every underſtanding as well as every proud will, muſt be ſubmitted to the obedience of Jeſus.

22. 8. For Conſcience being Gods creature, and his ſubordinate, cannot poſſibly prejudice the rights of God, for as ſoon as Gods right appears, and his Laws are read, conſcience doth and muſt obey; but this hinders not but that conſcience muſt be heard when ſhe pretends the Law of God for her warrant, ſo long as it is not known but that ſhe ſays true.

23. 9. For it is in this as it is in contracts and oaths, ſo long as they ſeem lawful they muſt be obſerved, and muſt not be reſcinded until it be diſcovered that they are againſt the Law of God, and ſo it is with the dictates of an erring conſcience.

24. Cha. 2. Rule 9. 10. And the reaſon is plain, becauſe conſcience does not make a real change in extreme objects (as I have formerly diſcourſed) the things are good or bad by their proportions to Gods Law, and remain ſo, whatever the conſcience thinks: But yet they put on vizors and ſhapes, and introduce accidental obligations by error. Indeed the error brings in no direct obligation but that it be diſcovered and laid down: but ſo neither can it hinder but that Conſcience ſhall ſtill retain the power that God hath given it directly and principally; that is, that it be the Mans rule and guide. For the fallacy that runs thorough all the objections is this, that the Erring Conſcience is in its obligation conſidered as erring. Now it does not binde, as Erring, but as Conſcience; that is, not by its Error, but by its Nature, and the power of God, as being the reporter and record of his commands. Againſt which, he that bids our conſcience to proceed indeed gives ill counſel. He that counſels a man to follow his erring conſcience, invites him to folly; he tells him he is in error, and bids him not lay it down. But he that adviſes him to follow his conſcience, though it happens in the truth of things that his conſcience be in error, meddles not at all in the countenancing the error, but in the power of conſcience.

11. For

25. 11. For all the obligation which our conſcience paſſes on us is derivative from God, and God commands us to follow our conſcience, but yet he commands us not to ſin; becauſe his commanding us to follow our conſcience ſuppoſes our conſcience inſtructed by the word of God and right reaſon, and God had appointed ſufficient means it ſhould be; but that conſcience offers a ſin to the obedience is wholly the mans fault, and beſides the intention of God. God hath not made us to ſin, but hath committed us to the conduct of Conſcience, which by prevaricating its inſtructions hath betrayed us.

26. By this it appears what manner of obligation is paſs'd upon us by an erring Conſcience; the Conſcience always hath the ſame commiſſion as being the ſame faculty, the ſame guide: but becauſe it ſelf is bound to the Laws of God and right reaſon, ſo farre as it follows them, ſo farre it binds. But becauſe when it is in error, it alſo pretends them, by them it ſtill binds, till the illuſion be diſcovered. Durandus expreſſed this by a diſtinction of words, in which himſelf onely made the difference. Ligat, ſed non obligat. So he. That is, it hath not the ſame power that is in a right conſcience. But it binds us ſo that we cannot proceed to good. A right Conſcience directly and finally binds us to the action it ſelf: An erring Conſcience cannot doe that, becauſe the action it offers is criminal, but it makes us take that in ſtead of what it ought to binde us to: That is, it hath the ſame authority, but an evil exerciſe of it; The formal obligation is the ſame, but when it comes to be inſtanc'd, it binds us to that in which it hath no power. For though it hath power over us, yet it hath no direct power in that particular matter.

27. Cordubenſis and Vaſquez contradict this expreſſion of Durandus, affirming that an erring conſcience does ligare & obligare; I cannot well tranſlate the words into a diſtinction, but their meaning is this, that we are not bound poſitively to follow the error, but yet ſo that we muſt not doe the contrary. Which indeed is the ſame thing; and they going to reprove Durandus his diſtinction that hath no difference, they doe it by a contradiction that hath in it no oppoſition. For to ſay that an erring conſcience does ſo binde us that we muſt not contradict it, is to ſay that it poſitively binds us to follow it. For if it commands us to follow it, and we muſt not goe againſt that command, is it not notorious and evident that we muſt poſitively follow it? But for the eſtabliſhing the meaſures of obedience in the preſent caſe, theſe following rules are the beſt proportions.

The meaſures of obedience due to an erring Conſcience.

28. 1. If an erring conſcience commands a thing that is of it ſelf indifferent, we are bound to follow it, and we may doe it without ſin. Becauſe if it be indifferent, it is therefore lawful, and it cannot ceaſe in it ſelf to be lawful, by being ſuppoſed to be neceſſary. Indeed if a Governour commands us to doe a thing indifferent, and ſays it is neceſſary, we may not doe it under that compliance; that is, we may not betray our Chriſtian liberty, and accept that as ſimply neceſſary which Chriſt hath left under liberty. We muſt doe the thing, but not own the neceſſity. But if an erring conſcience bid us doe an indifferent, and repreſent it as a neceſſary action, though it may be a ſin to beleeve it neceſſary, yet it is no ſin to doe the action. For nothing that ſupervenes can alter the nature of the thing, and a new perſonal neceſſity introduc'd by an erring conſcience, by making it ſeem neceſſary to him, changes it not from being being lawful in it ſelf. But then it inferres this alſo, that as it may be done without ſin, ſo without a ſin it cannot be left undone: Becauſe the error hath made it perſonally neceſſary, and the truth of God hath made it lawful really.

29. 2. If an erring conſcience dictate a thing to be good which is not good, not to follow that dictate, and not to doe that thing is no ſin. Becauſe every good is not neceſſary, and it may be good or ſeem ſo, and yet to omit it in certain circumſtances, may be equally good or better.

30. 3. If an erring conſcience affirm that which is good, or which is indifferent, to be evil and vicious; as if it ſays, it is a ſin to ſpit upon the pavement of a Church, or that it is ſuperſtition to ſerve the poor in an Hoſpital, it is no ſin to omit that indifferent or that commendable action; becauſe here is no command of God to countermand the reſolution of conſcience, and therefore the error may become a ſnare and a hindrance, but no direct cauſe of ſin; becauſe ſuch actions in themſelves not being neceſſary, it cannot be criminal upon a leſs reaſon to omit them. * But upon the ſame account it is a ſin to do them, becauſe they are not of faith, and the conſcience being perſwaded againſt them, they are ſins. For any deficiency of a neceſſary ingredient makes a ſin.

31. 4. If an erring conſcience ſay that ſuch an action is lawful onely, when of it ſelf it is good and laudable, we ſin not if we doe it, or if we doe it not. For in this caſe neither is there any direct obligation from God, nor any indirect obligation from Conſcience, and therefore the man is wholly permitted to his liberty: although it may be a pious action to pray kneeling on the ground with bare knees, or proſtrate on our faces, yet if conſcience ſays it is in no ſenſe laudable, but that it is lawful onely, we may ſafely doe it; but then there is no other effect of ſuch an action, then there is of ſcratching a mans head with one finger, and it cannot be commendable in him to doe an action in which he beleeves there is no worthineſs.

32. 5. If an erring conſcience commands what is ſimply evil, or forbids to doe that which is abſolutely commanded, the man ſins whether he obeys, or obeys not. In one caſe he ſins againſt his Rule, and in the other againſt his Guide: and any one miſcarriage is enough to introduce a ſin. But this will be the matter of the next Rule. The uſe of theſe Rules is not at all effective upon erring conſciences, while the error remains: for the advices ſuppoſing the error are not applicable to them who will not ſuppoſe themſelves in error. But they are applicable to conſciences recovered from their error, and are uſeful in the conduct of their repentance, becauſe they deſcribe the reſpective meaſures of ſin and innocence, and what obligations of ſorrow and amends are left behinde when the error is gone.

To theſe may be added thoſe Rules which I have already given, concerning the changes which can be made in moral actions, by the perſwaſion and force of Conſcience, Chap. 2. Rule 9.

RULE

RULE 3.

A Conſcience erring vincibly or culpably is an unavoidable cauſe of ſin, whether it be reſiſted, or complied with.

1. WHEN the error proceeds of malice or negligence, the man is guilty according to the venome of the ingredient; there is a ſin in the principle, and this leads to an action materially evil. He that makes aſſemblies againſt his Prelate, and thinks he may lawfully doe it, does an action for which by the Laws he is puniſhable; but to God he is to anſwer beſides the action, for the ſin that led him to that error.

Queſt.

2. BUT if it be inquired, whether that alſo be a ſin which is an obedience to his Conſcience, that is, whether the inſtance of the action be a ſin, beſide the malice of the principle, and ſo every ſuch action become a double ſin? I anſwer, that it is according as the inſtance is.

3. 1. If it be againſt a prime principle, in which we are naturally, or any way greatly inſtructed, then the error is culpable in that manner that it remains voluntary all the way; and then not only the introduction or firſt principle, but the effect alſo is a ſin. The man hath onely put a blinde before his eyes, and in every reflex action it is diſcovered, and he knows it habitually all the way. * And therefore in this caſe the conſcience ought not to be obeyed. For the Conſcience is but imperfect and equivocal, violent and artificial. It is perſwaded in the act, and convinced of the evil in the habit or reflex act, and is no otherwiſe deceived, then a man is blinde that wears a hood upon his eye.

Caſtropal. tom. 1. diſ. 1. punct. 6. n. 3.

4. 2. If the Conſcience be poſſeſſed with a damnable error, and in a great matter, and this poſſeſſion is a dereliction and a puniſhment from God for other crimes, it is no matter whether we call the conſequent action a ſin or no. For the man is in a ſtate of reprobation, and the whole order of things and actions in that ſtate are criminal formally or equivalently. His prayers are an abomination; and if ſo, then the actions that are materially evil, are much worſe, and in eſtimation, are proſecutions of the ſtate of ſin. Of this ſort are they that are given over to beleeve a lye; all the conſequent actions are ſins, juſt as the envies and blaſphemies of damned people are ſins, or as the acts of Devils are imputed: they are conſigned to death, and all the conſequent actions are ſymbolical; and it will be always ſo, unleſs they can return to a ſtate of repentance.

5. 3. If the Conſcience be abuſed in a deduction, conſequence, or leſs certain propoſition, by evil arts and prejudice, by intereſt and partiality, there is ſo much evil in the whole determination, as there was in the introducing cauſe of the error, and no more. For if the action conſequent to the perſwaſion were alſo a ſin, then it ought not to be done; but becauſe in this caſe the conſcience ought to be obeyed, though in the whole affair there is a ſin, and it is unavoidable, yet the ſin is antecedent to the action and determination, but no proper appendage or qualification of it. And ſince the object in the preſent caſe tranſmits honeſty and equity into the action, not according to what it is in the thing, but according to what it is in reaſon, it muſt needs be that we are obliged according to what we finde it to be in Conſcience. For in this caſe we know not what it is in it ſelf, and therefore by it we cannot be guided to chooſe or to refuſe; but becauſe we muſt be guided by ſomething, it muſt be wholly by opinion and conſcience.

6. 4. If the Conſcience be weakly and innocently miſguided, there is no ſin either in the error, or in the conſequent action. Becauſe no man is bound to doe better then his beſt; and if he hath no ſin in the principle of his error, it is certain he did his beſt, that is, he did all his duty, and then to proceed by the beſt light he hath, is agreeable to right reaſon and to Religion.

7. Upon the ground of theſe Concluſions we may eaſily inferre, that though an erring conſcience is to be followed (as it is above explained) and yet that God alſo is intirely to be followed, and that therefore a man by accident, and by his own fault may be intangled in nervis teſticulorum Leviathan (as S. Gregories expreſſion is out of Job) in the infoldings of ſin and Sathan, and cannot eſcape innocently ſo long as he remains in that condition; yet becauſe he need not remain in that condition but either by ſuſpecting himſelf, or being admoniſhed by another, by inquiry and by prayer he may lay his error down, it follows that to obey God never hath an unavoidable dilemma, and never is impoſſible ſo long as the man is in a ſtate and poſſibility of repentance. Becauſe every error that infers an action that is formally as well as materially ſinful, not onely ought but may alſo be depoſed or laid down, becauſe in ſuch caſes no man is invincibly abuſed. No man can ever be in that condition, that to love God ſhall become a ſin to him; becauſe no man can really be ignorant, or properly entertain this opinion, that it is a ſin to love God; that rebellion is lawful; that adultery is no ſin; that it can be lawful to ſtrike a Prince for juſtice; or to break a Commandement to preſerve the intereſt of a Sect; that a man may rob God in zeal againſt idolatry and images. Theſe things are ſo plainly taught, that an error in theſe cannot chooſe but be malicious.

8. But when the error is in ſuch caſes where either it is invincible and irremediable, or where weakneſs pleads excuſe, the action is in that degree innocent in which the error is unavoidable. And if it could be otherwiſe, then a caſe might happen in which by the Laws of God a man could be bound to that which is intrinſecally evil, and then God and not man were the Author of the ſin.

9. The ſumme is this. God is Supreme, and Conſcience is his Vicegerent and Subordinate. Now it is certain, that the Law of an inferiour cannot binde againſt the command of a Superiour when it is known. But when the Superiour communicates the notices of his will by that inferiour, and no otherwiſe; the ſubject is to obey that inferiour, and in ſo doing he obeys both. But the Vicegerent is to anſwer for the misinformation, and the Conſcience for its error, according to the degree of its being culpable.

It is a greater ſin to doe a good action againſt our Conſcience, then to doe an evil action in obedience to it.

1. THIS Rule concerns degrees onely, but is uſeful in the conducting ſome actions of repentance; and it is to be underſtood to be true onely in equal caſes, and when there is no circumſtance aggravating one part. Frier Clement the Jacobine thinks erroneouſly, that it is lawful to kill his King. The poor Damoiſelle Faucette thinks it unlawful to ſpit in the Church: but it happened that one day ſhe did it againſt her conſcience; and the Frier with his conſcience and a long knife killed the King. If the queſtion be here, who ſinn'd moſt, the diſparity is next to infinite, and the poor woman was to be chidden for doing againſt her conſcience, and the other to be hang'd for doing according to his. Becauſe the Friers error could not be invincible and inculpable, hers might; and in ſuch queſtions, the effect of which is of ſo high concernment, becauſe the errors in them are ſupreme and dangerous, the inquiſition ought to be very great where there can be difficulty, and therefore the negligence is always intolerable, and it is malicious where the diſcovery is eaſy, as it is in theſe caſes. And therefore in ſo different materials the caſe can no way be equal, becauſe in one there is a greater light, a more ready grace, a perfect inſtruction, an evident proviſion, an open reſtraint, and a ready Commandement.

2. But when the effect of the Queſtions are equal and not differenced by accidents, the rule is certain upon this reaſon: Becauſe a ſin done againſt knowledge, is greater then a ſin done ignorantly. He that ſins againſt his conſcience, ſins againſt all his knowledge in that particular. But if he ſins againſt a Commandement, which he knows not to be ſuch, he ſins ignorantly, and therefore the more excuſably. But I found mercy (ſaith S. Paul) for I did it ignorantly in unbeleef.

3. Upon this account it comes to be the ſame kinde, and the ſame degree of crime to ſin againſt an erring, and to ſin againſt a right Conſcience in the ſame inſtances. He that omits to hear Divine ſervice on a Feſtival when he hath no reaſonable impediment, and he who omits it upon a Common day, which he erroneouſly ſuppoſes to be a Feſtival, hath equally prevaricated the Law of the Church, and the analogy of the Commandement of God on which this of the Church is founded, they being equally againſt his rule by which he is to walk, and this error hath no influence upon the will, or choice, but is wholly extrinſecal to it. But this is to be underſtood in errors of fact, and ſuch as are inculpable, and have no effect, and make no change in the will.

4. And therefore in our penitentiall ſorrows and expiations we need not be curious to make a difference of them which have the ſame formal malice; and if we be taught to make any, it may have this evil conſequence in it, that we may love our ignorance, and flatter our ſelves in our irregularities, which we think will not be ſo ſeverely imputed, by reaſon of the error. If this be a great crime to diſobey our Conſcience teaching us righteous and true propoſitions, it is on the other ſide alſo very great to ſuffer our Conſcience to be ſo misled, that a good action ſhall become criminal by ſuch miſtaking; ſo that beſides the departing from our Rule which is equal in both, they have their own ſuperadded evil to weigh againſt each other.

Rule 5.

It is not lawful to delight in an evil action (after the diſcovery of our error) which we did innocently in an erroneous Conſcience.

1. THE caſe is this; Quintus Hortenſius received a forg'd Will of Minutius from ſome Hæredipetæ or Teſtamentary cheaters, and becauſe they offered to verify it, and to give him a ſhare, he defended the forgery and poſſeſſed his part; but when he afterwards perceived the cheat, and yet detained the purchaſe, he grew infamous: It was innocent till he knew it, but then it was criminal. He ſhould not have pleaſed himſelf in it, becauſe he ſhould have reſtor'd it: But in this there is no queſtion.

2. But when the poſſeſſion or purchaſe may lawfully remain, there is ſome difference in the deciſion of the queſtion. Spurinna ſtriking a Stag, involuntarily and unwittingly kils his brother, and becomes rich by the inheritance. Here the man muſt ſeparate the effect from its relation, and ſo proceed: The inheritance was a bleſſing, the accident was a misfortune; and if he may not rejoyce in that, he may not give thanks for it, but as for a croſs. But if he pleaſes himſelf in the way of his entrance to it, he had a minde ready to have kill'd his brother if he durſt, or at leaſt did ſecretly wiſh him dead, that he might openly have his living. In this there is no great difficulty to make the ſeparation. God ſtrikes a man with blindneſs, and gives him a good memory; he ſighs for that, and rejoyces for this. A little Metaphyſicks makes this abſtraction.

3. 2. But concerning the act when it is diſcovered to have been evil, he is to have no other complacency, but becauſe he did it ignorantly. He that ſuffers nocturnal pollution, if he finds a remedy by it, is to rejoyce that himſelf ſuffered it involuntarily, that is, he may rejoyce that he did not ſin; and of the innocence of the joy, he can have no other teſtimony but by his hating the act in all caſes in which it is a ſin, and refuſing to doe it. But the French woman whom Myl. Montaigne ſpeaks of, who having ſuffered a rape by divers Souldiers, gave God thanks that without ſin ſhe had enjoyed pleaſure, had a criminal joy, and delighted in the action, for the voluntary entertainment of which ſhe onely wanted an excuſe.

4. 3. If we conſider the whole conjunction of things together, the evil act with the advantageous effect, we are to be indifferent to joy and ſorrow, that is, to doe neither directly, but to look on it as an effect of the Divine providence bringing good out of evil, and to fear leſt a joy in the whole ſhould entitle us too nearly to the ſin by the relation of an after act and approbation; or leſt we be ſo greedy of the effect that we be too ready to entertain the like upon terms equally evil, but leſs fortunate.

4. This is alſo to be underſtood onely in ſuch caſes, in which we are not oblig'd to reſtitution. For if we rejoyce in that effect which we ought to deſtroy, ſtroy, we recal the ſin from the tranſient action, and make it dwell with the poſſeſſion, and then the firſt involuntary error becomes a choſen rapine.

6. 5. If the action was onely materially, and therefore innocently, an error againſt a humane Law, and turns to our ſecular advantage, we are more at liberty to rejoyce and pleaſe our ſelves in the advantage. Becauſe humane Laws make no action intrinſecally and eſſentially evil, but onely relatively and extrinſecally. And therefore the danger is not ſo great of polluting the conſcience by the contact and mingling of the affections with the forbidden action. He that eats fleſh in Lent in thoſe places and circumſtances where it is forbidden, and did not remember it was Lent, or did not know it, and by ſo doing, refreſhes himſelf well, and does advantage to his health, may not be accuſed eaſily if he delights in the whole action, as it joyns the error and the advantage. For beſides the former reaſon, this alſo is conſiderable; that humane Laws not being ſo wiſe and excellent as Divine Laws doe bend more eaſily and readily, that they may comply with the ends of charity and gentleneſs, and have in them a more apt diſpenſation, and almoſt offer themſelves to goe away, when a greater good comes in their room. But of this in its due place.

7. 6. In actions materially evil againſt the Divine Laws, if the event cannot be clearly ſeparated from the irregularity, the firſt innocent error is by the after pleaſure turned into a direct ſin. Cneius Carbo lay with Lælia unwittingly, ſuppoſing her to be his wife Poſthumia, but afterwards having diſcovered the error was pleaſed in the miſtake, becauſe he by the arts of fancy did by an after thought repreſent to himſelf the change and the variety, and then he was adulterous. For to be pleaſed in the miſtake which brings no advantage ſeparable from the ſin, is directly to chooſe the ſin for the advantage ſake; and this was Carbo's caſe.

An innocent, or invincibly erring Conſcience is to be obeyed even againſt the known Commandement of our Superiours.

1. AGainſt this S. Bernard ſeems to argue earneſtly; Si tantopere vitanda ſunt ſcandala parvulorum, quantò ampliùs prælatorum, quos ſibi Deus coæquare quodammodo in utroque dignatur, dum ſibimet imputat & illorum reverentiam & contemptum? &c. "If with ſo great caution we muſt be careful that we doe not offend "any of Gods little ones, how much more muſt we be curious to avoid giving offence "to great ones, to our Superiours, whom God ſeems in ſome manner to make equal "to himſelf, while the reverence or the contempt that is done to them, he takes unto "himſelf; ſaying, He that heareth you, heareth me, and he that deſpiſeth you, deſpiſeth me. But if you ſay, that men may be deceived in their inqueſt after the will of "God, and may deceive others in reporting it; what is that to thee who knoweſt not "that they are deceived? eſpecially ſince from Scriptures thou art taught, That the "lips of the Prieſt ſhall preſerve knowledge, and they ſhall require the Law at his "mouth, becauſe he is the Angel of the Lord of Hoſts. To which diſcourſe of S. Bernard, the following conſideration may adde ſome moment; and the diſcuſſing them, may give light to the inquiry. Lib. de præcept. & diſpenſ.

2. For in things indifferent the command of the Superiour muſt needs be accounted the will of God; for although our Superiours are executioners of the Divine Laws, yet becauſe they have alſo a Legiſlative power, they who can alter nothing in things commanded or forbiddden by God, muſt have a power to command or to forbid reſpectively in things indifferent or not at all. And therefore in ſuch things our conſcience is bound to obey.

3. And if conſcience be pretended againſt it, it is an error and ought to be laid down, for to follow this erring conſcience ingages us in ſin all the way.

4. But as he that ſubmits his underſtanding to the obedience of Jeſus, pleaſes God moſt, even when he does it in defiance of all arguments and temptations to the contrary, which though he cannot anſwer, yet he reſolves to follow Chriſt; ſo he does beſt who though his conſcience pretend reaſons againſt it, will yet lay aſide thoſe reaſons that he may ſubmit to his ſuperiors.

5. For it is a great crime by rebelling againſt or ſlighting the command of our Rulers, to give offence to whole ſocieties of men; *and there can be no greater contempt done to them, then by undervaluing their judgement to preferre our own; and therefore the Prophet pronounces woe to them who are wiſe in their own eyes.

6. But let a Subject be never ſo wiſe, he ought not to judge his Superiour, or to condemne his ſentence; and therefore he muſt be judged by it, and not by his own erring conſcience.

7. For as he who hath made a vow of obedience, hath deveſted himſelf of all pretences of contradicting what ſhall be impoſed; and if his conſcience ſhall check him in the inſtance, he ought to look upon it as a temptation and uſe it accordingly; ſo muſt it be alſo in every Subject, who by the Laws of God is as much tied to obey his Superiour, as he can be by any Law which he puts upon himſelf. The effect of theſe ſuggeſtions is this, that in things where the Law of God hath not declared poſitively, an erring conſcience is not to be attended to, but the Law of the Superiour, and his ſentence muſt be the guide of his Conſcience.

2. To this diſcourſe I anſwer in ſhort, That it is all very true; that the lawful Superiours are Gods Vicegerents appointed over us in things pertaining to God, ſo as to be Executioners of the Divine Laws; and beſides this, to make Laws in things indifferent and pertaining to men; That all contempt done to them is done to God; That it is ſcandalous to refuſe obedience to them; That he is a proud man who ſays he is wiſer then his Superiours; and he is intolerable that preferres his private folly before the publick wiſdome: And therefore it is well inferred, that the error of an abuſed conſcience ought to be laid down, and though he cannot in particular anſwer the arguments which trouble him, yet if he have reaſon to beleeve that though the arguments be too hard for him, yet that the Superiours command is innocent; it were well if he would lay aſide thoſe arguments and adhere to authority; yet all this touches not the ſecret of the Queſtion. For,

3. He that compares the law of Conſcience, with the law of the Superiour, compares the law of God and the law of man; and the queſtion is not whether a man ſhould follow his Superiour, or follow himſelf, but whether God or Man be to be obeyed, whether the Superiour or the Supreme be to be attended to? The reaſon of this is, becauſe the Conſcience ſtands bound by the ſuppoſed Law of God, which being ſuperiour to all the law of Man, muſt rather be obeyed; and therefore although the arguments conclude rightly that an erring conſci-

ence diſobeying his Superiours lawful command does ſin greatly, yet they cannot conclude that he avoids ſin by obeying againſt his conſcience. For his condition is indeed perplexed, and he can no way avoid ſin, but by laying his error aſide firſt, and then obeying. And ſince he ſins whether he obeys his Superiours juſt command, or the unjuſt command of his conſcience, the inquiry is, in this ſad conjunction of things, by what hand he muſt be ſmitten, on which ſide he muſt fall, that he may fall the eaſier? To this the Rule anſwers, That his erring conſcience muſt be obeyed rather, becauſe he is perſwaded that God ſpeaks there, and is not perſwaded that God ſpeaks by his Superiour. Now though in this he be deceived, yet he that will not goe there where he thinks God is, and leave that where he thinks God is not, does uncertainly goe towards God, but does certainly forſake him, as much as lies in him. For,

4. It is to the Conſcience all one as if the Law of God were really upon it, if it be thought it is. Idem eſt eſſe & apparere in this caſe, and therefore the erring conſcience is to be attended to, becauſe the will and the affections are for God, though the judgement hath miſtaken a gloworm for the Sun. But this is to be underſtood onely, when the conſcience erres innocently and unavoidably, which it can never doe in the precepts of nature, and brighteſt revelation.

5. But if the Conſcience does erre vincibly, that is, with an actual fault, and an imperfect, artificial reſolution, ſuch a one, as a good man will not, and a wiſe man need not have, his preſent perſwaſion excuſes him not from a double ſin, for breaking a double duty. For he is bound to correct his error, and to perform the precepts of his Superiour, and if he does not, his ſin is more then that which was in the vicious cauſe of his miſperſwaſion, as I ſhewed in the explication of the former Rules.

6. But according as the ignorance and error approaches towards pity, leſſening or excuſing, ſo the ſin alſo declines. He that thinks it is not lawful at all to take up arms at the command of his Prince in an unjuſt, or a dubious cauſe, ſins if he does what he thinks ſo unlawful, and he commits no ſin in diſobeying, that onely excepted which entred into his miſperſwaſion, which is greater or leſs, or next to none at all, according as was the cauſe of his error, which in the whole conſtitution of affairs, he could not well avoid. But he that is fooliſhly perſwaded that all Government is unlawful and Antichriſtian, is bound to lay his error down, and beſides the vicious cauſe of his error, he ſins in the evil effect of it, though his imperfect, equivocal conſcience calls on him to the contrary, yet he ſins if he does not obey, becauſe in ſuch notorious and evident propoſitions an error is not onely malicious in the principle, but voluntary all the way; and therefore may eaſily, and muſt certainly be laid aſide in every period of determination.

Whatſoever Caſes are between theſe, partake of the extremes according to their proper reaſon and relation.

RULE

Rule 7.

The error of an abuſed Conſcience ought to be reformed, ſometimes by the command of the will, but ordinarily by a contrary reaſon.

1. 1. If the error did begin upon a probable reaſon, it cannot be reformed but by a reaſon ſeeming equal to it, becauſe a leſs reaſon hath not naturally the ſame efficacy with a greater, and to aſſent to a leſs probability againſt a greater is to doe againſt reaſon, againſt all that by which this leſſer reaſon is outweighed. For in this caſe the will can have no influence, which not being a cognoſcitive and diſcourſing faculty, muſt be determined by its own motives when it is not determined by reaſon, that is, by the motives of underſtanding. Now the motives of will when it is not moved by right reaſon, are pleaſure and profit, ambition and revenge, partiality and pride, chance or humor; and how theſe principles can diſabuſe a conſcience is very hard to underſtand, how readily and certainly they doe abuſe it, is not hard. Whether the ſtarres be even or odde? whether the ſoul be generated, or created and infuſed? whether it be lawful to fight or rail againſt a Prince, what hath the Will to doe with it? If the will meddles, and makes the reſolution, it ſhall be determined, not as it is beſt, but as it falls out by chance, or by evil, or by vain inducements. For in the will there is no argument good but reaſon; I mean both in the matter of nature and of grace, that is, reaſon chang'd into a motive, and an inſtrument of perſwaſion from whatſoever inducing principle.

Vide Chap. 4.

2. 2. * Some have affirmed that the error of a conſcience may fairly be depoſed upon any probable argument though of leſs perſwaſion; which if it could be admitted, would give leave for a man to chooſe his ſide as he pleaſes, becauſe in all moral things as dreſſed with circumſtances it is very eaſy to finde ſome degrees of probability, but very difficult to finde a caſe againſt which nothing can be diſputed. And therefore if it happens that a man be better perſwaded of his error then of the contrary truth, that truth cannot be choſen wiſely, nor the error honeſtly depoſed, becauſe it is done againſt the way of a man, not abſolutely, but comparatively againſt reaſon.

* Sanchez. ſelect. 99. diſp. 41. num. 27. Merolla in florileg. verb. conſcientia nu. 14. Badus de conſcient. a diſcept. 3. cap. 11.

3. 3. If the reaſon on both ſides ſeems equally probable, the will may determine by any of its proper motives that are honeſt; any prudent intereſt, any fair compliance, any cuſtome, in caſe theſe happen to be on the right ſide. When the arguments ſeem equal, the underſtanding or conſcience cannot determine. It muſt either be a chance, and a ſpecial providence of God, or a particular grace that caſts us on the right ſide. But whatſoever it be that then determines us to the right, if of it ſelf it be innocent, it is in that caſe an effect of Gods grace, and an apt inſtrument of a right Conſcience.

4. 4. When the conſcience is erroneous, and the error unreaſonable, commenc'd wholly upon intereſt, trifling regards, or vicious principles, the error may be depoſed honeſtly, though there be no reaſon thought of to the contrary, beſides the diſcovery of the firſt abuſe. The will in this caſe is enough. Volo ſervare animam meam, ſaid one; I will, I am reſolved to ſave my own ſoul. A man may and ought to hate the evil principle of his error, and decline

it upon the ſtock of indignation, which in this caſe is a part of repentance. And this inſinuates the reaſon of this diſcourſe. For,

5. Repentance is founded principally in the will, and whatſoever a man is to leave upon the ſtock of repentance, he may doe it wholly upon the ſtock of his will, informed, or inclin'd by general propoſitions, without any cogniſance of the particulars of the preſent Queſtion. Eratoſthenes comming amongſt the Perſian Magi, and obſerving their looſer cuſtomes of marrying their ſiſters and their mothers, falls in love with his half ſiſter Lampra and marries her. A while after perceiving that he entred upon this action upon no other account but luſt, and fancy, and compliance with the impurer Magi, began to hate his act for the evil inducement, and threw away her and his folly together. This he might doe without any further reaſonings about the indecency of the mixture, by perceiving that a crime or a folly ſtood at the entrance and invited him to an evil lodging. He that begins without reaſon, hath reaſon enough to leave off, by perceiving he had no reaſon to begin; and in this caſe the will is the great agent, which therefore here is no ill principle, becauſe it leaves the error upon the ſtock of grace and repentance. Vide Chap. 4. Rule 5.

6. 5. If the will entertained the error without any reaſon at all, as oftentimes it does, it knows not why; ſhe may alſo depoſe it honeſtly without any reaſon relating to the particular, upon this general, that it could not make the action to be conſcientious to have it done without any inducement. But then the taking up the contrary truth upon as little reaſon is innocent, becauſe it happens to be on the right ſide; but it is not Vertue nor Conſcience till it be perſwaded by ſomething that is a fit inducement either in the general, or in the particular.

RULE 8.

The error of a Conſcience is not always to be opened to the erring perſon by the Guides of ſouls, or any other charitable adviſer.

1. IF the error began with a ſin, and ſtill dwells there upon the ſame ſtock, or if it be productive of a ſin, it is always to be diſcovered, though the greateſt temporal inconvenience were certainly conſequent to the diſcovery. Becauſe a man muſt not be ſuffered to lie in ſin, no not a minute, if he can be recovered or reſcued from it; and no temporal advantage or diſadvantage can be conſiderable in this caſe, which is the caſe of a ſoul. An error that is vincible is all the way criminal and muſt not be permitted.

2. 2. If the error be invincible and innocent or pitiable in the cauſe, and yet ends in an intolerable event, and the effect be a crime or a great danger to ſouls, the error muſt be diſcovered by them that can. The Novatians erred in the matter of Repentance: The inducing cauſe of their error was an over active zeal, and too wary a tenderneſs in avoiding ſcandal and judging concerning it. God ſerved the ends of his glory by the occaſion of that error, for he uſes to bring good out of every evil; and the Church under a better article ticle grew as wary as the Novatians,as watchful againſt ſcandal,as ſevere againſt lapſed perſons. Now although in this caſe, the error was ſtom an innocent cauſe, yet becauſe it landed them upon a courſe of diſcipline, and perſwaſion that was not innocent, they were not to be permitted in their error, though the diſſolut on of the error might or would have occaſioned the remiſſion of diſcipline. For their doctrine of repentance was diſhonourable to the mercies of God, an inſtrument of deſpair, a rendring the power of the Keys and the Miniſtery of the order Eccleſiaſtical in a manner wholly uſeleſs, and would if it were purſued to its juſt conſequents have hindred repenting ſinners to revert to the folds of the Church; and therefore for the accidental good which God brought, or which was likely to have come from that error or the innocence of its principle, it was not to be conceal'd, but reprov'd and deſtroyed becauſe it dwelt in ſin. He that beleeves that repentance to be ſufficient, which hath in it nothing but ſorrow for what is paſt, and a preſent purpoſe without amendment really in the future, upon no pretence is to be complied withall in the palliation of his error, becauſe the conſequent of his error is ſuch a danger, or ſuch a ſtate of ſin, for which nothing can make amends.

3. 3. If the error be invincible, and the conſequent of the perſwaſion be conſiſtent with the ſtate of grace, the error muſt be opened or not opened, according to prudent conſiderations relating to the perſon and his ſtate of affairs. So that the error muſt rather be ſuffered then a grievous ſcandal, or an intolerable, or a very great inconvenience. To this purpoſe Comitolus ſays it was determined by a Congregation of learned and prudent perſons in anſwer to a ſtrange and a rare caſe happening in Venice; A Gentleman ignorantly did lie with his Mother; ſhe knew it, but intended it not, till for her curioſity and in her ſearch whether her ſon intended it to her maid, ſhe was ſurpriſed and gotten with child: She perceiving her ſhame and ſorrow haſten, ſent her ſon to travel for many years; and he returned not till his Mothers female birth was grown to be a handſome pretty Maiden. At his return he eſpies a ſweet fac'd girl in the houſe, likes her, loves her, and intends to marry her. His mother conjured him by all that was ſacred and profane that he ſhould not, ſaying, ſhe was a beggers child, whom for pities ſake ſhe reſcued from the ſtreets and beggery, and that he ſhould not by diſhonouring his family make her to die with ſorrow. The Gentlemans affections were ſtrong, and not to be maſtered, and he married his own ſiſter and his own daughter. But now the bitings of the Mothers conſcience were intolerable and to her Confeſſor ſhe diſcovered the whole buſineſs within a year or two after this prodigious marriage, and asked whether ſhe were bound to reveal the caſe to her ſon and daughter, who now liv'd in love and ſweetneſs of ſociety, innocently, though with ſecret misfortune which they felt not. It was concluded negatively, ſhe was not to reveal it, leſt ſhe bring an intolerable miſery in the place of that which to them was no ſin; or leſt upon notice of the error they might be tempted by their mutual endearment and their common children, to cohabite in deſpight of the caſe, and ſo change that into a known ſin, which before was an unknown calamity; and by this ſtate of the anſwer, they were permitted to their innocence, and the children to their inheritance, and all under the protecton of a harmleſs, though erring and miſtaken conſcience.

4. 4. If it be doubtful whether more good or hurt may be conſequent to the diſcovery, it is better to conceal it. Becauſe it is more tolerable to have a good omitted, then to have an evil done. That may ſometimes be lawful, this can

can never; and a known evil that is not a ſin, is rather to be admitted then an unknown, which no man can tell whether it will arrive. But in this, the prudence of a good and a wiſe man is to be his onely guide, and Gods glory his onely meaſure and the publick good, and the greater concernments of the intereſſed be chiefly regarded.

CHAP. IV.

Of the Probable or Thinking Conſcience.

RULE I.

A probable Conſcience is an imperfect aſſent to an uncertain propoſition, in which one part is indeed clearly and fully choſen, but with an explicit, or implicit notice that the contrary is alſo fairly eligible.

1. A Probable Conſcience dwells ſo between the Sure and the Doubtful that it partakes ſomething of both. For a ſure Conſcience may begin upon a probable inducement, but is made ſure either by an aſſent to the Concluſion, ſtronger then the premiſes will inferre, or by a reflex act, or ſome other collateral hardneſs and adventitious confidence, and therefore the probable is diſtinguiſhed from that by the imperfection of the aſſent. But becauſe in that reſpect it approaches to the doubtful, and in that is alike, it is differenced from this by the determination. For a doubtful conſcience conſiders the probabilities on each ſide, and dares not chooſe, and cannot. But the probable does chooſe, though it conſiders that in the thing it ſelf there can be no certainty. And from them both it is diſtinguiſhed by the intervening of the Will. For in the ſure Conſcience the Will works not at all, becauſe it is wholly conducted by the underſtanding, and its proper motives. In the doubtful the Will cannot interpoſe by reaſon of fear and an uncertain ſpirit; but in the probable it can intervene, not directly, but collaterally and indirectly, becauſe the motives of the probable conſcience are not always ſufficient to make the concluſion without ſomething of the Will applied to extrinſecal motives which reflect alſo upon the underſtanding; and yet in this conſcience there is no fear, and therefore the Will can here be obeyed, which in the firſt needs not, in the laſt it cannot. For it is remarkable, that a probable conſcience though it be in ſpeculation uncertain, yet it may be practically certain, that is, he that beleeves his opinion to be probable, cannot but think that it is poſſible he may be in an actual error, but yet he may know that it is innocent to doe that for which he hath a probable reaſon: for though in all theſe caſes he may chooſe that which is the wrong part, yet he proceeds as ſafely as if he had choſen right, for if it were not ſafe to doe that which is onely probable, then nothing could be done till ſomething were demonſtrated; and then in moral Theology we ſhould often ſtand ſtill and ſuſpend our act, but ſeldome doe any thing; nay ſometimes

... neither act nor ſuſpend, it being but probable that either is to be ... ſometimes it happens what Ariſtotle ſaid, that falſe things are ... probable then true, as it is to all them who are innocently and in- ... abuſed; and in this caſe, if probability were not a ſufficient convicti- ... conſcience, ſuch perſons could not honeſtly conſent to truth. * For even ... men diſagree in their ſentences of truth and error, and after a great ſearch, ... doe they diſcover one ſingle truth unto juſt meaſures of confidence; ... therefore no other law could be exacted for humane actions, then an opinion honeſtly entred into, and a probable conſcience. And it is remarkable that Cicero ... that the word Arbitror is verbum conſideratiſsimum, & the old Romans were reſerv'd and cautious in the decrees of Judges, and the forms of their oath began with arbitror although they gave teſtimony of things whereof they were eye witneſſes; and the words which their Prætors did uſe in their ſentences, was feciſſe videtur, or non videtur. He that obſerveth the winds ſhall not ſow, and he that watcheth the clouds ſhall never reap; which means, that if we ſtart at every objection, and think nothing ſafe but what is certain, and nothing certain but what can be demonſtrated, that man is over wiſe and over juſt, and by his too curious ſearch miſſes what he inquires for. Λέγοιτο δ' ἂν ἱκανῶς εἰ κατὰ τὴν ὑποκειμένην ὕλην ἀποφαίνοιτο, That is well enough prov'd, that is prov'd according to the ſubject matter. For there is not the ſame exactneſs to be look'd for in all diſciplines, any more then in all manufactures. But in thoſe things which are honeſt and juſt, and which concern the publick, τοσαύτην ἔχει διαφορὰν καὶ πλάνην, there is ſo much diſſention and deception that things are good or bad not by themſelves, but as they are in law; πεπαίδευται δὲ καλῶς ὃς ἐπὶ τοσοῦτον τὴν ἀκρίβειαν ἐπιζητεῖ καθ' ἕκαστον γένος ἐφ' ὅσον ἡ τοῦ πράγματος φύσις ἐπιδέχεται. He is well inſtructed who expects that manner of proof for things, which the nature of the things will bear, ſaid Ariſtotle. And in moral things, it is ſufficient that a thing is judged true and certain, though by an uncertain argument; and the opinion may be practically certain, when the knowledge of it is in ſpeculation onely probable.

Eccl. l. 4.

2. It hath two ſorts of motives, intrinſecal and extrinſecal. That is reaſon, this is authority, and both of them have great conſiderations in order to practice, of which I am to give account in the following Rules.

RULE 2.

A Conſcience that is at firſt, and in its own nature probable, may be made certain by accumulation of many probabilities operating the ſame perſwaſion.

1. EVery probable argument hath in it ſomething of perſwaſion and proof, and although it cannot produce evidence and intire conviction to a wiſe and a diſcerning ſpirit, yet it can effect all that it ought; and although, if the Will liſt, or if paſſions rule, the underſtanding ſhall be made ſtubborn againſt it, and reject it eaſily; yet if nothing be put in barre againſt it, it may bring a man to adhere to it beyond the evidence. But in ſome caſes there are a whole army of little people, heaps of probable inducements which the underſtanding amaſſes together, and from every ſide gathers all that can give light and motion to the article in queſtion, it draws auxiliaries from every thing, fights with every weapon, and by all means purſues the victory; it joyns line to line, and precept to precept, reaſon to reaſon, and reaſon to authority; the ſayings of wiſe men with the proverbs of the people; conſent of talkers, and the arguings of diſputers; the nature of the thing, and the reaſonableneſs of its expectations; the capacities and poſſibilities of men, and of accidents; the purpoſes and deſigns, the uſefulneſs, and rewards; and by what all agents are and ought to be moved; cuſtomes are mingled with laws, and decencies with conſideration of profit; the underſtanding conſiders the preſent ſtate and heap of circumſtances, and by prudence weighs every thing in its own ballance; it conſiders the conſequent of the opinion it intends to eſtabliſh, and well weighs the inconvenience of the contrary. But from the obſcurity and inſufficiency of theſe particulars, there cannot come a perfect light; if a little black be mingled with white, the product muſt have ſomething of every influence that can be communicated from its principle, or material conſtitution; and ten thouſand millions of uncertains cannot make one certain.

2. In this caſe the underſtanding comes not to any certainty by the energy of the motives and direct arguments of probability, or by the firſt effort and impreſſes of their ſtrength, but by a particular reflexion which it makes upon the heap, and by a ſecondary diſcourſing extracted from the whole, as being therefore convinced, becauſe it beleeves it to be impoſſible that ſo many conſiderations, that no way conſpire either in matter or deſign, ſhould agree in the production of a lie. It is not likely that ſo many beams of light ſhould iſſue from the chambers of heaven for no other reaſon but to lead us into a precipice. Probable arguments and prudential motives are the great hinges of humane actions, for as a Pope once ſaid, It is but a little wit that governs the world; and the uncertainty of arguments is the great cauſe of contingency in events; but as uncertain as moſt counſels are, yet all the great tranſactions of the affairs of the world are reſolved on and acted by them; by ſuſpicions and fears and probable apprehenſions infinite evils are prevented; and it is not therefore likely to be an error by which ſo perpetually ſo many good things are procured and effected. For it were a diſparagement to the wiſe providence of God, and a leſſening the rare Oeconomy of the Divine Government that he ſhould permit almoſt all the world, and all reiglements, the varieties of event, and all the changes of Kingdomes, and all counſels and deliberations, to be conducted by moral demonſtrations, and to be under the power of probabilities, and yet that theſe ſhould be deceitful and falſe. Neither is it to be imagined that God ſhould permit wiſe men, and good, men that on purpoſe place their reaſon in indifference, that abate of their heats and quench their own extravagant fires, men that wipe away all clouds and miſts from their eyes, that they may ſee clearly, men that ſearch as they ought to do, for things that they are bound to finde, things that they are commanded to ſearch, and upon which even all their intereſts depends, and yet inquiring after the end whither they are directed, and by what means it is to be acquired that theſe men ſhould be inevitably abuſed by their own reaſon, by the beſt reaſon they have; and that when concerning the thing which cannot be demonſtrated by proper and phyſical arguments, yet we are to enter into a perſwaſion ſo great, that for the verification of it men muſt venture their lives and their ſouls; I ſay, if this kinde of proof be not ſufficient to effect all this, and ſufficiently to aſſure ſuch men, and competently to affirm and ſtrengthen ſuch reſolutions, ſalvation and damnation muſt be by chance, or, which is worſe, it muſt be impoſſible to be well, but when it cannot chooſe to be otherwiſe; and this I ſay is not to be imagined that God wil or does permit, ſince all theſe entercourſes ſo much concern Gods glory and our eternal intereſt. The main events of heaven and hell doe in ſome regards depend, as to us, upon our faith, whoſe objects are repreſented with ſuch lights from God and right reaſon as are ſufficient to perſwade, not to demonſtrate; they are ſuch which leave ſomething to us of choice and love, and every propoſition of Scripture though it be as ſure, yet it is not ſo evident as the principles of Geometry; and the Spirit of God effects his purpoſes with an influence as ſoft and placid as the warmth of the Sun, while a phyſical demonſtration blows hard and high as the Northwind; indeed a man muſt uſe rudeneſs if he does not quit his garment at ſo loud a call, but we are more willing to part with it when the Sun gently requires us: ſo is a moral demonſtration, it is ſo humane, ſo perſwaſive, ſo complying with the nature and infirmities of man, with the actions of his life and his manner of operation, that it ſeems to have been created on purpoſe for the needs and uſes of man in this life, for vertue and for hopes, for faith and for charity, to make us to beleeve by love, and to love by beleeving, for in heaven they that ſee and love, cannot chooſe but love, and ſee, and comprehend; for it is a reward and fils all their faculties, and is not poſſeſſed by us, but it ſelf poſſeſſes us; In this world where we are to doe ſomething our ſelves, though all by the grace of God, that which we doe of our ſelves is nothing elſe but to work as we our ſelves can, which indeed happens to be in propoſitions, as it is in the love of God, this cannot fail us, but we may fail of it, and ſo are the ſentences of Religion, infallible in themſelves, but we may be deceived, while by a fallible way we proceed to infallible notices, for nothing elſe could indear our labour and our love, our ſearch and our obedience; and therefore this muſt be ſufficient and acceptable, if we doe what we can: But then this alſo will ſecure our confidence, and in the noiſes of Chriſtendome when diſputing fellows ſay their brother is damned for not beleeving them, we need not to regard any ſuch noiſes, if we proceed prudently as we can, and honeſtly as we ought, probable motives of our underſtanding are our ſufficient conduct, and then we have this warrant, Brethren, if our hearts condemne us not, then have we peace towards God. And God would never have inſpired his Church with prudence, or made any ſuch vertue, if the things which were put under the conduct of it, that is, probabilities, were not inſtrumental to the ſervice of God, and to the verification of all its juſt and proper productions.

3. Probable arguments are like little ſtarres, every one of which will be uſeleſs as to our conduct and enlightening, but when they are tyed together by order and vicinity, by the finger of God and the hand of an Angel, they make a Conſtellation, and are not onely powerful in their influence, but like a bright Angel to guide and to enlighten our way. And although the light is not great as the light of the Sun or Moon, yet Mariners ſail by their conduct; and though with trepidation and ſome danger, yet very regularly they enter into the haven. This heap of probable inducements, is not of power as a Mathematical and Phyſical demonſtration, which is in diſcourſe as the Sun is in heaven, but it makes a Milky and a white path, viſible enough to walk ſecurely.

4. And next to theſe tapers of effective reaſon, drawn from the nature and from the events, and the accidents and the expectations and experiences of things, ſtands the grandeur of a long and united authority: The underſtanding thus reaſoning, That it is not credible that this thing ſhould have eſcaped the the wiſer heads of all the great perſonages in the world, who ſtood at the chairs of Princes, or ſate in the Rulers chair, and ſhould onely appear to two or three bold, illiterate, or vicious perſons, ruled by luſts, and overruled by evil habits; but in this we have the ſame ſecurity and the ſame confidence that timorous perſons have in the dark; they are pleaſed and can ſee what is and what is not, if there be a candle, but in the dark they are leſs fearful if they be in company.

5. This way of arguing ſome are pleaſed to call a moral demonſtration, not that it can make a propoſition clear and bright, and quit from clouds and obſcurity, as a natural demonſtration can, for I may in this caſe uſe Ariſtotles saying, τὸ μὲ ἀληθὲς, ἀλλ' ἀσαφὲς, Things of this nature may be very true, but are not very evident; but it can produce the ſame effect, that is, it can lead into truth, not with as much brightneſs, but with as much certainty and infallibility in the event of things. For a man may as proſperouſly and certainly arrive at his journeys end though but conducted by him that went the way but once before him, as if he had a ſtraight path walled in on both ſides; ſo may we finde truth as certainly by probabilities, as by demonſtrations: we are not ſo ſure that we finde it, but it is oftentimes as ſurely found. And if the heap arrive at that which we call a moral demonſtration, it is as certain that no moral demonſtration can be oppoſed againſt it, as that no natural demonſtration can be brought in contradiction to a natural. For the underſtanding cannot call any thing a moral demonſtration, till by conſidering the particulars on both ſides, the reaſonableneſs of one, and the unreaſonableneſs of the other, with a cold ſent, and liberty of ſpirit, and an unbyaſſed Will, it hath paſſed the ſentence for the truth; and ſince in this caſe all the oppoſition is between ſtrength and power on one ſide, and weakneſs and pretence on the other, it is impoſſible that the oppoſite parts ſhould be demonſtrations or ſeem ſo to the ſame man. And this appears by this alſo, that ſome propoſitions which are onely proved by a conjugation of probable inducements, have yet obtained as certain and as regular events as a natural demonſtration, and are beleeved equally, conſtantly, and perpetually by all wiſe men, and the underſtanding does regularly receive the ſame impreſſion, and give the ſame aſſent, and for ever draws forth the ſame concluſions when it is not abuſed with differing prejudices and preoccupations, when its liberty and powers are not infeebled with cuſtomes, example and contrary breeding, while it is not brib'd by intereſt, or hurried away by paſſion.

6. Of this I ſhall chooſe to give one inſtance, which as it is of the greateſt concernment in the world in it ſelf, ſo the gay impieties and bold wits of the world who are witty againſt none more then God and Gods wiſdome, have made it now to be but too ſeaſonable, and that is, that the Religion of Jeſus Chriſt, or The Chriſtian Religion is from God; concerning which I will not now pretend to bring in all the particulars whereby each part of it can be verified, but by heaping together ſuch heads of probabilities which are or may be the cauſe of an infinite perſwaſion, and this I had rather chooſe to doe for theſe reaſons:

7. 1. Becauſe many men excellently learned have already diſcourſed largely of the truth of Chriſtianity, and approved by a direct and cloſe congreſſion with other Religions, by examination of the contrary pretences, refutation of their arguments, anſwering their objections, and have by direct force ſo farre prevailed, that all the reaſon of the world appears to ſtand on the Chriſtian ſide: and for me to doe it now, as there is no juſt occaſion mini-ſtred by this argument, ſo neither can it be uſeful and neceſſary.

8. 2. In that way of arguing, every man that is an adverſary can anſwer one argument, and ſome can reprove many, and none can prevail ſingly to poſſeſs all the underſtanding, and to fill all the corners of conſideration, but in a moral demonſtration that can be ſupplied.

9. 3. In the other way an adverſary ſuppoſes himſelf to prevail when he can anſwer the arguments ſingly, and the diſcourſes in that method are like the ſervants ſent ſingly to gather fruits of the Husbandmen, they killed them as faſt as they came, and a man may kill a whole Kingdome over, if the opponents come by ſingle perſons; but a moral demonſtration is like an Army whichcan loſe ſingle perſons and yet prevail, but yet cannot be beaten unleſs it be beaten all.

10. 4. The few little things that Atheiſtical perſons prate againſt the holy Jeſus and his moſt excellent Religion, are infinitely outweighed by the multitude and variety of things to be ſaid for it; and let the others ſtand (as if they meet with perſons that cannot anſwer them) yet they are ſure this greater ought to prevail, becauſe it poſſeſſes all the corners of reaſon, and meets with every inſtance, and complies with the manner of a man, and is fitted to the nature of things, and complies with the Will, and perſwades the underſtanding, and is a guard againſt the tricks of Sophiſters, and does not onely effect its purpoſe by direct influence, but is ſecured by reflexion upon it ſelf, and does more by its indirect ſtrength, and by a back blow, then by its firſt operations; and therefore,

11. This inſtance and this way of argument may be of more uſe to thoſe perſons who cannot ſo diſpute, but that they are apt to be abuſed by little things, by talkings and imperfect arguings; it may be a defenſative againſt trifling objections, and the impious pratings of the nequam ingenioſi the witty fools, while the men are armed by love and prudence and wiſe ſecurities to ſtand with confidence and piety againſt talkings and intrigues of danger; for by this way beſt, Wiſdome is juſtified of all her children.

An inſtance of Moral demonſtration, or a conjugation of probabilities, proving that the Religion of Jeſus Chriſt is from God.

12. THis diſcourſe of all the diſputables in the world, ſhall require the fewest things to be granted; even nothing but what was evident, even nothing but the very ſubject of the Queſtion, viz. That there was ſuch a man as Jeſus Chriſt, that he pretended ſuch things and taught ſuch doctrines: for he that will prove theſe things to be from God, muſt be allowed that they were from ſomething or other. But this poſtulate I doe not ask for need, but for orders ſake and Art; for what the hiſtories of that Age reported as a publick affair, as one of the moſt eminent tranſactions of the world, that which made ſo much noiſe, which cauſed ſo many changes, which occaſioned ſo many warres, which divided ſo many hearts, which altered ſo many families, which procured ſo many deaths, which obtained ſo many Laws in favour, and ſuffered ſo many Reſcripts in the diſfavour of its ſelf; that which was not done in a corner, but was 33. years and more in acting; which cauſed ſo many Sects, and was oppoſed by ſo much Art, and ſo much power that it might not grow, which filled the world with noiſe, which effected ſuch great changes in the bodies of men by curing the diſeaſed, and ſmiting the contumacious or the hypocrites, which drew ſo many eyes, and fill'd ſo many tongues, and imployed ſo many pens, pens, and was the care and the queſtion of the whole world at that time, and immediately after; that which was conſigned by publick acts and records of Courts, which was in the Books of friends and enemies, which came accompanied and remarked with eclipſes and ſtars and prodigies of heaven and earth, that which the Jews even in ſpite and againſt their wills confeſſed, and which the witty adverſaries intending to overthrow, could never ſo much as challenge of want of truth in the matter of fact and ſtory; that which they who are infinitely concerned that it ſhould not be beleeved, or more, that it had never been, doe yet onely labour to make to appear not to have been Divine: Certainly, this thing is ſo certain that it was, that the defenders of it need not account it a kindneſs to have it preſuppoſed; for never was any ſtory in the world that had ſo many degrees of credibility, as the ſtory of the perſon, life and death of Jeſus Chriſt: And if he had not been a true Propher, yet that he was in the world, and ſaid and did ſuch things cannot be denied; for even concerning Mahomet we make no queſtion but he was in the world, and led a great part of mankinde after him, and what was leſs proved we infinitely beleeve; and what all men ſay, and no man denies, and was notorious in it ſelf, of this we may make further inquiries whether it was all that which it pretended, for that it did make pretences and was in the world, needs no more probation.

13. But now whether Jeſus Chriſt was ſent from God and delivered the Will of God, we are to take accounts from all the things of the world which were on him, or about him, or from him. Conſider firſt his perſon: he was foretold by all the Prophets: He, I ſay, for that appears by the event, and the correſpondencies of their ſayings to his perſon: he was deſcribed by infallible characteriſms which did fit him, and did never fit any but him; for when he was born, then was the fulneſs of time, and the Meſſias was expected at the time when Jeſus did appear, which gave occaſion to many of the godly then to wait for him, and to hope to live till the time of his revelation: and they did ſo, and with a ſpirit of Prophecie which their own nation did confeſs and honour, glorified God at the revelation: and the moſt excellent and devout perſons that were conſpicuous for their piety did then rejoyce in him, and confeſs him; and the expectation of him at that time was ſo publick and famous, that it gave occaſion to divers Impoſtors to abuſe the credulity of the people in pretending to be the Meſſias; but not onely the predictions of the time, and the perfect Synchroniſms did point him out, but at his birth a ſtrange ſtarre appeared, which guided certain Levantine Princes and Sages to the inquiry after him; a ſtrange ſtarre which had an irregular place and an irregular motion, that came by deſign, and acted by counſel, the counſel of the Almighty Guide, it moved from place to place, till it ſtood juſt over the houſe where the Babe did ſleep; a ſtarre of which the Heathen knew much, who knew nothing of him; a ſtarre which Chalcidius affirmed to have ſignified the deſcent of God for the ſalvation of man; a ſtarre that guided the wiſe Chaldees to worſhip him with gifts (as the ſame diſciple of Plato does affirm, and) as the holy Scriptures deliver; and this ſtarre could be no ſecret; It troubled all the Country; It put Herod upon ſtrange arts of ſecurity for his Kingdome, it effected a ſad tragedy accidentally, for it occaſioned the death of all the little Babes in the City, and voiſinage of Bethlehem: But the birth of this young child which was thus glorified by a ſtarre, was alſo ſignified by an Angel, and was effected by the holy Spirit of God, in a manner which was in it ſelf ſupernatural; a Virgin was his Mother, and God was his Father, and his beginning was miraculous; and this matter of his birth of a Virgin was proved to an intereſted and jealous perſon, even to Joſeph the ſuppoſed father of Jeſus, it was affirmed publickly by all his family, and by all his diſciples, and publiſhed in the middeſt of all his enemies, who by no artifice could reprove it, a matter ſo famous, that when it was urged as an argument to prove Jeſus to be the Meſſias, by the force of a Prophecie in Iſaiah [A Virgin ſhall conceive a Son] they who obſtinately refuſed to admit him, did not deny the matter of fact, but denied that it was ſo meant by the Prophet, which if it were true, can onely prove that Jeſus was more excellent then was foretold by the Prophets, but that there was nothing leſs in him then was to be in the Meſſias; it was a matter ſo famous that the Arabian Phyſicians who can affirm no ſuch things of their Mahomet, and yet not being able to deny it to be true of the holy Jeſus, endevour to elevate and leſſen the thing, by ſaying, It is not wholly beyond the force of nature, that a Virgin ſhould conceive, ſo that it was on all hands undeniable, that the Mother of Jeſus was a Virgin, a Mother without a Man. This is that Jeſus at whoſe preſence before he was born, a babe in his mothers belly alſo did leap for joy, who was alſo a perſon extraordinary himſelf, conceived in his mothers old age, after a long barrenneſs, ſignified by an Angel in the Temple, to his father officiating his Prieſtly Office, who was alſo ſtruck dumb for his not preſent beleeving: all the people ſaw it, and all his kindred were witneſſes of his reſtitution, and he was named by the Angel, and his Office declared to be the fore-runner of the holy Jeſus; and this alſo was foretold by one of the old Prophets; for the whole ſtory of this Divine perſon is a chain of providence and wonder, every link of which is a verification of a Prophecie, and all of it is that thing which from Adam to the birth of Jeſus was pointed at and hinted by all the Prophets, whoſe words in him paſſed perfectly into the event. This is that Jeſus who as he was born without a Father, ſo he was learned without a Maſter, he was a Man without age, a Doctor in a Childs garment, diſputing in the Sanctuary at 12. years old. He was a ſojourner in Egypt, becauſe the poor Babe born of an indigent Mother was a formidable rival to a potent King, and this fear could not come from the deſign of the infant, but muſt needs ariſe from the illuſtrioufneſs of the birth, and the Prophecies of the child, and the ſayings of the learned, and the journey of the Wiſe men, and the decrees of God; this journey and the return were both managed by the conduct of an Angel and a Divine dream, for to the Son of God all the Angels did rejoyce to miniſter. This bleſſed Perſon made thus excellent by his Father, and glorious by miraculous conſignations, and illuſtrious by the miniſtery of heavenly ſpirits, and proclaimed to Mary and to Joſeph by two Angels, to the Shepherds by a multitude of the heavenly Hoſt, to the Wiſe men by a Prophecie and by a Star, to the Jews by the Shepherds, to the Gentiles by the three Wiſe men, to Herod by the Doctors of the Law, and to himſelf perfectly known by the inchaſing his humane nature in the boſome and heart of God, and by the fulneſs of the Spirit of God, was yet pleaſed for 30. years together to live an humble, a laborious, a chaſt and a devout, a regular and an even, a wiſe and an exemplar, a pious and an obſcure life, without complaint, without ſin, without deſign of fame, or grandeur of ſpirit, till the time came that the clefts of the rock were to open, and the Diamond give its luſtre, and be worn in the Diademes of Kings, and then this perſon was wholly admirable; for he was uſhered into the world by the voice of a loud Crier in the wilderneſs, a perſon auſtere and wiſe, of a ſtrange life, full of holineſs and full of hardneſs, and a great Preacher of righteouſneſs, a man beleeved by all the people that he came from God, one who in his own nation gathered diſciples publickly, and (which amongſt them was a great matter) he was the Doctor of a new institution, and baptized all the Country, yet this man so great, so rever'd, so followed, so listned to by King and people, by Doctors and by ideots, by Pharisees and Sadduces, this man Preached Jesus to the people, pointed out the Lamb of God, told that he must increase, and himself from all that fame must retire to give him place; he received him to baptism after having with duty and modesty declared his own unworthiness to give, but rather a worthiness to receive baptism from the holy hands of Jesus; but at the solemnity God sent down the holy Spirit upon his holy Son, and by a voice from heaven, a voice of thunder (and God was in that voice) declared that this was his Son, and that he was delighted in him. This voyce from heaven was such, so evident, so certain a conviction of what it did intend to prove, so known and accepted as the way of Divine revelation under the second Temple, that at that time every man that desired a sign honestly, would have been satisfied with such a voyce; it being the testimony by which God made all extraordinaries to be credible to his people from the days of Ezra, to the death of the Nation; and that there was such a voice, not onely then, but divers times after, was as certain, and made as evident as things of that nature can ordinarily be made. For it being a matter of fact, cannot be supposed infinite, but limited to time and place, heard by a certain number of persons, and was as a clap of thunder upon ordinary accounts, which could be heard but by those who were within the sphere of its own activity; and reported by those to others, who are to give testimony as testimonies are required, which are credible under the test of two or three disinteressted, honest, and true men, and though this was done in the presence of more, and oftner then once, yet it was a divine testimony but at first, but is to be conveyed by the means of men; and as God thundred from heaven at the giving of the Law, though that he did so, we have notice onely from the Books of Moses received from the Jewish Nation; so he did in the days of the Baptist, and so he did to Peter, James, and John, and so he did in the presence of the Pharisees and many of the common people; and as it is not to be supposed that all these would joyn their divided interests, for and against themselves for the verification of a lye, so if they would have done it, they could not have done it without reproof of their own parties, who would have been glad by the discovery onely to disgrace the whole story; but if the report of honest and just men so reputed, may be questioned for matter of fact, or may not be accounted sufficient to make faith when there is no pretence of men to the contrary, besides that we can have no story transmitted to us, no records kept, no acts of Courts, no narratives of the days of old, no traditions of our Fathers; so there could not be left in nature any usual instrument whereby God could after the manner of men declare his own will to us, but either we should never know the will of heaven upon earth, or it must be that God must not onely tell it once but always, and not onely always to some men, but always to all men; and then as there would be no use of history, or the honesty of men, and their faithfulness in telling any act of God in declaration of his will, so there would be perpetual necessity of miracles, and we could not serve God directly with our understanding, for there would be no such thing as faith, that is, of assent without conviction of understanding, and we could not please God with beleeving, because there would be in it nothing of the will, nothing of love and choyce; and that faith which is, would be like that of Thomas, to beleeve what we see or hear, and God should not at all govern upon earth unless he did continually come himself: for thus, all Government, all Teachers, all Apostles, all Messengers would be needless, because they could not shew to the eye what they told to the ears of men; And it might as well be disbeleeved in all Courts and by all Princes, that this was not the letter of a Prince, or the act of a man, or the writing of his hand, and so all humane entercourse must cease, and all senses but the eye be useless as to this affair, or else to the ear all voyces must be strangers but the principal, if I say, no reports shall make faith: But it is certain, that when these voyces were sent from heaven and heard upon earth they prevailed amongst many that heard them not, and disciples were multiplied upon such accounts, or else it must be that none that did hear them could be beleeved by any of their friends and neighbours; for if they were, the voyce was as effective at the reflex and rebound as in the direct emission, and could prevail with them that beleeved their brother or their friend, as certainly as with them that beleeved their own ears and eyes.

14. I need not speak of the vast numbers of miracles which he wrought; miracles which were not more demonstrations of his power then of his mercy; for they had nothing of pompousness and ostentation, but infinitely of charity and mercy, and that permanent and lasting and often: he opened the eyes of the blinde, he made the crooked straight, he made the weak strong, he cured fevers with the touch of his hand, and an issue of blood with the hem of his garment, and sore eyes with the spittle of his mouth and the clay of the earth; he multiplied the loaves and fishes, he raised the dead to life, a young maiden, the widows son of Naim, and Lazarus, and cast out Devils by the word of his mouth, which he could never doe but by the power of God. For Satan does not cast out Satan, nor a house fight against it self, if it means to stand long, and the Devil could not help Jesus, because the holy Jesus taught men virtue, called them from the worshipping Devils, taught them to resist the Devil, to lay aside all those abominable idolatries by which the Devil doth rule in the hearts of men: he taught men to love God, to fly from temptations to sin, to hate and avoid all those things of which the Devil is guilty, for Christianity forbids pride, envy, malice, lying, and yet affirms that the Devil is proud, envious, malicious, and the Father of lies; and therefore where ever Christianity prevails, the Devil is not worshipped, and therefore he that can think that a man without the power of God could overturn the Devils principles, cross his designs, weaken his strengths, baffle him in his policies, befool him and turn him out of possession,& make him open his own mouth against himself as he did often, and confess himself conquered by Jesus and tormented, as the Oracle did to Augustus Cæsar, and the Devil to Jesus himself, he I say, that thinks a meer man can doe this, knows not the weaknesses of a man, nor the power of an Angel; but he that thinks this could be done by compact, and by consent of the Devil, must think him to be an Intelligence without understanding, a power without force, a fool and a sot to assist a power against himself, and to persecute the power he did assist, to stirre up the world to destroy the Christians, whose Master and Lord he did assist to destroy himself; and when we read that Porphyrius an Heathen, a professed enemy to Christianity, did say, Ἰησοῦ πεφημίσθαι τὰς θεῶν δημοσίας ὠφελείας οὐκ ἠθέλειν, that since Jesus was worshipped, the gods could help no man, that is, the gods which they worshipped; the poor baffled enervated Dæmons: He must either think that the Devils are as foolish as they are weak, or else that they did nothing towards this declination of their power; and therefore that they suffer it by a power higher then themselves, that is, by the power of God in the hand of Jesus.

Euseb. lib. 5. c. 1. præp. Evang.

15. But besides that God gave testimony from heaven concerning him; he also alſo gave this teſtimony of himſelf to have come from God, becauſe that he did Gods will; for he that is a good man and lives by the Laws of God and of his Nation, a life innocent and ſimple, prudent and wiſe, holy and ſpotleſs, unreproved and unſuſpected, he is certainly by all wiſe men ſaid in a good ſenſe to be the ſon of God, but he who does well and ſpeaks well, and calls all men to glorify and ſerve God, and ſerves no ends but of holineſs and charity, of wiſdome of hearts and reformation of manners, this man carries great authority in his ſayings, and ought to prevail with good men in good things, for good ends, which is all that is here required. But his nature was ſo ſweet, his manners ſo humble, his words ſo wiſe and compoſed, his comportment ſo grave and winning, his anſwers ſo ſeaſonable, his queſtions ſo deep, his reproof ſo ſevere and charitable, his pity ſo great and merciful, his preachings ſo full of reaſon and holineſs, of weight and authority, his converſation ſo uſeful and beneficent, his poverty great but his alms frequent, his family ſo holy and religious, his and their imployment ſo profitable, his meekneſs ſo incomparable, his paſſions without difference, ſave onely where zeal or pity carried him on to worthy and apt expreſſions a perſon that never laughed, but often wept in a ſenſe of the calamities of others; he loved every man and hated no man, he gave counſel to the doubtful, and inſtructed the ignorant, he bound up the broken hearts, and ſtrengthened the feeble knees, he releeved the poor, and converted the ſinners, he deſpiſed none that came to him for relief, and as for thoſe that did not he went to them; he took all occaſions of mercy that were offered him, and went abroad for more; he ſpent his days in Preaching and healing, and his nights in Prayers and converſation with God, he was obedient to Laws and ſubject to Princes, though he was the Prince of Judea in right of his Mother, and of all the world in right of his Father; the people followed him, but he made no conventions, and when they were made, he ſuffered no tumults, when they would have made him a King he withdrew himſelf, when he knew they would put him to death he offered himſelf; he knew mens hearts, and converſed ſecretly, and gave anſwer to their thoughts and prevented their queſtions: he would work a miracle rather then give offence, and yet ſuffer every offence rather then ſee God his Father diſhonoured, he exactly kept the Law of Moſes, to which he came to put a period, and yet choſe to ſignify his purpoſe onely by doing acts of mercy upon their Sabbath, doing nothing which they could call a breach of a Commandement, but healing ſick people, a charity which themſelves would doe to beaſts, and yet they were angry at him for doing it to their brethren: In all his life, and in all his converſation with his Nation, he was innocent as an Angel of light, and when by the greatneſs of his worth, and the ſeverity of his doctrine, and the charity of his miracles, and the noiſes of the people, and his immenſe fame in all that part of the world, and the multitude of his diſciples and the authority of his Sermons, and his free reproof of their hypocriſy, and his diſcovery of their falſe doctrines and weak traditions, he had branded the reputation of the vicious rulers of the people, and they reſolved to put him to death, they who had the biggeſt malice in the world, and the weakeſt accuſations were forced to ſupply their want of articles againſt him by making truth to be his fault; and his office to be his crime, and his open confeſſion of what was asked him to be his article of condemnation, and yet after all this they could not perſwade the competent Judge to condemne him, or to finde him guilty of any fault, and therefore they were forced to threaten him with Cæſars name, againſt whom then they would pretend him to be an enemy, though in their charge they neither proved, nor indeed deed laid it againſt him, and yet to whatſoever they objected he made no return, but his ſilence and his innocence were remarkable and evident, without labour and reply, and needed no more argument then the Sun needs an advocate to prove that he is the brighteſt ſtarre in the firmament.

16. Well, ſo it was, they crucified him, and when they did they did as much put out the eye of heaven as deſtroy the Son of God; for when with an incomparable ſweetneſs, and a patience exemplar to all ages of ſufferers, he endured affronts, examinations, ſcorns, inſolencies of rude ungentle Tradeſmen, cruel whippings, injurious, unjuſt and unreaſonable uſages from thoſe whom he obliged by all the arts of endearment and offers of the biggeſt kindneſs, at laſt he went to death as to the work which God appointed him that he might become the worlds ſacrifice, and the great example of holineſs, and the inſtance of repreſenting by what way the world was to be made happy [even by ſufferings and ſo entring into heaven] that he might (I ſay) become the Saviour of his Enemies, and the elder Brother to his friends, and the Lord of Glory, and the fountain of its emanation. Then it was that God gave new teſtimonies from heaven; The Sun was eclipſed all the while he was upon the Croſs, and yet the Moon was in the full; that is, he loſt his light, not becauſe any thing in nature did inveſt him, but becauſe the God of nature (as a Heathen at that very time confeſſed, who yet ſaw nothing of this ſad iniquity) did ſuffer. The rocks did rend, the veil of the Temple divided of it ſelf and opened the incloſures, and diſparked the Sanctuary, and made it pervious to the Gentiles eye; the dead aroſe, and appeared in Jeruſalem to their friends, the Centurion and divers of the people ſmote their hearts, and were by theſe ſtrange indications convinced that he was the Son of God. His garments were parted, and lots caſt upon his inward coat, they gave him vinegar and gall to drink, they brake not a bone of him, but they pierced his ſide with a ſpear, looking upon him whom they had pierced; according to the Prophecies of him, which were ſo clear and deſcended to minutes and circumſtances of his paſſion, that there was nothing left by which they could doubt whether this were he or no who was to come into the world: But after all this, that all might be finally verified and no ſcruple left, after three days burial, a great ſtone being rolled to the face of the grave, and the ſtone ſealed, and a guard of Souldiers placed about it, he aroſe from the grave, and for forty days together converſed with his followers and Diſciples, and beyond all ſuſpicion was ſeen of 500. Brethren at once, which is a number too great to give their conſent and teſtimony to a lye, and it being ſo publickly and confidently affirmed at the very time it was done, and for ever after urged by all Chriſtians, uſed as the moſt mighty demonſtration, proclaimed, preached, talked of, even upbraided to the gainſayers, affirmed by eye-witneſſes, perſwaded to the kinred and friends and the relatives and companions of all thoſe 500. perſons who were eye-witneſſes, it is infinitely removed from a reaſonable ſuſpicion; and at the end of thoſe days was taken up into heaven in the ſight of many of them, as Elias was in the preſence of Eliſha.

17. Now he of whom all theſe things are true, muſt needs be more then a meer man, and that they were true was affirmed by very many eye-witneſſes, men who were innocent, plain men, men that had no bad ends to ſerve, men that looked for no preferment by the thing in this life; men to whom their Maſter told they were to expect not Crowns and Scepters, not praiſe of men or wealthy poſſeſſions, not power and eaſe, but a voluntary caſting away care and

and attendance upon secular affairs that they might attend their Ministery; poverty and prisons, trouble and vexation persecution and labour, whippings and banishment, bonds and death, and for a reward they must stay till a good day came, but that was not to be at all in this world; and when the day of restitution and recompence should come, they should never know till it came, but upon the hope of this and the faith of Jesus, and the word of God so taught, so consigned, they must rely wholly and for ever. Now let it be considered how could matters of fact be proved better? and how could this be any thing, but such as to rely upon matters of fact? what greater certainty can we have of any thing that was ever done which we saw not, or heard not, but by the report of wise and honest persons? especially since they were such whose life and breeding was so far from ambition and pompousness that as they could not naturally and reasonably hope for any great number of Proselytes, so the same that could be hop'd for amongst them, as it must be a matter of their own procuring, and consequently uncertain, so it must needs be very inconsiderable, not fit to outweigh the danger and the loss, nor yet at all valuable by them whose education and pretences were against it? These we have plentifully. But if these men are numerous and united, it is more. Then we have more; For so many did affirm these things which they saw and heard, that thousands of people were convinced of the truth of them: But then if these men offer their oath, it is yet more, but yet not so much as we have, for they sealed those things with their blood; they gave their life for a testimony; and what reward can any man expect, if he gives his life for a lye? who shall make him recompence, or what can tempt him to doe it knowingly? but after all, it is to be remembred, that as God hates lying, so he hates incredulity; as we must not beleeve a lye, so neither stop up our eyes and ears against truth; and what we doe every minute of our lives in matters of little and of great concernment, if we refuse to doe in our Religion which yet is to be conducted as other humane affairs are, by humane instruments and arguments of perswasion proper to the nature of the thing, it is an obstinacy that is as contrary to humane reason as it is to Divine faith.

18. These things relate to the person of the holy Jesus, and prove sufficiently that it was extraordinary, that it was divine, that God was with him, that his power wrought in him; and therefore that it was his will which Jesus taught, and God signed. But then if nothing of all this had been, yet even the doctrine it self proves it self Divine and to come from God.

19. For it is a Doctrine perfective of humane nature, that teaches us to love God and to love one another, to hurt no man, and to doe good to every man, it propines to us the noblest, the highest, and the bravest pleasures of the world; the joys of charity, the rest of innocence, the peace of quiet spirits, the wealth of beneficence, and forbids us onely to be beasts and to be Devils, it allows all that God and nature intended, and onely restrains the excrescencies of nature, and forbids us to take pleasure in that which is the onely entertainment of Devils, in murders and revenges, malice and spiteful words and actions; it permits corporal pleasures where they can best minister to health and societies, to conservation of families and honour of Communities, it teaches men to keep their words that themselves may be secured in all their just interests, and to doe good to others that good may be done to them; it forbids biting one another that we may not be devoured by one another; and commands obedience to superiours, that we may not be ruined in confusions; it combines bines Governments, and confirms all good Laws, and makes peace, and oppoſes and prevents warres where they are not juſt, and where they are not neceſſary. It is a Religion that is life and ſpirit, not conſiſting in ceremonies and external amuſements, but in the ſervices of the heart, and the real fruit of lips and hands, that is, of good words and good deeds, it bids us to doe that to God which is agreeable to his excellencies, that is, worſhip him with the beſt thing we have, and make all things elſe miniſter to it; it bids us doe that to our neighbour, by which he may be better: it is the perfection of the natural Law, and agreeable to our natural neceſſities, and promotes our natural ends and deſigns: it does not deſtroy reaſon, but inſtructs it in very many things, and complies with it in all, it hath in it both heat and light, and is not more effectual then it is beauteous; it promiſes every thing that we can deſire, and yet promiſes nothing but what it does effect; it proclaims warre againſt all vices, and generally does command every vertue; it teaches us with eaſe to mortify thoſe affections which reaſon durſt ſcarce reprove, becauſe ſhe hath not ſtrength enough to conquer, and it does create in us thoſe vertues which reaſon of her ſelf never knew, and after they are known, could never approve ſufficiently: it is a doctrine in which nothing is ſuperfluous or burdenſome, nor yet is there any thing wanting which can procure happineſs to mankinde, or by which God can be glorified: and if wiſdome, and mercy, and juſtice, and ſimplicity, and holineſs, and purity, and meekneſs, and contentedneſs, and charity, be images of God and rays of Divinity, then that Doctrine in which all theſe ſhine ſo glorioufly, and in which nothing elſe is ingredient muſt needs be from God; and that all this is true in the Doctrine of Jeſus needs no other probation but the reading the words.

20. For that the words of Jeſus are contained in the Goſpels, that is, in the writings of them, who were eye-witneſſes and ear-witneſſes of the actions and Sermons of Jeſus, is not at all to be doubted; for in every ſect we beleeve their own records of Doctrine and inſtitution; for it is madneſs to ſuppoſe the Chriſtians to pretend to be ſervants of the Laws of Jeſus, and yet to make a Law of their own which he made not: no man doubts but that the Alcoran is the Law of Mahomet, that the old Teſtament contains the Religion of the Jews; and the authority of theſe Books is proved by all the arguments of the Religion, for all the arguments perſwading to the Religion are intended to prove no other then is contained in thoſe Books; and theſe having been for 1500. years and more, received abſolutely by all Chriſtian aſſemblies, if any man ſhall offer to make a queſtion of their authority, he muſt declare his reaſons, for the diſciples of the Religion have ſufficient preſumption, ſecurity and poſſeſſion, till they can be reaſonably diſturb'd; but that now they can never be is infinitely certain, becauſe we have a long, immemorial, univerſal tradition that theſe Books were written in thoſe times, by thoſe men whoſe Names they bear, they were accepted by all Churches at the very firſt notice, except ſome few of the later, which were firſt received by ſome Churches, and then conſented to by all, they were acknowledged by the ſame, and by the next age for genuine, their authority publiſhed, their words cited, appeals made to them in all queſtions of Religion, becauſe it was known and confeſſed that they wrote nothing but that they knew, ſo that they were not deceived; and to ſay they would lie muſt be made to appear by ſomething extrinſecal to this inquiry, and was never ſo much as plauſibly pretended by any Adverſaries, and it being a matter of another mans will, muſt be declared by actions, or not at all. But beſides the men that wrote them were to be beleeved becauſe they did Miracles, they wrote Prophecies, which are verified by the

the event, persons were cured at their Sepulchres, a thing so famous that it was confessed even by the enemies of the Religion: and after all, that which the world ought to rely upon, is the wisdome and the providence and the goodness of God; all which it concerned to take care that the Religion, which himself so adorned and proved by miracles and mighty signs, should not be lost, nor any false writings be obtruded in stead of true, lest without our fault the will of God become impossible to be obeyed. But to return to the thing: All those excellent things which singly did make famous so many sects of Philosophers, and remarked so many Princes of their sects, all them united, and many more which their eyes ὄμματα νυκτερίδων dark and dim could not see, are heaped together in this systeme of wisdome and holiness. Here are plain precepts full of deepest mystery; here are the measures of holiness and approaches to God describ'd; obedience and conformity, mortification of the body, and elevations of the spirit, abstractions from earth, and Arts of society and union with heaven, degrees of excellencies, and tendences to perfection, imitations of God, and conversations with him; these are the heights and descents, upon the plain grounds of natural reason, and natural religion, for there is nothing commanded but what our reason by nature ought to choose, and yet nothing of natural reason taught but what is heightned and made more perfect by the Spirit of God; and when there is any thing in the Religion, that is against flesh and blood, it is onely when flesh and blood is against us, and against reason, when flesh and blood either would hinder us from great felicity, or bring us into great misery: To conclude, it is such a Law, that nothing can hinder men to receive and entertain, but a pertinacious baseness and love to vice, and none can receive it but those who resolve to be good and excellent; and if the holy Jesus had come into the world with less splendor of power and mighty demonstrations, yet even the excellency of what he taught, makes him alone fit to be the Master of the world.

21. But then let us consider what this excellent person did effect, and with what instruments he brought so great things to pass. He was to put a period to the Rites of Moses, and the Religion of the Temple, of which the Jews were zealous even unto pertinacy; to reform the manners of all mankinde, to confound the wisdome of the Greeks, to break in peeces the power of the Devil, to destroy the worship of all false Gods, to pull down their Oracles, and change their Laws, and by principles wise and holy to reform the false discourses of the world. But see what was to be taught, A Trinity in the Unity of the Godhead, τρία ἓν καὶ ἓν τρία, that is the Christian Arithmetick, Three are one and one are three, so Lucian in his Philopatris, or some other derides the Christian Doctrine; See their Philosophy, Ex nihilo nihil fit. No: Ex nihilo omnia, all things are made of nothing; and a Man-God and a God-Man, the same person finite and infinite, born in time, and yet from all eternity the Son of God, but yet born of a Woman, and she a Maid, but yet a Mother; resurrection of the dead, reunion of soul and body; this was part of the Christian Physicks or their natural Philosophy. But then certainly their moral was easy and delicious. It is so indeed, but not to flesh and blood, whose appetites it pretends to regulate or to destroy, to restrain or else to mortify: fasting and penance, and humility, loving our enemies, restitution of injuries, and self-denial, and taking up the Cross, and losing all our goods, and giving our life for Jesus: As the other was hard to beleeve, so this is as hard to doe. But for whom and under whose conduct was all this to be beleeved, and all this to be done, and all this to be suffered? surely for some glorious and mighty Prince, whose ſplendor as far outſhines the Romane Empire as the jewels of Cleopatra outſhined the ſwadling clothes of the Babe at Bethlehem. No it was not ſo neither. For all this was for Jeſus whom his followers preached; a poor Babe born in a ſtable, the ſon of a Carpenter, cradled in a cratch, ſwadled in poor clouts; it was for him whom they indeed call'd a God, but yet whom all the world knew, and they themſelves ſaid, was whip'd at a poſt, nailed to a Croſs; he fell under the malice of the Jews his Countrymen, and the power of his Romane Lords, a cheap and a pitiful ſacrifice without beauty and without ſplendor. The deſign is great, but does not yet ſeem poſſible; But therefore let us ſee what inſtruments the Holy Jeſus choſe to effect theſe ſo mighty changes, to perſwade ſo many propoſitions, to endear ſo great ſufferings, to overcome ſo great enemies, to maſter ſo many impoſſibilities which this Doctrine and this Law from this Maſter were ſure to meet withall.

22. Here, here it is that the Divinity of the power is proclaimed. When a man goes to warre he raiſes as great an Army as he can to out-number his Enemy, but when God fights, three hundred men that lap like a dogge are ſufficient; nay one word can diſſolve the greateſt army. He that means to effect any thing muſt have means of his own proportionable, and if they be not, he muſt fail, or derive them from the mighty. See then with what inſtruments the holy Jeſus ſets upon this great reformation of the world. Twelve men of obſcure and poor birth, of contemptible Trades and quality, without learning, without breeding; theſe men were ſent into the midſt of a knowing and wiſe world to diſpute with the moſt famous Philoſophers of Greece, to out-wit all the learning of Athens, to out-preach all the Roman Orators; to introduce into a newly ſetled Empire, which would be impatient of novelties and change, ſuch a change as muſt deſtroy all their Temples, or remove thence all their gods: againſt which change all the zeal of the world, and all the paſſions, and all the ſeeming pretences which they could make, muſt needs be violently oppoſed: a change that introduced new Laws, and cauſed them to reverſe the old, to change that Religion under which their Fathers long did proſper, and under which the Romane Empire obtained ſo great a grandeur, for a Religion which in appearance was ſilly and humble, meek and peaceable, not apt indeed to doe harm, but expoſing men to all the harm in the world, abating their courage, blunting their ſwords, teaching peace and unactiveneſs, and making the Souldiers arms in a manner uſeleſs, and untying their military girdle; a Religion which contradicted their reaſons of State, and erected new Judicatories, and made the Romane Courts to be ſilent and without cauſes; a Religion that gave countenance to the poor and pitiful (but in a time when riches were adored, & ambition eſteemed the greateſt nobleneſs, and pleaſure thought to be the chiefeſt good) it brought no peculiar bleſſing to the rich or mighty, unleſs they would become poor and humble in ſome reall ſenſe or other; a Religion that would change the face of things, and would alſo pierce into the ſecrets of the ſoul, and unravel all the intrigues of hearts, and reform all evil manners, and break vile habits into gentleneſs and counſel: that ſuch a Religion in ſuch a time, preached by ſuch mean perſons, ſhould triumph over the Philoſophy of the world, and the arguments of the ſubtle, and the Sermons of the eloquent, and the power of Princes, and the intereſt of States, and the inclinations of nature, and the blindneſs of zeal, and the force of cuſtome, and the pleaſures of ſin, and the buſie Arts of the Devil, that is, againſt wit, and power, and money, and Religion, and wilfulneſs, and fame, and Empire, which are all the things in the world that can make a thing impoſſible; this I ſay could not be by the proper force of ſuch inſtruments; for no man can ſpan heaven with an inſidus palm, nor govern wiſe Empires with Diagrams. It were impudence to ſend a footman to command Cæſar to lay down his arms, to diſband his legions, and throw himſelf into Tyber, or keep a Tavern next to Pompey Theatre; but if a ſober man ſhall ſtand alone unarm'd, undefended, or unprovided, and ſhall tell that he will make the Sun ſtand ſtill, or remove a mountain, or reduce Xerxes his Army to the ſcantling of a ſingle Troop, he that beleeves he will and can doe this, muſt beleeve he does it by a higher power than he can yet perceive, and ſo it was in the preſent tranſaction. For that the holy Jeſus made inviſible powers to doe him viſible honours, that his Apoſtles hunted the Demons from their Tripods, their Navels, their Dens, their hollow Pipes, their Temples, and their Altars, that he made the Oracles ſilent, as Lucian, Porphyrie, Celſus, and other Heathens confeſs; that againſt the order of new things, which let them be never ſo profitable or good doe yet ſuffer reproach and cannot prevail unleſs they commence in a time of advantage and favour, yet that this ſhould flouriſh like the Palm by preſſure, grow glorious by oppoſition, thrive by perſecution, and was demonſtrated by objections, argues a higher cauſe then the immediate inſtrument; now how this higher cauſe did intervene is viſible and notorious: The Apoſtles were not learned, but the holy Jeſus promiſed that he would ſend down wiſdome from above, from the Father of ſpirits; they had no power, but they ſhould be inveſted with power from on high. they were ignorant and timorous, but he would make them learned and confident, and ſo he did: he promiſed that in a few days he would ſend the holy Ghoſt upon them, and he did ſo, after ten days they felt and ſaw glorious immiſſion from heaven, lights of movable fire ſitting upon their heads, and that light did illuminate their hearts, and the mighty ruſhing winde inſpired them with a power of ſpeaking divers languages, and brought to their remembrances all that Jeſus did and taught, and made them wiſe to conduct ſouls, and bold to venture, and prudent to adviſe, and powerful to doe miracles, and witty to convince gainſayers, and hugely inſtructed in the Scriptures, and gave them the ſpirit of Government, and the ſpirit of Prophecy. This thing was ſo publick that at the firſt notice of it three thouſand ſouls were converted on that very day, at the very time when it was done; for it was certainly a viſible demonſtration of an inviſible power, that ignorant perſons who were never taught, ſhould in an inſtant ſpeak all the Languages of the Romane Empire; and indeed this thing was ſo neceſſary to be ſo, and ſo certain that it was ſo, ſo publick and ſo evident, and ſo reaſonable, and ſo uſeful, that it is not eaſy to ſay whether it was the indication of a greater power, or a greater wiſdome; and now the means was proportionable enough to the biggeſt end; without learning they could not confute the learned world; but therefore God became their Teacher: without power they could not break the Devils violence, but therefore God gave them power; without courage they could not conteſt againſt all the violence of the Jews and Gentiles; but therefore God was their ſtrength and gave them fortitude; without great caution and providence they could not avoid the traps of crafty Perſecutors, but therefore God gave them caution, and made them provident, and as Beſaleel and Aholiab received the ſpirit of God, the ſpirit of underſtanding to enable them to work excellently in the Tabernacle, ſo had the Apoſtles to make them wiſe for the work of God and the Miniſteries of this Diviner Tabernacle, which God pitched, not man. Immediately upon this, the Apoſtles to make a fulneſs of demonſtration and an undeniable conviction gave the ſpirit to others alſo, to Jews and Gentiles and to the men of Samaria, and they ſpake with Tongues and prophefied, then they preached to all Nations, and endured all perſecutions, and cured all diſeaſes, and raiſed the dead to life, and were brought before Tribunals, and confeſſed the Name of Jeſus, and convinced the blaſphemous Jews out of their own Prophets, and not onely prevailed upon women and weak men, but even upon the braveſt and wiſeſt. All the diſciples of John the Baptiſt, the Nazarens and Ebionites, Nicodemus and Joſeph of Arimathea, Sergius the Preſident, Dionyſius an Athenian Judge, and Polycarpus, Juſtinus and Irenæus, Athenagoras and Origen, Tertullian and Clemens of Alexandria, who could not be ſuch fools as upon a matter not certainly true but probably falſe, to unravel their former principles, and to change their liberty for a Priſon, wealth for poverty, honour for diſreputation, life for death, if by ſuch exchange they had not been ſecured of truth and holineſs and the will of God.

23. But above all theſe was Saul, a bold and a witty, a zealous and learned young man, who going with Letters to perſecute the Chriſtians of Damaſcus, was by a light from heaven called from his furious march, reproved by Gods Angel for perſecuting the cauſe of Jeſus, was ſent to the City, baptized by a Chriſtian Miniſter, inſtructed and ſent abroad, and he became the prodigy of the world for learning and zeal, for preaching and writing, for labour and ſufference, for government and wiſdome; he was admitted to ſee the holy Jeſus after the Lord was taken into heaven, he was taken up into Paradiſe, he converſed with Angels, he ſaw unſpeakable rayes of glory, and beſides that himſelf ſaid it, who had no reaſon to lie, who would get nothing by it here but a conjugation of troubles, and who ſhould get nothing by it hereafter if it were falſe; beſides this I ſay, that he did all thoſe acts of zeal and obedience for the promotion of the Religion does demonſtrate he had reaſon extraordinary for ſo ſudden a change, ſo ſtrange a labour, ſo frequent and incomparable ſufferings: and therefore as he did and ſuffered ſo much upon ſuch glorious motives, ſo he ſpared not to publiſh it to all the world, he ſpake it to Kings and Princes, he told it to the envious Jews; he had partners of his journey who were witneſſes of the miraculous accident, and in his publication he urged the notoriouſneſs of the fact, as a thing not feigned, not private, but done at noon day under the Teſt of competent perſons, and it was a thing that proved it ſelf, for it was effective of a preſent, a great, and a permanent change.

24. But now it is no new wonder but a purſuance of the ſame conjugation of great and Divine things, that the Fame and Religion of Jeſus was with ſo incredible a ſwiftneſs ſcattered over the face of the habitable world, from one end of the earth unto the other; it filled all Aſia immediately, it paſſed preſently to Europe, and to the furtheſt Africans, and all the way it went it told nothing but an holy and an humble ſtory, that he who came to bring it into the world, died an ignominious death, and yet this death did not take away their courage, but added much: for they could not fear death for that Maſter, whom they knew to have for their ſakes ſuffered death, and came to life again. But now infinite numbers of perſons of all ſexes, and all ages, and all Countries came in to the Holy Crucifix, and he that was crucified in the reign of Tiberius, was in the time of Nero, even in Rome it ſelf, and in Nero's family by many perſons eſteem'd for a God; and it was upon publick record that he was ſo acknowledged; and this was by a Chriſtian, Juſtin Martyr, urged to the Senate, and to the Emperours themſelves, who if it had been otherwiſe could eaſily have confuted the bold allegation of the Chriſtian, who yet did die for that Jeſus who was ſo ſpeedily reputed for a God; the Croſs was worn upon breſts, pri ted in the air, drawn upon fore-heads, carried on banners, put upon crowns Imperial; and yet the Christians were sought for to punishments, and exquisite punishments sought forth for them; their goods were confiscate, their names o ious, pr sons were their houses, and so many kinds of tortures invented for them that Domitius Ulpianus hath spent seven Books in describing the variety of tortures the poor Christian was put to at his first appearing. and yet in despite of all this, and ten thousand other objections and impossibilities, whatsoever was for them made the Religion grow, and whatsoever was against them made it grow; if they had peace, the Religion was prosperous, if they had persecution, it was still prosperous: if Princes favoured them the world came in because the Christians lived holily; if Princes were incensed, the world came in because the Christians died bravely. They sought for death with greedines, they desired to be grinded in the teeth of Lions, and with joy they beheld the wheels and the bended trees, the racks and the gibbets, the fires and the burning irons, which were like the chair of Elias to them, instruments to carry them to heaven, into the bosome of their beloved Jesus.

25. Who would not acknowledge the Divinity of this person, and the excellency of this institution, that should see infants to weary the hands of Hangmen for the testimony of Jesus? and wise men preach this doctrine for no other visible reward, but shame and death, poverty and banishment? and Hangmen converted by the blood of Martyrs springing upon their faces which their impious hands and cords have strained through their flesh? who would not have confessed the honour of Jesus, when he should see miracles done at the Tombs of Martyrs, and Devils tremble at the mention of the name of Jesus, and the world running to the honour of the poor Nazaren, and Kings and Queens kissing the feet of the poor servants of Jesus? Could a Jew Fisherman and a Publican effect all this for the son of a poor Maiden of Judæa? can we suppose all the world, or so great a part of mankinde can consent by chance, or suffer such changes for nothing? or for any thing less then this? The son of the poor Maiden was the son of God, and the Fishermen spake by a Divine spirit, and they catched the world with holines and miracles, with wisdome and power bigger then the strength of all the Roman Legions. And what can be added to all this, but this thing alone to prove the Divinity of Jesus? He is a God, or at least is taught by God who can foretel future contingencies; and so did the holy Jesus, and so did his Disciples.

26. Our blessed Lord while he was alive foretold that after his death his Religion should flourish more then when he was alive: He foretold Persecutions to his Disciples; he foretold the mission of the holy Ghost to be in a very few days after his Ascension, which within ten days came to pass; he prophesied that the fact of Mary Magdalen in anointing the head and feet of her Lord, should be publick and known as the Gospel it self, and spoken of in the same place; he foretold the destruction of Jerusalem and the signs of its approach, and that it should be by Warre, and particularly after the manner of Prophets symbolically, nam'd the Nation should doe it; pointing out the Roman Eagles, he foretold his death, and the manner of it, and plainly before-hand published his Resurrection, and told them it should be the sign to that generation, viz. the great argument to prove him to be the Christ, he prophesied that there should arise false Christs after him, and it came to pass to the extreme great calamity of the Nation; and lastly, he foretold that his beloved Disciple S. John should tarry upon the earth till his coming again, that is, to his coming to Judgement upon Jeruſalem; and that his Religion ſhould be preached to the Gentiles, that it ſhould be ſcattered over all the world, and be received by all Nations, that it ſhould ſtay upon the face of the earth till his laſt coming to judge all the world, and that the gates of hell ſhould not be able to prevail againſt his Church; which Prophecie is made good thus long, till this day, and is as a continual argument to juſtify the Divinity of the Author: The continuance of the Religion helps to continue it, for it proves that it came from God, who fore old that it ſhould continue; and therefore it muſt continue becauſe it came from God, and therefore it came from God becauſe it does and ſhall for ever continue according to the word of the holy Jeſus.

27. But after our bleſſed Lord was entred into glory, the diſciples alſo were Prophets; Agabus foretold the dearth that was to be in the Romane Empire in the days of Claudius Cæſar, and that S. Paul ſhould be bound at Jeruſalem; S. Paul foretold the entring in of Hereticks into Aſia after his departure; and he and S. Peter and S Jude and generally the reſt of the Apoſtles had two great predictions, which they uſed not onely as a verification of the doctrine of Jeſus, but as a means to ſtrengthen the hearts of the Diſciples who were ſo broken with perſecution: The one was, that there ſhould ariſe a Sect of vile men who ſhould be enemies to Religion and Government, and cauſe a great Apoſtacy, which happened notoriouſly in the Sect of the Gnoſticks, which thoſe three Apoſtles and S. John notoriouſly and plainly doe deſcribe: And the other was, that although the Jewiſh Nation did mightily oppoſe the Religion, it ſhould be but for a while, for they ſhould be deſtroyed in a ſhort time, and their Nation made extremely miſerable; but for the Chriſtians, if they would fly from Jeruſalem and goe to Pella, there ſhould not a hair of their head periſh: the verification of this Prophecie the Chriſtians extremely long'd for and wondred it ſtaid ſo long, and began to be troubled at the delay, and ſuſpected all was not well, when the great proof of their Religion was not verified; and while they were in thoughts of heart concerning it, the ſad Cataclyſis did come, and ſwept away 1100000. of the Nation and from that day forward the Nation was broken in peeces with intolerable calamities, they are ſcattered over the face of the earth, and are a vagabond Nation, but yet like oyle in a veſſel of wine, broken into bubbles but kept in their own circles, and they ſhall never be an united people till they are ſervants of the holy Jeſus; but ſhall remain without Prieſt or Temple, without Altar or Sacrifice, without City or Country, without the land of Promiſe, or the promiſe of a bleſſing, till our Jeſus is their high Prieſt and the Shepherd to gather them into his fold: And this very thing is a mighty demonſtration againſt the Jews by their own Prophets, for when Iſaiah and Jeremiah, and Malachi had Propheſied the rejection of the Jews and the calling of the Gentiles, and the change of the old Law, and the introduction of a new by the Meſſias, that this was he, was therefore certain, becauſe he taught the world a new Law, and preſently after the publication of this, the old was abrogate, and not onely went into deſuetude, but into a total abolition among all the world; and for thoſe of the remnant of the ſcattered Jews who obſtinately blaſpheme, the Law is become impoſſible to them, and they placed in ſuch circumſtances that they need not diſpute concerning its obligation; for it being external and corporal, ritual and at laſt made alſo local, when the circumſtances are impoſſible, the Law that was wholly ceremonial and circumſtantial muſt needs paſs away, and when they have loſt their Prieſthood, they cannot retain the Law, as no man takes care to have his beard ſhaved when his head is off.

28. And it is a wonder to conſider how the anger of God is gone out upon that miſerable people, and that ſo great a blindneſs is fallen upon them, it being evident and notorious, that the old Teſtament was nothing but a ſhadow and umbrage of the new, that the Prophecies of that are plainly verified in this; that all the predictions of the Meſſias are moſt undeniably accompliſhed in the perſon of Jeſus Chriſt, ſo that they cannot with any plauſibleneſs or colour be turned any other way, and be applied to any other perſon, although the Jews make illiterate allegations, and prodigious dreams, by which they have fool'd themſelves for 1600. years together, and ſtill hope without reaſon, and are confident without revelation, and purſue a ſhadow while they quit the glorious body; while in the mean time the Chriſtian prays for his converſion, and is at reſt in the truth of Jeſus, and hath certain unexpreſſible confidencies and internal lights, clarities of the holy Spirit of God, and loves to the holy Jeſus produc'd in his ſoul, that he will die when he cannot diſpute, and is ſatisfied and he knows not how, and is ſure by comforts, and comforted by the excellency of his beleef, which ſpeaks nothing but holineſs, and light and reaſon, and peace and ſatisfactions infinite, becauſe he is ſure that all the world can be happy if they would live by the Religion of Jeſus, and that neither ſocieties of men nor ſingle perſons can have felicity but by this, and that therefore God who ſo decrees to make men happy, hath alſo decreed that it ſhall for ever be upon the face of the earth, till the earth it ſelf ſhall be no more. Amen.

29. Now if againſt this vaſt heap of things any man ſhall but confront the pretences of any other Religion, and ſee how they fail both of reaſon and holineſs, of wonder and Divinity, how they enter by force, and are kept up by humane intereſts, how ignorant and unholy, how unlearned and pitiful are their pretences, the darkneſſes of theſe muſt adde great eminency to the brightneſs of that. For the Jews Religion which came from heaven is therefore not now to be practiſed, becauſe it did come from heaven, and was to expire into the Chriſtian, it being nothing but the image of this perfection; and the Jews needed no other argument but this, that God hath made theirs impoſſible now to be done, for he that ties to Ceremonies and outward uſages, Temples and Altars, Sacrifices and Prieſts, troubleſome and expenſive rites and figures of future ſignification, means that there ſhould be an abode and fixt dwelling, for theſe are not to be done by an ambulatory people; and therefore ſince God hath ſcattered the people into atomes and crumbs of ſociety, without Temple or Prieſt, without Sacrifice or Altar, without Urim or Thummim, without Prophet or Viſion, even communicating with them no way but by ordinary providence, it is but too evident, that God hath nothing to doe with them in the matter of that Religion, but that it is expired, and no way obligatory to them or pleaſing to him which is become impoſſible to be acted; whereas the Chriſtian Religion is as eternal as the ſoul of a man, and can no more ceaſe then our ſpirits can die, and can worſhip upon mountains and caves, in fields and Churches, in peace and warre, in ſolitude and ſociety, in perſecution and in Sun-ſhine, by night and by day, and be ſolemnized by Clergy and Laity in the eſſential parts of it, and is the perfection of the ſoul, and the higheſt reaſon of man, and the glorification of God.

30. But for the Heathen religions it is evidently to be ſeen, that they are nothing but an abuſe of the natural inclination which all men have to worſhip a God, whom becauſe they know not, they gueſs at in the dark; for that they know there is and ought to be ſomething that hath the care and providence of their

to Judgement upon Jeruſalem; and that his Religion ſhould be preached to the Gentiles, that it ſhould be ſcattered over all the world, and be received by all Nations, that it ſhould ſtay upon the face of the earth till his laſt coming to judge all the world, and that the gates of hell ſhould not be able to prevail againſt his Church; which Prophecie is made good thus long, till this day, and is as a continual argument to juſtify the Divinity of the Author: The continuance of the Religion helps to continue it, for it proves that it came from God, who fore old that it ſhould continue; and therefore it muſt continue becauſe it came from God, and therefore it came from God becauſe it does and ſhall for ever continue according to the word of the holy Jeſus.

27. But after our bleſſed Lord was entred into glory, the diſciples alſo were Prophets; Agabus foretold the dearth that was to be in the Romane Empire in the days of Claudius Cæſar, and that S. Paul ſhould be bound at Jeruſalem; S. Paul foretold the entring in of Hereticks into Aſia after his departure; and he and S. Peter and S Jude and generally the reſt of the Apoſtles had two great predictions, which they uſed not onely as a verification of the doctrine of Jeſus, but as a means to ſtrengthen the hearts of the Diſciples who were ſo broken with perſecution: The one was, that there ſhould ariſe a Sect of vile men who ſhould be enemies to Religion and Government, and cauſe a great Apoſtacy, which happened notoriouſly in the Sect of the Gnoſticks, which thoſe three Apoſtles and S. John notoriouſly and plainly doe deſcribe: And the other was, that although the Jewiſh Nation did mightily oppoſe the Religion, it ſhould be but for a while, for they ſhould be deſtroyed in a ſhort time, and their Nation made extremely miſerable; but for the Chriſtians, if they would fly from Jeruſalem and goe to Pella, there ſhould not a hair of their head periſh: the verification of this Prophecie the Chriſtians extremely long'd for and wondred it ſtaid ſo long, and began to be troubled at the delay, and ſuſpected all was not well, when the great proof of their Religion was not verified; and while they were in thoughts of heart concerning it, the ſad Cataclyſis did come, and ſwept away 1100000. of the Nation and from that day forward the Nation was broken in peeces with intolerable calamities, they are ſcattered over the face of the earth, and are a vagabond Nation, but yet like oyle in a veſſel of wine, broken into bubbles but kept in their own circles, and they ſhall never be an united people till they are ſervants of the holy Jeſus; but ſhall remain without Prieſt or Temple, without Altar or Sacrifice, without City or Country, without the land of Promiſe, or the promiſe of a bleſſing, till our Jeſus is their high Prieſt and the Shepherd to gather them into his fold: And this very thing is a mighty demonſtration againſt the Jews by their own Prophets, for when Iſaiah and Jeremiah, and Malachi had Propheſied the rejection of the Jews and the calling of the Gentiles, and the change of the old Law, and the introduction of a new by the Meſſias, that this was he, was therefore certain, becauſe he taught the world a new Law. and preſently after the publication of this, the old was abrogate, and not onely went into deſuetude, but into a toral abolition among all the world; and for thoſe of the remnant of the ſcattered Jews who obſtinately blaſpheme, the Law is become impoſſible to them, and they placed in ſuch circumſtances that they need not diſpute concerning its obligation; for it being external and corporal, ritual and at laſt made alſo local, when the circumſtances are impoſſible, the Law that was wholly ceremonial and circumſtantial muſt needs paſs away, and when they have loſt their Prieſthood, they cannot retain the Law, as no man takes care to have his beard ſhaved when his head is off.

28. And it is a wonder to consider how the anger of God is gone out upon that miserable people, and that so great a blindness is fallen upon them, it being evident and notorious, that the old Testament was nothing but a shadow and umbrage of the new, that the Prophecies of that are plainly verified in this; that all the predictions of the Messias are most undeniably accomplished in the person of Jesus Christ, so that they cannot with any plausibleness or colour be turned any other way, and be applied to any other person, although the Jews make illiterate allegations, and prodigious dreams, by which they have fool'd themselves for 1600. years together, and still hope without reason, and are confident without revelation, and pursue a shadow while they quit the glorious body; while in the mean time the Christian prays for his conversion, and is at rest in the truth of Jesus, and hath certain unexpressible confidencies and internal lights, claritics of the holy Spirit of God, and loves to the holy Jesus produc'd in his soul, that he will die when he cannot dispute, and is satisfied and he knows not how, and is sure by comforts, and comforted by the excellency of his beleef, which speaks nothing but holiness, and light and reason, and peace and satisfactions infinite, because he is sure that all the world can be happy if they would live by the Religion of Jesus, and that neither societies of men nor single persons can have felicity but by this, and that therefore God who so decrees to make men happy, hath also decreed that it shall for ever be upon the face of the earth, till the earth it self shall be no more. Amen.

29. Now if against this vast heap of things any man shall but confront the pretences of any other Religion, and see how they fail both of reason and holiness, of wonder and Divinity, how they enter by force, and are kept up by humane interests, how ignorant and unholy, how unlearned and pitiful are their pretences, the darknesses of these must adde great eminency to the brightness of that. For the Jews Religion which came from heaven is therefore not now to be practised, because it did come from heaven, and was to expire into the Christian, it being nothing but the image of this perfection; and the Jews needed no other argument but this, that God hath made theirs impossible now to be done, for he that ties to Ceremonies and outward usages, Temples and Altars, Sacrifices and Priests, troublesome and expensive rites and figures of future signification, means that there should be an abode and fixt dwelling, for these are not to be done by an ambulatory people; and therefore since God hath scattered the people into atomes and crumbs of society, without Temple or Priest, without Sacrifice or Altar, without Urim or Thummim, without Prophet or Vision, even communicating with them no way but by ordinary providence, it is but too evident, that God hath nothing to doe with them in the matter of that Religion, but that it is expired, and no way obligatory to them or pleasing to him which is become impossible to be acted; whereas the Christian Religion is as eternal as the soul of a man, and can no more cease then our spirits can die, and can worship upon mountains and caves, in fields and Churches, in peace and warre, in solitude and society, in persecution and in Sun-shine, by night and by day, and be solemnized by Clergy and Laity in the essential parts of it, and is the perfection of the soul, and the highest reason of man, and the glorification of God.

30. But for the Heathen religions it is evidently to be seen, that they are nothing but an abuse of the natural inclination which all men have to worship a God, whom because they know not, they gues at in the dark; for that they know there is and ought to be something that hath the care and providence of their their affairs. But the body of their Religion is nothing but little arts of Governments, and ſtratagems of Princes and devices to ſecure the Government of new Uſurpers, or to make obedience to the Laws ſure, by being ſacred, and to make the yoke that was not natural, pleaſant by ſomething that is. But yet for the whole body of it who ſees not that their worſhippings could not be ſacred, becauſe they were done by ſomething that is impure, they appeaſed their gods with adulteries and impure mixtures, by ſuch things which Cato was aſhamed to ſee, by gluttonous eatings of fleſh, and impious drinkings, and they did litare in humano ſanguine, they ſacrificed men and women and children to their Demons, as is notorious in the rites of Bacchus Omeſta amongſt the Greeks, and of Jupiter, to whom a Greek and a Greekeſs, a Galatian and a Galateſs were yearly offered; in the anſwers of the Oracles to Calchas as appears in Homer and Virgil; who ſees not that crimes were warranted by the example of their immortal gods, and that what did diſhonour themſelves, they ſang to the honour of their gods, whom they affirmed to be paſſionate and proud, jealous and revengefull, amorous and luſtfull, fearfull and impatient, drunken and ſleepy, weary and wounded, that the Religions were made laſting by policy and force, by ignorance, and the force of cuſtome, by the preferring an inveterate error, and loving of a quiet and proſperous evil, by the arguments of pleaſure, and the correſpondencies of ſenſuality, by the fraud of Oracles, and the patronage of vices, and becauſe they feared every change as an Earthquake, as ſuppoſing overturnings of their old error to be the everſion of their well eſtabliſhed Governments: and it had been ordinarily impoſſible that ever Chriſtianity ſhould have entred, if the nature and excellency of it had not been ſuch as to enter like rain into a fleece of wooll, or the Sun into a window without noiſe or violence, without emotion and diſordering the political conſtitution, without cauſing trouble to any man but what his own ignorance or peeviſhneſs was pleaſed to ſpin out of his own bowels, but did eſtabliſh Governments, ſecure obedience, made the Laws firm, and the perſons of Princes to be ſacred; it did not oppoſe force by force, nor ſtrike Princes for Juſtice; it defended it ſelf againſt enemies by patience, and overcame them by kindneſs, it was the great inſtrument of God to demonſtrate his power in our weaknеſſes, and to doe good to Mankinde by the imitation of his excellent goodneſs.

31. Laſtly, he that conſiders concerning the Religion and perſon of Mahomet, that he was a vicious perſon, luſtful and tyrannical, that he propounded incredible and ridiculous propoſitions to his Diſciples, that it entred by the ſword, by blood and violence, by murder and robbery, that it propounds ſenſual rewards and allures to compliance by bribing our baſeſt luſts, that it conſerves it ſelf by the ſame means it entred; that it is unlearned and fooliſh, againſt reaſon, and the diſcourſes of all wiſe men, that it did no miracles and made falſe Prophecies: in ſhort, that in the perſon that founded it, in the article it perſwades in the manner of prevailing, in the reward it offers it is unholy and fooliſh and rude; it muſt needs appear to be void of all pretence, and that no man of reaſon can ever be fairly perſwaded by arguments, that it is the daughter of God and came down from heaven. Since therefore there is ſo nothing to be ſaid for any other Religion, and ſo very much for Chriſtianity, every one of whoſe pretences can be proved as well as the things themſelves doe require, and as all the world expects ſuch things ſhould be proved; it follows that the holy Jeſus is the Son of God, that his Religion is commanded by God, and is that way by which he will be worſhipped and honoured, red, and that there is no other name under heaven by which we can be saved, but onely by the name of the Lord Jesus. He that puts his soul upon this cannot perish neither can he be reproved who hath so much reason and argument for his Religion. Sit anima mea cum Christianis; I pray God my soul may be numbred amongst the Christians.

32. THIS Παρεργον I have here brought as an instance of moral demonstration, not onely to doe honour to my dearest Lord, by speaking true and great things of his Name, and indevouring to advance and establish his Kingdome, but to represent in order to the first intention, that a heap of probabilities may in some cases make a sure Conscience; for as Cicero says, Probabile id est, quod habet in se quandam similitudinem, sive id falsum est, sive verum. For probability is not in the thing properly, for every thing is true or false in it self, and even false things may have the face and the likeness of truth and cozen even wise persons. It was said of Bias in Diogenes Laertius, Orator summus & callidissimus, sed in bonam causam dicendi vim omnem exercuit, he could speak excellently, but then he spake best when he had an ill cause. This Lactantius calls argutam malitiam, a cunning and an eloquent malice. But then as falshood may put on the face of truth, so may truth also look like it self; and indeed every truth that men preach in Religion is at least probable, that is, there is so much to be said for it, that wise and good men may be perswaded into every truth; and the cause that it is onely probable is by reason of our want of knowledge of things; but if it so happen that there is much to be said for the truth, and little or nothing against it, then it is a moral demonstration, that is, it ought to perswade firmly, and upon it we may rest confidently.

33. This onely I am to admonish, that our assent in these cases is not to be greater then the force of the premises, and therefore the Church of Rome offering to prove all her Religion as it distinguishes from the other divisions of Christians, onely by some prudential motives, or probable inducements, and yet requiring that all her disciples should beleeve it with Divine and infallible faith, as certainly as we beleeve a Mathematical demonstration, does unjustly require brick where she gives no straw, and builds a tower upon a bulrush, and confesses that her interest is stronger then her argument, and that where by direct proof she cannot prevail, she by little arts would affright the understanding. For to give a perfect assent to probable inducements can neither be reasonable nor possible for considering persons, unless these conditions be in it.

The Requisites or Conditions of a Moral demonstration for the assuring our Conscience.

34. 1. That the thing be the most probable to us in our present condition: For there are summities and principalities of probation proportionable to the ages and capacities of men and women. A little thing determines a weak person; and children beleeve infinitely whatsoever is told to them by their Parents or Tutors, because they have nothing to contest against it. For in all probable discourses, there is an allay and abatement of perswasion by the opposition of argument to argument, but they who have nothing to oppose, and have no reason to suspect, must give themselves up wholly to it; and then every thing that comes is equally the highest, because it fully and finally must prevail. But then that which prevails in infancy seems childish and ridiculous in our youth and then we are concluded by ſome preſences and pretty umbrages of things, which for want of experiences we think very well of; and we can then doe no more; that is a demonſtration to us, which muſt determine us, and theſe little things muſt then doe it, becauſe ſomthing muſt be done, and we muſt doe it as wiſely as we may, but no man is bound to be wiſer then he can. As the thing ſeems, either in its own light or in our poſition, ſo we are to give our aſſent unto it.

35. 2. A heap of probable inducements ought to prevail, as being then a moral demonſtration when the thing is not capable of a natural; for then probabilities ought to prevail, when they are the beſt argument we have. For if any man ſhall argue thus: It is not probable that God would leave his Church without ſufficient means to end controverſies, and ſince a living infallible Judge is the moſt effective to this purpoſe, it is therefore to be preſumed and relied upon that God hath done ſo. This argument ought not to prevail as a moral demonſtration; for though there are ſome ſembiances and appearances of reaſon in it, Nihil enim eſt tam incredibile quod non dicendo fiat probabile, ſaid Cicero in his Paradoxes, there is nothing ſo incredible, but ſomething may be ſaid for it, and a witty man may make it plauſible, yet there are certainties againſt it. For God hath ſaid expreſly, that every man is a liar, and therefore we are commanded to call no man Maſter upon earth, and the nature of man is weak, and his underſtanding trifling, and every thing abuſes him, and every man that is wiſe ſees his own ignorance, and he that is not wiſe is eaſily deceived, and they who have pretended to be infallible have ſpoken pitiful things, and fallen into ſtrange errors, and cannot be guarded from ſhame without a whole legion of artifices and diſtinctions, and therefore it is certain that no man is infallible; and where the contrary is certain, the probable pretence is but a fallacy and an art of illuſion.

36. 3. There can be no moral demonſtration againſt the word of God, or divine revelation. He that ſhould flatter himſelf with thinking the pains of hell ſhall not be eternal, becauſe it is not agreeable to the goodneſs of God to inflict a never ceaſing pain for a ſudden and tranſient pleaſure, and that there can be no proportion between finite and infinite, and yet God who is the fountain of juſtice will obſerve proportions; (or if there could be ten thouſand more little things ſaid to perſwade a ſinning man into confidences of an end of torment) yet he would finde himſelf deceived, for all would be light when put into the ballance againſt theſe words of our bleſſed Saviour [Where the worm never dies, and the fire never goeth out.]

37. 4. Where there is great probability on both ſides, there neither of them can pretend to be a moral demonſtration, or directly to ſecure the conſcience: For contradictions can never be demonſtrated; and if one ſays true, the other is a fair pretender, but a foul deceiver; and therefore in this caſe the conſcience is to be ſecured indirectly and collaterally by the diligence of ſearch, the honeſty of its intention, the heartineſs of its aſſent, the infirmity of the ſearcher, and the unavoidableneſs of his miſtake.

38. 5. The certainty of a moral demonſtration muſt rely upon ſome certain rule, to which as to a centre, all the little and great probabilities like the lines of a circumference muſt turn; and when there is nothing in the matter of the queſtion, then the conſcience hath ἓν μέγα one great axiom to rely upon, and that is, that God is juſt, and God is good, and requires no greater probation then he hath enabled us to finde.

39. 6. In probable inducements, God requires onely ſuch an aſſent as can be effective of our duty and obedience, ſuch a one as we will rely upon to real events, ſuch as Merchants have when they venture their goods to Sea upon reaſonable hopes of becoming rich, or Armies fight battels in hope of victory, relying upon the ſtrength they have as probable to prevail; and if any article of our Religion be ſo proved to us as that we will reduce it to practice, own all its conſequences, live according to it, and in the purſuance of it hope for Gods mercy and acceptance, it is an aſſent as great as the thing will bear, and yet as much as our duty will require; for in theſe caſes no man is wiſe but he whoſe ears and heart is open to hear the inſtructions of any man who is wiſer and better then himſelf.

40. 7. Rules of prudence are never to be accepted againſt a rule of Logick, or Reaſon, and ſtrict diſcourſes. I remember that Bellarmine going to prove Purgatory from the words of our bleſſed Saviour, It ſhall not be forgiven him in this world, nor in the world to come; argues thus, If this ſhall not be forgiven in the world to come, then it implies that ſome ſins are there forgiven, and therefore there is a Purgatory; becauſe in heaven there are no ſins, and in hell there are none forgiven. This (ſays he) concludes not by the rule of Logicians, but it does by the rule of prudence. Now this to all wiſe men muſt needs appear to be an egregious prevarication even of common ſenſe; for if the rules of Logick be true, then it is not prudence, but imprudence that contradicts them, unleſs it be prudence to tell or to beleeve a lye. For the uſe of prudence is to draw from conjectures a ſafe and a wiſe concluſion when there are no certain rules to guide us. But againſt the certain rule it is folly that declares, not prudence; and beſides that this conjecture of Bellarmine is wholly againſt the deſign of Chriſt, who intended there onely to ſay, that the ſin againſt the holy Ghoſt ſhould never be pardoned; it fails alſo in the main inquiry, for although there are no ſins in heaven, and in hell none are forgiven, yet at the day of Judgement all the ſins of the penitent ſhall be forgiven and acquitted with a bleſſed ſentence: but beſides this, the manner of expreſſion is ſuch as may with prudence be expounded, and yet to no ſuch purpoſe as he dreams. For if I ſhould ſay, Ariſtobulus was taken away, that neither in this life, nor after his death, his eyes might ſee the deſtruction of the Temple, does it follow by the rule of prudence, therefore ſome people can ſee in their grave, or in the ſtate of ſeparation with their bodily eyes? But as to the main inquiry, what is to be the meaſure of prudence? For ſome confident people think themſelves very prudent, and that they ſay well and wiſely, when others wiſer then they know they talk like fools, and becauſe no eſtabliſhed reaſon can be contradicted by a prudent conjecture, it is certain that this prudence of Bellarmine was a hard ſhift to get an argument for nothing, and that no prudential motives are to be valued becauſe any man cals them ſo, but becauſe they doe rely upon ſome ſure foundation, and draw obſcure lines from a reſolved truth. For it is not a prudential motive, unleſs it can finally reſt upon reaſon, or revelation, or experience, or ſomething that is not contradicted by any thing ſurer then it ſelf.

Of two opinions equally probable, upon the account of their proper reaſons, one may be ſafer then another.

1. THat is more probable which hath fairer reaſons, that is more ſafe that is furtheſt diſtant from a ſin: and although this be always conſiderable in the matter of prudence, and in the whole conjunction of affairs, yet it is not always a proper ingredient in the queſtion. The Abbat of Lerins hath the Patronage of ſome Eccleſiaſtical preferments in the neighbourhood; He for affection preferres to one of them an ignorant and a vicious Clerk. But afterwards being troubled in conſcience inquires if he be not bound to reſtitution. He is anſwered, No; becauſe it is in the matter of diſtributive juſtice, which binds not to repair that which is paſt, any other ways but by repentance to God and proviſions for the future: yet he being perplexed, and unſatisfied, does reſtore ſo much fruits to the next worthy Incumbent, as the former unworthy Clerk did eat. This was the ſurer courſe, and it procured peace to him; but the contrary was the more probable anſwer. It is ſafer to reſtore all gains of Uſury; but it is more probable that a man is not oblig'd to it: In which caſes the advantage lies not on that ſide that is more probable, but on that which is more ſafe, as in theſe ſentences that oblige to reſtitution. For although either part avoids a formal ſin, yet the ſafer ſide alſo perſwades to an action that is materially good, ſuch as reſtitution is; but not to reſtore, although in theſe caſes it may be innocent, yet in no ſenſe can it of it ſelf be laudable.

2. To which alſo in theſe caſes it may be added, that on the ſafer ſide there is a phyſical, or natural and proper certainty that we ſin not: on the other, though there is a greater probability that there is no obligation, yet at moſt it can make but ſome degrees of moral certainty. But how farre this courſe is to be choſen and purſued, or how farre the other is to be preferr'd, will afterwards be diſputed.

An opinion that is ſpeculatively probable, is not always practically the ſame.

1. IN a right and ſure conſcience the ſpeculative and the practical judgement are always united, as I have before * explicated; but in opinions that are but probable the caſe is contrary. It is in ſpeculation probable, that it is lawful to baptize in the Name of the Lord Jeſus; but yet he that ſhall doe this practically, does improbably and unreaſonably. If the opinion of the Primitive Chriſtians had been probable that it is lawful to communicate infants, yet it were at no hand fitting to be done in the preſent conſtitution of affairs; and it were highly uſeful if men would conſider this effectually; and not from every tolerable opinion inſtantly run to an unreaſonable and intolerable practice.

* Lib. 2. Rule 2.

2. For a speculation considers the nature of things abstractedly from circumstances physically or metaphysically, and yet when it comes to be reduc'd to practice, what in the head was innocent will upon the hand become troublesome and criminal. If there were nothing in it but the disorder of the novelty or the disturbance of mens minds in a matter that is but probable, it were highly enough to reprove this folly. Every mans imperfect discourse or half reasons are neither fit to govern the actions of others or himself. * Suppose it probable (which the Greek Church beleeves) that the Consecration of the blessed Eucharist is not made by the words of institution, but by the prayers of the holy man that ministers, the Bishop or the Priest; yet when this is reduc'd to practice, and that a man shall omit the words of institution or consecration, his practice is more to be reproved then his opinion could be possibly allowed. * Some think Churches not to be more sacred then other places; what degree of probability soever this can have, yet it is a huge degree of folly to act this opinion, and to choose a Barn to pray in, when a Church may be had.

3. For there are in actions besides the proper ingredients of their intrinsecal lawfulness or consonancy to reason, a great many outsides and adherencies that are considerable beyond the speculation. The want of this consideration hath done much evil in many ages; and amongst us nothing hath been more usual then to dispute concerning a rite or Sacramental, or a constitution whether it be necessary, and whether the contrary be not lawful; and if it be found probably so as the inquirers would have it, immediately they reduc'd it to practice, and caused disorder and scandal, schism and uncharitableness amongst men, while they thought that Christian liberty could not be preserved in the understanding, unless they disorder all things by a practical conclusion. Videas quosdam quibus sua libertas non videtur consistere, nisi per esum carnium die Veneris in ejus possessionem venerint; Calvin complains with reason. It is a strange folly that men will not think they have possession of Christian liberty, unless they break all Laws and all customs, as if men could not prove things to be indifferent, and not obligatory, unless they certainly omit them. Christian liberty consists in the head, not in the hand; and when we know we are free from the bondage, we may yet doe the work; and when our gracious Lord hath knock'd our fetters off, we may yet think it too fit to doe what his Stewards command us in order to his services. It is free to us to eat or to abstain, to contain or to marry; but he that onely marries because he would triumph and brag of his freedome, may get an imperious Mistress instead of a gentle Master. By the Laws of Christian liberty indifferent things are permitted to my choyce, and I am not under their power; but no Christian liberty says that I am free from the power of a man, though I be from the power of the thing; and although in speculation, this last was sufficient to be considered, yet when the opinion comes to be reduc'd to practice, the other also ought to have been thought upon. And besides this, it is a strange pertness and boldness of spirit, so to trust every fancy of my own, as to put the greatest interest upon it; so to be in love with every opinion, and trifling conceit, as to value it beyond the peace of the Church, and the wiser Customes of the world, or the Laws and practices of a wise and well instructed community of men. Nothing can make recompence for a certain change but a certain truth, with apparent usefulness in order to charity, piety, or institution.

Lib. 3. c. 9. instit.

4. These instances are in the matter of Religion; it may also happen thus in the matter of justice. When Lamech perceiv'd something stirre in a bush, it was very probable it was a wild beaſt; but when he came to reduce his opinion to practice, he ſhot at it and kill'd a man. And in the matter of juſtice there is a proper reaſon for this rule: Becauſe in matters of right or wrong, poſſeſſion is not to be altered without certainty, and therefore neither can I ſeize upon my goods in another mans hand, unleſs I be ſure they are mine, though I were not otherwiſe reſtrain'd by humane Laws; neither may I expoſe any thing to danger, of which I am not certainly Maſter.

5. This alſo is with great caution to be obſerv'd in the matter of chaſtity. Although it may be true that in many caſes ſuch or ſuch aſpects or approximations may be lawful; that is, thoſe things ſo farre as they are conſidered have no diſſonancy from reaſon: yet he that ſhall reduce this opinion to practice muſt alſo remember that he is to deal with fleſh and blood, which will take fire, not onely from permiſſions, but from prohibitions and reſtraints, and will paſs inſtantly from lawful to unlawful: and although this may not be a ſin in conſideration and diſcourſe but is to be acquitted by the ſentence of the Schools and Pulpit, yet when it comes to be view'd and laid before the judgement in the Court of conſcience, and as it was cloth'd with circumſtances it will be found, that when it came to be practiſed, other parts or ſenſes were imployed which cannot make ſuch ſeparations, but doe ſomething elſe.

6. But if it be ask'd, To what purpoſe it can be that any man ſhould inquire of the lawfulneſs of ſuch actions which whether they be lawful or unlawful, yet may not be done? I anſwer, That the inquiry is neceſſary for the direct avoiding a ſin in the proper matter of the inſtance; For he that never inquires, ſins for want of inquiry, and deſpiſes his ſoul becauſe he takes no care that it be rightly informed; but if he inquires, and be anſwer'd that the opinion is falſe, or the action criminal, he finds by the anſwer that it was worth his pains to ask, becauſe by it he is taught to avoid a ſin: But then, beſides the queſtion of lawful or unlawful, there are further inquiries to be made concerning fitting and unfitting, offenſive, or complying, ſafe or dangerous, abſtractedly or in relation; for many things which are lawful in themſelves become very bad to him that does them, and to him that ſuffers them.

The greater probability deſtroys the leſs.

1. THat is, it is not lawful directly to chooſe an opinion that ſeems leſs probable, before that which is more probable; I ſay, directly; for if the leſs probable be more ſafe, it becomes accidentally more eligible; of which I have already * given account, and ſhall adde ſomething afterward*. But without this accident, the degrees of ſafety are left to follow the degrees of probability. For when the ſafety does not depend upon the matter, it muſt depend upon the reaſons of the inducement; and becauſe the ſafety muſt increaſe conſequently to the probability, it is againſt charity to omit that which is ſafer, and to chooſe that which is leſs ſafe.

* Note 2 of this 2. Rule 4.

2. For it is not in moral things as it is in natural; where a leſs ſweet is ſtill ſweet, though not ſo ſweet as that which is more: and the flowers of Trefoile are pleaſant, though honey be farre more pleaſant; and Phædon may be wiſe, though though he be not ſo wiſe as Plato: becauſe there are degrees of intenſion and remiſſion in theſe qualities: and if we look upon two probable propoſitions, and conſider them naturally, they are both conſonant to reaſon in their apparencies, though in ſeveral degrees. So that if Sempronius chooſe a leſs probable, before he hath learn'd what is more probable, he hath done well and ſafely. But when the two probables are compar'd, to reject that which is more probable is to doe 1. Unnaturally: 2. and Unreaſonably: 3. and Imprudently.

3. 1. Unnaturally.

In matters propoſed to the will, the will may chooſe a leſs good, and reject the greater; and though it is moſt commonly a great imperfection to doe ſo, yet it is many times innocent, becauſe it is in the choice of the will to which it is propounded, and no Commandement laid upon it. But in matters of opinion and intellectual notices, where there is no liberty, there is a neceſſity of following the natural proportions, that is, that the ſtronger efficient upon the ſame ſuſcipient ſhould produce the more certain and regular effect. To think or to opine is not free (ſaid Ariſtotle) and yet he that chooſes the leſs probable, omitting that which is more, makes the determination by his Will, not by his Underſtanding; and therefore it is not an honeſt act or judgement of Conſcience, but a production of the Will.

Lib. 2. de anima. text. 153.

4. 2. It is Unreaſonable. Becauſe in all thoſe degrees of reaſonableneſs in which the leſs probable is excelled by that which is more probable, a man does wholly proceed without and againſt that reaſon; and why does he chooſe the leſs probable? I doe not ask why he chooſes the leſs probable opinion, that I mean which is ſo in it ſelf; for he may doe that becauſe it ſeems more reaſonable, or he knows nothing elſe: but I ask why he proceeds according to a leſs probable conſcience? that is, why does he chooſe that which he beleeves to be leſs probable? for what reaſon does he chooſe that for which he hath the leaſt reaſon? If there be no reaſon to chooſe that rather then the other, then it is an unreaſonable thing to doe ſo. If there be a reaſon which is not in the other, or which is not excelled or equalled by it, then the caſe is altered, and this is not the leſs probable, but equally or more. But ſuppoſing it leſs probable, it is a contradiction to ſay a man can reaſonably chooſe it. For if he could, there muſt be ſome greater reaſon in that which hath leſs reaſon; ſomething there muſt be in it whereby it can be preferred, or be more eligible, which is directly againſt the ſuppoſition and ſtate of the queſtion. The unreaſonableneſs of this we may alſo perceive by the neceſſities of mankinde, which are ſerved by the more probable, and diſſerv'd by that which is leſs. For thus Judges are bound for the intereſt of all parties, and the reaſonableneſs of the thing to judge on that ſide where the ſentence is moſt probable: And the Phyſitian in preſcribing medicines muſt not chooſe that which he leaſt confides in, and reject that which he rather truſts. And why doe all the world in their Aſſemblies take that ſentence which is choſen by the greater part? but becauſe that is preſumed more probable, and that which is ſo, ought to be followed; and why it ought not to be ſo in matters of our ſoul is not eaſily to be told, unleſs our conſcience may be governed by will rather then by reaſon, or that the intereſt of ſouls is wholly inconſiderable.

5. 3. It is alſo imprudent: A man that beleeves a leſs probable, is light of heart, he is incurious of his danger, and does not uſe thoſe means in order to his great end which himſelf judges the moſt reaſonable, effective, and expedient. He does as Rehoboam did, who rejected the wiſer counſel of the Seniors, and choſe the leſs likely ſentence of the young Gallants, and does againſt the advice of all thoſe rules which are preſcrib'd us in prudent choice; and if no man ever adviſed another to chooſe that which is leſs reaſonable, he that does ſo, does againſt the wiſdome and the intereſt of all the wiſe men in the world.

6. 4. After all this it is not honeſt to doe it. For in two probables onely one of them is true, and which that is, he can onely take the beſt way of the beſt reaſon to finde out; and it is impoſſible he ſhould beleeve that which to him ſeems leſs likely, to be the more likely; and therefore ſo farre as is in him he chooſes that which is falſe, and voluntarily abuſes his conſcience, which, beſides the folly of it, is alſo criminal and malicious.

7. This doctrine thus delivered was the opinion of the ancient Caſuiſts, Angelus, Sylveſter, Cordubenſis, Cajetan, and ſome others; but fiercely oppoſed by the later, who are bold and confident to ſay that their opinion is the common and more received, and it relies upon theſe reaſons;

8. 1. Becauſe if it were unlawful to follow the leſs probable and to leave the greater, it is becauſe there is danger in ſo doing, and no man ought to expoſe himſelf to a danger of ſinning: but this pretence is nothing; for by the conſent of all ſides it is lawful to follow the more probable though it be leſs ſafe; and therefore all danger of ſinning is not under pain of ſin to be avoided.

9. 2. The people are not tied to greater ſeverity in their practices, then the Doctors are in their Sermons and diſcourſes, nor yet ſo much; becauſe in theſe an error is an evil principle, and apt to be of miſchievous effect and diſſemination, whereas an error in practice, becauſe it is ſingular and circumſtantiate, is alſo perſonal and limited. But the Doctors may lawfully teach an opinion leſs probable if they be moved to it by the authority of ſome more eminent perſon.

10. 3. It is confeſſed to be lawful to follow the opinion that is more probable, but that it is lawful to leave the more probable and to follow the leſs (ſay they) is the more common and received opinion, and therefore alſo more probable; and therefore this opinion may be choſen and purſued, and then becauſe we may follow that opinion which is more probable, we may follow that which is leſs, becauſe it is more probable that we may.

Theſe Objections I anſwer:

11. 1. That the danger of ſinning is not the onely reaſon why we may not follow the leſs probable opinion; for it is not always unlawful to expoſe our ſelves to a danger of ſinning, for ſometimes it is neceſſary that we endure a noble trial, and reſiſt openly, and oppoſe an enemy, which cannot be done without danger, but is often without ſin; but to leave the more probable for the leſs is not onely a danger of ſinning, but a ſin directly, and beyond a danger; and if it were not more then a meer danger, it could not be a ſin. For beſides that this hath danger, it is a moſt unreaſonable, and a moſt unnatural thing, againſt the deſigns of God, and the proper effects of reaſon. But beſides, this way of arguing is neither good in Logick nor in Conſcience. He that can anſwer one of my arguments, does not preſently overthrow my propoſition; and it is not ſafe to venture upon an action, becauſe the contrary relies upon one weak legge. But then as to the inſtance in this argument, I anſwer, He that follows the more probable, though it be leſs ſafe, does not expoſe himſelf himſelf to any danger at all of ſinning, becauſe though he does not follow his greateſt fears, yet he follows his greateſt reaſon, and in that he is ſometimes ſafeſt though he perceives it not: However, there is in this caſe no danger that is imputable to the man that follows the beſt reaſon he hath. But this excuſes not him who follows that which ſeems to him to have in it leſs reaſon; for unleſs it be by ſome other intervening accident which may alter the caſe (of which I ſhall afterwards give account) the leſs probable opinion hath in it a direct danger, and therefore to chooſe it, is ordinarily againſt charity, and in ſome degree againſt conſcience it ſelf.

12. 2. To the ſecond I anſwer, That both Doctors and the People, though they may ſafely follow the leſs probable opinion, yet they may never directly follow a leſs probable Conſcience: that is, though a probable opinion is a ſufficient guide of conſcience, and it is ſufficient both for publication and for practice that it is ſo; and therefore that we are not ſtrictly tied to make a curious ſearch into the two probables which excels others in the degrees of reaſon, leſt there ſhould ariſe eternal ſcruples, perpetual reſtleſneſs and diſſatisfaction in the minds of men; yet when of two probables there is an actual perſwaſion that this is more, and that is leſs, neither may the Doctors teach, nor any man follow the leſs, becauſe here it is not the better opinion, but the better conſcience that is deſpiſed. It may happen that what I beleeve more probable, is indeed leſs; and therefore it muſt be admitted to be ſafe to follow the leſs probable opinion, if it happen to ſtand on the faireſt ſide of conſcience, that is, that it be better thought of then it deſerves; but for the ſame reaſon it is alſo certain that we muſt follow that which we think the more probable opinion, whether it be ſo or no, becauſe this is to be done, not for the opinion, but for conſcience ſake. And whereas it is ſaid in the Objection, that a Doctor may lawfully teach an opinion leſs probable, if he be mov'd to it by the authority of ſome more eminent perſon, that is as much as to ſay, when the opinion which intrinſecally, or at leaſt in his private judgement ſeems leſs probable, becomes extrinſecally the more probable, he may follow either, of which in this Chapter I am yet to give a more particular account; but it no way rifles the preſent doctrine. Onely this I adde, If it were lawful and ſafe to follow the leſs probable opinion, and reject the greater, then in ſuch queſtions which are onely determined by authority, and ſentences of wiſe men, it were lawful to chooſe any thing that any one of them permits, and every probable Doctor may reſcind all the Laws in Chriſtendome, and expound all the precepts of the Goſpel in eaſy ſenſes, and change diſcipline into liberty, and confound intereſts, and arm Rebels againſt their Princes, and flocks againſt their Shepherds and Prelates, and ſet up Altar againſt Altar, and mingle all things ſacred and profane. Becauſe if any one ſays it is lawful, all that have a minde to doe evil things may chooſe him for their guide, and his opinion for their warranty.

13. 3. To the third, I anſwer, that the opinion which is more common is not always the more probable, for it may be falſe and heretical; and if at any times it ſeems more probable, it is becauſe men underſtand little or nothing of it. But then if it were ſo, yet this opinion which is lately taught by the modern Caſuiſts, is not the more common, ſimply and abſolutely; it was once the leſs common, and whether it be ſo now or no, it is hard to tell; but admit it be ſo, yet the community and popularity of opinion is but a degree of extrinſecal probability, and is apt to perſwade onely in the deſtitution of other arguments, which becauſe they are not wanting in this queſtion, the trick in the objection appears trifling.

Rule 6.

When two opinions ſeem equally probable, the laſt determination is to be made by accidents, circumſtances, and collateral inducements.

1. IN the matter of this Rule it is variouſly diſputed; ſome affirming that the Underſtanding muſt for ever remain ſuſpended, and the action wholly omitted, as in the caſe of a doubting Conſcience. * Others give leave to chooſe either part, as a man pleaſe, making the Will to determine the Underſtanding.

2. The firſt cannot be true, becauſe while they both ſeem equally conſonant to reaſon, it cannot be diſhoneſt to chooſe that which to me ſeems reaſonable; and therefore the underſtanding may chooſe practically. They are like two things equally good, which alike move the Will, and the chooſing of the one is not a refuſing the other, when they cannot be both enjoyed: but like the taking one peece of gold, and letting the other that is as good alone: and the action is determined by its own exerciſe, not by an antecedent reaſon.

* But neither can it be in all caſes and queſtions that the determination can be totally omitted; as if the queſtion be whether this ought to be done, or ought to be let alone, and both of them ſeem equally probable; ſo alſo if the queſtion be whether it may be done or may be let alone: In theſe caſes it is certain one part muſt be choſen, for the very ſuſpending the act is not a ſuſpending of the choyce, the not doing it is a compliance with one of the probabilities. The lazy fellow in the apologue that told his Father he lay in bed in the morning, to hear labour and idleneſs diſpute whether it were beſt to riſe or to lie ſtill, though he thought their arguments equally probable, yet he did not ſuſpend his act, but without determining he put the ſentence of idleneſs in execution; and ſo it muſt be in all queſtions of general inquiry concerning lawful, or unlawful, neceſſary, or not neceſſary, the equal probability cannot inferre a ſuſpenſion or an equal non-compliance.

3. But neither can the ſecond be true; for the Will muſt not alone be admitted an arbitrator in this affair; for beſides that it is of dangerous conſequence to chooſe an opinion becauſe we will, it is alſo unnatural, the Will being no ingredient into the actions of underſtanding. The Will may cauſe the underſtanding to apply a general propoſition to a particular caſe, and produce a practical judgement by that general meaſure without particular arguments in the queſtion apportioned to the proper matter, as I before diſcourſed. But when the underſtanding is wholly at diſpute about the proper arguments of two propoſitions, if the will interpoſes, the error that happens, if the concluſion falls on the wrong ſide, is without excuſe, becauſe it is choſen; and the truth is not ſo ſafe and uſeful, becauſe it came by an incompetent inſtrument, by that which was indifferent to this truth or the other. Indeed if there be no other way to determine the queſtion, the Will muſt doe it, becauſe there is no avoiding it; but if there be any other way, this muſt not be taken; but ordinarily there is.

Cha 3 Rule 7.

4. The third way therefore is this; The determination may be made by any thing that can be added to either ſide in genere rationis. As the action that is prepar'd ſtands more ready for my circumſtances; that which does me leſs vioviolence, that which is more proportionable to any of thoſe events which in prudence are to me conſiderable. It is indifferent whether Paula Romana give her alms to the poor of Nicopolis, or to the poor dwelling near the Monaſtery of Bethlehem; but becauſe theſe dwelt nearer, and were more fitted for her circumſtances, this was enough to turn the ſcales and make the determination. It is like putting on that garment that is neareſt me, not this rather then the other; nor yet this becauſe I will, but this becauſe it is here. The uſe of this Rule is, to prevent a probable conſcience to become doubtful, and yet (as much as may be) to avoid the interpoſition of the Will in the practical judgements of Conſcience.

5. This Rule is to be enlarged with this addition; That if the conſcience by reaſon of the equal probability of two opinions ſo ſtanding without any determining and deciding circumſtances and accidents cannot decree on any ſide neither by intrinſecal nor extrinſecal means, that is, neither by proper arguments, nor collateral inducements, no action ought to follow, but the caſe of which the queſtion is, if it can be, ought to be omitted, as in the caſe of a doubting conſcience, which though as I ſhewed before, cannot happen when the queſtion is general of lawful or unlawful, neceſſary, or unneceſſary, yet it may happen in particular caſes, as whether this thing be lawful, or that, whether this is to be done, or the other. It may happen that neither of them ought, and in the preſent ſuppoſition neither of them can; that is, if the man ſuffers his diſpute to paſs into a doubt.

6. In other caſes a man may ſafely take any courſe which he finds probable, equally diſputed, uncertain in it ſelf, contrarily determined by Doctors diſputing with fair arguments. For in this caſe malice is no ingredient; and if intereſt be, it is therefore lawful, becauſe it is an extrinſecal motive, apt and reaſonable to be conſidered, and choſen, and purſued by fair means, if the intereſt it ſelf have no foulneſs in it.

7. But of all the external motives that can have influence in the determination of a ſentence between two probabilities, a relation to piety is the greateſt. He that chooſes this becauſe it is moſt pious, chooſes his opinion out of conſideration, and by the inducement of the love of God. That which cauſes more honour to God, that which happily ingages men in holy living, that which is the moſt charitable, and the moſt uſeful, that is to be preferred. But this is to be conducted with theſe cautions:

8. 1. That the diſpoſition to piety or charity be not made to conteſt an apparent truth. It is hugely charitable to ſome men, if it could be made true, to ſay that God is merciful to all ſinners and at all times; and it is ten thouſand pities to ſee a man made to deſpair upon his deathbed upon the conſideration of his paſt evil life; but this conſideration muſt not therefore be pretended againſt the indiſpenſable plain neceſſity of a holy life, ſince it is plainly revealed, that without the purſuing of peace with all men, and holineſs, no man ſhall ſee God.

9. 2. If both the probabilities be backed and ſeconded by their proper relations to piety, to take one of them is not a competent way to determine the probability; but it muſt be wholly conducted by the efficacy of its proper reaſons, or by ſome appendage in which one prevails above the other, when one opinion is valued becauſe it is apt to make men fear, and not to be preſumptuous; and another, becauſe it is apt to make men hope, and never to deſpair, the ballance is equal, and muſt be turned by neither of theſe. Scotus and Durandus, Gabriel and Almain, Medina and ſome few others taught, That the death of Chriſt did not make ſatisfaction to God for the ſins of the whole world, by the way of perfect and exact juſtice, but by Gods gracious acceptance of it, and ſtipulation for it. This opinion does indeed advance the honour of Gods mercy, but the contrary advances the dignity of Chriſts ſuffering; and therefore it muſt be diſputed and determined by ſome other inſtruments of perſwaſion. God the Father is on one ſide, and God the Son on the other, and though he who honours one, honours both, yet he that preferres one may ſeem alſo to diſparage both.

10. 3. The relation to piety, and the advantages which come to it by the opinion muſt not be phantaſtick, and relying upon a weak opinion and fond perſwaſion, but upon true reaſon, or real effects. It is a common opinion among the Ancients, that Anna the Mother of the bleſſed Virgin Mother of God had been married to three husbands ſucceſſively, and that the bleſſed Virgin was the ſecond wife of Joſeph; they who think that the ſecond and third marriages are leſs perfect then the firſt, think it more pious to embrace the other opinions, viz. that Anna was married to none but Joachim, and that Joſeph was onely married to the holy Virgin Mary: But becauſe this is to take meaſures of things which God hath not given us, and to reckon purities and impurities by their own fancies, not by reaſon and revelation from God, therefore this phantaſtick relation to piety is not weight enough to carry the queſtion along with it.

In other caſes the Rule holds: And by theſe meaſures our conſcience can be ſupported in a ſtorm, and be nouriſhed and feaſted every day, viz. if we take care;

1. That we avoid every thing that we know to be a ſin, whether it be reproached by its natural impurity and unreaſonableneſs, or without any note of turpitude it be directly reſtrained by a Law.

2. That we fly every appearance of evil, or likeneſs of ſin. 1 Theſſal. 4.22.

3. That we fly every occaſion, or danger of ſin. Matth. 26.58, 69, 70. and 1 Cor. 7.5.

4. That we avoid all ſociety, or communication with ſin, or giving countenance, and maintenance to it. By theſe meaſures and analogies if we limit our Caſes of Conſcience, we cannot be abuſed into danger and diſhonour.

Rule 7.

It is not lawful to change our practical ſentence about the ſame object, while the ſame probability remains.

1. A Man may change his opinion as he ſees cauſe, or alter the practice upon a new emergent reaſon; but when all things are equal without and within, a change is not to be made by the man, except it be in ſuch caſes in which no law, or vow, or duty, or the intereſt of a third is concerned; that is, unleſs the actions be indifferent in themſelves, or innocent in their circumſtances, and ſo not properly conſiderable in the fears of conſcience, in which caſes a mans liberty is not to be prejudiced.

This

2. This ſtating of the Rule does intimate the proper reaſons of it, as appears in the following inſtances; Juan a Prieſt of Meſsina having faſted upon the Veſpers of a Holy day, towards the middle of the night hath a great deſire to eat fleſh; he dwelling by the great Church, obſerved that the Clocks in the Neighbourhood differed half an hour: He watches the firſt Clock that ſtruck midnight, and as ſoon as it had ſounded, he eat his meat, becauſe then he concluded that the Eccleſiaſtical faſting day was expired, and that therefore it was then lawful by the Laws of his Church to eat fleſh. But being to conſecrate the bleſſed Euchariſt the next morning, and obliged to a natural faſt before the celebration of the holy Sacrament, he chang'd his computation, and reckon'd the day to begin by the later Clock; ſo that the firſt day ended half an hour before the next day began, and he broke his faſt becauſe the Eve was paſt, and yet he accounted that he was faſting, becauſe the Holy day was not begun. This was to cozen the Law, and if it be tranſlated to more material inſtances, the evil of it will be more apparent, but in this, the unreaſonableneſs is as viſible. * The like is the caſe of a Gentleman living in the Neighbourhood of Rome. Baptiſta Colonna happened to be in Rome on the three and twentieth of Auguſt, which is uſually the Eve of S. Bartholomew, but there it is kept on the twenty fourth day; he refuſed to faſt on the ordinary day of the Vigils as he uſed to doe, becauſe in Rome where he then was, the cuſtome was otherwiſe; he eat his meals, and reſolved to keep it the next day, but on the morrow being very hungry and deſirous of fleſh, he chang'd his ſentence, and went out of Rome to the Neighbourhood, and kept the feaſt of S. Bartholomew without the Eves. This is to elude the duty, and to run away from the ſeverity of the Law, by trifling with the letter.

3. If the Caſe be not complicated with a Law, yet it is often infolded with the intereſt of a third Perſon, and then is not to be changed, but remains invariable. Mævius promiſed to Sertorius to give him a ſervant, either Ephodius or Taranta, but reſolves to give him Taranta; immediately after the reſolution Ephodius dies, and Mævius tels his friend he is disobliged, becauſe he hath but one, and reſolves not to part with Taranta, and it was in his liberty to give him either, and becauſe he will not aſſign his part in this, it is wholly loſt in the other; but this is unfriendly and unjuſt. To this ſort of inſtance is to be reduced a caution againſt fraudulency in the matter of Vows.

4. Vitelleſcus vows to faſt upon the laſt of February, but changing his minde, beleeves he may commute his Faſting for Alms; he reſolves to break his faſt and to give a ducket to the poor. But when he had new dined, he diſcourſes the queſtion again, and thinks it unlawful to commute, and that he is bound to pay his vow in kinde; but the faſt is broken, and yet if he refuſes upon this new inqueſt to pay his commutation, he is a deceiver of his own ſoul. For in the preſent caſe, if to commute were not lawful, yet it is certain he is not diſobliged; and therefore he is to pay his commutation, becauſe it was decreed in the time of a probable conſcience; and not being in it ſelf unlawful, though it be now ſuppoſed to be inſufficient, yet it is to be accounted for, upon the ſtock of the firſt reſolution of the conſcience, becauſe the ſtate of things is not intire; and advantages are not to be taken againſt Religion from the account and ſtock of our errors or deluſions; and if after this, the conſcience be not at reſt, it is to be quieted by other actions of repentance and amends.

Queſt.

5. BUT here alſo is to be inquired, Whether a man may to ſeveral perſons, to ſerve diſtinct ends, in themſelves lawful and honeſt, diſcourſe of and perſwade both the parts of a probability reſpectively? Titius wooes Oreſtilla for his wife; ſhe being ſickly, and fearful leſt ſhe ſhall have no children, declines it; he to perſwade her, tells her it is very likely ſhe will, and that it will cure her indiſpoſition. But the intereſt of Titius is to have no children, as being already well ſtored, and therefore is diſſwaded by them that have power over him, not to marry Oreſtilla. He to anſwer their importunity tells them, it is very likely Oreſtilla will be barren, and upon that account he marries her becauſe ſhe is ſickly, and unlikely to become a Mother. The Queſtion is, Whether this be lawful?

6. I anſwer, 1. If he be actually perſwaded of that part of the probability when he urges it, and be changed into the other when he perſwades the other, there is no queſtion but it is as lawful to ſay both as one; for they are ſingle affirmatives or negatives, and the time is but accidental to his perſwaſion; yeſterday this, and to morrow its contrary are alike, while in both or each of them his perſwaſion is hearty and ſincere.

7. 2. If Titius urges both parts ſeverally, and yet remains actually perſwaded but of one of them, he may urge them as probable in themſelves, diſputable, and of indifferent argument and inducement, for ſo they are. But,

8. 3. He muſt not imprint them by the efficacy of his own authority and opinion, nor ſpeak that as certain which is at moſt but probable, and to him ſeems falſe; for ſo to doe is againſt ingenuity and Chriſtian ſincerity; it is to make a lie put on the face of truth and become a craft; it is not honeſt nor noble, nor agreeing to the ſpirit of a Chriſtian, and is a direct deception on one ſide, and an indirect proſecution of a lawful end.

Rule 8.

An opinion relying upon very ſlender probability is not to be followed, except in the caſes of great neceſsity, or great charity.

1. THAT it is not ordinarily to be followed is therefore certain, becauſe it cannot be ſuppoſed, but that its contradictory hath greater probability, and either he that follows this trifle is light of beleef, or unreaſonable in his choice, or his reaſon is to him, but as eyes to an Owl or Bat, half-ſighted and imperfect; and at the beſt, no fit motive to the Will. And if it could be lawful to follow every degree of probability, it were perfectly in any mans choice to do, almoſt what he pleaſed, eſpecially if he meets with an ill counſellor and a witty advocate. For at this rate all marriages may be diſſolved, all vices excuſed upon pretence of ſome little probable neceſſity; and drunkenneſs will be entertained as Phyſick, and fornication as a thing allowed by ſome vicious perſons whoſe wit is better then their manners; and all books of Conſcience ſhall become patrons or indices of ſins, and teach men what they pretend againſt, and there ſhall be no ſuch thing as checks of Conſcience, becauſe few men

ſin without ſome excuſe, and it were no excuſe unleſs it were mingled with ſome little probabilities; and there were in very many caſes, no rule for conſcience but a witty inventer of pretty little inducements, which rather then a man ſhall want, his enemy will ſupply to him out of his magazine of fallacies.

2. 2. But that there are ſome caſes in which it is to be permitted is therefore certain, becauſe it may be neceſſary in ſome circumſtances to doe ſo, and in theſe caſes the former impediments cannot intervene, becauſe the cauſes of neceſſity or great charity occurring but ſeldome deſtroy all power or pretence of an eaſy deception. Anna Murrana was married to her near kinſman Thomaſo Grillo, but ſuppoſed him not to be ſo near. It was afterwards diſcovered to her that the propinquity was ſo great that the marriage was null and invalid: while this trouble was upon her, there happily comes a diſcreet old woman who tells her, that though it be true that Grillo's Father was ſuppoſed to have lien with her Mother, and that her ſelf was born of that conjunction, yet ſhe her ſelf being private to the tranſaction did put another woman into the place of Murrana's Mother, and that her Mother was alſo deceived in the ſame manner; and though they thought they enjoyed each other, yet they were both cozened into more chaſt embraces. Now upon this the queſtion ariſes, whether or no Murrana may ſafely rely upon ſo ſlight a teſtimony as the ſaying of this woman, in a matter of ſo great difficulty and concernment. Here the caſe is favourable. Murrana is paſſionately endeared to Grillo, and beſides her love hath a tender conſcience, and if her marriage be ſeparated, dies at both ends of the evil, both for the evil conjunction, and for the ſad ſeparation. This therefore is to be preſumed ſecurity enough for her to continue in her ſtate.

3. Like to this is that of a woman in Breſcia. Her husband had been contracted to a woman of Panormo, Per verba de præſenti; ſhe taking her pleaſure upon the Sea, is with her company ſurpriſed by a Turks man of Warre, and is reported, firſt to have been defloured, and then kill'd. When the ſorrow for this accident had boyld down, the Gentleman marries a Maid of Breſcia, and lives with her ſome years; after which ſhe hears that his firſt Spouſe was not kill'd, but alive and in ſorrow in the Iſle of Malta, and therefore that her ſelf liv'd in a ſtate of adultery, becauſe not ſhe, but the woman in Malta was the true wife to her husband. In this agony of ſpirit a Mariner comes to her houſe and ſecretly tells her, that this woman was indeed at Malta, but lately dead, and ſo the impediment was removed. The queſtion now ariſes, whether upon the taking away this impediment, it be required that the perſons already engaged ſhould contract anew? That a new contract is neceſſary, is univerſally beleeved, and is almoſt certain (as in its proper place will be made to appear) for the contrary opinion is affirm'd but by a very few, and relies but upon trifling motives, requiring onely the conſent of either of the parties as ſufficient for renewing of the contract. But this being but a ſlender probability ought not to govern her; ſhe muſt contract anew by the conſent of her husband as well as by her own act. But now the difficulty ariſes; for her husband is a vicious man, and hates her, and is weary of her, and wiſhes her dead; and if ſhe diſcover the impediment of their marriage, and that it is now taken away, and therefore requires him to recontract himſelf, that the marriage which was innocently begun, may be firm in the progreſſion, and legally valid, and in conſcience; ſhe hath great reaſon to beleeve that he will take advantage of it, and refuſe to joyn in a new contract. In this caſe therefore, becauſe it is neceſſary ſhe ſhould ſome way or other be releeved, it is lawful for her to follow that little probability bability of opinion which ſays, that the conſent of one is ſufficient for the renovation of the contract. And in this caſe all the former inconveniences mentioned before doe ceaſe: and this is a caſe of favour, in behalf of an innocent marriage, and in favour of the legitimation of children, and will prevent much evil to them both. So that although this caſe hath but few degrees of probability from its proper and intrinſecal cauſes, yet by extrinſecal and collateral appendages it is grown favourable, and charitable, and reaſonable: it is almoſt neceſſary, and therefore hath more then the little probabilities of its own account.

4. One caſe more happens in which a ſmall probability may be purſued, viz. when the underſtanding hath not time to conſider deeply, and handle the queſtion on all ſides; then that which firſt offers it ſelf, though but mean and weak, yet if it be not againſt a ſtrange argument at the ſame time preſented, it may ſuffice to determine the action; for in caſe the determination prove to be on the wrong ſide, yet the ignorance is involuntary and unchoſen.

These Rules are concerning a Conſcience that is probable by intrinſecal motives, that is, by reaſon, whether the reaſon be direct or collateral. But becauſe the conſcience is alſo probably moved in very many caſes, by Authority, which is an extrinſecal motive, this is alſo to be guided and conducted.

Rule 9.

Multitude of Authors is not ever the moſt probable inducement, nor doth it in all caſes make a ſafe and probable Conſcience.

1. FOllowing a multitude is ſometimes like the grazing or running of an heard, Non quo eundum eſt, ſed quo itur, not where men ought but where they uſe to goe: and therefore Juſtinian in compiling of the body of the Romane Laws, took that which was moſt reaſonable, not that which was moſt followed; Sed neque ex multitudine Authorum quod melius & aquius eſt judicabile: cùm poſſit unius forſan, & deterioris ſententia multos & majores aliqua in parte ſuperare. The ſentence of one, and of a meaner man may ſometimes outweigh the ſayings of a multitude of greater perſons. Nam teſtibus ſe, non teſtimoniis creditu-rum reſcripſit Imperator. Sometimes one witneſs is better then twenty teſtimonies; that is, one man, good and pious, prudent and diſintereſs'd, can give a ſurer ſentence then many men more crafty, and leſs honeſt. And in the Nicene Council when the Biſhops were purpoſing to diſſolve the Prieſts marriages, Paphnutius did not follow the common vote, but gave them good reaſon for his ſingle opinion, and they all followed him. This Rule is true, and to be practiſed in the following caſes:

L. penult. Sed neque C. de veter. jure enucleando.

Cap. Nicæna Synodus. dist. 32.

2. 1. When againſt the common opinion there is a ſtrong, or a very probable reaſon, then the common opinion is not the more probable. Becauſe a reaſon is an intrinſecal, proper and apportioned motive to the conſcience, but humane authority, or citation of conſenting Authors is but an extrinſecal, accidental and preſumptive inducement, and a meere ſuppletory in the deſtitution of reaſon: and therefore Socrates ſaid, Veritatem in diſputando, non ex teſte aliquo, ſed ex

ex argumento eſſe ponderandam; Truth is to be weighed by argument not by teſtimony, and it is never otherwiſe but when men are ruled by prejudice, or want reaſon to rule them in that particular. Tantum opinio præjudicata poterat, ut etiam ſine ratione valeret authoritas, ſaid Cicero. And this is to be extended to all ſorts of Authors that are not Canonical, or Divine. Meum propoſitum eſt antiquos legere, probare ſingula, retinere quæ bona ſunt, & a fide Eccleſiæ Catholicæ non recedere, ſaid S. Hierom. My purpoſe is to read the Fathers, to try all things, to retain that onely which is good, and never to depart from the faith of the Catholick Church, that is, from the Creeds, which all Chriſtendome profeſſes. And at another time when himſelf ask'd leave, in diſcourſe with S. Auſtin, Patiatur me cum talibus errare, Suffer me to goe along with ſuch great men, though to an error, it would not be permitted, but reaſon was choſen and the authority neglected. And this courſe all men have followed when they pleaſed, and knew they might and ought.

1. De nat. Deor.

Vide Liberty of Propheſ. Sect. 8. Duille du Vrai uſage des Peres

3. 2. When the multitude of Doctors are reducible to a ſingle, or an inconſiderable principle and beginning. Thus an opinion entertained by a whole family and order of Clerks, while they either generally doe follow, or think themſelves bound to follow the leading man in their own order, is to be reckoned but as a ſingle opinion. The Millenary opinion was driven to a head in Papias; the condemning unbaptized infants, in S. Auſtin, or S. Ambroſe; and therefore their numerous followers are not to be reckoned into the account. For if they that follow conſider it not, the caſe is evident; if they doe, then their reaſons are to be weighed, not their authority.

4. 3. When it is notorious that there is, or may be a deception in that number, by reaſon of ſome evil ingredient in the production of the opinion; as if it be certain that the opinion was taken up becauſe it ſerves an intereſt, the ſame men having been on the other ſide when their intereſt was there. That it is lawful to put hereticks, or diſagreeing perſons to death, is generally taught by the followers of Calvin and Beza where they doe prevail: and yet no man that lives under them hath warrant to rely upon their authority in this queſtion, becauſe it is onely where and when they have power, themſelves having ſpoken againſt it in the days of their minority and under perſecution. Under the ſame conſideration it is, if there be any other reaſon againſt the men, not relating to their manners, but to their manner of entring or continuing in the perſwaſion.

5. 4. But when theſe cautions are provided for, the multitude of Authors hath a preſumptive authority, that is, when there is no reaſon againſt the thing, nor againſt the men, we may preſume upon the multitude of learned men in their proper faculty, that what they teach is good and innocent, and we may proceed to action accordingly. It can never make a Conſcience ſure, but it may be innocent, becauſe it is probable; but he that relies upon authority alone is governed by chance. Becauſe, if the more be againſt him, he is prejudic'd by multitude; if the fewer be againſt him, yet they may be the wiſeſt: and whether they be or not, yet a tooth-drawer may ſometimes ſpeak a better reaſon; and one may carry it againſt multitudes, and neither one nor the other can juſtly induce a beleef unleſs they have conſidered all things; and if I can tell who hath done ſo, I am my ſelf as well able to anſwer as they: for he that can judge who ſpeaks beſt reaſon, or who is moſt fit to be truſted in the particular, muſt be able in himſelf to conſider the particulars by which that judgement is to be made; if he can and does, he hath reaſon within him, and needs not follow authority alone; if he cannot, then he is governed by chance, and muſt be in the right, or in the wrong according as it happens. For in many caſes both ſides have many advocates and abettors, and no man can tell who hath moſt, and each ſide ſays that their opinion is the moſt commonly received. In Venice there is a Law that any man may kill his Father if he be baniſhed; ſome affirm this alſo to be lawful where ſuch a Law is in force, and they affirm this to be the common opinion. Julius Clarius ſays that it is the common opinion, that though there be ſuch a Law, yet that it is unlawful to doe it. It is commonly affirmed that it is lawful for ſuch a baniſhed perſon to defend himſelf, and if he can in his own defence to kill the invader. It is alſo a common opinion that this is as unlawful as for a condemn'd man to kill his Executioner, becauſe no Warre can be juſt on both ſides. It is very commonly taught, that it is lawful by fraud, by ſurpriſe, by treaſon, to ſlay the Banditi. It is alſo very commonly taught that this is abſolutely unlawful. * Sometimes that which was the common opinion an age agoe, is now rarely maintained but by a few perſons. It was a common opinion in Tertullians time, that the ſouls departed are in outer Courts expecting the revelation of the day of the Lord; in the time of P. Leo, and Venerable Bede, and after, it was a coimmon opinion that they were taken into the inner Courts of heaven. * Sometimes the place diverſifies the opinion. In Germany and France, the Romaniſts worſhip the Croſs with a religious worſhip of the loweſt kinde of their own diſtinction; but in Spain they worſhip it with that which they call λατρεια, or the higheſt kinde; and this is commonly done in the ſeveral Countries reſpectively. When this, or any thing like this ſhall happen, unleſs by reaſon men be determined, they may draw lots for their opinion. But ſince the better part is not always the greater, it is left to me to chooſe which I will; and it is ten to one but I call the men of my own communion or my own acquaintance, The beſt; and it is certain I cannot judge of thoſe with whom I doe not converſe.

6. For theſe and many other concurrent cauſes, the proceeding is inartificial and caſual, and fit to lead the ignorant, but not the learned: and concerning the ignorant he can ſo little skill to chooſe his authority, that he muſt lie under that where he dwels, and where his fortune hath placed him. If he goes any whither elſe he hath no excuſe, becauſe he hath no ſufficient inducement; and where a man cannot goe alone, it is beſt for him to ſit ſtill where Gods providence hath placed him, and follow the Guides provided by the Laws of his Country where he was born, or where he lives:

Epictet. Πελυπόδι μοι τέκνον ἔχων τόον——
Τοῖσιν ἐφαρμόζων ὧν χ᾽ ὁσίης δήμου ἵκηαι.

Conform your ſelf to the Laws of the People with whom you muſt abide.

7. This is the moſt proper way to conduct the ignorant in their caſes of conſcience in which themſelves have no skill. They muſt beleeve one, and if they have a better way to proceed, let them purſue it: if they have not, this is certainly ſafe, becauſe it is their beſt; and no man is tied to make uſe of better then he hath. And if they could fall into error, yet it could not be imputed to them with juſtice, while bonâ fide they fall into hereſy, and are honeſtly betrayed. This onely is to be added:

8. They muſt make it as good as they can by inquiry (according to their circumſtances, opportunities, and poſſibilities) and by prayers, and by innocent and honeſt purpoſes, for theſe onely will ſecure our way, by means of Gods provi-providing. In this caſe there is no irregularity, becauſe it is the beſt obedience which can be expreſſed by ſubordinate and weak underſtandings, and there is in it no danger, becauſe the piety, and the prayers of the man will obtain Gods bleſſing upon his innocent well meaning ſoul. It was well ſaid of Heſiod,

Οὗτος μὲ παναέριστος ὃς αὐτὸς πάντα νοήσῃ
Φρασσάμενος τὰ κ' ἔπειτα καὶ εἰς τέλος ἤσιν ἀμείνων.
Ἐσθλὸς δ' αὖ κἀκεῖνος ὃς εὖ εἰπόντι πίθηται.
Ὃς δέ κε μήτ' αὐτὸς νοέῃ μήτ' ἄλλου ἀκούων
Ἐν θυμῷ βάλληται, ὅδ' αὖτ' ἀχρήιος ἀνήρ.

He is the beſt and wiſeſt man who in himſelf knows what he ought to doe, diſcerning what is beſt, and ſeeing unto the end of things. He alſo is good, who obeys the ſayings of wiſe men, that counſel well; but he is a fool who not being able to adviſe or determine himſelf, refuſes to be conducted by others. Here onely are the evils to be complained of.

9. In ſome places there are a great many articles put into their publick confeſſions, and a great many teachers of unneceſſary propoſitions, and a great many idle and impertinent guides, who multiply queſtions leſt themſelves ſhould ſeem uſeleſs; and amongſt men, there are many orders, and families, and ſocieties, all which are deſirous to advance themſelves, and to get diſciples and reputation; and on the other ſide, there are very many that are idle, and rather willing to truſt others, then to be troubled themſelves; and many chooſe Teachers for intereſt, and ſome have mens perſons in admiration becauſe of advantage; and Princes have deſigns of State, and they would have Religion miniſter to them, and there are a great many Eccleſiaſtical Laws made, and ſome of theſe paſs into dogmaticall propoſitions, and they teach for doctrines the Commandements of men; and there are very many ſects of men, and confident fools, who uſe to overvalue their trifles, and teach them for neceſſary truths, and in all this incertainty of things, men are in the dark, and Religion is become an art of wrangling; and the writers of Controverſies are oftentimes abuſed themſelves, and oftner doe abuſe others; and therefore men are taught certain little rules to grope by, and walk in Seas and upon Rocks. But the things themſelves are oftentimes ſo indifferent, and the reaſons of either ſide ſo none at all, or ſo inconſiderable, that it comes to paſs that the teſtimony of Doctors is the guide that men chooſe (as they liſt) to follow; who becauſe they teach contrary things, cannot be followed by their authority, and for reaſon, ſometimes themſelves have none, ſometimes their diſciples have not leiſure to examine them, or judgement to diſcern them.

Queſt.

10. HEre therefore is to be inquired, How ſhall the ignorant and vulgar people proceed in ſuch caſes where their Teachers are divided?

1. I anſwer, that in moſt caſes it is beſt for them to let them alone, and let them be divided ſtill, and to follow them in thoſe things where they doe agree; but if it be in ſuch caſes where they muſt declare or act on one ſide, let them take that which they think to be the ſafeſt, or the moſt pious, the moſt charitable, and the moſt uſeful; that ſo by collateral conſiderations they may determine that which by the authority ſeems equal and indeterminable.

The collateral conſiderations are commonly theſe:

1. That which is more agreeable to the letter of Scripture.
2. That which does moſt agree with the purpoſe and deſign of it.

3. That which Saints have practiſed.
4. That which whole Nations have approved.
5. That which is agreeable to common life.
6. That which is beſt for the publick.
7. That which is moſt for the glory of God, for the reputation of his Name, and agreeing with his attributes.
8. That which is more holy.
9. That which gives leaſt confidence to ſin and ſinners.
10. That which is moſt charitable to others.
11. That which will give leaſt offence.
12. And (in deſtitution of all things elſe) that which is moſt uſeful to our ſelves. All theſe are good conſiderations, and ſome of them intervene in moſt caſes, and can be conſidered by moſt men. But where nothing of theſe can be interwoven in the ſentence, but that the authority of the Teacher is the onely thing that can be conſidered, the following meaſures are to be added.

11. 2. The authority of one man wiſe and good, that is, who is generally ſo reputed, is a probable argument, and a ſufficient guide to ignorant perſons in doubtful matters, where there is no clear or known revelation to the contrary. When it is his beſt, there is no diſputing whether it be good or no; onely in this caſe, he is ſo farre to ſuſpend his conſent, till his guide hath conſidered, or anſwered deliberately; for if his guide vomit out anſwers, it is better to refuſe it, till it be digeſted better. This hath been highly abuſed in ſome places, and permiſſions have been given or taken to doe acts of vile impiety, or horrible danger, where by intereſt they were perſwaded, and being deſirous for ſome pretence to legitimate the act, or to invite their conſcience to it, they have been content with the opinion of one probable Doctor. Such was he whoſe teſtimony being required in a matter of right concerning his College, ſwore to a thing as of his certain knowlege, of which he had no certain knowledge, but a probable conjecture; onely becauſe he had read or been told that one Doctor ſaid it was lawful ſo to doe. This is to ſuborn a ſentence and to betray a conſcience, for the ſentence of one Doctor is onely a good or a tolerable guide, when there is no better guide for us, and no reaſon againſt us; that is, it is to be uſed onely when it is the beſt, but not when it is the worſt.

12. 3. But if divers men equally wiſe and good ſpeak variouſly in the queſtion, and that the inquirer cannot be indifferent to both, but muſt reſolve upon one, he is firſt to follow his Pariſh Prieſt, rather then a ſtranger in the article, who is equal in all things elſe; his own Confeſſor, his own Biſhop, or the Laws and Cuſtoms of his own Country: becauſe next to reaſon, comes in place that which in order of things is next to it; that is, the proper advantages of the man, that is, learning and piety; and next to them ſucceed the accidental advantages of the man, that is, his authority and legal prehe-minence. There is no other reaſon for theſe things, but that which is in the proper and natural order of things: This is the natural method of perſwaſion direct and indirect.

13. 4. Where it can certainly be told that it is the more common, there the community of the opinion hath the advantage, and is in the ſame circumſtances ſtill to be preferred, becauſe where reaſon is not clear and manifeſt, there we are to goe after it, where it is more juſtly to be preſumed. Τὰ τοῦ καλὸν ἐν πολλοῖσι καλλιον λέγειν, ſaid Euripides, it is good when good things are atteſted by by many witneſſes. Ὃ μὲ πᾶσι δοκεῖ, τοῦτο εἶναι φαμὲν, ſaid Ariſtotle, that which ſeems ſo to all men, this we ſay, is as it ſeems; and ſo it is in proportion from ſome to many, from many to all. The ſumme of all theſe things is this: 1. God is to be preferred before man. 2. Our own reaſon before the ſayings of others. 3. Many before few. 4. A few before one. 5. Our ſuperiours, or perſons in juſt authority over us, before private perſons, cæteris paribus. 6. Our own before ſtrangers. 7. Wiſe men before the ignorant. 8. The godly and well meaning, and well reputed, before men of indifferent or worſe lives. That is, they muſt doe as well and wiſely as they can, and no man is obliged to doe better. Onely this is to be obſerved; Eth. lib. 10. c. 3.

14. That in this caſe it is not neceſſary that truth ſhould be found, but it is highly neceſſary it ſhould be ſearched for. It may be it cannot be hit, but it muſt be aymed at. And therefore they (who are concerned) are not to be troubled and amazed at the variety of opinions that are in the world; There muſt be hereſies, that is, ſects and differing opinions, that they who are faithful may be approved. Now they can be approved in nothing but what is in their power, that is, diligence to inquire, and honeſty in conſenting; both which may very well be, and yet the man be miſtaken in his particular ſentence, in a matter not ſimply neceſſary, not plainly revealed.

15. There is but one thing more that concerns his duty, and that is, that in all his choices he preferre the intereſt of peace and of obedience; for it ought to be a very great cauſe that ſhall warrant his diſſent from the authority which is appointed over him. Such cauſes may be, but the unskill'd multitude (of whom we now treat) ſeldome finde thoſe cauſes, and ſeldome are able to judge of them, and therefore this Rule is certain.

16. Whoever blows a trumpet, and makes a ſeparation from the publick, they who follow his authority, and know not, or underſtand not a ſufficient reaſon for the doing it, they are highly inexcuſable upon this account, becauſe they following the leſs probable authority, have no excuſe for the matter of their ſin; and therefore if it happen to be ſchiſme or rebellion, or diſobedience, or hereſy in the ſubject matter, it is in the very form of it, ſo imputed to the conſenting perſon. For though great reaſon may be ſtronger then authority, yet no private authority is greater then the publick. But of this I ſhall have further occaſion to diſcourſe in its proper place.

17. Although this is the beſt, and therefore a ſufficient advice for the ignorant, yet for the learned and the wiſe, there are other conſiderations to be added.

1. They who are to teach others may not rely upon ſingle teſtimonies, or the ſlight probability of one Doctors opinion. This is true ordinarily and regularly, becauſe ſuch perſons are ſuppoſed more at leiſure, more inſtructed, better able to inquire, and to rely finally upon ſuch ſingle and weak ſupports, is to doe the work of the Lord negligently.

18. 2. If the opinion be probable upon the account of a more general reception, and be the more common, and allowed by wiſe and good men, they who are learned, and are to teach others, may lawfully follow the opinion without examining the reaſons for which it is by thoſe wiſe men entertained. For the work of learning and inquiry is ſo large and of immenſe extenſion, that it is impoſſible all men ſhould perfectly inquire of all things. But ſome eſpecially attend to one thing, ſome to another; and where men have beſt conſide-red, they conſider for themſelves and for others too, and themſelves are help'd by thoſe others, in the proper matter of their conſideration. A mans life is too ſhort, and his abilities leſs, and it may be his leiſure is leaſt of all, and unable ſo to conſider all that is fit to be beleeved and taught, that it will be neceſſary we ſhould help one another; and the great Teachers and Doctors in ſeveral inſtances may ordinarily be relied upon without danger and inconvenience.

19. 3. But if it happens that by circumſtances and accidents the particular queſtion be drawn out into a new inquiry; if a new doubt ariſe, or a ſcandal be feared, or the diviſion of mens minds in the new inqueſt, then the reaſons muſt be inquired into, and the authority is not ſufficient.

1. Becauſe the authority is by the new doubt made leſs probable, and is part of the queſtion, and therefore ought not to be preſumed right in its own caſe.

2. Becauſe the duty of Teachers is by this accident determined to this ſpeciall inquiry, and call'd from their unactive reſt, and implicit beleef; becauſe the inquirers upon this new account will be determined by nothing but by that reaſon that ſhall pretend ſtrongeſt; and therefore they who are thus call'd upon, can no other ways give anſwer to them that ask. It was the univerſal doctrine of the Church of God for many ages, even for fourteen Centuries of years, that Epiſcopacy is of Divine, or Apoſtolical inſtitution: It was a ſufficient warranty for a Pariſh Prieſt to teach that doctrine to his Pariſhioners, becauſe he found it taught every where, and queſtioned no where. But when afterwards this long preſcribing truth came to be queſtioned, and reaſons and Scriptures pretended and offered againſt it, and a ſchiſm likely to be commenc'd upon it, it is not ſufficient then to rely upon the bare word of thoſe excellent men who are able to prove it (as it is ſuppoſed,) but they who are to teach others muſt firſt be inſtructed themſelves in the particular arguments of probation; that according to the precepts Apoſtolical, they may render a reaſon of the hope that is in them, and may be able both to exhort and to convince the gain-ſayers; who becauſe they expreſly decline the authority, and the weight of teſtimony, cannot be convinced but by reaſon, and the way of their own proceeding.

1 Pet 3. 15. Tit. 1. 9.

Rule 10.

In following the authority of men, no Rule can be antecedently given for the choice of the perſons, but the choice is wholly to be conducted by prudence, and according to the ſubject matter.

1. Ancient Writers are more venerable: Modern Writers are more knowing: They might be better Witneſſes, but theſe are better Judges. Antiquity did teach the Millenary opinion, and that Infants were to be communicated; that without baptiſm they were damn'd to the flames of hell; that Angels are corporeal; that the ſouls of Saints did not ſee God before Doomeſday; that ſins once pardoned did return again upon caſe of relapſe; that perſons baptized by hereticks were to be re-baptized, and they expounded Scripture in places innumerable, otherwiſe then they are at this day by men of all perſwaſions; and therefore no company of men will conſent that in all caſes the Fathers are rather to be followed then their Succeſſors. They liv'd in the infancy of Chriſtianity, and we in the elder ages; they practiſed more and knew leſs, we know more and practiſe leſs; paſſion is for younger years, and for beginning of things, wiſdome is by experience, and age, and progreſſion. They were highly to be valued, becauſe in more imperfect notices they had the more perfect piety: we are highly to be reproved, that in better diſcourſes we have a moſt imperfect life, and an unactive Religion: They in their Caſes of Conſcience took the ſafeſt part, but the Moderns have choſen the moſt probable. * It was the opinion of the Ancient Divines and Lawyers, that every man is bound to make reſtitution of all that which he gains by play, by Cards and Dice, and all ſuch ſports as are forbidden by humane Laws. The modern Caſuiſts indeed doe often reprove the whole proceſs, and condemne the Gameſters in moſt circumſtances, but doe not beleeve them tied to reſtitution, but to penance onely: The firſt is the ſafer and the ſeverer way, but the later hath greater reaſons, as will appear in its own place. All contracts of Uſury were generally condemn'd in the foregoing ages of the Church: of late, not onely the Merchant, but the Prieſt and the Frier puts out money to increaſe, and think themſelves innocent: and although commonly it happens that our ignorance and fears repreſent one opinion to be ſafe, when the other is more reaſonable; yet becauſe men will be fearful, and very often are ignorant and idle in their inquiries, there will ſtill remain this advantage to either ſide, that one is wiſer, and the other in his ignorance is the more ſecure becauſe he does more then he needs. And therefore it often happens that though we call the ancient Writers, Fathers, yet we uſe them like children, and think our ſelves Men rather then them, which is affirmed by ſome, but in effect practiſed by every man when he pleaſes.

2. But if any one ſhall chooſe the later Writers, he muſt firſt chooſe his intereſt and his ſide; I mean if he chooſes to follow any upon their authority or reputation without conſideration of their reaſons, then he muſt firſt chooſe his ſide, for he can never chooſe his ſide by the men, becauſe moſt Authors are of it themſelves by intereſt. But becauſe all probability is wholly derived from reaſon, every authority hath its degree of probability according as it can be preſumed or known to rely upon reaſon. Now in this both the Ancients and the Moderns excel each other reſpectively. "The Ancients were nearer to "the fountains Apoſtolical, their ſtream was leſs pudled, their thred was not "fine but plain and ſtrong, they were troubled with fewer hereſies; they were "not ſo wittily miſtaken as we have been ſince; they had better and more firm "tradition, they had paſs'd through fewer changes, and had been blended with "fewer intereſts; they were united under one Prince, and conſequently were "not forc'd to bend their doctrines to the hoſtile and oppoſite deſigns of figh-"ting, and crafty Kings; their queſtions were concerning the biggeſt articles "of Religion, and therefore ſuch in which they could have more certainty "and leſs deception; their piety was great, their devotion high and pregnant; "their diſcipline regular and ſincere, their lives honeſt, their hearts ſimple, their "zeal was for ſouls, and the blood of the Martyrs made the Church irrigu-"ous, and the Church was then a garden of the faireſt flowers, it did daily ger-"minate with bleſſings from heaven, and Saints ſprung up, and one Saint could "know more of the ſecrets of Chriſts Kingdom, the myſteriouſneſſes of god-"ly wiſdome then a hundred diſputing Sophiſters; and above all, the Church "of Rome was then holy and Orthodox, humble and charitable, her authority dwelt "in the houſe of its birth, that is, in the advantages of an excellent faith and an "holy life; to which the advantages of an accidental authority being added by

" the Imperial ſeat, ſhe was made able to doe all the good ſhe deſired, and " ſhe deſired all that ſhe ought; and the greatneſs of this advantage we can beſt " judge by feeling thoſe ſad effects which have made Chriſtendome to groan, " ſince the Pope became a temporal Prince, and hath poſſeſs'd the rights of " ſome Kings, and hath invaded more, and pretends to all, and is become the " great Fable, and the great Comet of Chriſtendome, uſeleſs and ſupreme, " high and good for nothing in reſpect of what he was at firſt, and ſt ll might " have been, if he had ſeverely judged the intereſt of Jeſus Chriſt to have " been his own.

3. But then on the other ſide, the modern Writers have conſidered all the arguments and reaſons of the Ancients; they can more eaſily adde then their Fathers could finde out; They can retain their perfect iſſues, and leave the other upon their hands; and what was begun in conjecture, can either be brought to knowledge, or remanded into the lot and portion of deceptions. Omnibus enim hic locus feliciter ſe dedit, & qui præceſſerunt non præripuiſſe mihi videntur quæ dici poterant, ſed aperuiſſe. Conditio optima ultimi eſt, ſaid Seneca. They who went before us, have not prevented us, but opened a door that we may enter into the receſſes of truth: He that comes laſt hath the beſt advantage in the inquiry. Multum egerunt qui ante nos fuerunt, ſed non peregerunt, multum adhuc reſtat operis, multúmque reſtabit, nec ulli nato poſt mille ſecula præcludetur occaſio aliquid adhuc adjiciendi. They who went before us have done wiſely and well in their generations, but they have not done all; much work remains behinde, and he that lives a thouſand ages hence, ſhall not complain that there are no hidden truths fit for him to inquire after. There are more worlds to conquer:

Epiſt. 64. Multa dies, variúſque labor mutabilis ævi
Retulit in melius ——— ——— ———.

Every day brings a new light, and by hearty and wiſe labour we improve what our Fathers eſpied when they peep'd through the creviſes. Every art, every manufacture was improved,

Æneid. 11. Venimus ad ſummum fortunæ, pingimus atque
Pſallimus, & luctamur Achivis doctiùs unctis.

The Romanes out-did the Greeks, even in things which they were taught in Athens, or on their hils of ſport. But to proceed in the comparing the ages: Theſe later ages have more hereſies, but the former had more dangerous; and although the Primitive piety was high and exemplary, yet the effect of that was, that in matters of practice they were more to be followed, but not in queſtions of ſpeculation; theſe later ages are indeed diſeaſed like children that have the Rickets, but their upper parts doe ſwell, and their heads are bigger, ſagaciores in dogmate, nequiores in fide, and if they could be abſtracted from the mixtures of intereſt, and the ingagement of their party, they are in many things better able to teach the people then the Ancients: That is, they are beſt able to guide, but not always ſafeſt to be followed. If all circumſtances were equal, that is, if the later ages were united, and governed, and diſintereſt, there is no queſtion but they are the beſt inſtructors; there is certainly more certain notice of things, and better expoſitions of Scriptures now then formerly, but becauſe he that is to rely upon the authority of his guide, cannot chooſe by reaſons, he can hardly tell now where to finde them upon that account. There is more gold now then before, but it is more allayed in the running, or ſo hidden in heaps of tinſel, that when men are beſt pleaſed, now adays they are moſt commonly cozened.

4. If a man will take the middle ages, he may if he will, and that is all that can can be ſaid in it; for there can be no reaſon for it, but much againſt it. Ego ſanè veteres veneror, & tantis Nominibus ſemper aſſurgo. Verùm inter externa ætatem eſſe ſcio, omniáque non eſſe apud Majores meliora. I for my part doe more reverence the Ancients, and uſe to riſe up and bow my head to ſuch reverend names, as S. Irenæus, S. Cyprian, Origen, S. Hierome, S. Auſtin; but I reckon age amongſt things that are without, it enters not into the conſtitution of truth; and this I know, that amongſt theſe Ancients, not all their ſayings are the beſt. And on the other ſide, although Antiquity is a gentle prejudice, and hath ſome authority, though no certainty or infallibility; ſo I know that novelty is a harder prejudice, and brings along with it no authority, but yet it is not a certain condemnation.

Quòd ſi tam Græcis novitas inviſa fuiſſet
Quàm eſt nobis, quid nunc eſſet vetus, aut quid haberet
Quod legeret, tereretque viciſsim publicus uſus.

Horat. l. 2. ep. 1.

If our Fathers in Religion had refuſed every expoſition of Scripture that was new, we ſhould by this time have had nothing old; But in this caſe what Martial ſaid of friendſhips, we may ſay of truths:

Nec me, quòd novus ſum tibi, recuſes:
Omnes hoc veteres tui ſodales fuerunt.
Tu tantùm inſpice qui novus paratur
An poſsit fieri vetus ſodalis.

Videat lector epiſt. 19. Sancti Auguſtini; quæ eſt ad Hieronymum. & epiſt. ad Fortunatum.

Refuſe nothing onely becauſe it is new. For that which pretends to age now, was once in infancy; onely ſee if this new thing be fit to be entertained, and kept till it be old; That is, as the thing is in it ſelf, not as it is in age, ſo it is to be valued, and ſo alſo are the men; for in this, as in all the other, the ſubject matter will help forward to the choice of a guide.

1. The analogy of faith.
2. The piety of a propoſition.
3. The ſafety of it, and its immunity from ſin; theſe are right meaſures to gueſs at an article, but theſe are more intrinſecal, and ſometimes ſo difficult, that they cannot be made uſe of but by thoſe who can judge of reaſon, and leſs need to be conducted by authority. But for theſe other who are wholly to be led by the power and ſentence of their guide, beſides what hath been already adviſed.
4. The faculty and profeſſion of men is much to be regarded, as that we truſt Divines in matters proper to their cogniſance, and Lawyers in their faculty; which advice is to be conducted by theſe meaſures.

When the Authority of Divines is to be preferred, when that of Lawyers.

5. 1. The whole duty of a Chriſtian conſiſts in the laws of Faith or Religion, of Sobriety, and of Juſtice; and it is ſo great a work, that it is no more then needs that all the orders of wiſe and learned men ſhould conduct and miniſter to it. But ſome portions of our duty are perſonal, and ſome are relative, ſome are private, and ſome are publick; ſome are limited by the Laws of God onely, and ſome alſo by the Laws of men; ſome are directed by nature, ſome by uſe and experience; and to ſome of theſe portions contemplative men can give beſt aſſiſtances, and the men of the world, and buſineſs can give beſt help in the other neceſſities. Now becauſe Divines are therefore in many degrees ſeparate from an active life, that they may with leiſure attend to the conduct of things ſpiritual, and are choſen as the Miniſters of mercy, and the great reconcilers of the world, and therefore are forbidden to intermeddle in queſtions of blood: and becauſe becauſe the affairs of the world in many inſtances are ſo intangled, ſo unconducing to the affairs of the ſpirit, ſo ſtubborn that they are hardly to be manag'd by a meek perſon, carried on by ſo much violence, that they are not to be reſcued from being injurious but by a violence that is greater but more juſt; and becauſe the intereſts of men are complicated and difficult, defended by cuſtoms, preſerved in records, ſecur'd by ſentences of Judges, and yet admit variety by ſo many accidents, circumſtances, and conſiderations, as will require the attendance of one whole ſort of men, and of all men in the world Divines are the leaſt fit to be imployed in ſuch troubles and contracts, ſuch violences and oppoſitions, and yet they are ſo neceſſary, that without them the government of the world would be infinitely diſordered, it is requiſite that theſe ſhould be permitted to a diſtinct profeſſion. In particular matters of juſtice ordinarily and regularly Lawyers are the moſt competent Judges: In matters of Religion and Sobriety, the office of Divines is ſo wholly or principally imployed, that it ought to be choſen for our guide.

6 2. In matters of Juſtice which are to be conducted by general Rules, Theology is the beſt Conductreſs; and the Lawyers skill is but ſubſervient and miniſtring. The reaſon for both is the ſame, becauſe all the general meaſures of juſtice are the Laws of God, and therefore cognoſcible by the Miniſters of Religion; but becauſe theſe general meaſures, like a great river into little ſtreams, are deduced into little rivulets and particularities by the laws and cuſtomes, by the ſentences and agreements of men, therefore they muſt ſlip from the hands of the ſpiritual man to the prudent and ſecular. The Divine can condemne all injuſtice, murder, inceſt, injurious dealing; but whether all homicide be murder, all marriage of kindred be inceſt, or taking that which another man poſſeſſes be injuſtice, muſt be determined by Laws, and the learned in them; and though Divines may rule all theſe caſes as well as any of the long Robe, yet it is by their prudence and skill in Law, not by the proper notices of Theology.

7. 3. But juſtice is like a knife, and hath a back and an edge, and there is a letter and a ſpirit in all Laws, and juſtice it ſelf is to be conducted with piety, and there are modalities, and meaſures, and manners of doing or ſuffering in humane entercourſes; and many things are juſt which are not neceſſary, and there are exceſſes and rigours in juſtice which are to be moderated, and there are evil and intangling circumſtances which make ſeveral inſtances to juſtle one another; and one muſt be ſerv'd firſt, and another muſt ſtay its ſeaſon; and in paying money there is an ordo ad animam, and juſtice is to be done for Gods ſake, and at ſome times, and in ſome circumſtances for charities ſake; and the Law compels to pay him firſt that requires firſt; but in conſcience, juſtice is oftentimes to be adminiſtred with other meaſures: ſo that as prudence ſometimes muſt be called to counſel in the conduct of piety, ſo muſt piety oftentimes lead in juſtice, and juſtice it ſelf muſt be ſanctified by the word of God and prayer, and will then goe on towards heaven, when both Robes like Paranymphs attending a Virgin in the ſolemnities of her marriage, help to lead and to adorn her.

8. 4. Sometimes Humane Laws and Divine ſtand face to face and oppoſe each other, not onely in the direct ſanction (which does not often happen) but very often in the execution. Sometimes obedience to a humane Law will deſtroy charity, ſometimes juſtice is againſt piety, ſometimes piety ſeems leſs conſiſtent with Religion. The Church is poor, our Parents are neceſſitous, the fabricks of the Houſes of Prayer are ruinous, and we are not able to make ſupplies plies to all theſe; Here what is juſt, and what is duty, not the Law, but Theology will determine. I owe Sempronius a ſmall ſumme of money; it happens that he comes to demand it when the gatherers of Gabels are preſent to demand an equal ſumme for Taxes; here I am to ask my Confeſſor, not my Lawyer whether of the two muſt be ſerv'd, ſince I cannot pay both: and in this caſe the Miniſters of Religion are the guards and defenſatives of her intereſt: Concerning which for the preſent, I onely inſert this Caution; That when Religion and Juſtice are in conteſt, the Miniſters of Religion are not always bound to give ſentence on the ſide of Religion, but to conſider which is the more neceſſary, and where the preſent duty ſtands; for ſometimes it is abſolutely neceſſary to doe juſtice, and actions of particular Religion muſt attend their ſeaſon. But then even juſtice turns into Religion, and when it does ſo, Theology muſt conduct her into action.

9. 5. When the queſtion concerns an intereſt, relative to either faculty, it is hard choosing the authority on either part, for one judges for it ſelf, and the other againſt his adverſary; that is, in effect they are both Judges in their own cauſe. It is notorious in the Church of Rome, where the Canoniſts ſay, That a Canon Lawyer is to be preferr'd before a Divine in elections to Biſhopricks; but you muſt think, the Divines ſay that themſelves are farre the fitter. The Canoniſts ſay that Prædial tithes are due by Divine right. The Divines ſay they are onely due by poſitive conſtitution. The ſecret of that is, becauſe moſt of the Divines that write books are Monks and Friers, and ſuch which are no friends to Pariſhes, that the Pope may be allowed to have power to take tithes from the Pariſh Prieſts, and give them to the Monaſteries; which he could not doe, if by Divine right they were annexed to their proper Cures. Amongſt us the tables are turn'd, and the Lawyers take the Friers part, and the Divines generally affirm the Divine right of tithes. Concerning which it is to be conſidered, that though the authority of either part is not of it ſelf ſufficient to determine a doubting perſon, and where intereſt is apparent, the perſon perſwading loſes much of his authority, yet the propoſition it ſelf ought not to loſe any thing. The intereſt appearing is no more warrant to disbeleeve the propoſition, then it is to beleeve it. In this caſe there is intereſt on both ſides, and therefore as to that the caſe is indifferent. The way to proceed is to conſider the proper inſtruments of perſwaſion, and becauſe a truth is not the worſe for ſerving his ends that teaches it, I am to attend to his arguments without any prejudice. But if I am not able to judge of the reaſons, but muſt be led by authority, the preſumption lies for the Divines, I am to beleeve them rather then the Lawyers in ſuch queſtions, becauſe there is ſome Religion in doing ſo, and a relation to God, for whoſe ſake it is, that I chooſe to obey their propoſition.

10. 6. Where by the favour of Princes or Common-wealths any matters of Juſtice are reſerved to Eccleſiaſtical cogniſance, in thoſe affairs the authority of Divines is to be preferr'd before that of Lawyers, becauſe the perſonal capacities of the men being equal in all things, the Divines are exerciſed in the ſame matters, and therefore are both concern'd and able, inſtructed and engaged, and though the Lawyers are to be ſuppoſed honeſt, and juſt, and wiſe, yet all that alſo is to be ſuppoſed in Divines, with ſome advantages of Religion, and tenderneſs which is bred in them by their perpetual converſation with the things of God. But in all things he comes the neareſt to a ſure way of being guided, who does his beſt and with greateſt honeſty of heart, and ſimplicity of pious deſires to be truly informed. It was well ſaid of Socrates,

An

An placeant Deo quæ feci, neſcio; hoc certò ſcio, me ſedulò hoc egiſſe ut placerent. The things which I have done, whether they pleaſe God or no, I know not; but this I know aſſuredly, that I did earneſtly deſire, and diligently take care that they might pleaſe him.

11. If the queſtion be concerning other diviſions of men, as of Schoolmen and Caſuiſts, Criticks or Preachers, the anſwer can be no other, but that in all faculties relating to any parts of Religion, as there are very wiſe men, and very weak men, ſo there are ſome to be preferr'd in each faculty, if we could finde out who they are: but this prælation is relative to the men, not to the faculty, if they were rightly handled. For the ſeveral faculties are nothing but the proper portion of matter aſſign'd to the conſideration of an order of men, in a proper method; but the great end is the ſame, onely the means of perſwading the ſame truth is different. But in the Church of Rome they are made ſeveral Trades, and have diſtinct principles, and ſerve ſpecial and diſunited ends and intereſts; and therefore which of them is to be preferr'd, as to the making a probable opinion is juſt to be anſwered, as if we ſhould ask which is beſt of feathers or wooll; they both of them have their excellencies in order to warmth, and yet if you offer to ſwallow them down, they will infallibly choke you.

RULE II.

He that hath given aſſent to one part of a probable opinion, may lawfully depoſe that Conſcience, and that opinion upon confidence of the ſentence of another.

1. THE Curate of S. Martin being ſent for to doe his laſt offices to a dying man, finds him ſpeechleſs, but yet giving ſigns of his penitence, as beating his breaſts, weeping and groaning, holding up his hands, and looking pitifully, and in a penitent poſture: The Curate having read it, diſputed whether ſuch a perſon may be abſolved, concerning whoſe repentance he can have no other teſtimony but mute ſigns, which may be produced by other cauſes, and finding arguments on both ſides, conſents to the negative as probable; and yet finding learned perſons there who are of another opinion, lays aſide the practices of his own opinion, and in compliance with the other, abſolves the ſick man. One that was preſent, and underſtood the whole proceſs, inquires whether he did well or no, as ſuppoſing that to doe againſt his own opinion is to doe againſt his conſcience; and a mans own conſcience is more to him then ten watchmen that keep a city.

2. In anſwer to this, it is to be conſidered there is a double conſent to a propoſition, the one is direct, the other a reflex; the firſt is directly terminated upon the honeſty or diſhoneſty of the object, the other upon the manner of it, and modality. For inſtance, the Curate does not directly conſent to that part of the queſtion which he hath choſen, as that which he will finally rely upon, but he conſents to it onely as a thing that is probable; If he were fully perſwaded of the article as a thing certain, or as neceſſary (though of it ſelf it it be not ſo) or if he thinks it is not to be altered, then to doe againſt his opinion were to doe againſt his conſcience, becauſe the opinion were paſs'd the region of ſpeculation, and ineffective notion, and is become a rule and immediate meaſure of action. But becauſe he beleeves it onely probable, that is ſuch, in which he is not certain; but may be deceived, and may uſe liberty, he may as well chooſe that part of the probability which derives from the reputation and abilities of other men, as well as that which proceeds from conſiderations of thoſe little intrinſick arguments which mov'd his aſſent lightly like a breath upon the waters, or the ſmile of an undiſcerning infant. His own opinion is well enough concerning the honeſty of the object, but yet he that chooſes the other part may make an honeſt election; for his own opinion reflecting upon it ſelf, not going beyond the ſtage of uncertainty and probability does openly challenge its own right of chooſing another part; the conſcience is no ways intangled and determined, but ſo chooſes that it may chooſe again, if ſhe ſees cauſe for it, a cauſe in the particular caſe, which ſhe eſpied not in the abſtracted queſtion.

3. For he may prudently ſuppoſe that in what he is not certainly perſwaded, another may be wiſer and know more, and can judge ſurer: and if he have reaſon to think ſo, it may be a greater reaſon then that is by which himſelf did chooſe his own opinion and part of the probability; and he may have reaſon to think meanly of himſelf, and he may remember ſad ſtories of his frequent deception, and be conſcious of his own unaptneſs to paſs an honeſt unbiaſſed ſentence, and hath no reaſon to truſt himſelf in matters of proper intereſt or relation.

4. This Rule hath no other variety in it but that it be managed by theſe Cautions.

1. That the man upon whom we rely, be neither ignorant nor vicious, ſo farre as we can judge, and ſo farre as relates to the preſent queſtion, that is, that he be a perſon fit to be a guide of others.

2. That relying on others proceed not out of idleneſs, and impatience to inquire our ſelves.

3. That the opinion of the other be not choſen becauſe it better ſerves my ends or humour, but upon the preceding grounds of humility and mean opinion of my ſelf, and great opinion of the other.

4. That it be onely againſt his own probable perſwaſion ſo known, ſo conſidered, not againſt a ſure conſcience; that is, that it be in ſuch a matter, in which the aſſent is but imperfect, and relying upon unſure inducements. For then he may as honeſtly truſt the others prudence as his own weakneſs, the others leiſure and conſideration, as his own want of time and aptneſſes to conſider: and ſince the actions of moſt men in the world are conducted by the wit of others in very many things, and of all men in ſome things, it cannot be imprudence to take a guide to direct the conſcience in what it is not ſufficiently inſtructed by its own proviſions.

5. If the entercourſe happen between the ſuperior and the inferior, the liberty of changing our part of the probability is confirmed by a want of liberty to diſſent. The ſubject may change his opinion, becauſe he muſt obey where ever it is poſſible that he ſhould; and that is in this caſe: in which it is not onely true that the opinion is probable in it ſelf, but that it and its contrary be both apprehended as probably true, and ſafely practicable. For then there is no excuſe to the man, and the conſcience of the article cannot be pretended againſt the conſcience of obedience; and if it be lawful to obey, it is neceſſary to obey. Hoc amo quod poſſum quâlibet vire viâ, every man loves his liberty, but this liberty does ingage our obedience; we might not obey our ſuperior if God had ingaged us in the contrary; but we may, when we are perſwaded that the contrary opinion is probable, that is, conformable to reaſon, and fit enough to guide him that is not finally determined in his conſcience to the contrary. For if it could be otherwiſe, then there were nothing to be given to authority; for in equal probabilities, it is likely if I chooſe one part, I am determined by a little thing, by a trifle, by a chance, by a humour; and if I be weighed down by never ſuch a trifle, yet I am determined to the choice of one ſide, and it will be but an evil portion to authority, if it cannot be permitted to outweigh a humour, and a chance; an ignorant confidence, or a vain preſumption: and although it will be hard ſometimes for a man to be convinced of the vanity of his argument, yet when his opinion is not onely ſpeculatively but practically probable, that is, when it is conſidered onely as probable, and the contrary altogether, or almoſt as well thought of, the arguments of the preſent perſwaſion are confeſſed to be but little, becauſe they neither perſwade, nor abuſe beyond a probability; and therefore in this caſe to out-face authority, is without pretence, as much as it is without warrant. And this is affirmed by S. Auſtin in the caſe of Souldiers under a King, taking pay in a cauſe which either is juſt, or that they are not ſure it is unjuſt. Ergo vir juſtus ſi forte etiam ſub Rege homine ſacrilego militet, rectè poteſt illo jubente bellare, ſi vice pacis ordinem ſervans, quod ſibi jubetur, vel non eſſe contra Dei præceptum certum eſt, vel utrum ſit, certum non eſt.

Lib. 22. contr. Fauſtum cap. 74. & habetur cap. Quid culpatur 23. qu. 1.

6. But if the entercourſe happen between a Phyſitian and a Patient, it is made to differ. For 1. A Phyſitian may not leave a certain way, and take an uncertain in the queſtion of life or health; In matters of meer opinion, the very perſwaſion and probability of aſſent is warrant enough for the man, and the effect is innocent; but when ſo great an intereſt is ingaged, the man becomes faſter bound by the ſtricter ties of charity. It was a complaint that Pliny made of Phyſicians in his time, Diſcunt periculis noſtris, & experientiam per mortes agunt, medicóque tantum occidiſſe impunitas ſumma eſt. It is hard that a Phyſician ſhould grow wiſer at no cheaper rate then the deaths of many Patients. Now to doe the thing directly is intolerable, but to doe that which is not our beſt, and which is not ſafe, when we have by us that which is ſafe, and which we know is uſeful, is directly againſt charity, and juſtice, and prudence, and the faithfulneſs of a good man.

But 2. When a Phyſician hath no better, he may take that courſe which is probable, for that is his beſt; he cannot be required to more, and he is excuſed, becauſe he is required to miniſter. And this is yet more certain, if the ſick perſon ſhall die without Phyſick; but it is a venture whether the medicament may prevail for his cure or no. For then all the hazard is on the favourable ſide, and if it fails, the event is no worſe; and it is charity to offer at a Cure that is uncertainly good, but is certainly not evil.

3. When the opinions are on both ſides probable, he may take that which is in any ſenſe ſafer, or in any degree, or by any means more probable, that is, for the community of the opinion, or the advantage it hath by the learning and reputation of them that hold it: ſo that he may leave his own opinion which is overcome by the greater argument, or the greater authority of another, though both the authority be leſs then that which binds, and the argument leſs then that which is certain.

Rule

RULE 12.

He that inquires of ſeveral Doctors until he finde one anſwering according to his minde, cannot by that inquiry make his Conſcience ſafe; but according to the ſubject matter, and other circumſtances he may.

1. SAint Paul remarks the folly of ſuch men who heap up Teachers of their own, that is, ſuch who preach what they deſire, and declare things lawful which God never made ſo; and he that hath entertained an opinion, and is in love with it, and will ſeek out for a kinde and an indulgent nurſe for it, cannot ordinarily be the more ſecure for the opinion of his guide, becauſe the intrinſick motive of his aſſent is not his guide, but his own purpoſes and prediſpoſing thoughts and reſolutions; and the getting of a learned man to ſay ſo, is but an artifice to quiet the ſpirit, and make it reſt in the deception if it ſo happens to be. This determination from without may poſſibly adde a phantaſtick peace, but no moment to the honeſty of the perſwaſion or conſcience, becauſe the conſcience was not ready to rely upon the authority, but reſolved to goe ſomewhere elſe for an authority, if here it could not be had: and therefore the conſcience could not be made probable by the authority, becauſe the reſolution of the conſcience was antecedent to it.

2. This is true ordinarily and regularly, and there are uſually many appendant deceptions; as an impatient deſire to have that true which I deſire, a willingneſs to be deceived, a reſolution to bring our ends about, a conſequent uſing means of being pleaſed and cozened, a concealing ſome circumſtances, and a falſe ſtating of the queſtion, which is an infallible ſign of an evil conſcience, and a minde reſolved upon the concluſion, deſirous of a ſecurity, or ſleepy quietneſs, and incurious of truth. But yet there are ſome caſes in which this changing of guides and inquiries is not onely innocent, but an inſtrument of a juſt confidence.

3. 1. When the inquirer hath very probable inducements for his opinion, and remains really unſatisfied in the anſwers and accounts of the firſt Doctors.

2. When he hath an indifferency to any part that may appear true, but it falls out that nothing does ſeem true to him but what he hath already entertained.

3. When the aſſent to our own propoſition is determined, ſo as to avoid a real doubt or perplexity, but yet a ſcruple remains, that is, ſome little degrees of confidence are wanting, which cannot be better ſupplied then by an extrinſecal argument, the authority of a wiſe man.

4. When the inquiring perſon is under a weakneſs and temptation, and wants ſome to apply his own notices to him, and to make them operative and perſwaſive upon his ſpirit; as it happens to very many men always, and to all men ſometimes.

5. When the caſe is favourable and apt for pity and releef, as in the dangers of deſpair, then the inquirer not onely may, but ought to goe till he finde a perſon that can ſpeak comfort to him upon true grounds of Scripture and revelation.

6. When the purpoſe of the inquirer is to be landed upon any virtue, and pious ſtate of life or deſign, he may receive his incouragement and final determination from him whom he chooſes for his opinion ſake, and conformity to his own pious intentions.

4. The reaſon of theſe exceptions is this: Becauſe the matter being juſt, favourable, and innocent, the man goes right, and by being confirmed in his way, receives no detriment to his ſoul or his duty; and becauſe they are tendencies to duty, it is to be preſumed that the inquirer intends honeſtly and piouſly: and now ſince the way is ſecure, and the perſon well intending, if the inſtrument of eſtabliſhing this good courſe were very incompetent, it might be an imperfection in nature, but not in morality.

Rule 13.

He that is asked concerning a caſe that is on either ſide probable, may anſwer againſt his own opinion, if the contrary be probable and more ſafe, or more expedient and favourable.

1. THE reaſon is, becauſe he that holds an opinion which himſelf beleeves onely to be probable, knows alſo there is no neceſſity in counſelling it to another, becauſe it is not certainly true; and he may rather counſel the contrary to another then follow it himſelf, becauſe himſelf is already determined, which the other is not, but is indifferent.

2. But why he ſhould rather doe ſo then counſel his own opinion, there is no reaſon in the thing, but ſomething relating to the perſon inquiring; as if the opinion which he maintains not, be more agreeable with the others circumſtances and neceſſities. Codrus inquires if he be tied to reſtitution of all the fruits of a field which he held in a dubious title. The Curate thinks it to be a probable opinion, that he is bound; but becauſe Codrus is poor, or apt to break the bridle of Religion if it holds him too hard, he may counſel him according to the opinion of them that affirm that he is not bound to reſtitution. If he be asked what his own opinion is, he muſt not ſpeak contrary to it: But when the queſtion onely is asked in order to a reſolution, he may point to goe that way where by his own ſentence he may be ſafe, and by reaſon of the others neceſſities he may be more advantaged. The reaſon of this is, becauſe when two opinions are equally probable, the ſcales are turn'd by piety, or charity, or any good thing that is of collateral regard, and therefore makes a greater degree of artificial probability, and is in ſuch caſes ſufficient for determination. For in direct reaſon the caſe is equal, and in the indirect there is great advantage on the ſide of charity, or accidental neceſſity, or compliance with any fair and juſt intereſt. Chriſtian Religion is the beſt natur'd inſtitution in the world.

3. The like caſe it is, when the opinion of the Curate is ſuch, that the inquirer will probably abuſe it to licenciouſneſs and evil miſtake; for then the Curate may prudently conceal his own ſentence, and borrow his brothers candle to light a perſon that is in danger.

Rule

RULE 14.

When the guide of ſouls is of a different opinion from his charge or penitent, he is not bound to exact conformity to his own opinion that is but probable, but may proceed according to the conſcience of the penitent.

1. THat is, ſuppoſing the opinion of the penitent to be probable, and that he did the action bonâ fide, and as an act commendable, or permitted; he is not to be troubled with what is paſt, leſt that be turned into a ſcruple which was no ſin, and leſt the Curate judge unrighteous judgement, and preſcribe afflictions for that for which God ſhall never call him to judgement; for in this caſe it is, that no man can be the judge of another mans conſcience.

2. But if the opinion of the penitent be certainly falſe, or the parent, or protector, or the occaſion of a ſin, the guide of his ſoul muſt not comply at all with it, but diſcover the error and the danger. He that kills his brother becauſe he is zealous in another opinion, and thinks he does God good ſervice, muſt not be permitted in his erring conſcience, and criminal perſwaſion; for the matter hath altered the caſe, and in the relations of duty, the error is always vincible, and therefore intolerable: and therefore Peter Lombard's Mother upon her death-bed was admoniſhed to confeſs her ſin in having three children by illegal mixtures, though ſhe was fooliſhly perſwaded it was no ſin, becauſe her ſons did prove to be ſuch excellent perſons, and inſtruments of Divine glory.

Sicut vir prudens eam definierit, is the great meaſure which Ariſtotle and all the moral Philoſophers aſſign to very many caſes and queſtions. If two caſes that ſeem equally probable, have in them different degrees of ſafety, that the ſafeſt is to be choſen is certain; but oftentimes the ſentence and opinion of a good man is the onely rule by which we judge concerning ſafety. * When piety and religion are in competition for our preſent attendance, ſometimes piety to our Parents is to be preferr'd, ſometimes an action of religion in its own ſeaſon; but what portion of our ſervices is to be allowed to the one and the other is ſicut vir prudens definierit, according as a good and a prudent man ſhall determine. * To bury the dead is good, to releeve the living poor is ordinarily better; but yet there was a time in which there was a proper ſeaſon for that, and not for this; and our bleſſed Saviour commended Maries devotion and choice in ſo doing, but when we alſo may doe one or the other, depends upon circumſtances and accidents which are not immediately the ſubject of Laws, but of prudent conſideration. * Humane Laws binde the conſcience of their Subjects, but yet give place to juſt and charitable cauſes; but which are competent and ſufficient is not expreſly and minutely declared, but is to be defined by the moderation and prudence of a good man. * That we are to be careful in the conduct of our temporal affairs, in paying of our debts, in making proviſions for our children is certain and confeſſed: but beſides the general meaſures and limits of carefulneſs deſcribed by our bleſſed Saviour, our earneſtneſs of proſecution, our acts of proviſion and labour are to be eſteemed regular or irregular by the ſentence of a wiſe and a good man. The ſignifications of love to our children and neareſt relatives, the meaſures of compliance with the faſhions of the world, the degrees of ornament or neglect in clothing, intention of our actions and paſſions, and their degrees, the uſe and neceſſities and pretences for omiſſions in good things, and generally all the accidental appendages of action are determinable onely this way; and a probability is enough to determine us; but that this is the way of introducing the probability is upon this reaſon; becauſe next to the proviſion of Laws, ſtands the man who is obedient to Laws and underſtands them, and next to the reaſon of the Law, ſtands the analogy and proportion of thoſe Laws; and therefore this is the next beſt to the Laws, it ſtands neareſt to reaſon, is the beſt guide that is left us, and therefore a proper meaſure of conſcience in the deſtitution of that which is moſt proper.

" There are many other Rules concerning the exerciſe of a probable Con-
" ſcience, in the caſes and queſtions of Kings and Prieſts, of Advocates " and Judges, in matters of Sacraments and Government, which are " to be referred to the place of their proper matter; but this is alſo to be " determined by the Rules here aſſigned, and have no particular conſi-" deration, except what meerly relates to the matter.

CHAP. V.

Of a doubtful Conſcience.

Rule I.

A doubtful Conſcience aſſents to neither ſide of the queſtion, and brings no direct obligation.

1. THE Conſcience being in its proper operations poſitive and practical; when it is neither, it is not properly and directly conſcience; and becauſe it binds to obedience by its determination and aſſent, and its conſequent inclining the will, when the underſtanding is not determined, nor the will inclined, there can no action follow, but a total ſuſpenſion of action is its proper conſequent.

2. But upon this there is onely a reflex act of Conſcience and Underſtanding; for by conſidering that our conſcience is doubtful, and indeterminable, we are obliged to ſuſpend our action; but then this is the act, not of a doubtful, but of a right conſcience, becauſe in this we are certain, and right, and determined: ſo that a doubtful conſcience is but an æquivocal and improper conſcience; like an unreſolved will, or an artiſt with his hands bound behinde him: that is, the man hath a conſcience, but it is then in chains and fetters, and he wears a hood upon his eye, and his arm in a ſtring, and is onely to be taught how to cut the knot, and to doe ſome little things of advantage, or ſecurity to his intermedial ſtate of impediment; but a doubtful conſcience can be no rule of humane actions.

3. But yet ſome collateral and indirect obligations are paſs'd upon the man by that ſtate of infelicity, according to the nature of the doubt.

4. In order to which, doubts are conſidered, either as relating to the Law, or as relating to matters of fact, viz. whether ſuch a thing be lawful or not? or whether I did ſuch an action or no, by which I am bound to reſtitution or repentance?

5. Doubts alſo are Negative, or Poſitive, that is, they are ſtill upon us becauſe there is no means to determine the underſtanding; as no man can ever be reſolved whether the number of the ſtarres be even or odde; when is the preciſe minute in which a man firſt comes to the uſe of reaſon; and this is called a Negative doubt. The Poſitive enters by the indifferency of the arguments, and their equal weight on both ſides: as if it be doubted whether the ſouls departed enjoy the beatifick viſion before the day of Judgement? whether Reſidence on a Benefice be an indiſpenſable precept, or in what caſes it obliges not? whether Eccleſiaſtical perſons be bound by juſtice or by charity to give all that they can prudently ſpare to the poor? Theſe are poſitive doubts, becauſe there are many arguments on either ſide.

6. The Negative doubt is either Metaphyſical or Moral, or it is onely a Suſpicion; that is, theſe are ſeveral degrees of ſuch a doubt, for the determination of which there is no ſufficient inſtrument.

7. Laſtly, ſometimes a doubt is placed onely in the underſtanding, without any other effect but the trouble of thoughts; and then for methods ſake, and right underſtanding of the rules of practice, it is called a ſpeculative doubt. Sometimes this doubt paſſes on to the conſcience, and hath influence upon the action or event; ſo as to be an impediment to it, or the ſpoil of it, that is, ſo as to cauſe that it ſhall not be done, or if it be done that it becomes a ſin: and this is called a practical doubt.

According to theſe diſtinctions the following Rules are uſeful in order to practice.

RULE 2.

A negative doubt neither binds to action, nor inquiry, nor repentance; but it binds onely to caution and obſervance.

1. 1. THat it binds not to action] I affirm upon the ſame ground, by which the ſame is affirmed concerning all doubting conſciences. It binds from action; for whatſoever is done with a doubting conſcience (that is, without faith, or or fulneſs of perſwaſion that it is lawful to doe it) is a ſin. S. Paul gave us the Rule, Whatſoever is not of faith is ſin. Quod dubitas nè feceris, ſaid Cicero. For if we doe it with a doubting conſcience, we doe it without our Rule, which is the dictate of our conſcience, and ſince no action is indifferent between lawful and unlawful (though between good and bad there may) to doe without our Rule of lawful and permitted is to doe againſt it, even that which is not permitted, and therefore is unlawful. Adde to this,

2. He that does not know whether it be lawful or no, does that which he is not ſure but it may be forbidden by God, and diſpleaſing to him; and to doe that which I know not but may grieve my friend, or trouble him, cannot conſent with my love to him; and therefore every act of a doubting conſcience is againſt charity. In the queſtion of lawful or unlawful, not to know it to be lawful, is to enter upon it with a minde willing to admit the unlawful; it is all one to be in the dark, as to be without a candle or a ſtarre, and either of them is as bad, as full of ignorance and obſcurity, as if we ſhut our eyes, or put the candle out. When therefore it happens that our conſcience doubts whether ſuch an act be a ſin or no, a good man will be ſure not to ſin; but in that caſe, and while the doubt remains, he can have no ſecurity, but by not doing it.

2. 2. It binds not to inquiry] becauſe there is no competent means to finde out a reſolution; for that is the ſtate of the Queſtion, that is the definition of a Negative doubt. Fabiola doubts whether in her childhood ſhe did never take Gods name in vain; and although ſhe be bound to inquire in all the reaſonable and remembred parts of her life, becauſe of them ſhe may finde ſome records, and in that caſe the doubt is not negative; yet of the ſtate of childhood ſhe cannot be obliged to make inquiry, becauſe there was then no Law, no Regiſter, no Court kept, no judgement, no choice; that is, ſhe cannot be obliged to an effect that is impoſſible, and to an act that is to no purpoſe.

3. 3. It binds not to repentance.] In caſe ſhe fears exceedingly, ſuppoſing this ſtill to be a Negative doubt, that is, ſuch a one, for the proper reſolution of which there are no competent arguments or inſtruments. Fabiola not knowing whether ſhe did or no, and it being impoſſible afterwards to finde it out, Fabiola i not tied to ask forgiveneſs for the blaſphemies of her childhood: For no obligation can come from what is not, or cannot be known.

4. This is to be underſtood to be true of that ſort of Negative doubt which it called Metaphyſical, when there is no poſſibility of knowing; as it is impoſſible to know what little prety phantaſm made us to ſmile when we hanged upon our Mothers breaſts; and the doubt is onely founded upon the poſſibility that the thing might have been, though now it be impoſſible to finde out whether it was or no. It is poſſible that being a child I might laugh at Scripture, or mock an Apoſtle; but if this could bring an obligation to an act of repentance, then the ſame obligation paſſes upon all men in all actions and periods of their lives, for all things, and in all caſes in which they doe not remember all, or did not obſerve every circumſtance, or did not conſider every minute, or weigh every degree. For in every thing there is a poſſibility that I might have done ſomething very ill.

5. But there is a Negative doubt which is called Morally negative; that is, when there is no way of being readily and clearly determined, but yet the doubt doubt is founded upon ſome light conjecture, and no more. I was tempted, or I had an opportunity, or an evil thought came croſs me, and I know my own infirmity; and this according to the degrees of the conjecture can oblige us to a general and conditional repentance; thus, if I did amiſs, God of his mercy impute it not unto me. I know not, my conſcience does not accuſe me, (ſo S. Paul) but I am not hereby juſtified; God is greater then my conſcience. By this, ſet the words of S. John, and they will determine the caſe: If our hearts condemne us not, then have we peace towards God; that is, the doubt in this matter ought to be laid down, if our hearts doe not paſs ſentence againſt us; but not ſo wholly but that we may provide againſt a danger not actually felt: We ought to be peaceful, but not too confident, when there is any probability of error and deception. The peace is warranted by S. John, the warineſs is exemplified in S. Paul.

6. 4. It does binde to caution and obſervance.] Every thing does ſo, where either there is a danger, or any is ſuſpected, or any is poſſible, or any ever was: and therefore, for this there needs no peculiar reaſon, onely according to the approach of the negative doubt to any degrees of its being poſitive; that is, to a probability that it is as we doubt, the obſervance ought to be ſtricter, and the caution more ſevere, which happens in that imperfect kinde of imperfection, in ſuſpicion, which is but the image of doubting.

7. For there is yet another ſort of doubting, which may be called a privative doubt. Titius is invited to eat with one of another communion. Firſt he checks at it, but becauſe he knows no reaſon againſt it, nor indeed did ever diſpute, or hear the queſtion diſputed, whether it be lawful or no, he goes. The queſtion is, whether he did well or no?

8. Concerning which the caſe is evident, that whatſoever is not of faith is ſin, that is, if it be not done with a perſwaſion that it is lawful. But if a man be perſwaded that he may lawfully doe any thing againſt which he knows no Law, no Commandement, no Reaſon; this is not a doubting conſcience, but a probable, and therefore need not to abate the action. * But if this alſo turn into a doubt, the caſe is altered. For he that thinks he may not doe it, or doubts whether he may or no doe a thing for which he hath no command, or no poſitive and affirmative warrant, and that it is no ſufficient reaſon or warrant for the doing it that he knows nothing againſt it, unleſs he alſo have ſomething for it; this man thus perſwaded or abuſed, may not proceed to action. For in this caſe he hath nothing for it, and one great thing againſt it, even this propoſition, That a thing is not to be done in ſuch a caſe, which is the caſe of a privative doubt. But for the thing it ſelf, the next Rule gives an account of it.

A privative doubt cannot of it ſelf hinder a man from acting what he is moved to by an extrinſick argument, or inducement that is in it ſelf prudent or innocent.

1. IT cannot of it ſelf hinder] that is, abſtracting from the circumſtance of accidental doubting or not doubting. The reaſon is, becauſe there being no Law againſt it by which he is actually ruled, and no reaſon appearing in defiance of it, that is, there being no intrinſecal diſſwaſive, the conſcience is onely left to be conducted or perſwaded by the extrinſecal.

2. For all actions are left indifferent till by a ſuperinduced Law they are reſtrained; which ſuperinduced Law wants its publication, if inculpably I have no notice of it in my conſcience. But this is to be allowed with this caution: That this entring upon actions againſt which we know no reaſon or law, be not ſudden, and violent, and careleſs, like the ruſhing of an horſe into a battel without conſideration; but that we conſider according to our ſtrength, and to our time, whether there be any reaſons for or againſt the act in queſtion, and if we finde none, let us make none; that is, let us not by our unreaſonable and impertinent doubting place a ſnare for our own feet, there where none is placed by the prohibition.

3. 2. If it be a matter that concerns the intereſt of another, let us always be the more wary, and remember, if there be nothing againſt it, there muſt be ſomething for it, either in the matter, or in the manner, either in juſtice, or in charity, or at leaſt by the ſecurities of the ſafer part, by which, if we finde no reward, yet we are ſure to finde indemnity.

4. This whole advice is of great uſe in the circumſtances of the duty that concerns the married pairs; in which the Doctors of Caſes of Conſcience have ſpoken what they pleaſe, and in many things wholly by chance or fancy; and the holy ſtate of marriage ought to be reſcued from many of their ſnares and intricacies by which they have troubled it, as will appear when I ſhall ſpeak to the Rules of that affair.

Rule 4.

In doubts of Right, or Law, we are always bound to inquire; but in doubts of fact not always.

1. THE reaſon is, becauſe ignorance of our duty is always a ſin, and therefore when we are in a perceiv'd, diſcernable ſtate of danger, he that refuſes to inquire after his duty, does not deſire to doe it.

2. In matters of fact we are bound ordinarily to inquire, becauſe we muſt not be ignorant of the ſtate of our conſciences, and what obligation there is to reſtitution, or repentance. which the more particular it is, the more perfect it is. But this I ſay, that though ordinarily it be true that we are obliged, yet in ſome caſes it may happen that it is ſafer to truſt the event of things with a general repentance, then that the conſcience of ſome men be tempted with a particular notice of the fact.

3. 1. This happens in thoſe that are weak-hearted, ſoft, and apt to every impreſſion in too deep a regard. A Caſtilian Gentleman being newly recovered from the ſad effects of a melancholy ſpirit, and an affrighting conſcience, and being entertained by ſome that waited on him with ſports and innocent paſtimes to divert his ſcaring thoughts; he with his company ſhot many arrows in a publick field at rovers: at that time there was a man kill'd, whether by his arrows or no, he knew not, and is forbidden to inquire; and his caſe had in it reaſon enough to warrant the advice: The knowledge of it could not have done him ſo much good, as it would have done him hurt; and it was better he ſhould be permitted to a doubting then to a deſpairing conſcience, as in his caſe it was too likely to have happened. It is better to be ſuſpected then to be ſeen.

4. 2. This alſo is ſo to be adviſed, when the inquiry into the doubt of fact may be prejudicial to a third perſon. A Prieſt going to the Weſt-Indies by misfortune wounds one of his company, whom with much trouble and ſorrow, he leaves to be cured of his hurt, but paſſes on to his voyage, which he finiſhed at a huge diſtance from the place of his misfortune. The Merchants come the next year that way, and he is unwilling to inquire concerning his ſick friend; deſirous he was to know good of him, but infinitely fearful leſt he be dead: Conſulting therefore with his ſuperiour in the caſe, was directed not to inquire, upon this account; becauſe if the man were dead the Prieſt would be irregular, and a whole Pariſh unprovided for, and left without rites and Sacraments, and publick offices, which then and there could not eaſily be ſupplied.

5. But in matters of right or duty inquiry muſt be made, ever, when the queſtion is of the lawfulneſs or unlawfulneſs of what is to be done; becauſe we enter upon danger, and deſpiſe our own ſafety, and are careleſs of our duty, and not zealous for God, nor yet ſubjects of Conſcience, or of the Spirit of God, if we doe not well inquire of an action we are to doe, whether it be good or bad. But when the act is done, and done with an actual perſwaſion that it was lawful, the conſcience of that perſon is not eaſily to be diſturbed, which is to be underſtood with theſe cautions:

6. 1. When the queſtion was probable on either ſide, and at the time of acting, was choſen with its juſt meaſures and proviſions; then although the complice or partner of the act doe change his opinion, and think himſelf bound to repent, yet he is not bound to trouble the other. Anthony a Gentleman of Parma being in love with Maria de Rupe, being moved with great intereſts of his perſon, and a great neceſſity, conſummates his marriage before publication, they both of them being perſwaded that it is lawful. He afterwards changes his opinion, thinks it a ſin, and repents and begs pardon, but being alſo in doubt whether he ought to tell his wife of it, was adviſed to the contrary, upon this amongſt many other concurrent reaſons, becauſe what was innocently done, cannot be condemned in that in which it was innocent: for the man himſelf ought to be ſorrowful for his being deceived (if he thinks he was) but he cannot be tied to repent of the act, which ſuppoſing his then preſent perſwaſion was lawful, becauſe done according to a probable conſcience: and therefore much leſs ought he to diſturb the peace of his wife, whoſe perſwaſion remains the ſame as at firſt. What was not a ſin at firſt, cannot in that individual act become a ſin afterwards.

7. 2. This is alſo to be underſtood, when the act leaves no evil effect, or hath done no hurt to a third perſon; but if it doe, then my peace is not to be bought at the expence of anothers evil. No man is to be made better or left ſo, by anothers detriment; and therefore if a child were begotten in that unripe and haſty conſummation, and that child ſhould be declared baſtard, then the peace is to be diſturbed, and the inquiry on all hands to be curious and buſy, becauſe in all ſuch caſes there is ſomething of duty for the future concerned in it; ſometimes reſtitution, but always repentance in particular.

3. This

8. 3. This is alſo true when the fact that is paſt is not introductive of more and new inſtances; for if it was the wrong ſide of the probability which was choſen, and the ſame kinde of action is to return often, there the conſcience though heartily perſwaded, muſt be awakened from its ſecurity by him that beleeves it to be a ſin that was done, and then the intereſted party muſt inquire; the reaſon of this is, becauſe this concerns the future, and all the world when they enter upon action muſt inquire anew when they have reaſon to doubt anew, and they may be call'd upon, and muſt be better informed by them that can and are concerned. For the honour of God and the intereſt of his ſervice is in this caſe concerned, which in the other is not, when it onely relates to a ſingle and a paſt action, which was then lawful, and therefore will not afterwards be imputed.

9. 4. When the perſon intereſted does of himſelf doubt whether the paſt act was lawful or not, and deſires to be ſatisfied, and that there will be no evil effect in the alteration of his perſwaſion, then it is fit he be complied with in that which he judges to be for the intereſt of his ſoul, for this is certainly the better; the other way of concealing and not inquiring being onely permitted in ſome caſes, and with ſo many cautions and reſervations as are before expreſſed.

Rule 5.

In doubts the ſafer part is to be choſen.

1. WHen the Conſcience is doubtful, neither part can be choſen till the doubt be laid down; but to chooſe the ſafer part is an extrinſecal means inſtrumental to the depoſition of the doubt, and changing the conſcience from doubtful to probable. This Rule therefore does properly belong to the probable conſcience: for that the conſcience is poſitively doubtful is but accidental to the queſtion and appendant to the perſon. For the reaſons on either ſide make the conſcience probable, unleſs fear, or ſome other accident make the man not able to reſt on either ſide. For in matters of conſcience it is as hard to finde a caſe ſo equally probable that a man ſhall finde nothing without, or within to determine him, as it is to finde that which the Philoſophers call, Temperamentum ad pondus, a conſtitution ſo equal that no part ſhall excel the other. For if there were nothing in the things to diſtinguiſh them, yet in the man there is a natural propenſity which will make him love one ſort of arguments more then another. What can be more indifferent then to ſee two dogges fight? and yet no man ſees their cruelty, but he wiſhes better to one then to another: and although no opinions are ſo very even, yet if they were, the man hath an acquiſite, or elſe a natural biaſs, or ſomething of contingency that will determine him: and if the conſcience remains undetermined, ſo that he may not, or dare not venture upon either part, it is certainly a diſeaſe, or a direct infirmity. And becauſe ſuch perſons can doe nothing at all till their doubtful is changed into a probable conſcience, this diſcourſe muſt relate to that conſcience that is probable, though in compliance with the uſual ways of ſpeaking, I have placed it here.

2. 1. The Rule therefore is to be underſtood to be good advice, but not neceſſary in all caſes. For when the contrary opinion is the more probable, and this the

the more ſafe, to doe this is a prudent compliance, either with a timorous or with an ignorant conſcience; it is always an effect of piety, and a ſtrong will to good, but very often an effect of a weak underſtanding,; that is, ſuch an one which is inclined to ſcruple, and dares not truſt the truth of his propoſition, or God with his ſoul in the purſuance of it. And indeed ſometimes there is in this ſome little ſuſpicion of the event of things which muſt needs reflect upon the goodneſs of God, under whom we fancy we cannot be ſo ſafe by purſuing that rule and guide that he hath given us, that is, the beſt reaſon, and the faireſt inducement, as we may be by relying upon the ſureneſs of the matter. Indeed we our ſelves are ſo wholly immerged in matter that we are conducted by it, and its relations in very many things: But we may as well rely upon formalities and ſpiritual ſecurities (if we underſtood them) as upon the material; and it is as ſafe to rely upon the ſurer ſide of reaſon as upon the ſurer ſide of the thing. Now that which is the more probable hath the ſame advantage in conſtituting a conſcience formally ſafe, as the other leſs probable but ſurer ſide hath for the making the conſcience ſafe materially.

3. 2. If the conſcience be probable, and ſo evenly weighed that the determination on either ſide is difficult, then the ſafer ſide is ordinarily to be choſen, becauſe that helps to outweigh and determine the ſcale; that is, when reaſon and the proper motives of the queſtion are not ſufficient to determine it, let auxiliaries be taken from without, and if the conſcience be not made ſecurer by its rule, let it be made ſafe by the material. It is juſt as the building of an houſe. If the Architect be not wiſe and knowing how to ſecure the fabrick by rules of art, and advantages of complication, and the contexture of parts, let him ſupport it with pillars great and maſſy; for if the other be wanting, theſe will ſuſtain the roof ſure enough, but with ſome rudeneſs in the thing, and imperfection in the whole.

4. 3. If to that which is the ſurer ſide there be a great inconvenience conſequent, the avoiding of that inconvenience being laid on the oppoſite even part, will outweigh the conſideration of the ſafety. Quintus Milo commands his ſervant Anſidius whom he had taken for the teaching Grammar and Rhetorick to his children, that he would learn the Trade of a Shoo-maker. Anſidius doubts whether his Maſter Q. Milo hath power to command him to doe that which was no part of the imployment for which he was entertained, and yet becauſe the thing is of it ſelf lawful and honeſt, he conſiders it is the ſafeſt courſe for him to obey, for certainly in ſo doing he ſins not; and thus farre he is bound, and was in the right. But if to learn that mean Trade will diſhonour and diſable him, make him a fool and contemptible, and ruine his hopes and his intereſts when he leaves the ſervice of Milo, the ſervant is not tied to follow that which is more ſafe, but that which is more charitable and prudent; In dubiis juris tutior pars ſequenda eſt, & obedire teneor, ſi commodè poſſim, was the rule: becauſe the reaſon abſtractedly conſidered makes the queſtion ſafe on either ſide, as the determination happens; and the avoiding an intolerable inconvenience is as conſiderable as the accidental ſecurity, and in many caſes more complying with charity, becauſe in a queſtion in which the conſcience is probable there is a great ſafety without taking in the advantage of a ſafe matter, by the proper efficacy and influence of the reaſon making a probable and an honeſt conſcience; but then when the ſafety is provided for fairly otherways, and for the moſt part ſufficiently, and the inconvenience on the other ſide is not provided for; in all ſuch caſes we muſt leave that which is materially ſure, for the choice of that which in its formality is equally sure, and in its matter more charitable. A little child came to my door for alms, of whom I was told he was run from his Mothers house and his own honest imployment; but in his wandring he was almost starv'd: I found that if I releeved him, he would not return to his Mother, if I did not releeve him, he would not be able: I considered that indeed his souls interests were more to be regarded and secured then his body, and his sin rather to be prevented then his sickness, and therefore not to releeve him seem'd at first the greater charity. But when I weighed against these considerations, that his sin is uncertain, and future, and arbitrary, but his need is certain, and present, and natural; that he may choose whether he will sin or no, but cannot in the present case choose whether he will perish or no; that if he be not releeved he dies in his sin, but many things may intervene to reform his vicious inclination; that the natural necessity is extreme, but that he will sin is no way necessary, and hath in it no degrees of unavoidable necessity; and above all, that if he abuses my releef to evil purposes which I intended not, it is his fault, not mine, but the question being concerding my duty not his, and that to releeve him is my duty and not his, and that therefore if I doe not releeve him, the sin is also mine and not his; and that by bidding of him to doe his duty I acquit my self on one side, but by bidding him to be warm and fed, I cannot be acquitted on the other, I took that side which was at least equally sure and certainly more charitable.

5. This also happens in the matter of justice very often. It is the surer side in many cases to restore, and is a testimony of an honest minde, that to secure its eternal interest, will quit the temporal. But if to restore will undoe a man, and the case is indifferent, or at least probable that he is not bound, then it is not necessary to restore, though to restore be the surer side; and if the interest of a third person, as of wife, or children, be also involved in the question, then the inquiring person is bound not to restore. Because in the present case there is a certain uncharitablenes's, and but an uncertain justice, that is, a duty certainly omitted, for the securing of another that is not certain.

6. 4. When the more probable is also the more safe, there is no question but the safer is to be chosen. For so, the conscience is made the more sure both materially and formally; that is, by the better reason and the more advantageous matter, and he that does otherwise, exposes himself to an evident danger of sinning, having nothing to out ballance either the direct reason, or the accidental safety.

7. 5. Sometimes it happens that what is safe in one regard, is dangerous in another, and on each side of the probability there is a danger and a safety. Vittoria Columbina a Venetian Lady was married to five Magnifico's successively; and they all being dead, and she left very rich, young, and tempted to a sixth marriage, advises with her Confessor whether or no she may lawfully doe it? he tels her that it is not onely probable, but certain that she may; but it were better if she kept her Widdowhood, and after so much sense of mortality retire to Religion. But that he may determine her case with more certainty she tels him, she had once resolved with her self to live a Widow, but finds she shall not be free from temptation in that state, and desires him to tell her if she may lawfully marry, notwithstanding that resolution, which now to be something altered, he perceives by her question. * He answers, that it is the sureſt course to determine for chastity and abstinence, her state of Widowhood being more certainly pleasing then the other. But then she hints hints her temptation, and asks if ſome ſure courſe is not to be taken for her being ſecured in that point too? * This arreſts his thoughts upon a new conſideration, but the reſult is this:

8. 1. When there are two ſecurities to be provided for, one of the thing, and the other of the perſon; that of the perſon is firſt to be provided for. It is the ſafer part of the queſtion to determine on the ſide of chaſtity, or virginity, or widdowhood, but this may be the unſafer ſide to the perſon, who if he ſuffers temptation is to be provided for by that anſwer which gives him remedy and eaſe.

9. 2. But if it happens that there is danger on either ſide to the perſon, that is the ſurer ſide which provides againſt that temptation which is ſtrongeſt and moſt imminent, and which if it prevails is of the worſt conſequence.

10. 3. This is alſo to be underſtood in thoſe caſes when temporal life is offered in queſtion againſt the danger of a ſin. Michael Verinus a yong Gentleman of Spain, by reaſon of his living a ſingle life was preſs'd with ſo great inconvenience that he fell into a lingring and dangerous ſickneſs. The Phyſicians adviſe him to uſe his remedy, though he be not married, and being it was in order to his health, which was not elſe to be recovered, they preſumed it lawful, or did not care whether it were or no, but however they adviſe him to it. He doubts of it, and dares not be uncharitable and die for want of remedy, if he might have it, and yet dares not commit an act of uncleanneſs; but finding on either hand a ſin threatning him, and if he flies from a Lion he meets a Bear, or is told that a Bear is in the way: he at laſt flies from the evil beaſt that ſtood before him, and chooſes that way which was evidently the ſafeſt, not to his health, but to his ſalvation; not to his body, but his ſoul, and choſe rather to die, then to doe that which he was certainly perſwaded to be a ſin, and of the other he was not ſo ſure.

Sola Venus potuit lento ſuccurrere morbo,
Nè ſe pollueret, maluit ille mori.

In other things, the prudence of a guide muſt be his onely Rule.

The ſumme is this:

11. 1. If the doubt be equal and the danger equal, the doubt muſt be laid aſide, or there can be no action conſequent: and for the danger, if you chooſe one, you may chooſe either, for there is no difference; a dagger or a ſword is all one to him that muſt die by one.

12. 2. If the doubt be unequal and the danger equal, the reſolution muſt be on that ſide where there is the moſt confidence, that is, where the leſs cauſe of doubting is apprehended; as if I have but enough to give one alms, and I ſee two ready to periſh, and I can releeve but one; the danger is equal, for paſce fame morientem, ſi non paviſti, occidiſti, ſaid S. Ambroſe, but one is my friend, and the other is a ſtranger; in this caſe the doubt is unequal, and I ought to preferre my friend.

13. 3. If the danger be unequal, and the doubt equal, the reſolution muſt be made in compliance with our ſafety. For there is nothing to weigh down in the doubt, yet there is ſomething to weigh down in the danger, and that is ſufficient.

14. 4. If the doubt be unequal, and the danger unequal, there we muſt take the leaſt danger, though on the leaſt ſide of the probability, becauſe there can no degree of ſin be conſented to; and therefore when by our own fault or infelicity we muſt be forced to fall upon one, we muſt take the leſs, by the ſame reaſon for which we are to refuſe all that we can. Mævius Caligarius a Roman Gentleman and newly converted to Chriſtianity, obſerves that his friend Agricola was purſued by his enemies unto death, and was by them asked concerning him whether he were in his houſe or no. He knew he was, but knows alſo that if he confeſſes it he ſhall die. He doubts whether it be lawful to lie to ſave his friends life or no, and cannot reſolve whether it be or no, but inclines rather to think it is not lawful. But he conſiders if it be lawful, then he is guilty of his friends death, who refuſed to ſave him at an innocent charge. But if it be not lawful, he does but tell an officious lie, ſo long as the doubt remains, he muſt rather venture upon an uncertain ſin in the officious lie, then the uncertain but greater ſin of homicide. Theſe are the caſes in which the danger is on both ſides.

15. 5. But if there be danger on one ſide onely, and a doubt on both ſides, there is no queſtion but that ſide is to be choſen where there is no danger; unleſs the doubt on one ſide be contemptible and inconſiderable, and the other not ſo.

It is lawful for the Conſcience to proceed to action againſt a doubt that is meerly ſpeculative.

1. IN a ſure Conſcience the ſpeculative and the practical are the ſame in certain conſequence, as I have already proved in its own place; but in a doubting Conſcience the caſe is differing. For though it be ordinarily true here alſo that he that doubts ſpeculatively does alſo doubt practically; as if he doubts concerning all uſurarious contracts, whether it be lawful or no to uſe any, he doubts alſo concerning this which himſelf uſes, if it be uſurarious. But becauſe there may intervene a ſpecial caſe, and that which is true in general may be altered in the particular, it may happen that he may be certain and determined in the particular when he is not ſo in the general; that is, when the caſe is ſpecial, by privilege, or exemption, or the ceaſing of the reaſon, or by any other ſpecial caſe he may think himſelf acquitted, when yet the action is culpable in its whole kinde.

Chap. 2. Rule 3.

2. But by a ſpeculative doubt ſometimes is meant not the general, but the queſtion abſtracted from circumſtances; and in this it ſometimes happens that though the conſcience doubt concerning the queſtion, yet it does not doubt concerning the practice. Titius is poſſeſſed of a field on which he entred by inheritance, and wholly without fraud and violence; but yet upon ſome ſupervening notices he afterwards doubts whether the field be his own by a juſt title; but becauſe he is informed by his Confeſſor and others on whom he does and may rely, that poſſeſſion is a collateral title, and that what he ſo poſſeſſes he may ſtill dwell upon till it be certain that it is not his own; he reſts at quiet in his minde, becauſe poſſeſſion is ſtronger then his doubt, though it cannot prevail againſt demonſtration.

Mary

3. Mary of Rhemes the wife of a Souldier is told by his Captain that her huſband was kill'd at the battel of Pavy; after her year of mourning was expired ſhe marries again to a Citizen of Rhemes, and cohabites with him two year; after which ſhe is told that her firſt husband eſcaped to Tarentum, and there lives in obſcurity. Upon this ſhe doubts whether the Citizen be really her husband or no; yet living with him he demands her to pay her conjugal duty, ſhe inquires whether during this doubt ſhe may or no; and is anſwered affirmatively upon the ſame grounds: The Citizen is in poſſeſſion of the marriage, and this is not to be diſturbed by a doubt, but by a certainty, eſpecially ſince the doubt is but a ſpeculative doubt, not a practical. For it is no good argument to ſay, I doubt whether this man be my husband or no, therefore if I conſent to him I commit adultery; for the preſumption lying upon the poſſeſſor, though his title be dubious, yet his poſſeſſion is not, and either of them both are to have a portion in the effect, and therefore the certain poſſeſſion in a dubious title is to be preferred before a dubious title without poſſeſſion, and therefore this kinde of doubt ought not to hinder the effect of the preſent duty. For in this caſe it is not true; The antecedent is doubtful, therefore ſo is the conſequent. For as out of falſhood truth may come, ſo out of doubts may come certainty. I ſee a great way off Father Grimaldi moving his lips; I ſuppoſe he is diſputing, whom yet I was told not to be alive. I argue thus: He diſputes, therefore he is not dead. The conſequent is certain, but the antecedent doubtful; ſo it is in the preſent caſe. I doubt whether this woman be and ought to be my wife, but becauſe ſhe is legally ſo and ſo reputed and in poſſeſſion, I doe inferre that therefore I muſt pay my duty to her, till it be certain that ſhe is not my wife. For though I doubt of the perſon whether or no ſhe be my wife, yet I am certain, or I may be certain of this, that he that approaches to her who is in poſſeſſion of marriage may doe it lawfully; he onely does fornicate who approaches to her of whom I am certain that ſhe is not my wife. But if of this propoſition alſo I doubt, the doubt is practical, and I may not doe it, till by ſome means the doubt be reſolved or laid aſide. But ſo long as it is a queſtion ſpeculative, the action may be determinate and lawful, and introduced upon many accounts.

4. For the fuller manifeſtation of which ſecret, becauſe it is of great concernment, and hath influence upon the conſcience in many great actions and entercourſe of humane ſociety, it is remarkable that we cannot argue thus; This man is not bonæ fidei poſſeſſor, a poſſeſſor by a juſt faith, therefore he poſſeſſes it malâ fide, by an unjuſt: So neither does this follow, This man poſſeſſes it not with an evil faith, therefore he poſſeſſes it with a good faith. It does neither way follow negatively. But this conſequence is good; He is a poſſeſſor by a good faith, therefore he does not poſſeſs it by an evil. Or, he is a poſſeſſor by an evil faith, therefore he does not poſſeſs it by a good; it follows either way affirmatively. The reaſon of the difference is this; If it be good it cannot be bad, and if it be bad it cannot be good; if it be one, it cannot be the other, but it may happen that it may be neither good nor bad, for there is a medium or a third between good and bad faith or honeſty of poſſeſſion; and this conſiſts in a ſpeculative doubt, by which the poſſeſſor doubts whether that which is in his hands be in his right, or belongs to him or to another; and that he who ſo doubts hath neither good nor bad faith is expreſſed by the gloſs in l. 1. C. de acq. poſſ. gl. in l. 2. ff. pro ſolut. & gl. in l. 3. §. generaliter ff. de acq. poſſ.

5. The conſequent of which is this, That becauſe that he who ſo doubts is not bonæ fidei poſſeſſor, therefore he cannot from thence begin to preſcribe or to acquire a juſt title, becauſe of the rule of the Law, Quod ab initio non valuit, progreſſu temporis valere non debet, and it cannot by time get ſtrength to walk which enters into the world without feet; now the doubting conſcience is but a lame ſupporter. But yet becauſe ſuch a conſcience which onely hath this ſpeculative doubt is not malæ fidei poſſeſſor, therefore he may lawfully ſtill retain the poſſeſſion till the contrary be evicted.

There is this onely to be added, that although preſcription or other ways of juſt title cannot begin with a doubting conſcience, yet if it entred with a throughly perſwaded conſcience, it may goe on though it be diſquieted by a ſupervening doubt. The reaſon is, becauſe it having lawful Parents of its birth and firſt production, cannot be kill'd and deſtroyed by a ſuit at Law, it began well, and therefore had juſt principles of its progreſſion; and whatſoever hath the firſt advantage of juſt and reaſonable, is always to be ſo preſum'd till the contrary be proved; a doubt therefore may make the man unquiet, and tie him to inquire, but cannot interrupt the poſſeſſion or the beginning and growing title. Beſides the reaſon, this ſentence is confirm'd by the concurring teſtimonies of Bartolus, Imola, Sylveſter, Felinus, Balbus, and Johannes Hannibal, under their titles de præſcriptionibus & uſucapionibus.

6. There are ſome accidental hardneſſes to the conſcience which are innocent, and becauſe beſides the even meaſures of good and evil by lawful and unlawful, there are ſome paths chalked out to us by neceſſities, by conveniences, by preſumptions, by ſecurities, and other indefinite aims at things which can ſometimes weigh down the beſt of our imperfect conjectures in ſome obſure caſes, we may as well walk by the light of the ſtarres, and better too, then to walk quite in the dark; and not onely the Sun is appointed to rule the day, but there are the Moon and the Stars to govern the night: plain and eaſy Rules make a ſure conſcience, but the doubtful and the dark muſt be content with a leſs light.

7. For, unlearned men are oftentimes beſet with the arguments of a talking man, which they cannot anſwer, but create a ſpeculative doubt, and ſuch as deſtroys all the certainty of evidence which they had; but if they ſhould not ſtick to their own concluſion in deſpight of all the objections, by a certainty of adheſion, they might be diſturbed in every thing, and confident in nothing, and might if they met with a Heretick be fool'd out of their Religion, and quit the moſt material parts of their beleef. And even the learned have in many articles a preſumptive aſſent to their propoſitions; and if they be made to doubt in their underſtanding by the oppoſition of an adverſary, they are not inſtantly to change their practice, but to inquire further. For if after every ſuch doubting their practice muſt be inſecure or criminal, they might be forc'd to a lightneſs greater then that of the Egyptian Prieſts: and ſome men can beleeve well, and diſpute ill, but yet their faith muſt not change at the argument of every Sophiſter. In theſe caſes the practice is made ſecure by a collateral light, and he is defended from change by reputation, and cuſtome, by fear of ſcandal, and the tie of Laws, and by many other indirect inſtruments of determination, which although they cannot out-wit the crntrary arguments, yet they ought to outweigh the doubt, and guide the will, and rule the conſcience in ſuch caſes.

8. There is nothing but a weak man may doubt of, but if he be well, he muſt not change his foot, till it be made certain to him that he is deceived; let him conſider what he pleaſe, and determine at leiſure; let him be ſwift to hear, but ſlow to ſpeak, and ſlower yet in declaring by his action and changed courſe, that that his doubt hath prevailed upon him. I knew a Scholler once who was a man of a quick apprehenſion, and eaſy to receive an objection, who when he read the Romane Doctors was very much of their opinion, and as much againſt them when he read their adverſaries, but kept himſelf to the Religion of his Country, concerning which at all times he remembred that there were rare arguments and anſwers reſpectively, though he could not then think upon them. * There are temptations of faith and opinion, and they are to be reſiſted ſometimes by indirect ways of proceeding, and artifices of the ſpirit; and ſometimes men in ſickneſs are afflicted with doubting and trembling conſciences, but yet are ſupported onely with general remembrances, they conſider that there are comforts, and excellent promiſes, and inſtruments of hope, and wiſe and holy ſayings by which they were nurſed up to that height of ſtrength, that they are now able to fight in the dark: If the ſpeculative doubting conſcience ſhould always prevail in practice, the ignorant might be abuſed and miſerable in all things, and the learned in moſt.

RULE 7.

Every dictate and judgement of the Conſcience, though it be little and leſs material, is ſufficient and may be made uſe of for the depoſition of a doubt.

1. EVery little reaſon is not ſufficient to guide the will, or to make an honeſt or a probable Conſcience, as I have proved in the foregoing Chapter*; but in a doubting conſcience, that is, where there are ſeemingly great reaſons of either ſide, and the conſcience not able to determine between them, but hangs like a needle between two load-ſtones, and can goe to neither, becauſe it equally inclines to both; there it is, that any little dictate that can come on one ſide and turn the ſcale is to be admitted to counſel and to action; for a doubt is a diſeaſe in conſcience, like an irreſolution in action, and is therefore to be removed at any juſt rate, and any excuſe taken rather then have it permitted. For even to waſh in Jordan may cure a leproſy, and a glaſs of wine may eaſe the infirmities of the ſtomack and he is too ceremonious in the matter of life and death, that ſtands upon puntilio's with nature, and will not be cured but by rich medicines. For in a doubting conſcience the immediate cure is not to chooſe right, that is the remedy in an erring conſcience; but when the diſeaſe or evil, is doubting, or ſuſpenſion, the remedy is determination; and to effect this, whatſoever is ſufficient may be choſen and uſed.

* Rule 7.

2. Every conſcience that proceeds probably, proceeds honeſtly, unleſs by a greater probability it be engaged againſt the leſs; now to make a conſcience that is probable, yet even more probable, a little advantage is ſufficient; which is to be underſtood with theſe cautions:

3. 1. When the doubt is equal and the danger alike on either ſide, then a ſmaller ſuperfætation of argument will doe the work, that is, cure the doubting; for though a little argument is not alone a ground for the action of a wiſe man, yet a little overplus of reaſon will take off this calamity of irreſolution and trepidation;

pidation; it is not enough to out weigh any danger, but it can with the portion of the equal meaſures which ſtand on its own ſide, by its little weight caſt the ballance.

4. 2. This is not ſo eaſily to be admitted when the judgement of the man is diſcernably and perceivably little and not to be truſted, for then the ſuperaddition that is made by him to any part of the doubt may be as wholly inconſiderable as the doubt it ſelf is troubleſome; and though this may make the doubt to be laid aſide, as it will alſo determine ſuch a man in the whole traverſe of the queſtion, yet it is the worſt remedy of the doubt, and an inſufficient introduction of the probability. In this caſe the doubt is to be laid aſide by the advice and authority of ſome perſon fit to lead him, rather then by the confidence of his own little ſuperadded impertinency. For indeed it is not good to have the ſacredneſs of a conſcience governed by weakneſs and contingency.

5. 3. When the doubting perſon is inconſtant, let him not ſpeedily act what he lightly determines by the ſudden intervening humor; for he that changes quickly, judges lightly, but fancies ſtrongly, and acts paſſionately, and repents ſpeedily and often; therefore let ſuch a man when he perceives his own infirmity ſtop at the gates of action, leſt the laying down one doubt, multiply many, and he become more miſerable in his remedy then in his ſickneſs.

6. In purſuance of this Rule it is to be taken care of that fear be not miſtaken for doubt; for there is oftentimes a doubt no where but in the Will, and the more ſlender and weak the judgement is, oftentimes the fear is greater; and ſometimes they fear becauſe they fear, and not becauſe they have reaſon; when therefore the doubt does not rely upon ſuch a reaſon as can be formed into an argument and diſcourſe, but is an unreaſonable trouble, and an infinite nothing; the doubt ought directly to be laid aſide, for it is no way conſiderable, but onely that it is a conſiderable trouble.

Rule 8.

When two precepts contrary to each other meet together about the ſame queſtion, that is to be preferred which binds moſt.

1. THIS Rule we learn from the eighth Councel of Toledo, Ubi periculi neceſſitas compulerit, id debemus reſolvere quod minori nexu noſcitur obligari. Quid autem ex his levius, quidve ſit gravius, pietatis acumine inveſtigemus. The Councel inſtances in the keeping wicked oaths and promiſes, where though the inſtance be miſtaken, and that in the matter of wicked promiſes the caſe is not perplexed, and it is no ſin to break them, but a ſin to keep them; yet upon ſuppoſition that the conſcience is doubtful whether it be lawful to break them, and whether it be lawful to keep them, and fears a ſin on either ſide, the Councel hath given a right anſwer, the evil that is leaſt is to be choſen. Etenim dum perjurare compellimur, creatorem quidem offendimus, ſed nos tantummodo maculamus. Cùm verò noxia promiſſa complemus, & Dei juſſa ſuperbè contemnimus, & proximis impiâ crudelitate nocemus, & nos ipſos crudeliori gladio trucidamus. He " that having ſworn to doe an evil turn breaks his oath, offends God by put« ting his name to a lie and a villany, and he pollutes his own ſoul: But he « that keeps his oath when he hath ſo ſworn, deſpiſes the Commandements of « God, and hurts his neighbour with an impious cruelty, and deſtroys him- « ſelf with a worſe.] On this ſide therefore there being the more and worſe evils then on the other, we muſt decline furtheſt from this. For if all evil is to be avoided, then all degrees of evil are; and when we cannot avoid as much as we ſhould, we muſt avoid as much as we can. We muſt chooſe none directly, but when we are forced upon ſome by our own infelicity or fault, it is the beſt remedy for the Gangrene that we loſe our arm or legge, and he that is in the fatal neceſſity, no otherwiſe can be permitted to chooſe a ſin, then he is ſuppoſed to be deſirous to be cut of the ſtone, when upon any terms he reſolves he never will or can endure the torments of the diſeaſe. The great reaſon of this rule is that which was given by Ariſtotle, ἐν ἀγαθῷ γὰρ λόγῳ γίνεται τὸ ἔλαττον κακὸν πρὸς τὸ μεῖζον κακόν ἔστι γὰρ τὸ ἔλαττον κακὸν μᾶλλον αἱρετὸν τοῦ μείζονος. τὸ δ' αἱρετὸν, ἀγαθὸν, καὶ τὸ μᾶλλον μεῖζον, the leſs evil in reſpect of the greater evil is to be accounted good; becauſe the leſs evil is rather to he choſen then the greater; and what is in any ſenſe eligible is in ſome ſenſe good, and that which is more eligible is a greater good. Lib. 5. cap. 7. Ethic.

2. But it ſeems ſomething harder to inquire concerning this caſe when it relates to others: for ſo it uſes to be asked;

Queſt.

WHether it be lawful to adviſe, to counſel, to petition, to determine, to make uſe of the doubt of another, or his neceſſity, or perplexity, and to call upon him to doe that which is a ſin? The caſe is this; Pollio an intemperate and wanton young man falls into adulteries and unnatural luſts; his friend Publius Aſinius adviſes him, not ſo, but if he will not leave his vileneſs, better it is to ſatisfy his luſt by ſingle fornication, and the leſs harmful complications:

Et quas Euphrates, & quas mihi mittit Orontes Me capiant, nolo furta pudica thori.

whether or no Publius does well or no in giving this advice, is the queſtion? The reaſons of doubting are theſe: * Becauſe he that adviſes evil is guilty of the ſin which he procures; and he that any way conſents or induces another to ſin, ſhall be partner in the puniſhment.

3. To this I anſwer, That in the whole entercourſe there are to be conſidered the formal ſin, the material part of the action, and the degrees of the obliquity. The formal part, or the ſinfulneſs cannot, muſt not be countenanced, or aſſiſted at all, directly or indirectly; and in the preſent caſe it is ſo farre from being countenanced, that it is reduced to as little a proportion as it can, as near to a deſtruction as the preſent neceſſity or perplexity will permit, and it is out of hatred to the obliquity or ſinfulneſs that this leſſer way is propounded. Pilate ſeeing the Jews reſolved to doe a ſpight to the holy and moſt innocent Jeſus, propounded to them a leſſer way then murdering him; I will ſcourge him, and let him goe. Pilates conſcience was not perplexed, though his intereſt was, and therefore there was no neceſſity for him to doe either, and neither ought he to have propounded the leſſer evil, which it may be themſelves did not deſign: indeed if they were reſolved to doe one, he might have perſwaded the leſs, not abſolutely (for nothing could have made that lawful) but comparatively, that is, rather that then the other, if ye will doe one.

2. But

4. 2. But for the material part of the action, if it be already prepared, and the malice known and declared, it is lawful to propound a leſs inſtance of the ſin without perſwading to it; which is to be underſtood with theſe cautions:

1. That it be onely with a purpoſe of hindring a greater.

2. When the leſſer cannot be hindred, but at leaſt ſo much muſt be done by way of redemption. As if Caius reſolves to raviſh a Matron to ſatisfy his luſt, it is lawful to divert his luſt upon a common proſtitute, who ſells her ſoul for bread; becauſe her malice is always ready and watches for an opportunity, and ſins no leſs if ſhe wants opportunity which ſhe thirſts after.

3. That it be ever without the prejudice of a third perſon: As if one of the Banditi intends to kill one man, and this happens to be offered to a publick and a brave man, it is not lawful to point out his ſword to the ſtriking of a meaner perſon to ſave the other, becauſe though in reſpect of the effect it be a leſs evil, yet it is a direct uncharitableneſs to a third, which can receive no warrant or legitimation by the intention of the propounder; for although he intends that a leſs evil be done for the publick, yet he intends a greater evil to the particular.

4. That it be in a caſe certainly known where the malice is apparent and declared, and the matter prepared: for thus we ſee that God who ſees the hearts of men, diverts their prepared malice upon ſome ſpecial matter which ſerves the ends of his providence, and verifies the prophecies of God, and ſo brings his deſigns to effect, and a certain event by contingent or voluntary inſtruments. But we may no further imitate this, then we can attain to little portions of the knowledge of mens private and particular purpoſes.

5. 3. But as for the degrees of the obliquity or irregularity, it is certain, none is to be perſwaded or aſſiſted directly, but ſuffered in the whole, and perſwaded in the inſtance by way of remedy againſt the greater and more intolerable. Thus Moſes permitted divorces, that the Jews might not commit open and frequent adulteries, or kill their wives when they grew weary of them. Thus an inconvenience is ſuffered rather then a miſchief ſhall be introduced: and ſome fooleries and weak uſages are ſuffered in ſome Churches, rather then by reforming them, make the ignorant people think all Religion is indifferent: and if all the people of the Greek Church did perceive that any of their old cuſtomes were fit to be reſcinded, they would upon the ſame eaſineſs quit their whole Religion and turn Turks. And though an error is not to be permitted in any Church when it can be peaceably amended, and when it cannot it is, as often as it can be, peaceably to be diſcouraged; yet when the neceſſity is great, and the evil feared is certain, and felt and is intolerable; it is a ſad neceſſity, but no man can help it, and therefore it muſt be as it may, the leſſer error is to be endured till it can be remedied, with a remedy that is not worſe then the diſeaſe.

Queſt.

6. UPon this occaſion, and for the reducing the Rule to practice, and to regulate a caſe which now adays happens too frequently; it is not amiſs to inquire concerning the neceſſities of women married to adulterous and moroſe vile-natur'd husbands; Whether it be lawful for a wife out of a deſire to live with ſome degree of a tolerable comfort, to connive at her husbands ſtollen pleaſures, and to permit him quietly to enjoy his folly? and what is a womans duty, and what were her moſt prudent courſe, and manner of deportment?

Some

7. Some of great reputation in the Chureh of God both of old and later times put a ſpeedy period to this inquiry, and abſolutely condemne it as unlawful for a man or woman to live with their husband or wife reſpectively, if either of them be notoriouſly guilty of adultery. Of this opinion was S. Hierom, In 19 Matth. ſaying that a man is ſub maledictione ſi adulteram retineat, he is under a curſe if he retains an adultereſs in his embraces. And S. Chryſoſtom; Sicut crudelis & iniquus eſt qui caſtam dimittit, ſic fatuus & iniquus qui retinet meretricem. Patronus enim turpitudinis eſt qui celat crimen Uxoris. As he is cruel and unjuſt who puts a chaſt wife from him, ſo he is unjuſt and a fool that keeps a harlot. For he is a Patron of his wives turpitude. who conceals his wives adultery. And this they prove out of Solomon; Qui tenet adulteram ſtultus eſt; almoſt the Prov. 18. 22. words which S. Chryſoſtom uſes. He is a fool that keeps an adultereſs: ἀσεβὴς it is in the Greek LXX. He is an ungodly man. And of the ſame opinion was Bucer in the laſt age, who for his opinion brings two arguments which are not contemptible. The firſt is taken from Deuter. 24.4. where God enjoyns that if a man puts away his wife, he muſt at no hand receive her again, quia ipſa polluta eſt, ſhe is defiled, meaning if any man elſe hath lien with her: and if this be a good reaſon, it will conclude ſtronger, that if ſhe have committed adultery, ſhe may not be entertained becauſe in that caſe ſhe is much more polluted, and where the reaſon of the Commandement does intervene, there alſo the obligation does goe along. But the other is yet more conſiderable; For if God commanded that the adultereſs ſhould be ſtoned to death, certainly he much rather intended ſhe ſhould be turn'd out of doors. * To which I adde this conſideration; That ſince an adulterer is made one fleſh with the Harlot with whom he mingles impure embraces, it follows that he hath diſſolved the union which he had with his wife, or ſhe with her husband; for he cannot be one with his wife, and one with the Harlot, and yet he be one in himſelf and they two, for that is a perfect contradiction; for that which is one with two, is not one but two. Now for a woman to lie with a man, or a man with a woman, between whom there is not a juſt and legitimate union, ſeems to be an unjuſt and illegitimate uniting, and therefore it cannot be lawful to lie with an adulterer who is one with an Harlot.

8. Before I come to the reſolution of the Queſtion, I muſt deſcribe how much theſe arguments doe prove and inferre; becauſe though they doe not prove ſo much as their Contrivers doe intend, yet they doe ſomething towards the whole Queſtion. 1. The words of S. Hierome inferre nothing but this, That to live with a Harlot is a great calamity and a horrible curſe, and it cannot indeed tend towards a bleſſing, or end well, or be at all endured, if it be not intended to purpoſes beyond the proper effect of that calamity. He that is ſmitten with a leproſy, or he that is hanged upon a tree is accurſed; but if the leproſy makes a man run to God or to Chriſt, or the man that dies upon a tree does confeſs and glorify God, and by his death intends to doe ſo, the Leper ſhall be preſented pure before the throne of Grace, and he that hangs upon the tree does die with Chriſt, and ſhall reign with him for ever. 2. And the deſign expreſſed in the words of S. Chryſoſtome doe verify this commentary upon the words of S. Hierome. For S. Chryſoſtome charging not onely infelicity (as the other does) but folly and cruelty upon him who retains a Harlot; gives this reaſon, becauſe he is a Patron of his wives turpitude if he conceals it; meaning it, if he conceals it out of careleſneſs and poſitive neglect, or which is worſe, out of intereſt, or baſe deſigns: All wiſe and good men in the world condemn the fact of Cato, who did lend his wife Martia, a virtuous and a chaſt Matron to his friend Hortenſius: He that conceals his wives crime with an unwillingneſs to reform it, or a pleaſure in the ſin, or the fruits of it, is his wives betrayer and murderer; nay, he is an adulterer to his own wife. But theſe words cannot be true in all caſes, for he that conceals her ſhame, leſt the diſcovery ſhould make her impudent and harden her face, he is no patron of the ſin, but a careful guardian watching leſt ſhe ſhould commit a worſe. And this alſo is the meaning of the words of Solomon; for although they are not at all in our Bibles, becauſe they are not found in the Hebrew text, yet the words which are found in the Greek LXX. and in the Vulgar Latin, and which were certainly in the Bibles which S. Hierome and S. Chryſoſtome did uſe, and which were the cauſe and original of their opinion, have in them this ſenſe; That as he who expels a good woman thruſts good from his houſe, ſo he that does not thruſt an evil woman thence, an adultereſs, he is a fool; meaning if he connives at her wickedneſs, or unleſs he have ſomthing to ſweeten the ſufferance, or ſome pious purpoſes to ſanctify his action. But if it were abſolutely unlawful, then the adultereſs were a perſon of a deſperate fortune, irremediable and irrecoverable, uncapable of mercy, or repentance; or if ſhe were, yet her husbands charity and forgiveneſs might by no means be inſtrumental to it; and yet S. Paul in a caſe that was extremely bad, even in the caſe of infidelity, Quî ſcis mulier an virum ſis lucratura? What knoweſt thou O woman whether thou mayeſt gain thy husband? * But the arguments of Bucer being intended directly againſt the lawfulneſs of retaining an adultereſs, or living with an adulterous husband, are to have diſtinct anſwers. For although where a commandement is given with a reaſon, where ever the ſame reaſon is, it does not always follow that there is the ſame obligation, becauſe although God is ſometimes pleaſed to give a reaſon for the precept, yet the reaſon did not binde without the precept, but the precept does binde without a reaſon, which demonſtrates that the obligation proceeds wholly from the authority of God, and not from the reaſon (as I intend to ſhew more largely in its proper place) yet beſides this I ſay, the reaſon is not rightly rendred in the uſual Tranſlations: Non poterit prior maritus recipere, quia polluta eſt; The firſt husband may not receive her, becauſe ſhe is defiled: for the words in the Hebrew are אשר הטמאה which doe not ſignify [becauſe ſhe is polluted, but quia facta eſt polluere ſe, becauſe ſhe is made to defile her ſelf;] meaning that becauſe her firſt husband had thruſt her out and offered her to be humbled by him that would, he being the cauſe of that pollution hath loſt all right to her, and the privilege of reſtitution: and then this caſe refers not to a ſimple adultery, but to him who betrays or expoſes his wife to adultery; & indeed ſuch a perſon might not in Moſes Law receive her again: and this was the caſe of Cato and Socrates who were very free in lending their wives, as a man lends an utenſil. As for the caſe of lapidation, it is true, the woman if ſhe were legally convicted was to die; but the husband was not bound to accuſe her, he might pardon her if he pleaſed, and conceal the fact; he might pardon her for his ſhare as Chriſt did the woman taken in adultery; or put her away privately as Joſeph upon a miſtake intended to doe to the bleſſed Virgin Mother: but that it is therefore unlawful to retain her whom his ſoul loves, whom he would fain convert, whom he deſires and hopes to reform, or that God did intend the good man ſhould not uſe any of his charity and kindneſs to any ſuch purpoſe is not at all to be concluded by theſe arguments. Now as to the laſt, the adulterous man is one with the Harlot, but this union is not a natural union, but a ſpiritual and legal, as appears by the effect of ſecond and third marriages; for one perſon can no more be one naturally with two or three ſucceſſively, then he can be one with many at one time; and when the Patriarchs were married to divers women at once, they were not naturally one with them all, but legally they were; that is, they were conjoyned in holy bands, and were to very many purpoſes to be reckoned but as one. Εν γάρ εἰσιν ἀνὴρ καὶ γυνὴ τῇ φύσει, τῇ συμπνοίᾳ, τῇ ἑνώσει, τῇ ἀγαθέσει, τῷ βίῳ, τῷ προσώπῳ, κεχωρισμένοι δέ εἰσι τῷ σχήματι καὶ τῷ ἀριθμῷ, ſaid Clemens. They were one perſon by union of affection, they had one bed, one purſe, one intereſt, community of children, communication of bodies, equal rights, as to the power of marriage, the ſame band of duty, tied by the ſame myſtery. Now he or ſhe that commits adultery breaks this union, and divides or imparts ſome of the rights due to each other to an impure perſon, and they become one fleſh in an impure mixture. Now becauſe he or ſhe that firſt breaks this union loſes their own right by invading or giving away anothers, therefore the offending perſon may be put away and refuſed in their petition of right, which they have loſt by doing wrong. But the adultery hath not ſo united the offending perſons, but that the union can, and may better be broke, and the erring party reduced to his rule and to his right. For it is but a legal, and it is a ſpititual or intellectual union, which is to be done not by material but by moral inſtruments which can eternally return, and be effective when they doe. The way then being thus farre made ſtraight, I anſwer;

9. That it is not onely lawful, but may have in it great piety and great charity for a woman ſtill to cohabite with an adulterous husband. The lawfulneſs appears, in that there is no prohibition by a Divine Commandement, no natural uncleanneſs in it; and this appears as all other negative pretences can, even by evacuating the pretences made to the contrary. Of this opinion was S. Baſil, who alſo made a Canon for it, and commanded it to be done in his Church, as appears in his Epiſtle to Amphilochius 1. Can. 9. & 21. The ſame alſo was the ſentence of S. Auſtin to Pollentius, and in his Book de adulterinis conjugiis: and of P. Pelagius in his Epiſtle to Melleus his Subdeacon. But they it ſeems went againſt the general ſtream, for they were not onely forc'd to diſpute it, but alſo to limit the queſtion and the permiſſion. For David received his wife Michol who had liv'd with another man; and S. Paul adviſes the wife to be reconciled to her husband; and Chriſt forgave the woman taken in adultery, and God not onely is ready to forgive, but calls and invites his Church to return to his love though ſhe hath been an adultereſs, and committed fornication againſt him: but therefore ſo may a man, but it ought onely to be done in caſe the ſinning perſon does repent: onely S. Baſil is for the living ſtill with the adulterer though he wallow in his ſin; but does not think it fit the man ſhould be tied to doe ſo to his adulterous wife. That he or ſhe reſpectively may if they will ſtill live with the ſinning perſon, needs no other proof but this, that the innocent being alſo the injured perſon may forgive the injury done to them; and that it may have in it great piety and great charity is certain upon the ſame account on which it can be piety and charity to ſuffer injuries, to be patient, to have a long-ſuffering ſpirit, to exhort, to intreat, to bring the ſinner to repentance, to convert a ſoul, to ſave a ſinner from the evil of his way. But this is to be practiced with the following meaſures and cautions:

Lib. 3.

10. 1. The innocent perſon muſt not be bound to doe this, becauſe the union being diſſolved, the criminal hath loſt his right, and therefore if the other uſe their liberty, they doe no wrong; and although it may be good charity in many inſtances to doe it, yet becauſe there is no direct obligation in any, and there may be great uncharitableneſs to ones ſelf as the caſe may happen, no ones liberty is to be prejudiced in this particular, but they are to be exhorted to all inſtances of charity; ever remembring that ſaying of God by the Prophet, Malach 2.16. The Lord God of Iſrael ſaith, he hateth putting away.

11. 2. The innocent perſon may lawfully retain the criminal, though he or ſhe have no other end or purpoſe in it, but the love of the perſon, or the retaining of their own rights temporal, or any other thing that is in it ſelf honeſt and lawful: and the reaſon is, becauſe the fault of the one is not to prejudice the other; and it is miſery enough to be injured in their direct relation, and not that this injury compel them to receive another. If Titius be an adulterer, his wife Caia hath not loſt her power over his body, or her intereſt in his family or fortune.

12. 3. This is to laſt as long as there is any hopes of repentance, and the repentance is to be procured and endevoured by all direct means, and by all the indirect means which are miniſtred to the innocent perſon by the power and advantages which his or her innocence gives over the guiltineſs of the other: Such as are, reproving his fault, denying conjugal rights, delating the perſon, bringing him or her to private ſhame, procuring reproof from ſpiritual ſuperiors, or natural relatives, and indeed any thing that can be prudent, and by which the offender can be made better, and will not be made worſe.

13. 4. If there be no hopes of repentance, yet ſtill the innocent perſon may uſe their own right, not onely becauſe there may be poſſibilities and real conſequent events when we have no hopes; and S. Pauls queſtion, Quî ſcis ô mulier? how knoweſt thou O woman whether thou ſhalt gain thy husband? may ſtill have place, not onely I ſay for this reaſon, but for the foregoing; the innocent perſon does not loſe his or her right, and therefore may ſtill poſſeſs what otherwiſe ſhe might quit; and his incontinence does not oblige her to be expoſed to the danger of a πύρωσις or uſtulation, nor to be reproached with the noiſes of divorce, nor offered to an actual poverty, or dereliction, or to become an actual widow before death.

14. 5. If the retaining the adultereſs be actually ſcandalous, the Church in that caſe hath been more reſtrained in her permiſſion, and hath commanded the innocent perſon to put the offending woman away: and therefore the Fa-
C. 05. thers in the Councel of Eliberis refuſed to give the Communion to a Clergy man even at the laſt, if he did not ſtatim projicere inſtantly expel from his houſe his wife whom he knew to commit adultery: And in the Councel of Neo-Cæ-
C. 8. ſarea he was to be depoſed from his dignity in the ſame caſe; the reaſon is given by the Councel of Eliberis, Nè ab his, quì exemplum bonæ converſationis eſſe debent, videantur magiſteria ſcelerum procedere; leſt their houſes which ought to be the examples of piety and chaſtity, become the precedents and warranty of uncleanneſs. This is nothing elſe but a purſuance of the Canon Apoſtoli-
1 Tim. 3. 4, 5. cal, requiring that Biſhops and Deacons ſhould be ſuch who rule their own houſes well; for if they cannot doe that, it is not eaſy to be ſuppoſed they can well rule the Church of God: and though a good man may have an evil wife, and ſuch a one whom no prudence can govern; yet if ſhe be an adultereſs, he can put her away, though he cannot govern her: and indeed all ſuch reproaches ought to be infinitely removed from the houſes of thoſe, whoſe lives and whoſe Governments ought to be exemplar. Oportet ſuſpicionem abeſſe à Cæſaris domo. Princes and Prelates ought not to have any thing under their roof ſo nearly relating to them, that can juſtly be ſuſpected. But this is matter of decency and fittingneſs, not of indiſpenſable neceſſity.

15. 6. The innocent perſon muſt not directly by any compliance, cohabitation, or indulgence give countenance or incouragement to the impurity or crimes of the offending relative, for nothing can make it tolerable or lawful to promote a ſin, or any ways directly to cooperate toward it. This is a ſpecies lenocinii, a being a bawd to the uncleanneſs of that perſon whom with our lives we ought to reſcue from that damnation if we could. And therefore if the woman finds her husband grow worſe by her toleration and ſufferance, ſhe is to goe off from it by ſuch degrees as are on this ſide the extreme remedy, which I reckoned before in the third caution; and if nothing elſe hinder, it is not onely excuſable, but hugely charitable, and in a very great degree commendable to be divorc'd. For ſhe uſes her own power, and therefore ſins not, and does it when nothing elſe can prevail, and therefore ſhe is not raſh, or light and inquiſitive after new relations, and ſhe does it that ſhe may not patronize or increaſe his ſin, and therefore is charitable to his better intereſt.

16. 7. But if his or her compliance and cohabitation does accidentally make the offending party worſe, yet if it be beſides the intention, and againſt the purpoſe, and contrary to the endevours of the innocent; he or ſhe in that caſe is not tied to relinquiſh their right and their advantages in the preſent poſſeſſion or cohabitation. 1. Becauſe concerning accidental events, againſt which we labour, no man is to give account. 2. Becauſe of this accidental event, the offending perſon is the onely author, and the innocent is not to ſuffer for his ſin. 3. If the innocent perſon were tied to depart, then it were at any time in the power of the adulterer or adultereſs to be divorced from the innocent, becauſe he growing worſe by the others being good can oblige the other to quit him of the burden which he hates. 4. Becauſe to depart in that caſe is no remedy. Becauſe he that is vile, may grow worſe by contrary cauſes; and as wicked men are made preſumptuous by mercies, and hardned by judgements, and whether they be puniſhed or not puniſhed, from both they take occaſion to perſevere, ſo may an adulterer, or an adultereſs, by being ſweetly uſed, or by being harſhly. All that can be of duty and neceſſity in this caſe, is that the innocent perſon with all prudent advice and caution doe not by any direct act incourage the crime, or connive at it when it can be help'd, or commend it when it cannot, or refuſe to uſe any fair or any juſt inſtrument of curing the leper; and for the reſt, let them pray earneſtly, frequently, humbly, and leave the event to God. It is lawful to permit or ſuffer an evil whith I cannot help, and by that permiſſion retain my own rights, or prevent my own wrongs; but it is at no hand lawful for any intereſt ſpiritual or temporal to doe an evil, or to ſet it directly forward.

17. Thus ſome Common-wealths permit fornication and publick ſtews, to prevent the horrid conſequents of the luſts of their young men, which when they cannot cure, they ſeek to leſſen and divert; and though there be in the whole, many evil appendages, and a great fault in Government, and many evil and avoidable neceſſities introduced or ſuppoſed; yet ſo farre as this intention is conſidered, if it were not avoidable or remediable by the ſeverity of Laws, and the wiſdome of diſcourſes, and the excellencies of Religion, it were the onely charity that were left, and an after game of Conſcience and Religion; ſad and fatal to thoſe whoſe folly inferres it, but all that is left that can be done for God and for ſouls.

But yet this thing in all the circumstances is not to be done at all, because it is a snare to many who have no such necessities, who are otherwise curable, who enter into the temptation, because it is made ready to their hand; and it is a high scandal to the Laws and to the Religion of a Country, where such vile nests of impurity are suffered; and the necessity is but phantastick, accidental, and inferr'd by evil customes, or some secular interest, or weaker regard; for there is no necessity that men must either debauch Matrons or be fornicators; let them marry, for that is the remedy which God hath appointed, and he knows best how to satisfy and provide for all the needs of mankinde. But it is objected The Laws of Italy forbid the younger brothers of great families to marry. * That is it, which I said, men make necessities of their own, and then finde ways to satisfy them which therefore cannot be warranted by that necessity, because that necessity is of their own procuring, not from God, nor for him. For this is the case; An evil is to be cured, and a greater prevented; God hath appointed marriage for a remedy, the civil power forbids it to some persons, who for want of that must fornicate, or doe worse. To prevent the worse they provide them of opportunities of doing the less? But what remedy is there for the less? That is not thought of; for marriage is inconvenient to younger families; but it is very convenient for their souls, and they also would be provided for, as being no contemptible interest. Here therefore, if they would alter the necessities which worldly interest introduced, if they would preferre souls before the greatness of families, heaven before a Marquisate in Sardinia, and would esteem it more honour to a house to have chastity preserv'd rather then wealth and an intire inheritance, the weak pretences of excuse for Stews would be hissed off from the face of all Christian Countries; for if fornication be a remedy against unnatural lusts, it is just as being poysoned is an antidote against hanging, but certainly there is a better: Innocence or pardon will prevent it with more advantage, and so will marriage doe to the worse evils of lust; unless no health is considerable which is not effected by a Witch, and ease is to be despised if it be brought with a blessing. * But if any one can pretend that marriage will not secure the Italians or hot Spaniards from attempting intolerable vilenesses (besides that fornication will doe less, as having in it no more of natural remedy, and not so much by way of blessing) in this case, the wheel or the gallies, hard labour and the mines, the rods and axes must pare off the luxury.

* This therefore is the result, as to this particular instance. In the questions of greater or less uncleannesses, permissions are not to be made by publick authority, for the reasons before named: but there may be particular necessities in single instances which will run into present evil, for which no remedy can be provided; and then it is lawful to divert the malice upon a less matter, when it cannot be taken off intirely: For thus righteous * Lot offered his daughters to the impure Sodomites, to redeem the strangers from the violation intended them, and to hinder his Citizens from breaking the laws of Nature and Hospitality, which (if they were not always) yet they were of greater obligation then the restraints of simple fornication. And to this purpose is that of S. Chrysostome who to a man that is accustomed to swear, and cannot avoid it, advises that he should rather swear by his head then by God. I doe not, I confess, like the instance, both because it is in some cases worse to swear by a Creature then by the Creator; it is an honour done to him to swear by him, though to doe it triflingly is such an honour done to him, as superstition is, an honour that angers him; and 2. also because, he that can pretend his swearing to be unavoidable, does say so, because he does swear when he cannot deliberate; &

if he does not conſider, he can never make uſe of his advice to doe one rather then another; for no man can chooſe that cannot conſider, but as for the prime intention of the advice, that the leaſt evil is to be choſen, or adviſed, it is without queſtion ſafe and prudent.

* Of the ſame purpoſe are theſe words of S. Auſtin, Si decreviſti homicidium aut adulterium facere, adulterium committe non homicidium. If thou wilt murder or commit adultery, doe this, not that; that is, rather this then that. But neither here am I pleaſed with the inſtance, becauſe, when any man can lawfully be diverted to a leſs ſin, it muſt be in the ſame kinde; becauſe the ſame luſt cannot be filled with a differing object; and if the temptation be ſuch that it can be taken off wholly from that Scene, and chang'd to a differing and diſparate matter, he can as well be turn'd to ſomething that is innocent as to ſome other diſtinct vice; that is, he may for all his temptation. From unnatural luſts to natural, from the greater kinde to the leſs, from adultery to fornication, from fornication to trifling amours, and Platonick fooleries; from murder to a blow, from a blow to an angry word; theſe are proper diminutions which are in a direct order to the retrenching of the ſin: but from murder to adultery a man is not to be diverted, becauſe this is not a direct leſſening of the degrees of ſin, but a changing it into equal; or if it be not, yet the malice is more extended, if not intended, and the man is directly tempted to be a Devil upon a new ſcore, for it muſt be a new malice that muſt change him; but ſtill, the advice is in its main deſign ſafe and innocent. L. 1 c. 15. de adulterin. conjug.

* But of the ſame minde is S. Gregory affirming it to be good advice that when of two ſins one muſt be choſen, that the leaſt be it, but his proof of it is not to be ſuffered; for ſo (ſaith he) for the avoiding fornication S. Paul permits marriage; which ſaying of his without great violence to the words and charity to the man can never be reconciled with the truth of Scriptures, or the honour of marriage, but as for the main advice it is well and agreeable to right reaſon. Lib. 32. moral. c. 18.

19. But beſides the cautions already given num. 4. relating to the material part of ſin, the whole affair is to be conducted with theſe proviſions:

20. 1. No man may uſe this courſe, by ingaging in a preſent leſſer evil, to ſeek to prevent a greater that is to come: the reaſon is, becauſe this is a ſecuring of evil, it is an aſſurance and a certain gain to the intereſt of ſin, and this certainly may outweigh the greater degree of an uncertain evil; and there are many acts of providence which may intervene and prevent the future evil, which therefore is not to be prevented by a preſent evil though leſs miſchievous, becauſe poſſibly it may be hindred at a cheaper rate; and no little evil is to be done, but when either it ſelf or a greater is unavoidable, which happens not (for ought we know) in the preſent caſe; for before to morrow the man may die, or his affections to ſin may die, or he may be ſick, or ſcar'd, and to put it off as long as we can, is one kinde of diminution and leſſening of the ſin, which is the thing here conſulted of.

21. 2. Care muſt be taken, that by this means no mans ſin be promoted, no mans eternal intereſt be leſſened, no evil be done that we could and ought to forbid and hinder; and that of this we have a moral certainty, or at leaſt no probable cauſe to doubt: The reaſon is, becauſe if we put any mans ſoul to hazard, by procuring a leſs damnation to an evil perſon, the evil we doe is greater then our good; and we venture one miſchief, for the venture or hopes of leſſening another. Quintus Milvius being in love with the wife of Muræna, and ſhe with him, Milvius reſolves to kill his wife Virginia, and run away with the wife of Muræna, or force her from him, he acquaints his freed man Priſcus Calvus with his purpoſe, but he to divert his purpoſe of murder and adultery perſwades his Patron Milvius rather to lie with Muræna's wife now, then to doe ſuch things of hazard and evil voice, and diſhonour: and his advice was charitable and prevailed; for though the adultery was future, yet the intended murder was preſent, and the evil was leſſened as much as it could, and no man prejudiced, but the life of one ſav'd. But if he beleeves that by this act Virginia will be ſo exaſperated that ſhe will turn adultereſs in revenge, or kill her husband; this is not to be adviſed upon the foregoing reaſon. If a rich Uſurer refuſes to give an alms to a ſtarv'd perſon, he may be adviſed rather to lend him ſome money upon intereſt, then ſuffer him to die for want of bread: but if I beleeve, or probably ſuppoſe or ſuſpect that another man will be confirm'd in the uncharitableneſs, and think becauſe I adviſe him to this, he does well in it, and will live and die in this opinion, then I may not at the charge of another mans ſoul, doe the other wicked perſon that ſmall advantage, which is leſs then can countervail the other evil.

22. 3. He that adviſes the leſſer evil for the avoiding of a greater, muſt not adviſe any thing ſo to ſerve his own intereſt or humor, as that he ſhall in any ſenſe be delighted with the evil, becauſe ſo he becomes guilty of the others ſin, and then he cannot doe a thing lawfully, if it aſperſes him with guilt; and he may not ſerve anothers need with his own evil joyes; and the intereſt of ſouls is not ſet forward when one dies to make another leſs ſick. But beſides this, the queſtion here being whether it be lawful to adviſe a leſs evil for avoiding of a greater, though it be affirm'd to be ſo, when it is wholly for the avoiding the greater; yet it cannot be lawful to give ſuch advice to ſerve my own lower ends: Nothing but the former can legitimate ſuch an advice, and therefore this latter cannot.

23. 4. No man muſt make uſe of this courſe himſelf; for though it be lawful to divert a greater evil by adviſing the leſs to others, yet I may not my ſelf chooſe a leſs, that I may not chooſe a greater; for if this could be lawful, it would be in the power of any man to ſin what ſin he pleaſed, and to threaten his conſcience into a leave; for if he ſhould reſolve he would either kill the father, or lie with the daughter; be unnatural in his luſts, or looſe in his entertainments, he might legitimate every leſſer ſin for fear of the greater. But therefore it is certain, that when he can chooſe either, he muſt chooſe none, for nothing can make it lawful, directly to chooſe any, even the leaſt evil. But when it ſo happens that the conſcience is doubtful and perplex'd, and that in this ſad conjunction of evil and weak thoughts, it ſeems unavoidable but that one muſt be choſen, we may then incline to that which hath leaſt danger, and leaſt miſchief. And this advice was given by the Chancellor of Paris: Si ſub electione proponuntur duo mala, cave neutrum eligas: Nam in malis quid eſt eligendum? At verò ſi culpâ noſtrâ eò recidimus ut neceſſe ſit alterum ex peccatis fieri, minus eſt acceptandum; quia jam in comparatione deterioris, ſortitur boni, ſecundum quid, rationem. No ſin is to be choſen when both can be avoided, but when they cannot, the leaſt is to be ſuffered. But when this comes to be another mans caſe that he will not avoid both, though he ſins in chooſing any, yet he that adviſes him rather to take the leſs does not ſin. He that chooſes the leſs, ſins leſs, but yet yet ſins, becauſe he ſhould chooſe none at all; but he that adviſes him to chooſe the leſs, ſins not at all, becauſe he hinders all ſin as much as he can.

24. 5. He that adviſes a leſs ſin for the prevention of a greater, muſt ſee that it be directly leſs, and certainly ſo; it muſt be in the ſame matter and kinde, and in a leſs degree, becauſe he can no other ways be certain that he hath done any good at all, and may doe a greater evil. For in degrees of ſin the caſe is clear when the matter or inſtance is the ſame; but if it be ſpecifically different, or in the whole kinde, all queſtion of degrees is infinitely uncertain, and therefore the rule is not without danger practicable in ſuch caſes. But of this I have already given ſome accounts in the fifth number of this Rule.

25. But becauſe all this diſcourſe relies upon this main ground, that the leſſer evil in reſpect of the greater hath the nature of good, and therefore is to be preferred; or (which is all one) the avoiding of the greater evil is directly a good, and the ſuffering the leſs evil is better then ſuffering the other, yet becauſe it is but comparatively good, it is poſitively evil; here it is to be inquired, Whether this can be lawful, or is it not a prevaricating of the Apoſtles rule, That evil is not to be done that good may come of it? and whether this may be done in any caſe, and by what cautions it can be permitted or made legitimate? This inquiry hath great uſes in the whole life of men, and therefore is not unworthy a ſtricter ſearch.

26. And firſt as to the preſent Rule, it is certain, that this permiſſion is not a doing evil that good may come of it: 1. Becauſe no evil is at all permitted when all can be avoided. 2. Becauſe no man is to act this Rule in his own perſon, upon whom he may and ought to have a power of perſwaſion and effort ſufficient to cauſe himſelf to decline all evil. 3. It is onely permitted to be adviſed to others by ſuch perſons who hate all ſin, and have neither pleaſure nor intereſt in any. 4. It is not a giving leave to any ſin, but an hindring as much as can be hindred. It is not a doing any thing at all of kindneſs to any thing but to the man. It is like that permiſſion which the ſons of Iſrael gave to the remnant of the Canaanites, to live in the land becauſe they could not deſtroy them all. They kill'd as many as they could, and it was not kindneſs but neceſſity that left thoſe few alive. And the thing was not ill expreſſed by Petrarch, Duobus aut pluribus ex malis minus malum eligendum eſſe non video, cùm minus malum haud dubiè malum ſit, qualiter mali electio ſit laudanda. Itaque rectiùs dici reor, majora mala majori ſtudio vitanda, ut ſi vitari cuncta non poſſunt, minora faciliùs tolerentur, non electione, ſed patientiâ, æquanimitate, modeſtiâ. Of two evils the leaſt is not to be choſen, ſince that the leſs evil is without all doubt an evil. Thus therefore I ſuppoſe we ought to ſay; The greater evils are with greater care to be avoided, that if all cannot be declined, the leſs may be better tolerated, not by choice, but by patience. Now though it be not lawful to doe evil for a good end, yet it is lawful to ſuffer evil to avoid a greater, and to make the beſt of it that we can; which was the counſel which Cicero ſays he received from learned men, Non ſolùm ex malis minima oportere eligere, ſed etiam excerpere ex iis ipſis ſi quid ineſſet boni.

27. But to the thing it ſelf, there can be no diſpute but that it is highly unlawful to doe evil for a good end; S. Pauls words are decretory and paſſionate in the thing: He calls it ſlander, or blaſphemy that they reported it of him that he ſhould ſay, It was lawful to doe evil that good might come of it; he alſo affirms that though the greatneſs of the ſins of the Jews or Gentiles did magnify the greatneſs of the Divine mercy, yet they whoſe ſins accidentally thus ſerv'd the glorification of God, their damnation was juſt. Though this be clear and certain, yet I doubt not but all the world does evil that good may come of it; and though all men are of S. Pauls opinion, yet all men doe not blame themſelves when they doe againſt it. I will therefore firſt repreſent the matters of fact, and then conſider of the allays or excuſes to which men pretend in their private accounts or publick anſwers, and ſo ſeparate the certain from the uncertain, and eſtabliſh the proper meaſures of the propoſition.

28. For firſt if we look in Scripture, we ſhall finde that divers eminently holy have ſerv'd God by ſtrange violences of fact, and for his glory have laid hold upon inſtruments not fit to be handled, but ſuch which would have cut the hands of a Chriſtian, if they had been drawn through them. David gave order to Huſhai to enrol himſelf in the rebel party, and to deal falſly with Abſolom, that he might doe good to David; and indeed ſo doe all ſpies, which if they were not neceſſary, would not be uſed in all Armies; and if they be, yet
1 Kings 18.25. they doe that which honeſt men would ſcruple at. * Elias the Prophet that he might bring the people from idolatry, cauſed a ſacrifice to Baal to be made, and the idol to be invocated, which of it ſelf was ſimply and abſolutely evil; and Jehu (though a much worſe man) yet proclaimed an aſſembly for Baal, and both of them did it that they might deſtroy the Prieſts of Baal, and diſhonour the idol, and doe honour to God, and both did well: * and for ought appears ſo did the ten men of Shechem who to redeem their lives from the fury Jerem. 41. of Iſhmael diſcovered the ſecret treaſures of the Nation: * and amongſt the Chriſtians ſome women, particularly Pelagia and her daughters have drowned themſelves to prevent the worſe evil of being defloured. * And is it not neceſſary in all Governments that by violence peace ſhould be eſtabliſhed, and by great examples of an intolerable juſtice others ſhould be made afraid. * For ſo doe all Princes knowingly procure their rights by doing wrong; for in all warres the innocent muſt ſuffer that the guilty may be puniſhed: And beſides that all great examples have in them ſomething of iniquity; it were not eaſy to have diſcipline in private Governments, or coercitive power in Laws, if in ſome caſes ſome evil were not to be permitted to be done for the procuring ſome good. For ſuppoſe Corippus hath an obſtinate ſervant, ſo perverſe that like the ſides of Elephants his very ſoul grows hard by ſtripes, and that Corippus knows this, yet if he have other ſervants who will be corrupted by the impunity of this, he may, he muſt doe evil to the obſtinate, and ruine his ſoul for the preſerving the others. * And indeed if we conſider how ſad, how intolerable an evil it is that a malefactor is ſnatch'd from his ſcene of evil and vile actions, and hurried to hell with his ſins about him; and that for the onely reaſon of doing good to others, and preſerving the publick intereſt, it will ſeem neceſſary that this intereſt be preſerved, and therefore that the other inſtrument be imployed; * for it is natural enough that as truth comes from falſehood, ſo ſhould good from evil, it is not an accidental or contingent product, but ſometimes natural and proper; and as God brings good out of evil by his almighty power, ſo doe good men by the nature of the thing; and then the intermedial evil to a wiſe and religious perſon is like unhandſome and ill taſted phyſick, it is againſt nature in the taking and in its operating, but for the preſervation of nature in the effect and conſequent; ſo are ſome evils againſt Religion but uſeful for its advancement. * And this very ſimilitude ſupplies many particulars of the ſame nature. For thus we make children vain-glorious that they may love noble things; and who can govern prudently and wiſely that reſolves never to be angry? and to be angry ſo as to doe the work of government; though it be not bigger then the meaſures of the Governour, yet they exceed the meaſures of the Man. * Thus for Phyſick it is affirmed to be lawful for a man to be drunk: * And Cardinal Tolet allows of voluntary deſires of pollution when without it we cannot have our health; and yet to deſire ſuch pollution without ſuch a good purpoſe is certainly criminal, and if for the intereſt of health evil may be done, much more for Religion and effects of holineſs. * But thus I ſaid, it muſt happen in publick Governments: The Chriſtians that dwell in China, Japan, and in the Indies cannot tranſact their affairs with the Heathens without oaths, and therefore they make them ſwear by their own falſe gods, by the names of their idols and devils, which onely they think binding, and neither could there be any ſecurity of faith to Princes or to Subjects, that is, in the publick or private entercourſe without it, and yet without queſtion as to ſwear by Devils and falſe Deities is a high crime, ſo to require or to procure it is a great ſin, and yet it is done for neceſſity. The Romans would not truſt the Jews that would ſwear by the Temple of Jupiter:

Lib. 5. c. 1

Ecce negas, juráſque mihi per Templa Tonantis, Non credo, jura verpe per Anchialum.

no truſt was given unleſs they ſwore by the God whom they feared, and ſo it is in the caſe of others; and what is neceſſary, it were very ſtrange if it might not be permitted. * And what elſe can be the meaning of diſpenſations, but that a thing which is otherwiſe unlawful is made good by its miniſtring to a good end; that is, it is lawful to doe evil, to break a Law, and leave is given to doe ſo, when it is neceſſary, or when it is charitable. Upon this account it is that preſcription does transferre a right, and confirms the putative and preſumed, in defiance of the legal and proper, and this is for no other reaſon but to prevent uncertainties in title, and eternal contentions, which is a certain doing injury to the right owner, that good may be procured, or evil prevented. * When a man is in extreme neceſſity, the diſtinctions of dominion doe ceaſe; and when David and his Souldiers were hungry, they eat the Shew bread which God forbad to all but to the Prieſts; and ſo did the Apoſtles to ſatisfy their hunger break the Sabbath by pulling and rubbing the ears of corn; * and in the defence of a mans own life it is lawful to kill another: which is certainly a doing evil for a good end: and if it be ſaid, that this is not a doing evil, becauſe the end makes it not to be evil, this is a plain confeſſing the queſtion againſt the words of S. Paul; for if the good end makes that to be lawful, which of it ſelf without that end is unlawful, then we may conclude againſt S. Paul, that it is good to doe evil that good may come; that is, it is changed by the end and by the deſign. * And upon an equal ſtock of neceſſity it is, that all Princes think themſelves excuſed, if by inferring a warre they goe to leſſen their growing neighbours; but this is a doing wrong to prevent a miſchief, as the birds in Plutarch, that beat the Cuckow for fear that in time ſhe ſhould become a Hawk. * And this is certain in the matters of omiſſion, though to omit a duty be ſimply evil, yet when it is neceſſary, it is alſo lawful, and when it is charitable it is lawful: Thus religion yeelds to charity, and charity to juſtice, and juſtice it ſelf to neceſſity, and a man is not bound to pay his debts, when to doe ſo will take from him his natural ſupport. * And it is thus alſo in commiſſions; who will not tell a harmleſs lie to ſave the life of his friend, of his child, of himſelf, of a good and a brave man? and to govern children and fools by ſaying falſe things, no man makes a ſcruple: and Phyſicians are commended

mended if with a witty lie they can cozen melancholick and hypochondriacal men into a cure. Thus the man of Athens, who phanſied if he ſhould make water he ſhould drown the city, was cured by his Phyſicians ingenious fiction that the city was on fire, and deſiring him to quench it with his urine, leſt water ſhould be wanting in that great neceſſity, ſtruck his fancy luckily, and prevailed upon him to doe that which no direct perſwaſion could effect. Thus Hercules de Saxonia having committed to his charge a melancholick man, who ſuppoſing himſelf to be the Prophet Elias would needs faſt forty days, dreſs'd a fellow like an Angel, who pretending that he brought him meat from heaven, prevail'd upon him to receive both food and Phyſick. This lie was charitable, and if it was not therefore innocent, then ſome charity can be criminal; but if it was innocent, it was made ſo wholly by the good end, which ſanctified the evil inſtrument. * Thus alſo Judges exact oaths from contradicting parts, though they know that one is perjured, but yet he proceeds by ſuch means to gueſs at truth, and ſatisfy the ſolemnities of Law. * And when the Judges themſelves are corrupt, we think it fit to give them bribes to make them doe juſtice, who otherwiſe would for bribes doe injuſtice; and yet we ſuppoſe we are no more to be reproved then they are who pay intereſt money to the Uſurers and Bankers whom yet themſelves beleeve to ſin. But bribery is a ſin, and bribery in a wrong cauſe is two or three; and therefore let the cauſe be what it will, it is no way tolerable but that it is for a good end. * Thus we venture into danger to ſerve worthy deſigns; ſome read heretical Books to be able to confute them; and ſome venture into perſecutions which they could avoid, becauſe they would not weaken the hands of ſuch who cannot avoid it; and yet to goe to danger is not ſafe, and therefore againſt charity, and therefore a ſin, and yet it is for charity and faith even when it is againſt one of them. * And laſt of all, all men doe, and they beleeve they may make addreſſes to a Tyrant for juſtice, and though he ſits on the Bench by wrong, yet we ſtoop to his purple, and kiſs his rods and axes when we deſire to be defended from the oppreſſion of a leſſer Tyrant; and if this be not a doing evil that good may come of it, then it is no evil to make another doe an act of uſurped power, or to bend to a power which deſtroys that to which we are bound by the oath of God.

29. Theſe inſtances I have not brought in oppoſition of the Apoſtles rule, or that I think any man elſe pretends any of theſe in defiance of it, but to repreſent that either a great part of mankinde does it when they leaſt think of it, or that ſome things which ſeem evil are not ſo; and that I may deſcribe the meaſures of theſe things, and eſtabliſh the caſe of Conſcience upon its juſt limits and rule.

30. 1. Therefore it is to be obſerved, that the facts of men living under a Law, are not to be meaſured by Laws of a differing Government, and therefore if the facts of worthy men were exemplary (of which in its proper place I am to give accounts) yet the facts of Saints in the old Teſtament would not be ſafe examples to us in the New; and therefore we may not doe that which Huſhai did, for he did well, that is, againſt nothing of the Law under which he ſtood; but if the ſimplicity and ingenuity of our Law gives us other meaſures; the effect will be, that Huſhai did not doe evil for a good end, but did well to a good purpoſe. And as to the thing it ſelf, it is very likely that it is lawful to abuſe his credulity, whoſe life I may lawfully take; the cautions and limits of which permiſſion belong not to this preſent inquiry.

31. 2. The rules of warre, and the meaſures of publick intereſt are not to be eſtimated by private meaſures, and therefore becauſe this is unlawful in private entercourſes, it muſt not be concluded to be evil in the publick. For humane affairs are ſo intricate and intangled, our Rules ſo imperfect, ſo many neceſſities ſupervene, and our power is ſo limited, and our knowledge ſo little, and our proviſions ſo ſhort ſighted, that thoſe things which are in private evils may be publick goods: and therefore in this queſtion, the evil and the good are to be in the ſame kinde; a private evil is not to be done for the procuring of a private good, but for a publick it may: not that evil may be done for any thing; but that here it is not evil, when it is meaſured by the publick ſtandard. For ſince God is the fountain of Government, he alſo gives authority to all ſuch propoſitions which are neceſſary means of its ſupport, not to all which pretend to it, or which are inferr'd by folly or ambition, but which are really ſuch. Warre cannot be made as a man corrects his child, with even degrees of anger, and a juſt number of ſtripes, and equalities of puniſhment both to the perſon and to the offence; and Kings are in the place of God who ſtrikes whole Nations and Towns and Villages; and warre is the rod of God in the hands of Princes, but the evils which are intermedial to the greater purpoſes of a juſt warre are ſuch which are unavoidable in themſelves, and beſides the intentions of good Kings; and therefore in ſuch caſes, though much evil is ſuffered becauſe it is unavoidable, yet none is done of choice, and that makes not againſt the Rule. For,

32. 3. In many of the inſtances objected, the evils which are the ways of procuring good, are not evils in morality but in nature; and then it is lawful, when there is no malice in the deſign, to prevent the ſin, or to doe a good office by a ſhrewd turn. Thus I may pull my friend out of a pool by a ſtrained arm, and ſave his life by putting his arm out of joynt; and this is a doing evil materially, with a pious purpoſe, that is without malice, and for a good end, and that is innocent and charitable, when it is unavoidable, but it is not to be choſen, and done with delight, or evil intent, or perfect election: to doe evil to a man in this caſe is beſides the mans intention, it is accidental alſo to the whole event, it is not ſo much as giving unpleaſing Phyſick, not ſo much as impoſing cupping glaſſes and uſing ſcarifications; for this is voluntary and choſen for a good end, becauſe the good cannot elſe well be procured, and yet it is choſen upon thoſe terms by the Patient. Upon this account a man may give his life for his friend, or wiſh himſelf dead; and S. Paul wiſh'd himſelf accurſed for his brethren, and Moſes deſired to be blotted out of the book of life in zeal for the people of God; and yet all this is a very great charity, becauſe though a man may not doe evil, yet he may ſuffer evil for a good end; he may not procure it, but he may undergoe it: and after all, the doing of a natural or phyſical evil may be permitted when there is no motive but charity, for then it is in no ſenſe forbidden; ſometimes neceſſary and unavoidable, but no ways evil or criminal; and if it be, it becomes ſo by accident, or by the intertexture of ſome other ingredient.

33. 4. When the evils are ſubordinate or relative, the leſs may be done to prevent the greater, though they be not in the ſame matter; as a child may be beaten to prevent a ſin, an offender ſmitten to make him diligent: for theſe actions, though they are in the accounts of evil things, yet have no intrinſecal irregularity, but wholly depend upon the end; But becauſe commonly evil things are done to evil purpoſes, and with irregular meaſures, they have an ill name, but they can be changed when the end is made ſtraight, and the meaſures ſures temperate. Every thing that is not intrinſecally evil, if it be directed to a good end, is good, unleſs it be ſpoiled by ſome intervening accident.

34. 5. Some things are evils properly and naturally, ſome by accident, ſome by our own faults, ſome by the faults of others. An action may be innocent as from me, and yet a very great evil by the fault of others: A malefactor put to death, it may be periſhes eternally; if he does, it is his own fault, the Laws are innocent when they ſmite him for the good of others; and this is not a doing evil that good may come of it; for in things not eſſentially and unalterably evil, good and evil are in relations, and though the ſmiting ſome ſinners produce a very evil effect, yet it is only to be imputed to its own cauſe: There is a good and an evil in many things, & God and the Devil have their ſhare of the thing, and ſo have ſeveral perſons, according as they intend, and as they operate: and in this caſe, the Laws intend good, and doe that which is good, that is, they puniſh a Malefactor, but of the accidental damnation, the ſinner that ſuffers onely, is the onely cauſe; and therefore in this, and many like caſes of publike tranſaction there is no evil done for a good end. Thus if any man who is to take an oath be wicked and falſe, the Law may exact the oath becauſe that is good, but the Law it ſelf may uſe a falſe oath if the man will ſwear it, but then the falſeneſs is the mans that ſwears, not the Laws that exacts it. For to many products there are many concurrent cauſes, which are not integral, but have each their ſhare; and when cauſes are not integral, the portion of effect is to be applied onely by the intention of the agent, and the proportion and order to the end: Indeed if the whole effect were to be imputed intirely to every concurring agent (as in murder every man is principal and integral) then in many of the fore alledged caſes, evil were done for a good end, but then it could not be lawful ſo to doe, but the actions are therefore innocent to ſome agents, becauſe they doe nothing of it but the good ſhare, that which they ought to doe; and that which ſpoils it, comes in at another door.

35. 6. Some Laws of God are ſuch that their rectitude is ſo perfect, the holineſs ſo intire, the uſefulneſs ſo univerſal, the inſtance ſo fitted for all caſes, and the Oeconomy of it ſo handſome and wiſe that it never interferes with any other duty, is never complicated with contradicting matter, or croſs intereſts; now theſe are ſuch which no caſe can alter, which no man may prevaricate, or if they doe they are ſuch which no meaſure can extenuate, which no end can ſanctify: and theſe are either Laws of general reaſon, and common ſanction; or ſpiritual inſtances, and abſtracted from matter. Thus no man may blaſpheme God at any time or for any end, or in any degree; and in theſe caſes it was rightly ſaid in the objections, that if the end can change the inſtrument, then it is not evil to doe any thing for a good end, becauſe the end makes the evil to be good. But then in other caſes, where the inſtances are material, tied up with the accidents of chance, made changeable by relations, tied in ſeveral parts by ſeveral duties, fill'd with various capacities, there the good and the evil are like colours of a doves neck, differing by ſeveral aſpects and poſtures, there abſtractions are to be made, and ſeparations of part from part, of capacity from capacity; and when every man provides concerning his ſhare of influence into the effect all is well, and if one fails, it may be evil is done to the whole production, but it is not imputed to them who took care of their own proportions. * But in ſuch kinds of actions, the limits and meaſures are extrinſecal and accidental, and the goodneſs is not eſſential, natural, and original; and therefore the whole receives variety by neceſſities, and by charity. For whatſoever ſoever can be neceſſary by a neceſſity of Gods making, that is lawful: and I may ſerve any greater neceſſity by any thing that is leſs neceſſary, when both neceſſities cannot be ſerved. Thus Davids eating the Shew-bread, and the Apoſtles eating corn on the Sabbath, ſerv'd a greater need then could have been ſecur'd by ſuperſtitious or importune abſtinence. In poſitive and temporary commands there is no obligation but when they conſiſt with higher duties; Actus imperati unius virtutis non debent præjudicare actibus elicitis alterius. The proper and natural actions of one virtue are ever to be preferr'd before the inſtrumental acts of another. As an act of temperance muſt be preferr'd before a poſture in worſhipping; charity before faſting, or before ceremonies: that is, the more neceſſary before the leſs. It is more neceſſary to ſave the life of a man, then to ſay my prayers at any one time, and therefore I may leave my prayers in the midſt, and run to ſave a man from drowning. This is a thing which cannot ſtay, the other can. For in all ſuch precepts of affirmative duty, there is a ſecret condition annexed, and they oblige not when they croſs a negative. And it is certain there could be no uſefulneſs of knowing the degrees of good or evil, if it were not for prelation and election of one before another: To what purpoſe were it that we are told, Obedience is better then ſacrifice, but that we ſhould neglect one and doe the other when both cannot ſtand together? and this order of degrees is the full ground of diſpenſations when they can be allowed in divine Commandements: but in humane diſpenſations there is another, even the want of foreſight, the imperfection of the Laws themſelves which cannot provide for all caſes before-hand, as Gods Laws can; and therefore to diſpenſe with a Subject in a humane Law is not a doing evil for a good end; for to break an humane Law is not intrinſecally an evil, though no expreſs leave be given, as the caſe may happen: but when leave is given, as it is in diſpenſations, then there is no evil at all. And ſomething like this, is that other caſe of preſcriptions, which does indeed transferre a right from a right owner, as it may happen, but this is a doing good and not evil, for it is a preferring a certain poſſeſſion before an uncertain right; or it is a doing a greater good, that is a prelation of a title which hath more evidence, and publick advantage then the other. Beſides, it is done by publick conſent, in which, becauſe every particular is included, there is no evil done, but much is prevented.

23. 7. In actions the material part is to be diſtinguiſhed from the formality, the work from the affection: That may be wholly indifferent, when this may be wholly criminal. He that drinks till he vomits, by the Phyſicians advice, gives none of his affection to the pleaſure of any thing forbidden, he takes it as he takes a potion or pills, which may have the ſame effect with drink. But when the material part cannot be done without the ſenſe of pleaſure which is forbidden, then the end cannot ſanctify it: and therefore although to drink much for Phyſick may be lawful, yet pollution may not be deſired for health, becauſe that cannot be done or ſuffered without an unlawful pleaſure; and ſo alſo will drinking for health become vicious, if in the acting of the material part, any part of our affections be ſtolen away, and the pleaſure of the exceſs be delighted in.

24. 8. He that makes uſe of the matter of a ſin already prepared to which he gives no conſent, and which he cannot help, does not doe evil for a good end. Thus the Prophet called on the Prieſts of Baal to doe what they uſed to doe, that they might never doe ſo again: He was no way the cauſe of a ſin, but of its circumſtances and adjuncts, that it be done here and now, and this is not againſt the Apoſtles rule; time and place are no ſins, and make none unleſs frequency be added to the time, and holineſs to a place, and then they may adde degrees or new inſtances to the ſin; but when neither of theſe is procured or injured reſpectively, it is lawful to glorify God by uſing the prepared ſin to good purpoſes. When a Judge is ready to receive money upon any terms, out of this evil we may bring good, and cauſe him to doe a good thing rather then a bad; he does neither well, but that is his own fault; but to give money is a thing indifferent, and to give it for that end which is good, makes it better: and bribery is a word of an ill ſound when it means an evil thing, but when it means well we may finde a better word for it, or mean well by this: though concerning the particular it is not amongſt men eſteemed certain that it is lawful to give money to a Judge: Sed ſi dedi (ſays Ulpian) ut ſecundum me in bonâ cauſâ Judex pronunciaret, eſt quidem relatum condictioni locum eſſe: ſed hic quoque crimen contrahit. Judicem enim corrumpere videtur: & non ita pridem Imperator noſter conſtituit litem eum perdere. Whether it be lawful or no is to be inquired in another place; but as to the preſent inquiry, if it be lawful, I have accounted for it already; if it be not, it is not to be done, no not for juſtice ſake. For in this caſe we no way conſent to the evil, but endevour to bring good out of that evil which is already in being. Thus we run to a Tyrant power for juſtice, he will govern whether we will or no, the ſin will be acted and continued upon his own account; but when the evil matter is thus made ready, we may reap as much good by it as we can bring out of it; and in this ſenſe is that true and applicable to the preſent which is urged in the objection, That as truth may come from falſhood, ſo may evil from good; when an ill gotten power is apt either to juſtice or injuſtice, we may draw juſtice from it, and then we doe good without cooperating to the evil: that is, we onely doe determine an indifferent agent to the better part: The manner of getting the power is wholly extrinſecal to the miniſtration of it: That is wholly the fault of the Uſurper, but this which is our own act is wholly innocent. If Nero ſets Rome on fire, I doe no hurt if I warm by the heat, and walk by the light of it; but if I laugh at the flames, or give a fagot to it, I am guilty. And thus the Chriſtians uſe the Heathens oaths for their own ſecurity; the oath is good, and ſo farre it is deſired; that the oath is by a falſe god is the Heathens fault; this is effected by theſe, but the other is onely deſired by them: This therefore is not a doing evil for a good end; it is a deſiring of good, and a uſing the evil matter which is of anothers procuring.

38. 9. There are ſome actions criminal and forbidden in certain States onely, as to kill a man is a ſin, a private man may not doe it; but the ſame man when he comes to be a publick Magiſtrate may doe it: A private man alſo may not doe it when he is in the relation and protection of civil ſociety, becauſe in that, the Laws are his guards, and the publick Judges are his defenſatives; but if a man ſets on me by violence, and ſo puts himſelf into a ſtate of warre, he by going from the limits of civil ſociety, takes off the reſtraint which that ſociety put upon me, and I am returned to the liberties of nature; and there is by all Laws a power given a man to defend himſelf, by Laws, if he can, and if he cannot, then by himſelf and the means of nature; and therefore to kill him that would kill me, is not to doe evil for a good end, for the thing is permitted, and therefore not intrinſecally evil, and whatſoever is not ſo, may be accidentally good.

39. 10. Some of the inſtances are ſuch which are diſallowed by moſt men; ſo to tell a lie for a good end is unlawful, upon ſuppoſition that a lie is intrinſecally evil;

evil; concerning which the account must be reserved for its own place: for the present, it is certainly unlawful to lie for any end, if that supposition be true; but if lying be onely forbidden for its unchristableness or injustice, that is, for its effects, then when the end is good, the instrument is tolerable. By these measures all the instances objected can be measured and secured, and by these the Rule it self must be conducted. What cannot be excused upon one of these, is wholly to be reproved as being a direct prevaricating the Apostles Rule.

40. The summe is this; Whatsoever is forbidden by the Law under which we stand, and being weighed by its own measures is found evil; that is, in a matter certainly forbidden, not for any outward and accidental reason, but for its natural or essential contrariety to reason and the Law of God, that may not be done, or procured for any end whatsoever. For every such thing is intrinsecally and essentially evil, it is evil without change or variety, without condition or circumstance, and therefore cannot be made good by any such thing. What is evil in some circumstances may be good in others, and what is condemned for a bad effect, by a good one may be hallowed, but if it be bad of it self, it can never be good, till there come a cause as great to change its nature, as to make it: the cruelty of a mans habit or his choice can be turn'd, but a viper will for ever have a venome in his tooth.

41. But this Rule is also to be extended to cases that are duplicate, and relate to two persons. As if two persons affirm or promise contraries; the first upon a presumptive power and authority over the other, and this other upon firm resolution, and by an intire power over him or her self; though I am bound to hinder his promise from passing into fallacy and deception as much as I can, yet I must rather secure my own. The reason is, because he who had no power over me, could not promise but with a tacite condition; and though he were guilty of temerity and an interpretative breach of promise, yet if the other fails, he is directly and properly guilty. This is still more evident if a Father promises his daughter to Titius before witnesses, presuming that his daughter who is a widow will yet be ruled by him, though she be at her own dispose; but his daughter hath solemnly sworn and contracted her self to Sempronius: The daughter must be more careful not to break her oath and contract, then by verifying her Fathers promise keep him from a lie; and this was the case of Acontius and Cydippe in Ovid,

Promisit pater hanc, hæc adjuravit amanti:
Ille homines, hæc est testificata Deam.
Hic metuit mendax, sed & hæc perjura vocari,
Num dubitas hic sit major, an ille metus?

This case may be varied by accidents intervening, as if the daughter be under her Fathers power, she hath none of her own to contract or swear; but in an equal power and circumstances, the greater care must be to avoid the greater crime.

42. These Cautions are all which I think necessary for the conducting of a doubting Conscience (that is, a conscience undetermined) in its danger and infirmity: but concerning the matter of doubts, that is indeed, all cases of Conscience, they are to be handled under their proper matter. Concerning interpretation of doubts to the better part, obedience to superiours in a doubtful matter, favourable and easy interpretation of Laws for the deposition of a doubt, though I was tempted to have given accounts in this place, yet I have chosen to referre them to their own places, where by the method and rules of art they ought to ſtand, and where the Reader will expect them. But concerning the cure of a doubting Conſcience, this is all that I am to adde to the foregoing Rules:

43. A doubtful Conſcience is no guide of humane actions, but a diſeaſe, and is to be cured by prayer and prudent advices, and the proper inſtruments of reſolution and reaſonable determinations; but for thoſe things which are called doubts, and the reſolution of which is the beſt way to cure the infirmity of conſcience, they muſt be derived from their ſeveral heads and categories. For theſe diſcourſes or advices of Conſcience in general, are intended but as directions how to take our Phyſick, and what order to obſerve in diebus cuſtodiæ; but the determining of the ſeveral doubts, is like preparing and adminiſtring the Medicines which conſiſt of very many ingredients.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Scrupulous Conſcience.

RULE I.

A Scruple is a great trouble of minde proceeding from a little motive, and a great indiſpoſition, by which the conſcience though ſufficiently determined by proper arguments, dares not proceed to action, or if it doe, it cannot reſt.

1. UI nimis emungit, elicit ſanguinem, ſaid Solomon; too violent blowing draws bloud from the noſe; that is, an inquiry after determination, and ſearching into little corners, and meaſuring actions by atomes and unnatural meaſures, and being over righteous, is the way not to govern, but to diſorder our Conſcience.

Prov. 28.

2. That it is a great trouble, is a daily experiment and a ſad ſight: Some perſons dare not eat for fear of gluttony, they fear that they ſhall ſleep too much, and that keeps them waking, and troubles their heads more, and then their ſcruples increaſe. If they be ſingle perſons, they fear that every temptation is a πύρωσις, that burning which the Apoſtle ſo carefully would have us to avoid, and then that it is better to marry then to ſuffer it; and if they think to marry, they dare not for fear they be accounted neglecters of the glory of God which they think is better promoted by not touching a woman. When they are married they are afraid to doe their duty, for fear it be ſecretly an indulgence to the fleſh, and be to be ſuſpected of carnality, and yet they dare not omit it, for fear they ſhould be unjuſt, and yet they fear that the very fearing it to be unclean ſhould be a ſin, and ſuſpect that if they doe not fear ſo, it is too great a ſign they adhere to Nature more then to the Spirit. * They repent when they have not ſinn'd, and accuſe themſelves without form or matter; their virtues make them tremble, and in their innocence they are afraid; they at no hand would ſin, and know not on which hand to avoid it: and if they venture in, as the flying Perſians over the river Strymon, the ice will not bear them, or they cannot ſtand for ſlipping, and think every ſtep a danger, and every progreſſion a crime, and beleeve themſelves drowned when they are yet aſhore.

are

3. Scruple ſometimes ſignifies all manner of vexation of the minde; ſo Cicero pro Sext. Roſcio uſes it, Hunc mihi ſcrupulum ex animo evelle, qui me dies noctesque ſtimulat ac pungit. Take this ſcruple out of my minde which pricks and goads me night and day. So alſo in S. Hieromes Bible 1 Regum 25. Non erit tibi in ſingultum & ſcrupulum cordis quòd effuderis ſanguinem innoxium. It ſhall not be to thee a cauſe of grief and ſcruple of heart that thou haſt ſhed innocent bloud: But in the preſent diſcourſe it hath a more limited ſignification, and according to the uſe of Divines and Canoniſts, means an unquietneſs and reſtleſneſs of minde in things done or to be done, after the doubts of conſcience are determined and ended. Intolerabilem perturbationem Seneca calls it, a fear of doing every thing that is innocent, and an aptneſs to doe every thing that can be ſuggeſted,

——nuda ac tremebunda cruentis
Irrepet genibus ſi candida juſſerit Ino.

* Scruple is a little ſtone in the ſoor, if you ſet it upon the ground it hurts you, if you hold it up you cannot goe forward; it is a trouble where the trouble is over, a doubt when doubts are reſolved; it is a little party behinde a hedge when the main army is broken and the field cleared, and when the conſcience is inſtructed in its way, and girt for action, a light trifling reaſon, or an abſurd fear hinders it from beginning the journey, or proceeding in the way, or reſting at the journeys end.

4. Very often it hath no reaſon at all for its inducement, but proceeds from indiſpoſition of body, puſillanimity, melancholly, a troubled head, ſleepleſs nights, the ſociety of the timorous from ſolitarineſs, ignorance, or unſeaſoned imprudent notices of things, indigeſted learning, ſtrong fancy and weak judgement; from any thing that may abuſe the reaſon into irreſolution and reſtleſneſs. It is indeed a direct walking in the dark, where we ſee nothing to affright us, but we fancy many things, and the phantaſms produced in the lower regions of fancy, and nurſed by folly, and born upon the arms of fear doe trouble us.

But if reaſon be its parent, then it is born in the twilight, and the mother is ſo little that the daughter is a fly with a ſhort head and a long ſting, enough to trouble a wiſe man, but not enough to ſatisfy the appetite of a little bird. The reaſon of a ſcruple is ever as obſcure as the light of a Gloworm, not fit to govern any action, and yet is ſuffered to ſtand in the midſt of all its enemies, and like the flies of Egypt vex and trouble the whole Army.

6. This diſeaſe is moſt frequent in women, and monaſtick perſons, in the ſickly and timorous, and is often procured by exceſs in religious exerciſes, in auſterities and diſciplines, indiſcreet faſtings and pernoctations in prayer, multitude of humane Laws, variety of opinions, the impertinent talk and writings of men that are buſily idle: the enemy of mankinde by the weakneſſes of the body and underſtanding enervating the ſtrengths of the ſpirit, and making Religion ſtrike it ſelf upon the face by the palſies, and weak tremblings of its own fingers.

7. William of Oſney was a devout man, and read two or three Books of Religion and devotion very often, and being pleaſed with the entertainment of his time, reſolved to ſpend ſo many hours every day in reading them, as he had read over thoſe books ſeveral times; that is, three hours every day. In a ſhort time he had read over the books three times more, and began to think that his reſolution might be expounded to ſignify in a current ſenſe, and that it was to be extended to the future times of his reading, and that now he was to ſpend ſix hours every day in reading thoſe books, becauſe he had now read them over ſix times. * He preſently conſidered that in half ſo long time more by the proportion of this ſcruple he muſt be tied to twelve hours every day, and therefore that this ſcruple was unreaſonable; that he intended no ſuch thing when he made his reſolution, and therefore that he could not be tied: he knew that a reſolution does not binde a mans ſelf in things whoſe reaſon does vary, and where our liberty is intire, and where no intereſt of a third perſon is concerned. He was ſure that this ſcruple would make that ſenſe of the reſolution be impoſſible at laſt, and all the way vexatious and intolerable; he had no leiſure to actuate this ſenſe of the words, and by higher obligations he was faſter tied to other duties: he remembred alſo that now the profit of thoſe good books was receiv'd already and grew leſs, and now became chang'd into a trouble and an inconvenience, and he was ſure he could imploy his time better: and yet after all this heap of prudent and religious conſiderations, his thoughts revolv'd in a reſtleſs circle, and made him fear he knew not what. He was ſure he was not oblig'd, and yet durſt not truſt it; he knew his rule, and had light enough to walk by it, but was as fearful to walk in the day as children are in the night. * Well! being weary of his trouble, he tells his ſtory, receives advice to proceed according to the ſence of his reaſon, not to the murmurs of his ſcruple; he applies himſelf accordingly. But then he enters into new fears; for he reſts in this, that he is not oblig'd to multiply his readings, but begins to think that he muſt doe ſome equal good thing in commutation of the duty, for though that particular inſtance become intolerable and impoſſible, yet he tied himſelf to perform that which he beleev'd to be a good thing, and though he was deceived in the particular, yet he was right in the general, and therefore that for the particular he muſt make an exchange. He does ſo; but as he is doing it, he ſtarts, and begins to think that every commutation being intended for eaſe, is in ſome ſenſe or other a leſſening of his duty, a diminution of his ſpiritual intereſt, and a note of infirmity; and then alſo fears, that in judging concerning the matter of his commutation he ſhall be remiſs and partial. * Now he conſiders that he ought to conſult with his Superiors; and as he is going to doe ſo, he begins to think that his ſuperior did once chide him for his ſcruple, and that now much more he will doe it, and therefore will rather ſeek to aboliſh the opinion of obligation then change it into another burthen; and ſince he knows this before hand, he fears leſt it ſhall be expounded to be in him an artifice to get himſelf eaſed or chidden out of his duty, and cozened from his obligation. * What ſhall the man doe? He dares not truſt himſelf; and if he goes to another, he thinks that this will the more condemne him; he ſuſpects himſelf, but this other renders him juſtly to be ſuſpected by himſelf and others too. * Well! he goes to God and prays him to direct him; but then he conſiders that Gods graces are given to us working together with Gods Spirit, and he fears the work will not be done for him becauſe he fails in his own part of cooperating; and concerning this he thinks he hath no ſcruple, but certain cauſes of fear. * After a great tumbling of thoughts and ſorrows he begins to beleeve that this ſcrupulouſneſs of conscience is a temptation, and a punishment of his sins, and then he heaps up all that ever he did, and all that he did not, and all that he might have done, and seeking for remedy grows infinitely worse, till God at last pitying the innocence and trouble of the man made the evil to sink down with its own weight, and like a sorrow that breaks the sleep, at last growing big, loads the spirits, and bringing back the sleep that it had driven away, cures it self by the greatness of its own affliction. In this case, the Religion is not so great as the affliction.

8. But because a scruple is a fear, or a light reason against a stronger and a sufficiently determined understanding, it can bring no other work to the conscience, but that it get it self eased of the trouble, which is to be done by the following Rules.

RULE 2.

A Conscience sufficiently instructed by its proper arguments of perswasion, may without sin proceed to action against the scruple and its weaker arguings or stronger tremblings.

1. THIS is the best remedy that is in nature and reason. S. Bernard preached rarely well, and was applauded, but the Devil offering to him the temptation of vain-glory, he in his resisting it, began to think that he had better leave off to preach then begin to be proud; but instantly the Holy Spirit of God discovered to him the deception, and the Devils artifice who would at any rate have him leave off to preach; and he answered, I neither began for thee, nor for thee will I leave off. This is a right course in the matter of scruple: proceed to action; and as the reason or the fear in the scruple was not inducement enough to begin, so neither to leave off.

2. Against a doubting conscience a man may not work, but against a scrupulous he may. For a scrupulous conscience does not take away the proper determination of the understanding; but it is like a woman handling of a frog or a chicken, which all their friends tell them can doe them no hurt, and they are convinced in reason that they cannot, they beleeve it and know it, and yet when they take the little creature into their hands they shreek, and sometimes hold fast and finde their fears confuted, and sometimes they let goe, and finde their reason useless.

3. Valerius of Hippo being used always to fast till high noon of festivals, falls into an ilness of stomack, and is advised to eat something in the morning; all the reason of the world that is considerable and pressing, tells him he may doe it lawfully, but because he hath not been used to it, and good people in health doe not doe it, he is fearful to doe that which others doe not, that need it not; this is a slight ground, and with it perfectly may stand his practical determination of conscience that it is lawful for him; which final determination, because it is the next and immediate rule of actions cannot be impeded by that which suffers this perswasion still to remain, because the doing onely against such ſuch a perſwaſion can onely be a ſin, for that onely is the tranſgreſſion of the immediate Law; to doe conformably to ſuch determination is to doe it with faith; and if the ſcruple can leſſen it, yet it onely makes the man the weaker, but cannot deſtroy the aſſent.

4. Adde to this, that ſince ſcruples doe ſometimes make men mad, doe detriment to our health, make Religion a burden, introduce a wearineſs of ſpirit and tediouſneſs, it cannot be a ſin to ſtop all this evil, and directly to throw away the ſcruple and proceed to contrary actions.

5. But this is to be underſtood onely, when the ſcruple is ſuch that it leaves the conſcience practically determined. For if the ſcruple prevails upon his weakneſs ſo farre as to riſle the better reaſons, the conſcience loſes its rule and its ſecurity, and the ſcruple paſſes into a doubt, and the Law into a conſultation, and the judgement into opinion, and the conſcience into an undiſcerning, undetermined faculty.

6. Hither is to be reduced the caſe of a perplexed conſcience; that is, when men think that which part ſoever of the contradiction they chooſe, they ſin; for though that be impoſſible to wiſe men, yet all men are not wiſe; and if it were impoſſible in the thing, yet it is certainly poſſible upon the diſtempers of ſome men: and becauſe a man hath contrary reaſonings and divided principles within, as our bleſſed Lord had a natural deſire not to die, and yet a reaſonable and a holy ſpiritual deſire to ſubmit to his Fathers will, and if he pleaſe, to die; ſo hath every man deſires to pleaſe an appetite, or ſecure an intereſt of ſecular deſigns, and a reaſon to ſerve the intereſt of his ſpirit in ſpiritual deſigns: But although in our bleſſed Lord the appetites of nature were innocent and obedient, and the ſpirit always got a clear victory, and the fleſh reſiſted not, yet in us it is not ſo; and ſometimes ſpiritual complications doe diſturb the queſtion, and make the temporal end ſeem religious or pious; and the contrary pretence is pious too, and yet a duty will be omitted which way ſoever be choſen, or a ſin committed as is ſuppoſed; here the caſe ſeems hard.

* It is certain that there is no ſuch caſe in the world, that it is neceſſary for a man to ſin which part ſoever he takes, and unleſs it be his own fault he cannot think ſo; but ſome men are wilde in their reaſonings, and erre in circles, and cannot untie the knots themſelves have knit. Some are weary, and many are involved, and more are fooliſh; and it is as poſſible for a man to be a fool in one propoſition as in another, and therefore his error may be this, that which part ſoever he chooſes he ſhall ſin; what is to be done here is the Queſtion?

7. The caſe is this; Pratinus a Romane Souldier turns Chriſtian, and having taken his military Sacrament before, and ſtill continuing the imployment, he is commanded to put to death certain criminals, which he undertakes, becauſe he is bound to it by his oath. Going to the execution he finds they were condemned for being Chriſtians; then he ſtarts, remembring his Sacrament or oath on one ſide, and his faith on the other; that is, his Religion on both; by which he is bound neither to be perjured, nor to kill his Brethren: The Queſtion is not how he might expedite his doubt, and ſecure his conſcience by chooſing the ſurer part, but what he is to doe, this perplexity remaining, that is, he not being able to lay aſide either part of the doubt; for his queſtion is not whether of the two he ſhall doe, but is perſwaded that to doe either is a high crime.

8. 1. Concerning this, it is evident, that if the caſes be equal, and the event not to be diſtinguiſhed by him in the greatneſs of its conſequent or malice of it, it, it is indifferent to him which he chooses; and therefore there can be no Rule given which he must take, unless he could be convinced of one that it is lawful, and the other unlawful; but in his case that not being to be done, he ought to know that in this case he sins not if he takes either, because all sin is with liberty and choice, at least with complacency; but his error is an infelicity and no sin, if he neither chooses it, nor delights in it, which in the present case he is supposed not to doe.

9. 2. But if in the event of the actions and parts of choice there be a real or apprehended difference, he is bound to choose that part which he beleeves to be the less sin; this being a justification of his will, the best that can be in the present case; but if he chooses that which is of worse event, he hath nothing to excuse it.

He that is troubled with scruples, ought to rely upon the judgement of a prudent Guide.

1. THE reason is, because his own understanding is troubled and restless, and yet his reason determined; and therefore he can but use the best way of cure, which in his particular is to follow an understanding that is equally determined as is his own, and yet not so diseased.

2. Adde to this, that God hath appointed spiritual persons, Guides of souls, whose office is to direct and comfort, to give peace and conduct, to refresh the weary, and to strengthen the weak, to confirm the strong, and instruct the doubtful; and therefore to use their advice is that proper remedy which God hath appointed. *. And it hath also in it this advantage, that there is in it humility of understanding, a not relying on our own wisdome, which by way of blessing and disposition will obtain of God that we be directed. Consule bonos, prudentésque viros, & acquiesce eis, was an old advice, and derived from Solomon and Tobit; lean not on thy own understanding; but ask counsel of all that are wise, and despise not any counsel that is profitable. Antonin. in sum. 1. p. tit. 3. c. 10.

When a doubt is resolved in the entrance of an action, we must judge of our action afterwards by the same measures as before; for he that changes his measures, turns his doubt into a scruple.

1. THE reason of the Rule is this, That which is sufficient for satisfaction before, is sufficient for peace afterwards. A Christian in the Diocese of Salamis being faint in his stomack before the reception of the holy Sacrament, disputes whether he may take a cordial or a glass of wine. Upon inquiry he is told, told, That to receive the holy Sacrament virgine ſaliva, faſting is a cuſtome of the Church later then the times of the Apoſtles, as appears by the Corinthian uſages mentioned by S. Paul; that it having no authority but cuſtome, no ſanction but a pious fancy, and a little proportion and analogy of reverence, it ought to yeeld to the elicite acts of charity: Upon this account he being ſatisfied, drinks a little, is well, and communicates with health, and joy, and holineſs. But afterwards reflecting upon what he had done, he begins to fear he had not done well; that he had done againſt the cuſtomes of the Church, that it was at leaſt infirmity in him, and upon what account with God that ſhould be, which in his own moſt gentle ſentence was at leaſt, infirmity, he knew not; and twenty other little things he thought of, which ſignified nothing, but did ſomethings, they meant no good, but did great evil: and finding himſelf got into a net, he calls for help, but is told that he muſt get out of it by the ſame way that he came in, and that which was the ſufficient cauſe of his doing the action, was ſufficient alſo for the juſtification of it, and let him confront the reaſons which introduc'd the action againſt theſe flies and little pretenſions which diſturb his minde, and he ſhall finde that he hath reaſon to be aſhamed of debauching and proſtituting his underſtanding to ſuch trifles and images of argument: For let a man look to his grounds when he begins to act, and when he hath acted, let him remember that he did his duty, and give God thanks. For if any juſt cauſe appear for which he ought to reprove his former determination; that juſt cauſe can have no influence upon what is paſt, if the firſt proceeding was probable, and reaſonable, and diſ-intereſt. He knows ſomething which he did not know before; and for the time to come is to walk by this newly kindled taper, but if he in the firſt inſtance walked by all the light he had, he is not tied to walk it over again: for as God will not of a child exact the prudence and cautions of a man, but in every age expects a duty anſwerable to the abilities of it; ſo it is in all the ſtages of our reaſon, and growing underſtanding. According to what we have, and not according to what we have not we ſhall give accounts. This is intended to prove that if we proceed probably, we are not tied to ſorrow and repentance, though afterwards we finde a greater reaſon to the contrary; but this concludes more in the preſent queſtion of ſcruple, in which the greater probability goes before, and the leſs comes after.

But the Rule is to be managed with theſe Cautions:

2. 1. Take heed that in the beginning we doe not miſtake our deſires to have it done, for a ſufficient warrant that it may. For if we enter in at a wrong door, or at the windows, we muſt goe back, and cannot own that entrance which was like a Theef, or that action which was done with more craft then prudence.

3. 2. Be not too eaſy in the arguments of probation. For although in actions concerning our eternal intereſt, God expects no more of us but that we ſhould walk by the meaſures of a man; yet we doe not perform our duty if we act by the meaſures of a child or a fool. If we could doe no better, the action might be more reprovable then the man; but if we could conſider better and wiſer then when we reflect afterwards upon what we did before, and finde a fault or a ſin, a negligence or an avoidable error in the principle, we cannot from thence bring reſt and confidence to our conſciences.

4. 3. Separate your queſtion as much as you can from intereſt, that your determination and inquiry be pure; and if more arguments occurre afterwards then did in the firſt inquiry, remember that it was well enough at firſt,

if

if it was probable enough; and for the rest, pray to God to accept you, if you did well and wisely, and to pardon you in what was done amiss, or negligently, or imperfectly.

RULE 5.

A scrupulous Conscience is to be cured by remedies proper to the disease, and remedies proper to the man.

1. THat is, there are some advices which are directly intended for the lessening the scruple, and some others which take away the scruple by curing the man, and taking off his distemperature. Those which are directly intended against the scruple, besides the Rules before described, are these:

Remedies against the Scruple.

2. 1. Let the afflicted and disquiet man often meditate of the infinite goodness of God, and how his justice is equity, and his jndgements are in mercy; that he judges us by what we heartily endevour, but does not put our infelicities into our accounts of sins.

3. 2. Let him be instructed that all Laws Divine and Humane are desirous of sweet and merciful interpretations, and that of themselves they love to yeeld to necessity and to charity; and that severity and exactness of measures is not onely contrary to the goodness, but to the justice of God, who therefore will pity us because we are made of dust, and are a lump of folly and unavoidable infirmities; and by the same justice by which God is eternally angry with the fallen Angels, by the same justice he is not finally angry with man for his first follies, and pities all his unavoidable evils.

4. 3. Let it be remembred that charity is the fulfilling the Law, and by the degrees of it a man tends to perfection, and not by forms and tittles of the letter, and apices of the handwriting of ordinances. And that if he loves God and does his best, and concerning the doing his best make the same judgements real and material, that he does of the other actions of his life, he certainly does all that can belong to him, and all that which can be wise and safe. He that acts according to the reason of a man, ought to have the confidences of a man, for no other confidence can be reasonable. That is charity that we doe carefully and wisely, and follow the best we can.

5. 4. Let it be considered that to incline to the scruple, and neglect the stronger reason that stands against it, is to take the worse end, it is to doe that which must seem worse; and then it may be remembred, that if the man is afraid and troubled with the trifle, with the scruple, when he hath stronger reason to secure him, if he yeelds to the scruple and neglects the stronger reason, the neglect of that will run upon him like a torrent and a whirlewind, and the scruple, or the bulrush will not support his building.

6. 5. Since the very design of the Euangelical Covenant is, that our duty be demanded, and our sins accounted for, according to the measures of a man, and and not by the proportions of an Angel; and that all our infirmities and ignorances, and unavoidable prejudices are taken into account, beſide the infinite remiſſions on Gods part, it will follow that by this goodneſs of God and a moral diligence, and a good heart we are ſecured, but we can never be ſecured by our own meaſures. For let us weigh never ſo exactly, we may miſs ſome grains or ſcruples, but to ſnatch greedily at the little overrunning duſt of the ballance, and to throw away the maſſive ingots that ſunk the ſcales down, is the greateſt folly in the world.

7. 6. The lines of duty are ſet down ſo clear and legible, are ſo agreeable to reaſon, ſo demonſtrable upon their proper principles, are ſo eaſy and plain, that we need not run into corners, and ſneaking by-lanes to finde it out: If by little undiſcerned minutes we were to ſtand or fall, though now there are but few that ſhall be ſaved, yet but a few of thoſe few ſhould eſcape eternal death. The counſels of God are not like the Oracles of Apollo, double in their ſenſe, intricate in their expreſſion, ſecret in their meaning, deceitful in their meaſures, and otherwiſe in the event then they could be in their expectation. But the word of God in the lines of duty is open as the face of heaven, bright as the Moon, healthful as the Suns influence; and this is certainly true, that when a thing becomes obſcure, though it may oblige us to a prudent ſearch, yet it binds us not under a guilt, but onely ſo farre as it is or may be plainly underſtood.

8. But in the caſe of a ſcrupulous conſcience, it is not the thing ſo much that troubles the minde, as the indiſpoſition of the part, the man hath a vicious tenderneſs; it is melancholy and fear, and as very accident can trouble the miſerable, ſo every fancy can affright the timorous; the chiefeſt remedies therefore muſt be by applications to the man, to cure his diſtemper, and then the ſcruple will work no more then its own activity will enable it, and that is but little and inconſiderable.

Advices to the ſcrupulous man.

1. The caſe of the ſcrupulous man is ſo full of variety, or uncertainty ra-
9. ther that it is as eaſy to govern chance, and to give rules to contingency as to him. In all other caſes there is a meaſure and a limit, and therefore a remedy can be proportioned to it; but in this, fear is the diſeaſe, and that alone is infinite; and as it commences oftentimes without cauſe, ſo it proceeds without limit. For by what reaſon it entred in, by the ſame it may grow; that is, without any cauſe at all it may increaſe for ever. * But for the remedy, this is conſiderable; That the worſe it is, the better it may be remedied, if we could conſider. For when fear is grown ſo bigge that it is unreaſonable, the cure is ready and plain, that it muſt be laid aſide becauſe it is intolerable, and it may becauſe it is unreaſonable. When it comes from a juſt cauſe, that juſt cauſe is uſually the limit of it: but when it is vaſt and infinite it hath no cauſe, but weakneſſe, and it appears enough in the inſtances; for the ſcrupulous man fears concerning thoſe things where he ought to be moſt confident; he fears that God is angry with him for not doing his duty, and yet he does whatſoever he can learn to be his duty. * This is a complication of evils, as melancholy is of diſeaſes. The ſcrupulous man is timorous, and ſad, and uneaſy, and he knows not why. As the melancholy man muſes long, and to no purpoſe, he thinks much, but thinks of nothing; ſo the ſcrupulous man fears exceedingly, but he knows not what nor why. It is a Religious melancholy, and when

when it appears to be a diſeaſe and a temptation, there needs no more argument againſt its entertainment. We muſt rudely throw it away.

10. 2. He that is vexed with ſcruples, muſt fly to God by prayer and faſting, that this lunacy and ſpirit of illuſion which ſometimes throws him into the fire, and ſometimes into the water may be ejected, and the Spirit of God, and the Spirit of wiſdome may come in ſubſtitution according to the promiſe ſo often recorded in the holy Scriptures. Luke 11. 13. James 1. 5.

11. 3. Let the ſcrupulous man change the tremblings of his ſpirit to a more conſiderable object, and be ſure if he fears little things, let him fear great things greatly, every known ſin let him be ſure to avoid, little or great, for by this purity he ſhall ſee God, and the things of God, peace and truth, and the honeſty of his heart will bear him out from the miſchief, if not quit from the trouble of the ſcruple: * at no hand let it be endured that he ſhould think this diſeaſe or vicious tenderneſs in ſpirit is able to excuſe him from his duty in greater things. Some ſcruple at an innocent ceremony, and againſt all conviction and armies of reaſon will be troubled and will not underſtand; this is very bad, but it is worſe that he ſhould think himſelf the more godly man for being thus troubled and diſeaſed, and that upon this account he ſhall fall out with Government and deſpiſe it, this man nurſes his ſcruple till it proves his death, and inſtead of curing a bile, dies with a cancer, and is like a man that hath ſtrained his foot and keeps his bed for eaſe, but by lying there long falls into a lipothymie, and that bears him to his grave.

12. 4. Let the ſcrupulous man avoid all exceſs in mortifications and corporal auſterities, becauſe theſe are apt to trouble the body, and conſequently to diſorder the minde, and by the prevailing fond perſwaſions of the world they uſually produce great opinions of ſanctity and ignorant confidences of Gods favour, and by ſpending the religion of the man in exterior ſignifications make him apt to take his meaſures from imperfect notices, and then his religion ſhall be ſcruple and impertinency, full of trouble, but good and profitable for little or nothing. Admiratione digna ſunt (ſaith Cardan) quæ per jejunium hoc modo contingunt: ſomnia, ſuperſtitio, contemptus tormentorum, mortis deſiderium, obſtinata opinio, inſania: jejunium naturaliter præparat ad hæc omnia. It is wonderful to conſider what ſtrange products there are of faſting: Dreams ſuperſtition, contempt of torments, deſire of death, obſtinacy in opinion, and madneſs. To all theſe, faſting does naturally prepare us: and concerning S. Hilarion it is reported by S. Hierome, Ita attenuatus fuit jejunio & vigiliis in tantum exeſo corpore ut oſsibus vix hærebat: unde nocte infantum vagitus, balatus pecorum, mugitus boum, voces & ludibria dæmonum, &c. that he was ſo lean and dried with faſting and watching, that his fleſh did ſcarce cleave to his bone: Then his deſires and capacity of ſleep went away, and for want of ſleep he muſt needs grow light headed, and then the illuſions of the Devil were prepared and certain to prevail; then his brains crowed, and he heard in the deſert children crying, ſheep bleating, bulls lowing, and rattling of chains, and all the phantaſtick noiſes raiſed by the Devil. Much to the ſame purpoſe is by S. Athanaſius reported of S. Anthony. It was this exceſs that made S. Hierome ſo ſcrupulous in reading of Tullies Orations; it was not an Angel, but his own dreams that whipp'd him for making and reading good Latin and good ſenſe. After long faſting it was that S. Gulſlach of Crowald fought with the Devil, and ſuch irregular auſterities have been in all ages of ſuperſtition, the great inſtru-

Lib. 8. c. 19. De rerum varietate.

ment of Satan by which his illusions became Oracles, and religion was changed into superstition, and the fear of God into timorousness, and inquiry into scruple.

13. 5. Let the scrupulous man interest himself in as few questions of intricate dispute, and minute disquisition as he can; they that answer fewest, doe commonly trouble themselves with most. Curious questions may puzzle every man, but they can profit no man, they are a certain disturbance, they are rebels in the kingdome of the inner man, they are just the same things in speculation which scruples are in practice, and therefore because notice properly tends and directs to action, the increase of them will multiply these. Avoid them therefore, for not these, but things practical are the hinges of immortality; but the other break the peace of the superior faculties, they trouble the understanding and afflict the conscience and profit, or instruct no man.

14. 6. He that would cure his scrupulousness must take care that his Religion be as near as he can to the measures and usages of common life. When S. Anthony was troubled with a scrupulous conscience, which so amaz'd him, that he thought it was impossible for him ever to arrive at heaven, an Angel came to him in the likeness of a Hermit, or rather an Hermit spake to him like an Angel and said, Nunc paululum laborando manibus, nunc genibus flexis orando, deinde corpus reficiendo, pòst quiescendo, & rursus iterum operando, Antoni, sic fac tu & salvus eris. Sometimes labour with thy hands, then fall on thy knees and pray, then refresh thy body, then sometimes rest, and then labour again; and so thou shalt be saved. Let us take care that our Religion be like our life, not done like pictures, taken when we are dressed curiously, but looking as the actions of our life are dressed, that is, so as things can be constantly done, that is, that it be dressed with the usual circumstances, imitating the examples, and following the usages of the best and the most prudent persons of his communion; striving in nothing to be singular, not doing violence to any thing of nature, unless it be an instrument or a temptation to a vice. For some men mortify their natures rather then their vicious inclinations or their evil habits, and so make Religion to be a burden, a snare, and an enemy. For in scrupulous, that is, in melancholy persons nature is to be cherished in every thing where there is no danger, that is, where she is not petulant and troublesome. Such men have more need of something to repair their house, then to lessen it.

15. 7. Let the scrupulous man take care that he make no vows of any lasting imployment. For the disease that is already within, and this new matter from without will certainly make new cases of Conscience, and new fears and scruples upon the manner, and degrees, and circumstances of performance. Therefore what ever good thing they intend, let them doe it when they can, when it is pleasant, when it is convenient, and always reserve their liberty. For besides that to doe otherwise must needs multiply scruples, it is also more pleasing to God that we make our services to be every day chosen, then after one general choice of them, to have the particulars done and hated.

16. 8. But that I may summe up many particulars in one. The scrupulous man must avoid those companies, and those imployments, and those books from whence the clouds arise, especially the books of ineffective and phantastick notion, such as are Legends of Saints, ridiculously and weakly invented, furnished out for Idea's, not for actions of common life, with dreams and false propositions; for the scrupulous and fearful will easily be troubled, if they finde themthemſelves fall ſhort of thoſe fine images of virtue which ſome men deſcribe, that they might make a fine picture, but like no body. Such alſo are the Books of myſtical Theology, which have in them the moſt high, the moſt troubleſome, and the moſt myſterious nothings in the world, and little better then the effluxes of a religious madneſs. *

17. 9. Let the ſcrupulous man endevour to reduce his body into a fair temper, * and enkindle in his minde a great love and high opinions of God and Gods mercy, and by proper arts produce joy in God, and rejoycings in the Spirit; * let him purſue the purgative way of religion, fight againſt and extirpate all vicious habits and evil cuſtomes, doe the actions of virtue frequently and conſtantly, but without noiſe and outcries, without affectation and ſingularity; that religion is beſt which is incorporated with the actions and common traverſes of our life; and as there will be ſome fooliſh actions, ſo there will be matter for repentance; let this humble us, but not amaze us and diſtract us.

18. 10. Let all perſons who are or uſe to be thus troubled with flies, and impertinencies of reaſon and conſcience be carefully and wiſely inſtructed in thoſe practical propoſitions which are the general lines of life, which are the axiomes of Chriſtian Philoſophy, which like the rules of Law have great influence in many virtues, and have great effect towards perfection. For the more ſevere the rules are, the more apt they are to be the matter of ſcruple when they are not underſtood in their juſt meaſures. Such as are, It is the part of a good minde to acknowledge a fault where there is none. * Not to goe forward is to goe backward. * He that loves danger ſhall periſh in danger. * Hold that which is certain, and let goe that which is uncertain. There are many more, of which I am to give accounts in the next Book, and from thence the ſcrupulous may derive aſſiſtances.

" Concerning the matter of ſcruples, I on purpoſe decline the conſide-" ring of it here, becauſe either every thing or nothing of it is to be handled.
" A ſcruple may ariſe in the doing of every duty, in the remembrance of every " action; and to ſtop one gap, when the evil may enter in at 500. I did ſup-
" poſe not to be worth my labour. I therefore reſerve every thing to its own " place, being content here to give the meaſures and rules of conſcience in " its ſeveral kinds, and differing affections, that is, in all its proper capacities " which can relate to action.

RVLE OF CONSCIENCE.

viz.

The Laws Divine and Humane,

And

All collateral Obligations.

THE SECOND BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of the Law of Nature in general.

RULE I.

The Law of Nature is the Universal Law of the world, or the Law of mankinde, concerning common necessities to which we are inclined by Nature, invited by consent, prompted by reason, but is bound upon us onely by the commands of God.

1. Constit. Apost. l. 1. c. 6.

Σπου σοὶ περὶ ὀφθαλμῶν γινώσκειν τὸν νόμον φυσικὸν, καὶ τὰ παρ' ἐπιδευτερώσεως, said the Apostolical constitution; Be careful to understand what is the Law natural, and what is superinduc'd upon it. The counsel, abating the authority and reverence of them that said it, is of great reasonableness. For all men talk of the law of Nature, and all agree that there is such a material law which some way or other is of the highest obligation; but because there are no Digests or Tables of this law, men have not onely differ'd about the number of them, and the instances themselves, but about the manner of drawing them forth, and making the observation: whereas if the law of Nature were such a thing as it is supposed generally, these differences would be as strange and impossible, as that men should disagree about what is black, or what is yellow, or that they should dispute concerning rules to signify when they desire, or when they hope, or when they love. The purpose of the present intendment will not suffer me to make large disputes about it, but to observe all that is to be drawn from it in order to Conscience and its obligation.

The

The Law of Nature]

2. Jus naturæ, and Lex naturæ are uſually confounded by Divines and Lawyers, but to very ill purpoſes, and to the confuſion and indiſtinction of all the notices of them. The right of nature, or Jus naturæ is no Law, and the law of nature is no natural right. The right of nature is a perfect and univerſal liberty to doe whatſoever can ſecure me or pleaſe me. For the appetites that are prime, original, and natural, doe deſign us towards their ſatisfaction, and were a continual torment, and in vain, if they were not in order to their reſt, contentedneſs and perfection. Whatſoever we naturally deſire, naturally we are permitted to. For natures are equal, and the capacities are the ſame, and the deſires alike; and it were a contradiction to ſay that naturally we are reſtrained from any thing to which we naturally tend. Therefore to ſave my own life, I can kill another, or twenty, or a hundred, or take from his hands to pleaſe my ſelf, if it happens in my circumſtances and power; and ſo for eating, and drinking, and pleaſures. If I can deſire, I may poſſeſs or enjoy it: this is, The right of nature. Jus naturæ, by jus or right, underſtanding not a collated or legal right, poſitive or determined, but a negative right, that is, ſuch a right as every man hath without a Law, and ſuch as that by which the ſtones in the ſtreets are mine or yours; by a right that is negative, becauſe they are nullius in bonis, they are appropriate to no man, and may be mine; that is, I may take them up and carry them to my bed of turf, where the natural, wild, or untutored man does ſit. But this is not the Law of nature, nor paſſes any obligation at all. Valla Elegant. l. 4. c. 48.

And indeed nature her ſelf makes not a Law:

Nec natura poteſt juſto ſecernere iniquum, and this opinion Carneades did expreſs, but rudely, and was for it noted by Lactantius. He ſaid there was no law of nature. But the Chriſtians who for many ages have followed the School of Ariſtotle, have been tender in ſuffering ſuch expreſſions, and have been great promoters of Ariſtotles doctrine concerning the τὸ φυσικὸν, the natural Law. But indeed Ariſtotle himſelf in this was various and indetermined. For in his Ethicks he affirms that ſome think the natural law to be [τὸ μὲ φύσῃ ἀκίνητον καὶ πανταχοῦ τὴν αὐτὴν ἔχῃ δύναμιν, ὥσπερ τὸ πῦρ καὶ ἐνθάδε καὶ ἐν Πέρσαις καίει] unalterable, and of the ſame force every where, as fire burns here and in Perſia: and yet he himſelf makes it mutable, and that it is not the ſame among all Nations; for ſo he in his Rhetoricks ſays, ἔστι γὰρ ὃ μαντεύονταί τι πάντες, φύσει κοινὸν δίκαιον καὶ ἄδικον κἂν μηδεμία κοινωνία πρὸς ἀλλήλους ᾖ, μηδὲ συνθήκη, that ſome doe Divine [not demonſtrate] that ſome things are juſt or unjuſt by nature, without any Covenant or Society; intimating, that without a covenant or contract tacite or explicite, there can be no Law: and if it depends upon contract, it muſt be variable as neceſſity, and contingency together; and ſo he affirms, That there is nothing ſo naturally juſt but it is variable; and although the right hand is in moſt men the ſtrongeſt, yet in ſome the left hand is. Διανεμητικὸν δίκαιον τῶν κοινῶν ἀεὶ κατ' ἀναλογίαν ἔστι τὸ εἰρημένον. Diſtributive juſtice is by proportion, and therefore it is variable; and in general he affirms of all juſtice, ὅ γε δίκαιον ἀνάλογον, juſtice is in proportion and relation. L. 5. c. 10. Lib. 1. c. 13. & 15. Lib. 5. c. 7. Ethic.

4. For juſtice is ἀλλότριον ἀγαθὸν, that is, πρός ἕτερον, a relative excellency, and therefore muſt ſuppoſe ſociety, and a paction or covenant. For a man cannot be unjuſt to himſelf or to his own goods which are abſolutely in his

Ethic. l. 5 c. 10. power. οὐκ ἔστιν ἀδικία πρὸς ἄλλον and therefore Juſtice, I mean that univerſal virtue that contains all elſe within it, is a virtue that hath its being from ſomething ſuperinduc'd upon nature. Juſtice is natural, as all virtues are, that is, reaſonable and perfective of our nature, and introductive of well-being: But nature alone hath not injoyn'd it originally, any more then matrimonial chaſtity was a natural law, which could not be at all before Eve was created, and yet our nature was perfect before. Juſtum nihil eſt non conſtitutâ lege, nothing is juſt or unjuſt of it ſelf, until ſome Law of God or man does ſupervene; and the Scepticks generally, and amongſt the Dogmaticks Ariſtippus ſaid, that nothing is juſt by nature, but onely νόμῳ καὶ ἔθει, by law and cuſtome; which in what ſenſe it is to be admitted, I ſhall explicate in the following periods.

Ἐν ᾧ δικαιοσύνη συλλήβδην πᾶσ' ἀρετή ἐστι,

——is the univerſal law of the World.]

Rhetor. l. 1. c. 11. ὁ κοινὸς νόμος, ſo Ariſtotle calls it [The law of mankinde] Commune omnium hominum jus; ſo Juſtinian; which is not to be underſtood of all men in all things
L. 9. ff. de jure & juſtitia. abſolutely, but eſpecially of all wiſe or civil Nations that communicate with each other. Lucretius reſtrains it to neighbours,

Tunc & amicitiam cœperunt jungere habentes
Finitima inter ſe nec lædere, nec violare.

But many Nations have thought, and ſome think ſo ſtill, that they may hurt ſtranger people, the poſſeſſors of farre diſtant Countries, barbarous and ſavage people: The Romans who were the wiſeſt of all Nations did ſo.

Arbiter. ——ſi quis ſinus abditus ultra,
Siqua foret tellus quæ fulvum mitteret aurum
Hoſtis erat——

All people whom they call'd barbarous, or whom they found rich were their enemies.

5. But there are ſome laws of Nature which belong to all abſolutely, to whom any notice of the true God and of good manners is arrived; particularly thoſe which belong to common religion: But in the laws of juſtice, the law of nature is more reſtrained, becauſe it does not onely, like the laws of religion, ſuppoſe ſome communications of command from God, but ſome entercourſe with man; and therefore are obligatory, or extended in proportion to the proximity and communication. But the law taken in its integrity, or according to its formal reaſon, is the law of all mankinde; for all men in all things are bound to it.

Concerning ſome common neceſsities]

This deſcribes the matter and body of natural Laws. For there is nothing by which the laws are denominated natural more then by this, that they are proviſions made for the natural neceſſities of mankinde; ſuch are, To doe as we would be done to: To perform covenants: To ſecure meſſengers of peace and Arbitrators: To be thankful to our Benefactors, and the like: without theſe a man cannot receive any good, nor be ſafe from evil.

6. By this relation, and interchanging reaſon, it is therefore neceſſary that theſe laws ſhould be diſtinguiſhed from all others, becauſe theſe and their like proceed from the ſame principle, are reſtrained by the ſame penalties, written in the ſame tables, have the ſame neceſsity, and doe ſuppoſe ſomething ſuperadded to our nature; and therefore that these and their like are natural, and the others are not, must be by relation to the subject matter.

7. For in these cases and the like, when that which is profitable is made just, then that which is natural is made a law; that is, when the law tends to the same end whither nature tends, when the faculty or appetite is provided for by obedience to a law, then the law is called natural. For since all good and just laws are profitable, they are laws Civil or Religious, or Natural according as they serve the end of the Commonwealth, or of the Religion, or of Nature. This is evident in the Code of the Mosaick law, where all laws being established by God under the same Prince, could have no difference but by their subject matter; and when they did lie in one body, to separate one from the other by proper appellatives was not easy, but by their manner of doing benefit, and their material relations.

8. To which we are inclined by nature]

That which is usually called the law of Nature is of it self nothing else but convenientia cum naturâ rationali, a consonancy to natural reason and being. Some in drawing the Tables of the natural law, estimate those onely to be natural laws which are concerning appetites and actions common to man and beast. Jus naturale est quod natura omnia animalia docuit, said Ulpian. That is the law of nature which is by nature taught not onely to men, but even to beasts, for they also are under her power, L. 1 ff de justitia & jure.

——Magnis agitant sub legibus ævum.

The same definition is also given by Aquinas, and many Lawyers after Justinian, and almost all Divines after Aquinas; but Laurentius Valla will at no hand endure it, Nam jus naturale dicere quod natura omnia animalia docuit, ridiculum; it is ridiculous to affirm that to be the law of nature, which nature teaches to all living creatures; such as are, conjunction of sexes for conservation of the kinde, nursing and educating children, abstinence from some certain mixtures and copulations, abhorring the conjunction of some very near persons. Concerning which it is therefore certain, that though the matter of these laws is hugely agreeable to nature, and some of them are afterwards made into laws, and for their matter sake and early sanction are justly called natural (as I have otherwhere discoursed) yet they are made laws in nature onely dispositivè, that is, by nature they are made Candidates of laws, they are prepar'd by nature, but compleated by God in other ways then by our nature and creation. 1.2ae q. 104. art. 2. Elegant. l. 4. c. 4. See Great Exemplar.

9. The reason is, because that which is natural is one, but these laws admit variety; and amongst wise Nations in several cases have and have not obligation. The Religious, and the Priests, and wise men among the Persians did not account themselves bound by all these, as I shall discourse in the following numbers; and yet they were then to be reckoned amongst the wisest men in the world, because of their great Empire and Government, which, by reason of their great necessities and communications with mankinde, cannot be done without its proportion of wisdome. But if nature did make these into a law, that is, if it comes by creation, and from thence also the penalty and coercion is derived (for without these there is no law) then it were impossible the wise Persians should think it commendable to doe that which others called abominable, since in all those things in which they doe a thing which they call unlawful, they as other men felt an equal sharpness and pungency of conscience.

But

10. But that I may ſpeak cloſer to the particular, That a thing is common to men and beaſts is no indication of a law of nature, but onely of a common neceſſity, inſtinct, or inclination reſpectively. For they doe it without a law, and therefore ſo may we, unleſs ſomething elſe beſides nature makes it a law to us; for nature or natural deſire in them and us is the ſame, but this deſire is in them where a law cannot be, and therefore in us alſo it may be without a law. Beaſts doe all that they can doe, and can love, and are no more capable of law then of reaſon; and if they have inſtincts and inclinations, it is no otherwiſe then their appetites to meat, concerning which nature hath determined all, but without proper obligation: and all thoſe diſcourſes concerning the abſtinence of beaſts, their gratitude, their hoſpitality, their fidelity, their chaſtity and marriages, are juſt like the diſcourſes of thoſe that would make them reaſonable. More certain and true is that which was ſaid of old,

Ἰχθύσι μὲν γὰρ θηρσὶ, καὶ οἰωνοῖς πετεηνοῖς
Ἔδμεν ἀλλήλους, ἐπεὶ οὐ δίκη ἔστι μετ' αὐτοῖς,

Fiſhes and birds and beaſts eat one another, becauſe they have no juſtice or laws amongſt them, ſaid Heſiod; and the like is in Homer, and therefore although it is a good popular argument which is uſed againſt unnatural conjunctions which is in the Greek Epigram,

Ὡς γὰρ ἔστι λέουσι καὶ ἀνδράσιν ὅρκια πιστά.

I. 7.

Δέρκεο τὴν ἀλόγων ζώων γένεσ, ἃ γὰρ ἐκείνων
Φύσις ἀπεμάξει θεσμια συζυγίης, &c.

L. 1. c. 78.

Abſtain from ſuch impurities, for the very beaſts preſerve their natural cuſtoms and conjunctions inviolate; yet this is an infinitely uncertain and fallacious way of eſtimating any particular laws of nature, becauſe it may as well be ſaid to be againſt the law of nature to be drunk, as to be inceſtuous, upon this account, becauſe Cows will drink no more then to quench their thirſt: and although in the law of Moſes, beaſts were put to death if they were inſtrumental in beſtiality or murder, yet this was in pœnam Domini, or a matter of dominion over beaſts; and the word pœna or puniſhment was improper and no otherwiſe to be underſtood then that of Suidas in his ſtory of Nicon; whoſe ſtatue when an envious perſon had whipp'd, to diſgrace his memory, becauſe in the Greek games he had won 1400. crowns, the ſtatue fell upon his head and cruſhed him to death. τὸν δὲ οἱ παῖδες ἐπεξίεσαν φόνου ὅτι τῇ εἰκόνι· καὶ οἱ Θάσιοι καθαπερ τῶν αὐτῷ τὴν νόμον τοῦ Δράκοντος Ἀθηναίου. His ſons accuſed the ſtatue as guilty of murder, and the Thaſians threw it into the Sea; for ſo was the law of Draco the Athenian, ὑπερορίζειν φονεύοντας καὶ τὰ ἄψυχα, to baniſh every thing that kill'd a man, though it were wood, ſtones, or hatchets as you may ſee in Demoſthenes. Theſe things were tragical deteſtations and emblematical proſecutions of the crime; but the men were wiſer then to beleeve it really a puniſhment to inanimate things. The ſame is true of beaſts in their proportion, whoſe cruelty, ſavageneſs, or violent revenges is not κακία, but οἱονεὶ κακία as Origen calls it, it is like pravity or wickedneſs.

Orat. contr. Ariſtocratem.

11. This thing is ſo much the more conſiderable, becauſe it is of uſe againſt the pretences and ſcruples of ſome perſons in things where they ought to be confident. S. Hierom ſays that beaſts when they are impregnated abſtain from coition till the production of their young, and that this they doe by the law of nature; now upon this account to impoſe a law upon mankinde to doe ſo too, is weak and dangerous. But yet not onely he[a], but Origen[b], S. Ambroſe[c], and Sedulius[d], doe argue to the ſame purpoſe upon that very ground; moſt weakly and dangerouſly expoſing married perſons to the greater dangers of fornifornication, and depriving them of all the endearments of ſociety, not conſidering that thoſe creatures, and thoſe men whoſe cuſtome was otherwiſe, or laws different, had vagam libidinem, or the evil remedy of Polygamy. Beaſts indeed are ſo ordered by nature, but without a law; as there is no law for Lions to eat fleſh, or Oxen graſs, but yet naturally they doe it. A beaſt may be cruel or luſtful, or monſtrous and prodigious in the ſatisfaction of his appetites; but not injurious, or the breaker of any ſanction, or laws of juſtice. There may be damnum ſine injuria facientis datum, ſays the law, and it is inſtanc'd in beaſts. Neque enim poteſt animal injuriam feciſſe dici, quod ſenſu caret. A beaſt that hath no ſenſe (that is, no reaſon) no ſenſe or perception of lawful or unlawful cannot be ſaid to doe an injury, and therefore is not capable of puniſhment, becauſe he is incapable of a law. So Juſtin Martyr, or who ever is the author of the Queſtions and anſwers plac'd in his works; Ὅτι φαυλότητι παράξεως ἁμαρτάνειν τὴν ἀλόγων τὰς φύσεις, ὅτι ἄλογοι. It is unreaſonable to exact of beaſts the obliquity of their actions, becauſe they have no reaſon; it is therefore as unreaſonable to make the law of nature to be ſomething common to them and us.

L. 1. ff. ii Quadrupes §. 3.

12. If it be replied, that the Lawyers and Philoſophers mean onely that theſe material inſtances which are common to them and us are the particulars of the law of Nature, and though they be not a law to them, yet the ſame things which they doe naturally, are natural to us, and a law beſides, that is, the natural law: Beſides that this is not uſually ſaid by them, we are then never the nearer to know what is the law of Nature by this deſcription of it, for all things which they and we doe are not pretended to be laws; as eating and ſleeping; and therefore by what meaſure any other thing ſhould be a law to us becauſe they and we doe it, is not ſignified by this definition, or any explication of it. Let us then try the other meaſures which are uſual.

Invited by conſent]

13. The conſent of Nations, that is, publick fame amongſt all or the wiſeſt Nations is a great ſignification of decency or undecency, and a probable indication of the law of nature.

Φήμη δ' ἥτις πάμπαν ἀπόλυται, λῶτινα πολλοὶ
Λαοὶ φημίζωσι———

It is not a vain noiſe when many Nations joyn their voices in the atteſtation or deteſtation of an action; and it looks as if it were deriv'd from ſome common principle, which ſeems either to be Nature, or Contract; and then as in the firſt caſe they are reaſonable, ſo in the ſecond they are directly obligatory. Quod apud multos unum invenitur, non eſt erratum ſed traditum, ſaid Tertullian: like that of Heraclitus, τὰ κοινῇ φαινόμενα πιστά, if it ſeems ſo to the communities of mankinde, it is genuine, and natural, and without illuſion.

De præſcript.

14. Now this is true up to many degrees of probability; and yet it is rather an index of a permiſſion of nature, then of a natural obligation; it tels us rather what we may doe, then what we muſt, it being more probable that all nations will not conſent to an unnatural thing, that is, will not doe violence to nature, then that whatſoever they commonly act ſhould be a neceſſary law, and the meaſures of nature, or the indication of her ſanctions; and yet it is ſtill more probable that the conſent of Nations is more fit to be uſed as a corroberative to a perſwaſion or a kinde of actions, then as the prime motive or introduction. Κεάπιζον παντας ἀνθρωπους φαινεσθαι συμφωνουντας τοις ῥηθησομενοις, said Ariſtotle; and argumentum eſt veritatis aliquid omnibus videri, ſaid Seneca; it is a great ſtrengthening and a powerful prevailing argument to have all men conſent to our opinions and propoſitions. But it is in many moral inſtances as it is in the univerſal opinion which all mankinde hath concerning jewels, where they conſent no man knows how, or why: And no man can give a rational account why ſo great value ſhould be ſet upon a Diamond, but becauſe it looks prettily and is laſting: and ſo there are in nature decencies and laſting proportions in moral inſtances between the conſcience and the action; but yet as there is no proper and effective uſefulneſs in Diamonds towards the life of man, ſo neither is there in many inſtances in which the conſent of mankinde is very general. And therefore this is very farre ſhort of a law, and is no certain token of a permiſſive right of nature, much leſs of a law or obligation. For,

15. 1. Whole Empires have been eſtabliſhed and United by violence, and have laws given to them, and they receiv'd them in purſuance of the Conquerors intereſt and their educations have been form'd accordingly. Ninus form'd the Aſſyrian Monarchy, and his ſon was flattered into the reputation of a God, and all the Nations under that Scepter conſented to the worſhip of Belus; and all the Nations with whom theſe men converſed, imitated the manners of the Princeps populus, and in their banquets, the moſt modeſt of their women uſed to ſtrip themſelves ſtark naked, and it was counted no undecency, but ſhe was rude and uncivil that did not.

16. 2. There are ſome Nations ſo wholly barbarous and bruitiſh in their manners, that from their conſent we can gather nothing but thorns and wild briers: They are the words of Porphyry, ἐξ ὧν ὁ φερσήκει τὰς συγνώμας τῇ ἀνθρωπίνης καλαψευδεσθαι φύσεως, from whom we muſt not learn to bely and abuſe the fair inclinations and ſentences of humane nature. And therefore if we goe to account by the conſent of Nations, we muſt thruſt out all wild, ſavage, barbarous, and untaught people, νόμων ἐθνικῶν ὄντων, ἐχὶ δὲ βαρβαρώδης· ὃ γὰρ τῷ ἔθνους ὄνομα νομικῶς εἰρημένον ἑλλήνων συλλήπτικόν ἐστι νόμοις ὑποκειμένων, ſaid Michael Pſellus. We muſt into the account of the law of Nations take them onely who are ſubject to Laws, the well manner'd people onely, but then this alſo will be an infinite uncertainty. For,

In Synopſi LI.

17. 3. All Nations to the Greeks were barbarous; to the Romans alſo all Nations but the Greeks and themſelves: and to the Jews all were Heathens, which to them ſignified the ſame thing or worſe.

18. 4. And then which are thoſe Nations whom we ſhall call Moratiores, wiſe and well manner'd people, for this will depend upon our own cuſtomes; if they be like our cuſtomes, our laws, and manners of living then we approve them, elſe we condemne them.

19. 5. But then let us remember alſo that civility and fair cuſtoms were but in a narrow circle, till the Greeks and Romans beat the world into better manners. Ariſtotle ſays, that in his time in the Kingdomes of Pontus, which were very near to Greece, divers Nations were eaters of mans fleſh, ſuch as were the Achæans and Heniochans, and divers amongſt the Mediterraneans were worſe then they.

6. The

20. 6. The greateſt part of the world were undiſcovered till this laſt age, and amongſt them the Jus Gentium was to ſacrifice one another to Dæmons; for all the old Navigations were by Maritime Towns, and the inlands either were left alone in their own wilder manners, or it is not known what civilities they had. So that the Jus Gentium muſt needs have been an uncertain thing, variable and by chance, growing by accidents, and introduc'd by violence, and therefore could not be the meaſure of the law of Nature.

21. 7. Adde to theſe that the ſeveral Nations of the world had cuſtomes of their own, which commencing upon uncertain principles, have been derived to their poſterity, and retained with a religious fancy; becoming natural and proportionable to their fancies and their fears, and they would rather die then doe an act of violence to them, and beleev'd it to be the greateſt impiety in the world to break them. Herodotus tells a full inſtance of this in a triall made by Darius to the Indians and Greeks. He ask'd the Greeks what they would take to doe as the Indians did who eat their dead Parents and friends and accounted it the moſt honourable burial; they anſwered, They would not doe at it any price. And when he as'kd the Indians upon what conditions they would be induc'd to burn the bodies of their Fathers, and not to eat them, they deſired him not to ſpeak to them of any ſuch horrid impiety as to burn their Fathers carcaſſes, and to deny to them the honour of a narural burial in the bowels of their dear children. ἔθος Δαίμων. Cuſtome is the Genius or ſpirit of a mans actions, and introduces a nature, a facility, a delight, and religion it ſelf. Καὶ γὰρ ὃ εἰθισμένον ὥσπερ πεφυκὸς ἤδη γίγνεται. ὅμοιον γάρ τι τὸ ἔθος τῇ φύσει· ἐγγὺς γὰρ τὸ πολλάκις τοῦ ἀεὶ, ἔστι δ' ἡ μὲν φύσις τοῦ ἀεί. τὸ δὲ ἔθος τοῦ πολλάκις. Cuſtome is as nature, and that to which we are accuſtomed is like that which we were born. For that which is often is next to that which is always. It is nature which is always, that is cuſtome which is frequent: It is poſſible that nature in many things ſhould be altered, and it is very difficult that cuſtome ſhould in any thing; we have ſeen and heard it in a great inſtance in a few ages laſt paſt. For when ſome of the reformed Doctors by their private authority did twice attempt it, and the Church of Rome did twelve times publickly endevour it, to get the Greeks to forſake the cuſtomes of their Churches, and to reform themſelves by their copy, they were all repulſed; and if the Greek Prelates ſhould take the people off from their old cuſtomes, beſides that the great Turk would doe them a miſchief for complying with the Weſtern Chriſtians his Enemies, the people themſelves would indanger all their Religion and turn Turks, if they once did learn that their old cuſtomes were not neceſſary Religion: and therefore they choſe to ſtick ſecure in their Religion though allayed with ſome errors, then for the purchace of a leſs neceſſary truth endanger the whole Religion by taking the people off from their Jura Gentis, the cuſtoms of their Nation.

But the inſtances will make greater indication of this any mans affirmative. The Idumæans are Theeves and Murderers, and will not beleeve that they doe amiſs: The manner of their Nation is to live very much upon robbery, and plundring Merchants: and in Homers time there was a Nation of Pirates: οὐκ ἄδοξον τῷ ὡδὶ τοῖς παλαιοῖς τὸ λῃστεύειν, ἀλλ' ἔνδοξον, ſaid the Scholiaſt upon Homers Odyſſes τ. They thought it no diſparagement to ſteal, but an honourable and a glorious thing; and it is worſe now, and hath been growing ſo ever ſince Nimrods time. Men account it lawful to kill and ſteal, if they doe it by Nations, by Companies, and Armies, and Navies: and Cato had reaſon to complain, Fures privatorum furtorum in nervo atque in compedibus ætatem

C. p. 43. Solinus tells of the Garamantici that they know no marriages, and therefore children only own their Mothers, for they can hardly gueſs at their Fathers; and indeed the old world did doe ſuch vile things, contracted ſuch baſe cuſtomes, ſo delighted in wickedneſs, that as they highly provoked God to anger, ſo they left it impoſſible to judge of the laws of nature by the conſent of Nations. Propertius complains ſeverely of this popular impiety.

" The whole earth grew ſo impure and degenerous, that they drave juſtice from " them as their Enemy; brothers waſh'd their hands in their brothers bloud; the " ſons mourn'd not at their Fathers funeral; and the Father wiſh'd the death of " his eldeſt ſon, that he might lie with his ſons wife; the Mothers would ſteal " ſecretly into the embraces of their ſons; and they feared not to break the " laws of Hoſpitality, or Cuſtome, or Nature, or of Societies. Now from hence it will be impoſſible to derive our cuſtomes, and ſo to ſuppoſe them to be laws of Nature, which are openly deſtructice of juſtice. And upon this laſt inſtance it appears that the ſaying of Polybius will be of no uſe to us in this queſtion; δεῖ δ' σκοπεῖν ἐν τοῖς κατὰ φύσιν ἔχουσι μᾶλλον τὸ φύσει, καὶ μὴ ἐν τοῖς διεφθαρμένοις· That for the laws of Nature we muſt ſeek amongſt them that live according to nature, not amongſt them whoſe natures are deprav'd by cuſtome; ſince as Andronicus of Rhodes was wont to ſay, He lies not that ſays honey is ſweet, though a ſick man refuſes it as bitter and unpleaſant; ſo is the law of Nature perfect and immutable in thoſe Nations who are endued with a ſound mince and a ſober judgement. This indeed is true, but how this can be reduc'd to practice, will be found inexplicable, and the thing it self impossible: since the Lacedæmonians the wisest and severest amongst all Commonweaiths permitted such natural injustices, and would breed children upon their own wives by strangers that they might have a good and a handsome breed.

23. 9. Some Tyrants have made Laws to serve their lusts, or their necessities, and these things have come into Customes, and Laws of Nations, and sometimes have been suppressed, or spent in desuetude. It was the case of Seleucus, who in the necessity of his son Antiochus gave him his own wife, and made it a Law for the future, which thing either was instantly disgrac'd and rejected, or else S. Paul had not heard, or had not taken notice of; for he thought it such a fornication as was not so much as named amongst the Gentiles that one should have his Fathers wife: indeed it was not named inter cordatiores, or those with whom he had conversed; but in Syria and in the Pontick Kingdome before his time, it had been named and practiced and pass'd into a Law; and yet that Kingdome consisted of two and twenty Nations of distinct languages. There was another instance like it spoken of by Cicero, that a woman married her daughters husband, which exactly was the same undecency and incestuous approach. Nubit genero Socrus, auspicibus nullis, nullis authoribus, funestis ominibus. O mulieris scelus incredibile & præter hanc unam in omni vita inauditum. Something like S. Pauls ἵνα μὴ δὲ ὀνομάζεται, but yet sometimes it was done, and not onely before his time, but long after this monition also, as it was in the case of Antonius Caracalla: Matrem duxit Uxorem; ad parricidium junxit incestum: So Spartianus. Now concerning these things, how can any man from hence take an estimate of the law of Nature; for this cannot be of the law of Nature which hath in it so unreasonable and unnatural complications; and yet by what rule shall we judge of natures Law, since the wisest persons, even Socrates and Cato did such things which they thought fit, and we call unreasonable, for they gave their wives to their friends, as a man lends his beast for his neighbours use.

Appian. de Bel. Syr.

Cic. pro Cluent.

24. 10. There are some Nations so used to a rude unmannerly pride and fierceness, that all civility seems softness and effeminacy. To this purpose is that which Tacitus reports of the son of Phraates the Parthian, who being bred up with Tiberius and efform'd into the Romane civilities was by the Prince his friend sent to the Kingdome of Parthia; but in the young Gentleman there were presently observed easiness of access, a fair civil deportment and affability; obvia comitas: But these virtues being unknown to the Parthians were nova vitia; and because they were unknown to their Ancestors, perinde odium pravis & honestis, the good and the bad amongst them did equally detest them.

25. 11. Some Nations have left their good Customes and taken up bad, and have chang'd their natural reason into unnatural follies, and the basest sins have been very general; and when God warned the Jews to take heed of the manners of their neighbour Nations, he enumerates vile lusts which were the national customs for which God affirms that he ejected them from their habitations.

26. 12. Lastly, there is no consent among Nations in their Customes, nor ever was until a higher principle made a law and tied it on with penalties; such as were conquest, necessity, contract, reputation, decrees of Princes, or the laws of God, or of a Religion. νόμος καὶ δίκη ἄνω καὶ κάτω φέρεται ἀκατωμύλια καὶ ἀκαταμύλια, ρα ασόμφωνα, and neither Nation with Nation, nor Man with Man, nor a Man with himself does long agree.

27. Indeed there are some propositions which all the world agrees upon, such as are, the immortality of the soul, and that there is a God. Ταῦτα ὁ Ἕλλην λέγει, καὶ ὁ βάρβαρος λέγει, καὶ ὁ ἠπειρώτης, καὶ ὁ θαλάττιος, καὶ ὁ σοφὸς, καὶ ὁ ἄσοφος· The Greek and the Barbarian, the Epirot and the Maritime, the wise and the unwise agree in the beleef and profession of a God: but when these things come to manners and customes, they differ infinitely; and as they anciently chose several gods, so they did not agree in the manner of worshipping their gods; some they worshipped by praises, and some by railing, some by giving sacrifice, some by throwing stones; and so it was in other things. Some were observant of their Parents, and some knock'd them on the head with clubs when they came to a certain age, as is to be seen in Ælian; and even in the taking care and educating their children, in which nature seems most to have made a law, and signified it with the consent of Nations, yet even in this also there was variety, and no universal law naturally established. For some nursed their children, and some did not; sometimes they were left to their Mothers without any provision made by their Fathers; sometimes the Fathers took them from their Mothers, but however, yet this cannot be properly derived from a Jus Gentium, for if it be a right or a law at all, it is a lex singulorum, it belongs to single persons and to families, and is common to man and beast, and hath a necessity in nature, as it is necessary to eat or sleep, and is as necessary to families as the other are to single persons, but where there is a necessity, there needs no law, and cannot properly be any.

28. From all which I conclude that the Jus Gentium, the law of Nations is no indication of the law of Nature; neither indeed is there any Jus Gentium collectively at all, but onely the distinct laws of several Nations; and therefore it is to be taken distributively; for they are united onely by contract, or imitation, by fear, or neighbourhood, or necessity, or any other accident which I have mentioned. And in those things in which they have agreed tacitely, or expresly, they have no obligation but what they bring upon themselves, as penalties, forfeitures, obloquies, and the like; which they as easily shake off when they have power, and when it is for their profit; and we see it in those who have killed Heralds or Ministers of peace and of Religion; which we say commonly is against the law of Nations; that is, it is against the custome of them, because to doe so is to no purpose, a spleenish ineffective malice; and therefore although of no usefulness, and consequently seldome done, yet it hath been sometimes, and no punishment follows, and therefore it is no law.

See the preface to the Great Exemplar. n. 23.

29. Now that this opinion may not wholly seem new, I finde something of it affirmed by Constantinus Harmenopulus, ἐθνικὸς δὲ νόμος ἐστὶν ὃν πλείονα ἔθνη, ἢ ἕν ἔθνη χρῶνταί τινα· The law of Nations is that which one or more Nations use; and he instances in not marrying their neareſt kinred, amongst the Greeks and Sauræ [Sarmatæ (I suppose)] or else to marry them as the Persians use. But this onely, where it happens that Nations doe consent in great proportions, it confirms our assent to the law, and publishes its being natural, in case that of it self it be so.

30. Cicero defines the law of Nature to be, Vera ratio naturæ congruens, diffusa in omnes, constans, sempiterna: That right reason which is consonant to nature, which which is in every one always and the ſame, that is the law of Nature: So he, and from him Lactantius; but that is not exactly true. Right reaſon is the inſtrument of uſing the law of Nature, and is that by which together with the Conſcience (which is alſo reaſon) we are determined to a choice and proſecution of it our ſelves, or to a willingneſs of obeying the obliging power. τὸν θεῖον νόμον ὑποδέχεται λογισμὸς, καὶ δικαστὴς ἄγρυπνος γίνεται· Reaſon entertains the Divine laws (of nature) and ſo is made a moſt vigilant Judge, ſaid Hierocles. This is that which diſtinguiſhes us from beaſts, and makes us capable of Laws.

Juven. Sat. 15.

* But reaſon is not the law, or its meaſure; neither can any man be ſure, that any thing is a law of Nature, becauſe it ſeems to him hugely reaſonable, neither if it be ſo indeed, is it therefore a law. For it is very reaſonable that every man ſhould chooſe his own wife, becauſe his intereſt is the greateſt: * That every man ſhould ſuffer as much evil as he does; * That a man be not puniſhed for evils that he cannot help; * That every man ſhould ſuffer for his own fault, and no man for the fault of another; and yet theſe are not laws in all places where they are reaſonable. Pythagoras in Laertius ſaid that which was very reaſonable. Plantæ manſuetæ non nocendum, veluti neque animali quod non noceat hominibus. A man may not hurt a gentle and a ſweet plant, much leſs, a harmleſs and a profitable beaſt. Truly, it is unreaſonable a man ſhould, but if he does, he breaks no law by the meer doing ſuch an action. For reaſon can demonſtrate, and it can perſwade and invite, but not compel any thing but aſſent, not obedience, and therefore it is no law.

31. But beſides this, Reaſon is ſuch a boxe of Quickſilver that it abides no where; it dwells in no ſetled manſion; it is like a doves neck, or a changeable Taffata; it looks to me otherwiſe then to you who doe not ſtand in the ſame light that I doe: and if we inquire after the law of Nature by the rules of our reaſon, we ſhall be uncertain as the diſcourſes of the people, or the dreams of diſturbed fancies. For ſome having (as Lucian calls it) weighed reaſons in a pair of ſcales thought them ſo even, that they concluded no truth to be in the reaſonings of men; or if there be, they knew not on which ſide it ſtood, and then it is, as if it were not at all; theſe were the Scepticks: and when Varro reckoned two hundred eighty eight opinions concerning the cheefeſt good or end of mankinde, that were entertained by the wiſeſt and moſt learned part of mankinde, it is not likely that theſe wiſe men ſhould any more agree about the intricate ways and turnings that lead thither, when they ſo little could agree about the journeys end, which all agreed could have in it no variety, but muſt be one, and ought to ſtand fair in the eyes of all men, and to invite the induſtry of all mankinde to the purſuit of it.

32. And it is certain, that the baſeſt of things have been by ſome men thought ſo reaſonable, that they really choſe it, and propounded it to others. And this is the leſs wonder, when we conſider that in defiance of all the conſenting reaſons, and faith of all the Nations of the world, ſome few ſingle perſons, wittier then folly, but not ſo wiſe as Reaſon or religion ſhould ſay that there is no God: ſuch were Diagoras Mileſius, Theodorus Cyrenaicus, Protagoras; and it is thought, Lucian alſo: But they that think ſo, muſt alſo conſequently beleeve that nothing is diſhoneſt that they can doe in private, or with impunity. * Some have beleeved that there is nothing in it ſelfe juſt, but what is profitable: So did Carneades (whom I before noted out of Lactantius) and ſo did Ariſtippus.

33. Now here it is not ſufficient to ſay, that in this inqueſt after the law of nature by the proportions of reaſon, we muſt exclude all unreaſonable, bruitiſh, and monſtrous perſons. For firſt the queſtion will returne, who thoſe are which are unreaſonable, and we are not to reject the opinion upon pretence it is unreaſonable, unleſs we firſt know ſome certain meaſures of reaſon: Now we cannot take our meaſures of reaſon from Nature; or if we doe we cannot take the meaſures of Nature from reaſon, that is, if we call men unreaſonable becauſe they ſpeak Unnatural things, then it muſt be certain that what is natural or unnatural is known ſome other way then by the proportions of reaſon; for the reaſon being miſliked for its diſproportion to Nature, the laws of nature muſt be foreknown, and therefore are not to be proved by that which comes after: beſides this (I ſay) the wiſeſt of Men in their profeſſion, and ſuch as were no fools in their perſons, ſo far as can appear by all their other diſcourſes, have beleeved the worſt of crimes to be innocent, and to have in them no natural diſhoneſty. Theodorus allowed of Sacrilege, and ſo do thouſands who at this day call themſelves Chriſtians: Plato allowed adultery, and community of wives; ſo did Socrates and Cato. Zeno and Chryſippus approved of inceſt, and ſo did the Perſians: So that we may well ſay as Socrates to Phædon; when we hear the name of Silver or Iron all men that ſpeak the ſame language underſtand the ſame thing: but when we ſpeak of good and evil, we are diſtracted into various apprehenſions and differ from each other and from our ſelves: we ſay as Pilate ſaid of truth, What is truth? we cannot tell what is true and what is good and what is evil; and every man makes his own opinions to be laws of nature, if his perſuaſion be ſtrong and violent. Tertullian complain'd that the old Philoſophers did ſo: leges naturæ opiniones ſuas facit [Philoſophia.] And yet it is without all peradventure that all lawes which are commonly called Natural are moſt reaſonable, they are perfective of Nature, unitive of Societies, neceſſary to common life, and therefore moſt agreeable to reaſon. But if you make an ἀνάλυσις of theſe, and reckon backward, you cannot wiſely and demonſtratively reckon from reaſon, or conſent or natural inclinations up to natural laws.

Lib. de anima cap. 2.

But the laſt clauſe of the Rule finiſhes this whole queſtion,

[Bound upon us by the Command of God]

34. For when God made man a free agent, he by nature gave him power to do all that he could deſire: and all that is Jus naturale, a natural right or power: and it needs no inſtances; for it is every thing he could deſire in eating and drinking and pleaſures and rule and poſſeſſion: but the law was ſuperinduc'd upon this. Right is liberty, but law is a fetter; Nature is free to every thing which it naturally deſires τὸ ἐλεύθερον τὸ μηδενὸς ὑπήκοον ἀλλὰ πράτειν ἁπλῶς τὰ δοκοῦντα αὐτῷ ſaid Dio Chryſoſtomus: That's the right of nature, to be free, to be ſubject to no law, to do abſolutely whatſoever pleaſes Pleaſes us. This is φυσικὴ εὐχέρεια (as the law callsit) συγχωρῆσα πράτ[illegible]ειν ἃ βέλεζαι. A natural liberty permitting us to do what we liſt, Libertati proprium eſt ſic vivere ut velis, ſaid Cicero de Offic. lib. 1. It is not liberty unleſs you live as you pleaſe: but ſervitude is not by nature, therefore liberty is. l. 5. D. de ſtatu hominum. Inſtit. de jure perſonarum §. & libertas. For where nanature hath an appetite, and proper tendency, it cannot deny to it ſelf ſatisfaction; whatſoever therefore is a law and a reſtraint to it, muſt needs be ſuperinduc'd upon it: which nature her ſelf cannot be ſuppoſed to be willing to doe; and nothing had power to doe but God onely who is the Lord of Nature.

——————Κερίων
Ανθρώποισι δ' ἔδωκε δίκλω ἢ πολλὸν ἀρίστη.

It was God that gave juſtice to Mankinde: he made juſtice by his ſanction: This was expreſſely the ſentence of Cicero ſpeaking of the law of nature: Eſt recta ratio à Numine Deorum tracta, imperans honeſta & prohibens contraria. and again, Lex vera atq; princeps apta ad jubendum & ad vitandum ratio eſt recta ſummi Jovis. The law of nature is a tranſcript of the wiſdome and will of God written in the tables of our minds, not an ἔυρημα διὰ χρόνου, a product of experience, but written with the finger of God, firſt in the tables of our hearts. But thoſe tables we like Moſes brake with letting them fall out of our hands, upon occaſion of the evil manners of the world: but God wrought them again for us, as he did for Moſes by his ſpirit, in all the ages of the world, more or leſs, by arts of inſtruction and ſecret inſinuation, by all the waies proportioned to a reaſonable nature; till from an inclination it came to a firme perſuaſion and ſo to a law: God, in this, ruling in our hearts ſomthing after the manner by which he reigns in heaven, even by ſignifications of what is fit, by inſpirations and congenite notices, by natural neceſſities: but this thing was yet no law till God alſo had ſignifi'd it to Men, after the manner of men, that is, by diſcourſe and humane Communications, by ſomething that taught them, and obliged them.

35. The ſenſe of this is, that religion is the firſt and greateſt bond of laws, and neceſſity is the next: For though many times it prevails more then religion, yet it is not alwaies incumbent, and that which is neceſſary to ſociety, is inconvenient in ſome caſes, and when power comes in, and need goes out, there is nothing which can make or continue the law: and it were impoſſible that all the world ſhould acknowledge any lawgiver but God; for nothing elſe could be greater then all mankind, nor be truſted in all caſes, nor fear'd but he alone. And therefore the heathen Princes when they gave their lawes, gave them in the Name of a Deity. So Numa, Lycurgus, and others; which was not a deſigne to ſcare fools and credulous people, but in ſome inſtances (excepting onely that they nam'd a falſe God) was a real truth; that is, in all thoſe things which commanded natural juſtice, honeſty and decencies: for theſe were really the lawes of the true God.

36. For the law of Nature is nothing but the law of God given to Mankinde for the conſervation of his Nature and the promotion of his perfective end. A law of which a man ſees a reaſon and feels a neceſſity: God is the lawgiver. Practical reaſon or conſcience is the record, but revelation and expreſſe declaring it, was the firſt publication and emiſſion of it, and till then it had not all the ſolemnities of law, though it was paſs'd in the Court, and decreed and recorded.

37. And this is the perfect meaning of those words of S. Paul [but for the law I had not known sin] that is, although by natural reason and the customes of the world I had or might have reasons to dislike many actions; yet till the law declar'd it I could not call any thing a sin, and if S. Paul could not, neither could the Gentiles: their Nature was alike, and S. Paul had advantage in education, and yet his nature could not instruct him in the Names and differences of good and evil; therefore neither could the Gentiles know it meerly by Nature. But yet a man may become a law unto himself: So S. Paul observes of the Gentiles who not having a law doe by Nature the things contain'd in the law, and so become a law unto themselves. So does every man who beleeves any thing to be necessary, though it be not so; yet he becomes a law to himself, because by his conscience and persuasion he makes to himself a law or obligation: much more might the Gentiles do so; in whose Nature the aptnesses to justice and disposition to laws were concreated with their understandings. Well might they become a law unto themselves in these natural instances; for if opinion can make a law to our selves in an unlawful matter, much more may it doe so in a matter that is so agreeable to our Nature, so fitting, so useful, so prepared to become a law, that it wants onely the life of authority, sanction and publication: but though the Gentiles became a law unto themselves, by this means: yet their Natural reason was not yet fram'd into a law, till Gods authority, either by his expres declaration, or by the conscience of the man, that is, directly or indirectly did intervene: testimonium reddente conscientia, so S. Paul, their conscience bearing witness: for either God published these lawes by expres declaration and voices, or else by imprinting upon the Conscience such fears and opinions that pass'd upon the man the reverence and obligation of Lawes. In both these there was variety: though in the latter there was amongst the better sort of men a more regular and universal influence and effect: and although it is very probable that all the measures of justice and natural lawes of honesty were expresly published to the Patriarchs of the great families of the world, yet when some of the posterity lost their tradition, these laws were maintain'd by more imperfect relations, and kept up by fears and secret opinions which the spirit of God who is never wanting to men in things necessary, was pleas'd in his love to Mankinde to put into the hearts of men, that men might be governed by instruments which would not fail.

38. Thus S. Hierome [a] affirmes that Pharaoh knew his sins by the law of Nature: and of this it was that Tertullian [b] affirmed; ante legem Moysi scriptam in tabulis lapideis, legem fuisse contendo non scriptam, quæ naturaliter intelligebatur & a patribus custodiebatur: Nam unde Noë justus inventus est si non illum naturalis legis justitia præcedebat? Unde Abraam amicus Dei deputatus, si non de æquitate & justitia legis hujus Naturalis? by this the Fathers liv'd, by this Noah was found just, and Abraham the friend of God: for this though not written in Tables of stone, yet it was written in the tables of their hearts; that is, it was by God so imprinted in their Consciences that they were by it sufficiently instructed how to walk and please God; and this is that which was said by Antigonus in Sophocles, and which Apollonius did use against the edict of Nero.

"This is a thing which neither heaven not hell hath taught by any new or ex"preſs ſanction: For God hath given us other laws. But never did I think "that thy commands could ever prevail ſo, that it could be poſſible that thou
"being a mortal man ſhould prevaricate the unwritten and potent laws of "God. For theſe laws are not of to day or yeſterday, but they are eternal, and "their principle is ſecret, and from within.

39. And therefore Philo ſaies, the law of nature is a law ὑπ' ἀθανάτυ φύ-σεως ἐν ἀθανάτῳ διανοίᾳ τυπωθεὶς engraven in an immortal Underſtanding by an immortal nature. In this whole affair, God is as the Sun, and the Conſcience as the Eye: or elſe God or ſome Angel from him being the intellectus agens did informe our reaſon, ſupplying the place of Natural faculties and being a continuall Monitor (as the Jews generally beleeve, and ſome Chriſtians, eſpecially about three or four ages ſince:) which Adam de Mariſco was wont to call Helias his Crow: ſomething flying from heaven with proviſions for our needs. And the Gloſs. and Gulielmus Pariſienſis, and before them Maimonides, from whom I ſuppoſe they had it, affirme this to be the meaning of David in the fourth Pſalme, Offer the ſacrifice of righteouſneſs; it follows, Quis monſtrabit? Who will ſhew us any good? who will tell us what is juſtice, and declare the meaſures of good and evil? He anſwers, Signatum eſt ſuper nos lumen vultûs tui Domine, thou haſt conſign'd the light of thy Countenance upon us, ut ſcilicet (as it is in another Pſalme) in lumine tuo videamus lumen, that in thy light we may ſee light.

40. The effect of all which is this onely, That God is our lawgiver, and hath made our hearts to be the Tables of the laws of nature, that they might alwaies be there under our eye, legible and clear. It is not a law for being plac'd there; but God firſt made or decreed it to be a law, and then plac'd it there for uſe, and promulgation: and although very many men, and nations had no entercourſe with God as a lawgiver but what they have by the means of their conſcience, that is, they never heard God ſpeak, had no prophets, no revelation, and have forgot the tradition of their fathers; yet when God by ways undiſcernible hath written a propoſition there, and that the Man does beleeve any thing to be good or evil: it is true that God is his lawgiver, becauſe he onely is Lord of his Conſcience: but it is alſo true: that he becomes a law unto himſelfe: that is, he becomes oblig'd to God by the act of his own conſcience; and however it be that his conſcience be wrought upon, though by a fancy or a fear, a ſad ſight, or a caſuall diſcourſe, if it works the conſcience into the notice and obedience of a natural law, the meaner the inſtrument is, the greater is the efficacy of the principal agent. The putting it into the conſcience is a ſufficient promulgation of the law, however that be done; but nature alone never does it: The expreſs voice of God, tradition, prophets, contract, providence, education and all ſorts of influence from God, and entercourſe with man have their portion in this effect. And when wiſe men ſay, this is naturally underſtood; it muſt mean thus, naturally men find it reaſonable, but not naturally to be a law: naturally they conſent to it, but not naturally find it out, or naturally we may be inſtructed but not naturally bound: but when God changes ſcience into conſcience, then he makes that which is reaſonable to become a law.

Bus

41. But first or last, this way or another, it became a law onely by the authority and proper sanction of God; God is the author of our Nature and made a law fit for it, and sent the principles of that law together with it, not that whatsoever is in nature or reason is therefore a law because it is reasonable or because it is natural: but that God took so much of prime reason as would make us good and happy, and established it into a law; which became and was called the law of Nature both because 1. These laws are in Materia Naturali: that is, concerning the good which refers to the prime necessities of Nature; and also because 2. being Divine in respect of the authour, the principles of this law are natural in respect of the time of their institution being together with our nature: though they were drawn out by God severally in several periods of the world, who made them laws actually by his command, which in nature are so onely by disposition.

42. This latter reason is given by Alphonsus à Castro and by Wesenbech: the former is insinuated by Mynsinger defining the law of Nature to be quod natura, adeoque Deus ipse omnes homines in Creatione, prima quædam præcepta & formulas honestatis docuit. But the latter of them I say is true onely of such as are the prime laws or rather rules of nature, and the general measures of vertue and vice. But as for the particular laws of Nature (which onely are properly to be call'd laws) we are to look for no other systeme or collective body of them, but the expresse declared laws of God which concerne morality, that is, all that are given to all Mankinde without relation to any one period, such is the moral law of the Jewes: and such is the religion of the Christians; that less perfect, this more perfect and intire: for these in their several proportions are such which are generally for all mankind; and upon this account it is affirm'd Dist. 1. in princ. by Gratian, Jus naturale esse, quod in lege & Evangelio continetur, The law of Nature is that which is contain'd in the Law, and the Gospel: which saying he had from Isidore.

43. It is necessary that this be rightly understood, because it establishes many certainties in the matter of Conscience, and eases us of the trouble of finding out a particular systeme of Natural laws, the inquiry after which hath caused many disputes in the world, and produc'd no certainty, It is all εὕρημα καὶ δῶρον θεοῦ, νόμος καὶ λόγος, ὀρθὸς λόγος, Διὸς διανομή, as the Platonists call it, νόμος τῆ διανομῆ, the word of God is the law, a right rule or sentence, and divine law, a law that is the distribution of the mind of God; and under this come all the precepts of Christianity: which was well summ'd up by him who gave this account of the religion, and the religious that are of it, saying they are homines conspirantes in communem utilitatem; and that they mutually make and give σύμβολα πρὸς τοῦτο μὴ ἀδικεῖν εἰς ὃ μὴ βλάπτειν ἀλλήλους, μηδὲ βλάπτεσθαι, Symbols and Sacraments to each other, that none shall doe or receive injury: men conspiring for the good of others: or as the Romane souldier was told, They are men whose profession is to doe hurt to no man, and to do good to every man: and this is the integral designe of the law of Nature so far as it can relate to humane entercourse.

44. Νόμος καὶ λόγος. So Christ is called by S. Peter and the Greek Fathers, he is the word of the Father and the law; and it is remarkable, this word or law of the Father was the instrument of teaching mankind in all periods of the world. He taught the law of Nature to all men, and renew'd it, and made several manifestations and manners, and at last appear'd in the forme of a man, and made a perfect body of it to last as long as our nature lasts, and as long as this world, and his kingdome abides. When God spake to Adam, to the Patriarchs, to the Prophets, still he spake by Christ, who was the Angel of the old Testament, and the Mediator of the New. He is therefore Verbum Patris; by him he signified his laws and righteous commandements, and the law was given ἐν χερὶ μεσίτου, in the hands, that is, by the ministery, of the Mediator, who is one: that is Jesus Christ; and this Tertullian affirmes. Christus semper egit in Dei Patris Nomine. Ipse ab initio conversatus est, & congressus cum Patriarchis & Prophetis: and again, Christus ad colloquia semper descendit, ab Adam usque ad Patriarchas & Prophetas, in visione, in somno, in speculo, in ænigmate, ordinem suum præstruens ab initio semper: & Deus internis cum hominibus conversatus est; non alius quàm sermo qui caro erat futurus. Christ in all ages spake to Men in the person of his Father, being from the beginning the word of the Father, which was to be incarnate. The same also is to be read in Justin Martyr against Tryphon the Jew. "Christ therefore was the preacher of this righte-"ousnes, and at last revealed all his Fathers will, which should ne-"ver receive any further addition, diminution or alteration. The Novellæ constitutiones, the inlargements and explications made by our Blessed Lord, together with the repetition of the old, that is, the Christian law, is the perfect Code and Digest of the Natural law. For they all rely upon the fundamental relations between God and us, and the natural entercourse betwen Man and Man, and the Original necessities and perfective appetites of our own Nature.

Adv. Marcion. lib. 2. Adv. Praxeam.

45. But here it will be necessary to clear that great objection which will be pretended against this doctrine. For since Christian religion is new in respect of Nature, and superinduc'd some things upon Nature, and rescinded some of her rights, and restrain'd her liberty; it will seem impossible that Christian religion should be a collected body of the laws of Nature; because the law of Nature is prime and eternal; which Christian religion seems not to be: Now to this I answer

46. 1. That it is evident that all that which any men call the laws of Nature is actually conteined in the books of the new Testament. S. Austin, Hugo de S. Victore, and Alexander say the law of Nature hath but these two precepts, 1 Doe as you will be done to; and 2 Doe not that which you would not have done to your self: Isidore reckons into the laws of Nature, 1 Conjunction of male and female, 2 Education and 3 Succession of children; 4 Common possessions and 5 Common liberty, and 6 Acquisition of things in air, earth, and sea: 7 Restoring the thing that is intrusted, 8 Repelling force by force. These are rights of Nature, and natural states or actions, but not laws. There are some laws concerning these things, but they also are in the New Testament. Cicero reckon'd, 1 Religion, 2 Piety, 3 Thankfulnes, 4 Vindication of injuries, 5 Observance of Superiors, 6 To speak truth. The lawyers reckon otherwise. The laws of Nature are these, 1 To worship God, 2 To live honestly, 3 To obey superiors; Kings, Parents, &c. 4 To hurt no man, 5 To give every one their own, 6 Common use of things as far as it may be; and where it may not, then 7 Dominion and 8 Propriety enter, 9 To take away evil doers from among men. And if we observe but the precepts of Nature (for they had no other light which we know of) which are reckoned by Hesiod, Pythagoras, Theognis, Phocylides, Epictetus, Cato, Publianus, and Seneca, we shall finde that they reckon many minute counsels counſels which are deriv'd from naturall Principles, but yet ſtand far off of from the fountain: and ſome which they derivefrom t he rights of Nature, not from her laws, but indeed are directly contrary.

So Cato, and

Qui ſimulat verbis, nec corde eſt fidus amicus;
Tu quoque fac ſimules, ſic ars deluditur arte.

And that of Cicero, vindicationem eſſe honeſtam, revenge is juſtice. By their own reaſon men took their aim at the precepts and laws of Nature, but their reaſon being imperfect and abuſed it was not likely they could be exact: none but the wiſedome of the Father could doe it perfectly. Thus they can never agree in their enumeration of the Natural laws: But it is certain that ſo many of theſe as are laws, and bound upon us by God, are ſet down in the Scriptures of the New Teſtament. For it is not a law of Nature unleſs God have commanded it to us in or by or with Nature and natural reaſon. Now it is certain that Chriſt told us all his fathers will: and the Apoſtles taught all that to the Church which Chriſt taught to them: and therefore what is not in their doctrine is not in natures law, that is, it is no part of the law of God: and if it be certain that he that lives according to the law of Chriſt does pleaſe God and doe all his duty; then it follows that either there is no ſuch thing as that which we call the law of Nature, and no obligation from thence, and no meaſures of good and evil there; or if there be, it is alſo part of the Chriſtian mans duty, and expreſs'd and taught by the Maſter and Lord of the Chriſtians. All that is eſſentially good, is there; all that by which the World can be made happy, is there: all that which concernes every mans duty, is there; all the inſtruments of felicity, and the conveyance of our great hopes is there, and what other potentiality there can be in the law of Nature, then what I have reckon'd now, I neither have been taught by any manelſe, neither can I my ſelf imagine, or underſtand. Here are the general propoſitions which are the forme, and make the honeſty and the juſtice of all the particular laws of Nature; and what is not there provided for by ſpecial proviſion, or by general reaſon and analogy, is wholly permitted to humanelaws and contracts, or to liberty and indifferency, that is, where the laws of nature ceaſe, there the rights of nature returne.

47. 2. But ſecondly, to the objection I anſwer, that it will be but weakneſs, to thinke that all the inſtances of the law of Nature, muſt be as prime as Nature herſelf: for they neither are ſo prime, nor ſo laſting, but are alterable by God and by Men, and may be made more, or fewer, or other.

48. This may ſeem new, and indeed is unuſual in the manner of ſpeaking: but the caſe is evident and Empirically certain. For when God commanded Abraham to kill his ſon; the Iſraelites to rob the Egyptians and to run away with their goods; he gave them a commandement to break an inſtance of the natural Law; and he made it neceſſary that Cain ſhould marry with his Siſter: and all thoſe laws of Nature which did ſuppoſe liberty and indiſtinction of poſſeſſions are wholly altered when Dominion, and Servitude, and propriety, came into the world: and the laws of nature which are in peace are not obligatory to other perſons in the time of war.

49. For the laws of nature are in many inſtances relative to certain ſtates: and therefore in their inſtances and particulars are as alterable as the ſtates themſelves, but the reaſons indeed on which they doe relie (ſuppoſing the ſame or equal circumſtances and the matter unchang'd) are eternal and unalterable as the Conſtitution of Nature. But therefore it was unwarily ſaid of the learn'd Hugo Grotius, and of divers others before him, that God cannot change the law of Nature. For as S. Paul ſaid of the prieſthood; that it being chang'd, there muſt of neceſsity be a change alſo of the law, ſo it is in the law of Nature; the matter of it being chang'd, there muſt of neceſſity alſo be a change in the law: for although the eſſential reaſon may be the ſame in chang'd inſtances yet that hinders not but the law may juſtly be affirm'd to be alterable; juſt as the law was under the ſeveral prieſthoods, in both which the obligation is the ſame, and ſo is the relation to God, and the Natural religion. * Thus when rivers are common it is lawful for any man to fiſh, and unlawful for my neighbor to forbid me, but when rivers are incloſed and made proper, it is unlawful for me to fiſh, and lawful for the proprietary to forbid me; before the incloſure it was juſt to doe that thing, which afterward is unjuſt; and this is as much a change of a particular law as can be imagined. * If it be meant, that while the propriety remains, or the ſtate, the law introduc'd upon that ſtate is unalterable: then there is no more ſaid of the law of Nature then of any poſitive law of God, or the wiſe law of any Prince; which are not to be altered as long as the ſame caſe and the ſame neceſſity remains; and it would be to no purpoſe to affirme ſo of the law of Nature; for the ſence of it would be, that while things remain as God eſtabliſhed them, they are unalterable. But if God can diſannull the obligation by taking away the matter of the law, or the neceſsity or the reaſonableneſs, or the obligation (and all this he can doe one way or other) it is not ſafe nor true to ſay, God cannot alter the law of Nature. * He chang'd the matter in ſuffering liberty to paſs into ſervitude, * he made neceſsity in one inſtance, I mean, in the matter of inceſt in the caſe of Cain, and afterwards took it away: * he took away the reaſonableneſs of the ſanction by changing the caſe in the ſubduction or mutation of the matter, * and he took off the obligation in the caſe of Abraham and of the Iſraelites robbing their Neighbors.

50. And therefore the Chriſtian laws ſuperinducing ſome excellencies and perfections upon humane Nature, and laying reſtraint upon the firſt Natural laws, that is, upon ſuch which before this laſt period of the world were laws of Nature, is no hard thing to be underſtood. God in it uſed but his own right. And I ſuppoſe it will be found to be unreaſonable to expound the precepts of the Religion by the former meaſures of Nature while ſhe was leſs perfect, leſs inſtructed: but this rather; the former inſtances of the Natural law are paſs'd into the Chriſtian precepts, and the Natural inſtance is chang'd, and the law alterd in it's material part; the formality of it remaining upon the ſuppoſition of a greater reaſon. Thus to repell force by force is a right of Nature; and afterwards it was paſſed into a law that Men might doe it; that is, God expreſsly gave them leave; and although it be not properly a law which neither forbids nor commands but onely gives a leave, yet when God had forbidden men to doe violence, and to eſtabliſh this law the rather, gave leave, to any man that could, to puniſh his unjuſt Enemy that attempted to doe him miſchiefe, it may be call'd a law, in the leſſer ſence, that is, a decree of the Court of Heaven by which this became lawful. * Though this was paſs'd into a law in the manner now explicated, yet it was with ſome reſtraints; which yet were not ſo great but they left a great liberty which was ſufficient ſecurity againſt violence. The reſtraint which God ſuperinduc'd upon this Right of Nature was but moderamen inculpatæ patæ tutelæ, it left men defended ſufficiently againſt injuries though it permitted us to be tried in ſome leſſer inſtances and unavoidable accidents. But now although Chriſtianity hath proceeded in the firſt method of God, and reſtrain'd it yet more, and forbids us to ſtrike him that ſtrikes us, we are not to force this precept into a ſenſe conſiſting with the former liberty which we call the law of Nature; but was at firſt onely a right of Nature or a permiſsive law, but not obligatory; and afterwards ſuffer'd ſome reſtraints: for that which ſuffer'd ſome, may ſuffer more: and as the right of nature was for its being reſtraind recompenc'd in the proviſions of laws, and by the hands of juſtice, taking it from the private into the publike hand: ſo may this right of nature when it is wholly taken from us be recompenc'd by Gods taking the ἐκδίκησις or the power of avenging our quarrels into his hands.

51. This right of nature being now almoſt wholly taken from us, part of it is taken up to God, and part of it is depoſited in the hands of the civil power, but we have none of it; onely by Chriſt's laws and graces our nature is more perfect, and morality is ſet forward, and juſtice and all our rights are ſecured; but yet the law is changed. * The like may be ſaid in divers other inſtances, as I ſhall diſcourſe in their ſeveral places: here it is ſufficient to have given the firſt hint of it, and demonſtrated the certainty and reaſonableneſs of it, which (as appears by the inſtances) although it be eſpecially and frequently true in the Jus naturæ or the permiſsive law of nature, and in thoſe not onely God but men alſo may make an alteration; yet even in thoſe laws which are directly obligatory, the power of God who made them cannot be denyed to be equal in the alteration: And indeed he that can annull nature, can alſo at leaſt alter her laws, which are conſequent to Nature and intended onely for her preſervation.

52. The caſe ſeems to be the ſame with eating and drinking which God hath made neceſſary for our life, as juſtice is to ſocieties: but as he can take away the neceſſity from this perſon at this time to eat and can ſupply it otherwiſe: ſo he can alſo conſerve humane ſociety in the mutation of caſes and extraordinary contingencies as well as in the ordinary effects of juſtice. Indeed God cannot doe an unjuſt thing; becauſe whatſoever he wills or does is therefore juſt becauſe he wills and does it; but his will being the meaſure of juſtice, and his providence the diſpoſer of all thoſe events and ſtates of things to which the inſtances of Juſtice can relate: when he wills an extraordinary caſe and hath chang'd the terme of the relation, then he hath made that inſtance which before was unjuſt, now to become juſt; and ſo hath not chang'd juſtice into unjuſtice, but the denomination of the whole action concerning which the law was made, is alterd from unjuſt to juſt, or on the contrary.

53. It is not to be ſuppos'd that the whole law of Nature can be alter'd as long as our Nature is the ſame; any more then the faſhion of our garments can be generally alter'd as long as our body is of this ſhape: and therefore it is not to be thought that he that makes a doublet ſhall ever make three ſleeves unleſs a man have three armes, or a glove with ſix fingers for him that hath but five, but many particular laws of Nature ſuffer variety and alteration, according to the changes that are in our Nature and in our Neceſſities, or by any Meaſure of Man or Men which God ſhall ſuperinduce.

Duo cùm idem faciunt ſæpe, ut poſsis dicere
Hoc licet impunè facere huic, illi non licet;
Non quod diſsimilis res eſt, ſed is qui facit.

The

The rule of Nature is always the ſame; yet one may doe what another may not, and ſometimes that is lawful which at another is criminal; not becauſe the meaſure is changeable, but the thing meaſured ſuffers variety. So that in effect the ſence and extent of truth in this queſtion is this; That although as long as this world laſts and men in it, the law of Nature cannot be abrogated, becauſe it is that law which is fram'd proportionable to Mans Nature; yet it may be derogated, that is, leſſen'd, or inlarg'd in inſtances, chang'd in the integrity of many of it's particulars made, relative to ſeveral ſtates and new neceſſities; and this is that which in true ſpeaking does affirme that the laws of Nature may be chang'd. For although there are ſome propoſitions and decrees ſo General that they are in their Nature applicable to all variety of things, and therefore cannot be chang'd: yet they are rather the foundation of laws then laws themſelves: becauſe a law muſt be mixt with a Material part, it muſt be a direction of actions, and a bond upon perſons which does ſuppoſe many things that can be changed: And therefore although the propoſitions upon which the reaſonableneſs and juſtice of the law does depend, ſerves to the contrary inſtances by analogy, and common influence, yet the law being material does not, and therefore is alterable. But of this I ſhall give a fuller account in the ninth and tenth rules of this Chapter. For the preſent, I obſerve,

54. The want of conſidering this, hath made difficulty in this queſtion and errors in many. Every natural propoſition is not a law: but thoſe antecedent propoſitions, by the proportions of which laws ſtand or fall, are the meaſures of laws. They are rules, not laws: and indeed the rules of Nature are Eternal and Unalterable: that is, all thoſe Natural and reaſonable propoſitions which are dictates of prime reaſon, and abſtract from all perſons and all ſtates and all relations: ſuch as are God is to be honour'd: Juſtice is to be done: Contracts are to be affirm'd: Reaſon is to be obeyed: Good is to be followed: Evil to be eſchewed. Theſe are the common meaſures of all laws, and all actions: but theſe are made laws when they are preſcrib'd to perſons, and applied to matter: and when they are, becauſe that matter can have variety, the law alſo can, though the rule cannot.

55. That we are to reſtore all that was intruſted to us, is a Natural law deriv'd from the rule of doing juſtice: but this may be derogated and prejudic'd without ſin. For preſcription transfers the poſſeſſion and diſobliges the fiduciary from reſtitution.

56. By the law of Nature relying upon the rule of performing contracts, clandeſtine marriages are valid and firme: but yet ſome Churches, particularly the Church of Rome in the Councell of Trent hath pronounc'd ſome marriages void which by the Rule of Nature, and afterwards by a law were rate and legal; particularly, clandeſtine marriages, and marriages not clandeſtine by the ingreſs of one of the parties into Religion, as is to be ſeen in the eighth Seſſion.

57. By the law of Nature a teſtimony under two or three witneſſes may ſtand, but in the caſe of the accuſation of a Cardinal Deacon in Rome they require the concurrence of ſeven and twenty, of a Cardinal Prieſt ſixty four, of a Cardinal Biſhop ſeventy and two, and in England one ſhall ſerve the turne, if it be for the King. In Codicils the civil law requires five witneſſes. In teſtaments there muſt be ſeven: when a controverſy is concerning the eminency and prelation of excellent perſons, fifteen are demanded. But if theſe things may be prejudic'd by men, much more may they be alter'd by God. But this extends it ſelf a little further. For in ſome of theſe inſtances, that which is a law of Nature becomes ſo inconvenient as to doe much evil, and then it is to be eſtimated by a new Rule; and therefore the whole law is chang'd when it comes to have a new meaſure, and the analogy of a New reaſon.

58. Upon the account of theſe premiſes it follows, that it is but a weak diſtinction to affirme ſome things to be forbidden by God becauſe they are Unlawful: and ſome to be unlawful becauſe they are forbidden. For this laſt part of the diſtinction takes in all that is unlawful in the world, and therefore the other is a dead member and may be lopp'd off. So Ocham affirmes againſt the more common ſentence of the Schooles (as his manner is) nullus eſt actus malus niſi quatenus à Deo prohibitus eſt, & qui non poſsit fieri bonus ſi à Deo præciptatur & è converſo: Every thing is good or bad according as it is commanded or forbidden by God, and no otherwiſe. For nothing is Unlawful antecedently to Gods commandement. Sin is a tranſgreſſion of ſome law, and this law muſt be made by a Superior, and there is no Superior but who depends on God, and therefore his law is its meaſure. There are ſome things good which God hath not commanded; but then they are ſuch which he hath commended by counſels, or analogies and proportions. But whatſoever is a ſin, is ſo therefore becauſe it is forbidden, and without ſuch a prohibition, although it might be Unreaſonable, yet it cannot be criminal or unjuſt. Since therefore all meaſures of good and evil in the entercourſes of Men wholly rely upon the law of God, and are conſequent to his will, although it can never be that we can have leave to be Unjuſt, or Unchaſt, that is, to doe againſt a law in being with all its circumſtances, yet the law may be ſo changed that the whole action which was forbidden may become permitted, and innocent, and that which was permitted may become Criminal. I inſtance in the ἀδελφομιξία, or the conjunction of the neereſt kindred, which once was lawful and ever ſince is become Criminal.

2. q. 19. ad 3. & 4.

59. The purpoſe of this diſcourſe is this, that we look no further for tables of the law of Nature, but take in onely thoſe precepts which bind us Chriſtians under Chriſt our lawgiver who hath revealed to us all his Fathers will. All the laws of Chriſt concerning moral actions are the laws of Nature: and all the laws of Nature which any wiſe Nation ever reckoned either are taken away by God, or elſe are commanded by Chriſt. So that Chriſtianity is a perfect Syſteme of all the laws of Nature, and of all the will of God, that is, of all the obligatory will; of all the Commandements. In thoſe things where Chriſtianity hath not interpos'd, we are left to our Natural liberty, or a Jus permiſsivum, a permiſſion, except where we have reſtrain'd our ſelves by contract or dedition.

Rule 2.

The law of Nature is the foundation of all laws and the meaſure of their obligation.

1. FOR all good laws, and all juſtice hath the ſame reaſonableneſs, the ſame rules and meaſures, and are therefore good becauſe they are profitable, and are therefore juſt becauſe they are meaſured by the common analogies and proportions: and are therefore neceſſary becauſe they are bound upon us by God mediately or immediately. And therefore Cicero defin'd vertue to be perfecta & ad ſummum perducta natura, or Habitus animi naturæ modo rationi conſentaneus, The perfection of Nature, or a habit of mind agreeing to Natural reaſon. But more expreſsly and full in his third book de legibus: lex eſt juſtorum injuſtorúmq. diſtinctio ad illam antiquiſsimam & rerum omnium principem expreſſa Naturam, ad quam leges hominum diriguntur, quæ ſupplicio improbos afficiunt, & defendunt & tuentur bonos. A law is the diſtinction of good and bad, of juſt and unjuſt, expreſſed or fitted to Nature, which is the firſt and the prince of all, and to which humane laws are directed for the punishment of evil doers, and the defence of the good. And it is evident in all the moral precepts of Chriſtianity: all which are ſo agreeable to a mans felicity and ſtate of things to which a man is deſign'd both here and hereafter, that a man cannot be happy without them: and therefore they all rely upon ſome prime natural reaſon, which reaſon although poſſibly ſome or all of it was diſcovered to us by revelation and the wiſe proper diſcourſes of the religion, and was not generally known to men before Chriſt, yet the reaſons are nothing but conſonancies to our ſtate and being, introductive of felicity, perfective of our Nature, wiſe and prudent and noble, and ſuch which abſtracting from the rewards hereafter, are infinitely eligible and to be preferred for temporal regards before their contraries.

Lib. 1. de inv. & lib. 4. & 5. de finib.

2. Adde to this, they are ſuch which ſome few the wiſeſt of the Heathens did teach by natural reaſon, for ought we know. And there is a proportion of this truth alſo in all the wiſe laws of Common-wealths. The reaſons of which are nothing but the proportions of Nature, and the prime propoſitions of Juſtice, common Utility and Natural neceſſity. And therefore ſuppoſing that every civil conſtitution ſupplies the Material part or the inſtance, every civil law is nothing but a particular of the natural law in reſpect of its formality, reaſonableneſs and obligation. And all laws of manners are laws of Nature: for there can be but one juſtice, and the ſame honeſty and common utility in the world, and as a particular reaſon is contained in the Univerſal, ſo is the particular profit in the publike, ſaluti civium proſpexit quâ intelligebat contineri ſuam, ſaid Torquatus in Cicero, and ſo it is in laws. In the obſervation of the laws of Nature the good of every ſociety and every private perſon is compris'd: and there is no other difference in it, but that in every civil conſtitution there is ſomething ſuperadded; not to the reaſonableneſs or juſtice, but it is inveſted with a body of action and circumſtances. Jus civile neque in totum à Naturali ac Gentium jure recedere, neque per omnia ei ſervire; adeò ut cùm juri communi aliquid additur vel detrahitur, jus proprium, id eſt, civile efficiatur, ſaid Juſtinian: The civil law neither does wholly recede from the law of Nature and Nations, neither does it wholly ſerve it: for when any thing is added or detracted from the Natural law it becomes the Civil: and another, leges poſitivæ repetunt Jus Naturæ quum leges ſive pactiones quæ ſunt Jura attingunt utilitatem & ſcopum Naturæ; The poſitive laws of a Common-wealth repeat the law of Nature, when laws and covenants doe promote the profit and this deſign of Nature.

Lib. 6. tit. de juſtit. & jure.

3. But from hence it follows that the law of Nature is the onely rule and meaſure of all laws, and ſuperinduc'd laws of God and Man are but inſtances of obedienne in thoſe General precepts of Nature: and ſince the law of Chriſtianity contains in it all the law of Nature; and is now the onely law that can oblige us primarily, and others in vertue of it: it is the prime and adequate rule and measure of Conscience, and the explication of all its precepts will be a full institution of the Conscience: to which purpose that saying of Lælius in Cicero is very pertinent: viros bonos appellandos esse putamus qui assequuntur quantum homines possunt Naturam optimam rectè vivendi Ducem. Nature is the best guide and measure of living well: and they who exactly observe her measures as far as Men can, are to be called Good Men.

De amicit.

Rule 3.

The first and greatest band of the law of Nature is fear of punishment.

I Have already spoken of this as it is the act and effect of Conscience: here I am to speak of it more abstractedly, and as it self hath effect upon humane actions; there as it is the Minister of the Judge: here as it is the Sanction of the law,

1. Omne malum aut timore aut pudore Natura suffudit, said Tertullian. Fear and shame are the waiters and handmaids of every sin which Nature hath provided for it. And indeed fear is the band of all laws. For although there is a pravity in the Nature of injustice which natural reason hates, proceeding partly from the deficiency from the perfective end of Nature and societies, which is injustice; partly from the consequent obloquy and disreputation which all wise men and all talking people put upon it (for they that doe it themselves speak ill of it in others) yet this is but a little. This is a part of the punishment of the breach of the Natural law; but not strong enough to make a firme obligation. Now in all laws there must be some penalty annexed, the fear of which may be able to restrain men from doing against the law: which cannot be unless the evil be greater then the benefit or pleasure of the prævarication can be: and therefore it is, that God establishing this law hath appointed a Court within us, a severe judge who will not spare, a wise discerner who will not be deceived, an exact remembrancer which never forgets any thing that can doe the greatest mischiefs, a just witness who will not be suborn'd, and is conscious and privy to all that which he is to judge; and the same also is the executioner of the delinquent and sinning people.

Apolog. c. 1.

2. The stings of Conscience and fear of the Divine vengeance, is this evil which Naturally restrains us: it is the greatest restraint, because it is the greatest of evils, and it is Unavoidable, and it is Natural. I will not adde it is lawful to abstain from evil for fear of punishment, but it is necessary, and it is Natural, and that is more; and this is it which Epicurus taught, οὐκ ἄλλῳ τινὶ τὸ ἀδικεῖν δεῖν ἀπεργεῖν, ἢ φόβῳ ἡλάσεων; which although Plutarch seems angry at, was well enough spoken by him; meaning that it is a fear not of temporal discovery and civil punishment which is onely appointed to restrain evil actions, but a fear of those evils whose apprehension God hath made necessary and congenite with the Nature of Man; fear of Gods displeasure, and the destruction of our Nature and felicities relying upon that Natural love of our selves and desire of our own preservation, without which a man cannot be suppos'd sufficiently provided with principles of necessary being and providence.

3. There

3. There is another kind of fear of punishment, that is, a fear of those auxiliary punishments which Princes and Republikes have superadded to the breakers of Natural laws, which is in some men who are despisers of all the evils which are threatned hereafter: Such as was that of Thrasymachus in Plato. Nihil esse melius quàm facere injuriam neque pœnas dare, nihil pejus quàm pati nec posse Ulcisci; medio autem modo se habere Justitiam, cùm quis nec facit nec patitur, quod ut fiat, esse optabile; sed nempe imbecillibus quorum proinde interest paciscì aut servare pacta, non autem valentioribus, qui si viri fuerint ac sapuerint, nullatenus pactum de injuria non inferenda accipiendave sint inituri. Nothing is better then to doe injury without punishment: nothing worse then to suffer mischief and to be able to doe none again. In the midst of these is justice, which neither does injury, nor receives any, which is much to be desired; but by whom? By none but by weak people. For the stronger, if they be valiant and wise will never enter into Covenants concerning not doing or receiving injury. * According to this doctrine, there should be nothing of it self just or unjust, and if there were, it were not to be regarded, but so long as justice were profitable, and injustice troublesome and dangerous. And therefore strong men or crafty might in many cases be exempt from contracts and from doing justice, and would neither doe right, nor take wrong. 7. de Repub.

4. Against this it is that all wise men in the world doe speak, Vos autem nisi ad populares auras inanésque rumores recta facere nescitis; & relictâ conscientiâ virtutísque præstantiâ de alienis præmia sermunculis cogitatis, said Boetius in indignation against all those who took accounts of themselves by publike noises not by the testimonies of a just Conscience, that is, who fear man but doe not fear God. And to doe good out of fear of punishment (in this sence) is to doe good no longer then I am observed, and no longer then I am constrained: from both which because very many men are very often freed, and all men sometimes, there would be no habit, no will, no love of justice in the world; that is, there would be no vertue of justice, but single actions as it could happen. This would introduce horrid tyrannies, while Princes and Generals having power in their hands might do all things as they pleased, and have no measure but their own private: and all mens conditions under them would be always precarious and arbitrary, and most commonly intolerable: And therefore this fear is the characterisme of evil persons, De consol. Philosoph.

Oderunt peccare mali formidine pœnæ.

and against such civil laws are made: Justis lex non est posita, saith S. Paul, the law is not made for the righteous, but for the wicked. If the sons of Israel had continued pious as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were, the law should not have been given to them as it was upon Mount Sinai; but the necessities of men brought a law upon them, and that law a punishment, while good men ποιῶσιν ἑκουσίως ἃ ποιοῦσιν ἄκοντες οἱ λοιποὶ διὰ τὸν νόμον as Zenocrates in Laertius said of the Philosophers; they doe it for the love of God; by choice and delight in the actions of vertue they doe excellent things, Plúsque ibi boni mores valent quàm alibi bonæ leges, as Tacitus said of the old Germanes. Good manners prevail'd more then good Laws. Thus did the Patriarchs, and therefore they needed not a law. Vetustíssimi mortalium nullâ adhuc malâ libidine, sine pretio, sine scelere, eóque sine pœna & coercitionibus agebant: neque præmiis opus erat, cùm honesta suopte ingenio peterentur: & ubi nihil contra morem cuperent, nihil per metum vetabantur. Our fore- Tac. Annal. 3.

fathers desir'd nothing against honesty and justice and therefore were not forbidden any thing by the instrument of fear.

5. But therefore the civil and positive law is not made for all those men who have other restraints; that is, for good men who are mov'd by better principles; but because these things that are better are despis'd by the vitious and the Tyrants, oppressors and the impudent, the civil power hath taken a sword to transfixe the Criminal and to kill the Crime. And therefore Epicurus in Stobæus said not amiss: laws were made for wise men, not for fear they should doe ill, but lest they should suffer evil from the Unjust.

6. And yet even the wise and the good men have a fear in them which is an instrument of justice and religion; but it is a fear of God, not of the secular Judge, it is a fear that is Natural, a fear produc'd from the congenite notices of things, and the fear of doing a base thing; a fear to be a fool, and an evil person.

Me natura dedit leges à sanguine ductas
Ne possem melior Judicis esse metu.

said Cornelia in Propertius: a good man will abstain from all Unrighteous things, though he be sure that no man should hear or see any thing of it, that is, though there were no laws, and superinduc'd punishments in republikes: and all this upon the account of such a fear which a good man ought to have; a fear of being a base person or doing vile things.

Ovid. l. 3. Eleg.

——Impositio teneræ custode puellæ
Nil agis: ingenio quæque tuenda suo est.
Siqua metu dempto casta est, ea denique casta est;
Quæ quia non liceat, non facit, illa facit.

That chastity is the Noblest which is not constrain'd by spies and severity, by laws and jealousie: when the mind is secretly restrain'd, then the virtue is secur'd. * Cicero puts a case to Torquatus: Si te amicus tuus moriens rogaverit ut hæreditatem reddas suæ filiæ, nec usquam id scripserit, ut scripsit Fadius, nec cuiquam dixerit, quid facies? Aruncanus dies and leaves his inheritance to his daughter Posthumia, and intrusts his friend Torquatus with it, but privately, without witness, without consignation of tables: will Torquatus who is a Feoffee in private trust restore this to the child when she shall be capable? Yes; Torquatus will, and Epicurus will, and yet Cicero had scarce a good word for him, whom he hath fondly disgrac'd during all ages of the world, weakly and Unjustly: but the account he gives of it is pertinent to the rule: Nónne intelligis eò majorem esse vim naturæ, quod ipsi vos qui omnia ad vestrum commodum, & ut ipsi dicitis ad voluptatem referatis, tamen ea faciatis quibus appareat, non voluptatem vos, sed officium sequi, plúsque naturam rectam, quàm pravam rationem valere. Nature is more prevalent then interest: and sober men though they pretend to doe things for their real advantage and pleasure, yet follow their duty rather then either pleasure or profit, and right nature rather then evil principles.

7. The reason of this is, because Nature carries fear and reverence in the retinue of all her laws, and the evils which are consequent to the breach of Natural laws are really, and by wise men so understood to be greater mischiefs then the want of profit, or the missing of pleasure, or the feeling the rods and axes of the Prince. If there were no more in a crime then the disorder of Nature, the very unnaturalness it self were a very great matter, S. Basil said well, ad omnia quæ descripta à nobis, à Deo præcepta sunt, consequenda, naturales rales ab ipso facultates accepimus. God hath given to vertues, Natural Organs, or bodily instruments; as to mercy he appointed bowels, eyes for pity, hands for relief; and the proper imployment of these is so perfective of a mans condition (according to their proportion) that not to employ them according to the purpose of Nature is a disease, a Natural trouble; just as it is to trumpet with our mouth which was intended for eating and drinking and gentler breathings. It is punishment enough to doe an Unnatural and a base action, it puts our soul and it's faculties from their centre, and the ways of perfection. And this is fully observed by Seneca: Male de nobis actum erat quòd multa scelera legem & Judicem effugiunt, & scripta supplicia, nisi illa naturalia & gravia de præsentibus solverent & in locum patientiæ timor cederet. Mankind were in an ill state of provisions, if those wickednesses which escape the law and the Judge, did not suffer the more grievous inflictions of natural punishment and fear came into the place of patience; still, fear is the bridle: but it is an honest fear, a fear of God and of natural disorders and inconvenience. Οὐκ ἐν συμβολαίοις πολιτικοῖς οὐδὲ ἐν ἀπαγορεύσει νόμου, ἀλλ' ἐξ ἰδιοπραγίας, καὶ τοῦ πρὸς τὸν θεὸν ἀγάπης ἡ δικαιοσύνη as Clemens of Alexandria calls it; a righteousness not produced by laws and the sword, fear and interest, but from the love of God, and something that is within: There is a fear, but it is such a fear as still leaves the love to vertue, and secures it in privacies and enjoynes the habit and constant practice of it: a fear that is complicated with a Natural love of our own preservation, and is constant, and measur'd by God, and in the Natural limit cannot be extravagant; a fear that acknowledges Gods Omniscience, and his Omnipresence, and his eternal justice: and this was the sence of that of Sophocles.

Πρὸς ζυπὸν κρύπτε μηδὲν, ὡς ἅπαντ' ὀφῶν
Καὶ πάντ' ἀκούων πάντ' ἀναπτύσσει χρόνος.

Doe nothing basely and secretly; for times Father sees and hears all things, and time will discover it, and truth shall be the daughter of time, and that which is done in secret shall be spoken upon the tops of houses: so both the Christian and the Heathen are conjoyn'd in the several expressions of the same great truth. This fear is deposited in Conscience, and is begotten and kept by this proposition that God is a rewarder of all men according to their works.

Consequent to this is the love of Vertue.

The second band of vertue is love, and its proper and consequent deliciousness.

1. THis is not wholly Natural, but in much of it is Empirical, ἔυρημα χρόνε καὶ ζήτε proceeding from the grace of God, and the experience of the deliciousness and rewards of vertue, and the excellency of a greater hope which does entertain our spirits in the outer courts of pleasant expectations: ὅπ ἐκ φιλοσοφίας τοῦτο αὐτῷ προσήκοντε τὸ ἀνεπιτάκτως ποιεῖν ἅπαντας διὰ τὸν ἀπὸ τῶν νόμων φόβον ποιοῦσι, as both Aristotle and Xenocrates did speak. It is the effect of Philosophy and Religion, of vertuous and severe institutions to doe that for love and without constraint, which fools, and vitious, and weak persons doe for fear of laws.

2. Now

2. Now this, I ſay, is not Natural, that is, although it be agreeable to Nature, yet not primarily introduc'd by it, without a Tutor, becauſe Nature forbids injuſtice, but does not command juſtice, but ſecondarily and by accident and upon ſuppoſition of other contingencies. To doe injuſtice is alwaies a ſin but not to doe a juſtice is not alwaies. For a man may depoſe the perſon of a Judge, or a truſtee, or a delegate; but they who habitually doe juſtice, find the rewards of reputation, and the eaſe of being freed from the torments of an evil Conſcience which is a delicacy, like the being eaſed of the horrid gripes of the colick; and ſo inſenſibly grow in love with juſtice, that they think they love juſtice for juſtice ſake.

Ipſa ſui merces erat & ſine vindice præda.

3. Concerning which it is fit we conſider a little leaſt it become the occaſion of Scruples and nice opinions. Antigonus Sochæus an old Jew was fam'd for ſaying, Be not ſervants who ſerve their Lord that they may receive a reward from him; but be ſuch who ſerve him without conſideration of wages, or recompences, and let the fear of God be upon you: Baithus and Sadoc his Diſciples, from whom the ſect of the Saduces did ſpring, not well underſtanding him, took occaſion from hence to deny the Reſurrection and rewards after this life. And indeed ſuch ſayings as theſe are eaſily abuſed; and when ſome men ſpeak Great things, and others beleeve as much of it as they Underſtand, but underſtand it not all, they make Sects and divide their Schools, and ignorance and faction keep the doors and ſit in the chairs ſometimes. It is impoſſible a man ſhould doe Great things, or ſuffer nobly without conſideration of a reward; and ſince much of vertue conſiſts in ſuffering evil things, vertue of her ſelf is not a beatitude, but the way to one. He does things like a fool, who does it for no end: and if he does not chooſe a good end, he is worſe: and vertue herſelf would in many inſtances be unreaſonable if for no material conſideration we ſhould undertake her drudgery: and therefore S. Auſtin ſaid well, Sublatis æternis præmiis & pœnis verum ſtaturum à partibus Epicuri: Senſual pleaſures were highly eligible, and not vertuous ſufferings, if in this life onely we had hope. But if it be accounted the top of vertue to love vertue for vertues ſake, and without intuition of the reward; many times good men obſerving that themſelves are encouraged by all Gods promiſes to obedience and patience, and that in Martyrdome there is no Natural or ſenſitive pleaſure, and that it cannot be lov'd for it ſelf, but wholly for its reward, will find themſelves put into fear where no fear is, and that a nequam humilitas an unworthy opinion of their duty ſhall affright their peace and holy confidence. Peregrinus the Philoſopher in A. Gellius expreſs'd this love of vertue for it ſelf, thus; Etiamſi Dii atque homines ignoraturi forent; to doe good though neither God nor Men ſhould know of it: but as this is impoſſible in fact, ſo it is in ſpeculation; for there were no ſuch thing as vertue, if it were not relative and directed to God or Man: But yet the thing which they mean is very good. Good men love vertue for vertues ſake, that is, they act it and love it, they doe it with ſo habitual and confirm'd elections and complacency that many times they have no actual intuition to the reward; they forget this, they are ſo taken with that; like a man that chooſes a wife upon many conſiderations, as portion, family, hopes and beauty; yet when he hath convers'd long with her and finds her amiable and fruitful, obedient and wiſe: he forgets all other conſiderations, and loves her perſon for her own perfections, but will not quit all his other intereſts. The difference is beſt underſtood by variety of Motions. Some Motions cannot be continued unleſs ſome agent or other do continually urge them; them; but they are violent and unnatural: others are perfective and lov'd, and they will continue and encreaſe by their own principle if they be not hindred. This is the love of vertue, that is, fear, or it may be hope; ſave that hope is a thing between both, and is compounded of both, and is more commendable then fear. But to love vertue for it ſelf, is nothing elſe, but to love it directly and plainly; he that loves it onely for the reward, and is not by the reward brought to love the thing, loves not this at all but loves ſomething elſe: but he that loves it at all, ſees good in it, becauſe he finds good by it, and therefore loves it ſelf, now, whatever was the firſt incentive: and the woodden arch may be taken away when that of marble is concentred.

4. 2. Vir fortis & juſtus .... in ſumma voluptate eſt & periculo ſuo fruitur. "When a good man laies before him the price and redemption of his mortality, "the liberty of his Country, the ſafety of his friends, he is hugely pleas'd and "delights in, and enjoies his danger. But if he feels not this pleaſure, yet with- "out trembling and uncertainty he will dare to die, facere recte pleq. contentus; "and if you tell him this reputation which he gets of his Citizens will die al- "moſt as ſoon as he ſhall die; he anſwers, all thoſe things are without the nature "and conſideration of my work: Ego ipſum contemplor, hoc eſſe honeſtum ſcio: "I look upon the work it ſelf and find it honeſt, and that's enough; meaning ſecretly; that though theſe outward rewards were pared off, yet there are ſe- cret pleaſures which will follow and ſtick cloſe to vertue, as the ſhadow does to the body, and this good men muſt conſider, becauſe they feel it, and that is part of the reward.

5. 3. They are pleaſed with the vertue it ſelf, and their ſoul is as much de- lighted with it, and as naturally as the eye with beauteous colours, or the throat with Unctuous juices, or the tongue with moiſt ſweetneſſes, For God hath made vertue proportionable to all the noble ends, and worthy deſires of man- kind, and the proper inſtrument of his felicity: and all its beauties, and all its works, and all its effects, and all that for which it can be loved is part of the re- ward. And therefore to ſay a man can love vertue for vertues ſake and without conſideration of the reward, is to ſay, a man can love vertue without any rea- ſon and inducement, without any argument to move his affections.

6. 4. For there can be but two cauſes of amability in the world, Perfection and Uſefulneſs, that is, Beauty and Profit; that in the thing it ſelf, this as it re- lates to me: Now he that ſaies, a man may love vertue for its own ſake with- out conſideration of the reward, ſaies no more then that a man may love a flower which he never hopes to ſmell of; that is, he may admire and commend it, and love to look on it, and juſt ſo he may doe to vertue. But if he deſires either, it is becauſe it is profitable or uſeful to him, and hath ſomething that will delight him, it canot elſe poſſibly be deſir'd.

7. Now to love vertue in the firſt ſence is rather Praiſe then love an act of Underſtanding rather then of the Will, and its object is properly the per- fections of the flower or the vertue reſpectively: But when it comes to be deſired, that is, lov'd with a relation to my ſelf, it hath for its object other perfections, thoſe things that pleaſe, and that delight me, and that is nothing but part of the reward or all of it.

8. The queſtion being thus explicated, it follows, that to love vertue for vertues ſake, is ſo far from being the honour of a good and perfect man, that it it is the character of an evil man, if it goes no further. For it amounts to nothing but this that the understanding is convinc'd of the worthiness of it,

——— video meliora proboque. ———

it is that which S. Paul calls a delighting in the law after the inner man. * But it is a Relative, Material, Practical love of vertue that makes a good man; and the proper inducement of that is also Relative, Material and Practical.

Est profecto Deus qui quæ nos gerimus
Auditque & videt. Bene merenti, bene profuerit,
Male merenti par erit :

Plaut. said the Comedian,. God hath so endeared justice and vertue to us, that he hearing and seeing all things, gives good things to them that doe good things; but he will be even with the evil man.

9. 5. Lastly, To love vertue for vertues sake, is to love it without consideration of humane rewards, praise of men honours, riches, rest, power, and the like, which indeed are the hinges of most mens actions.

Ovid. Cura quid expediat, prior est quàm quid sit honestum,
Et cum fortuna statque caditque fides.
Nec facile invenies multis de millibus unum,
Virtutem pretium qui putet esse sui.
Ipse decor recti, facti si præmia desint,
Non movet, & gratis pœnitet esse probum.
Nil nisi quod prodest charum est.

Now he that is a good man and loves vertue vertuously, does not love it principally for these secular regards; but without such low expectations, and without apprehension of the angry sentence of the laws; but this does not exclude the intuition of the Divine reward from having an influence into the most perfect love of vertue; for this is intrinsecal to the sanction and the Nature of the law; the other is extrinsecal and accidental. The first is such a reward as is the perfection of the work; for glory is the perfection of Grace; and he that serves God for hope of glory, loves goodness for goodness sake: for he pursues the interest of goodness that he may be fill'd with goodness; he serves God here that he may serve him hereafter; he does it well that he may doe it better; a little while that he may doe it over again for ever and ever. Nothing else can be a loving vertue for vertues sake; this is the greatest perfection and the most reasonable and practicable sence of doing it. * And if the rewards of vertue were not the great practical inducement of good mens love to goodness, all the promises of the Gospel were to no purpose in relation to the faith of good men, and therefore the greatest and the best part of faith it self would be useless: for there is no purpose or end of faith of the promises but to enable our obedience by the Credibility and expectation of such promises to doe our duty.

10. Now that even good men, even the best men, even all men have an habitual regard to it, besides that it is impossible to be otherwise (for he that plowes does plow in hope) and will easily be understood to be so by them who know the causes and nature of things; it appears also in the instance of as good a man as any story reports of; even Moses who despised to be called the son of Pharaohs daughter, because he had an eye to the recompence of reward: and by the instance of all those brave persons whom S. Paul enumerates in the eleventh Chapter to the Hebrews; who all died in faith not having received the promises; but they look'd for better, even such as were to come; and beyond Heb. 11. 13. all this; Our Blessed Lord himself, despis'd shame and endured the Cross; but it was for the glory that was ſet before him. For it is the firſt and the Greateſt article of the Gentiles Creed, Every one that comes to God muſt beleeve that God is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently ſeek him.

1. The ſumme is this; Although in Nature herſelf, and in the Conſcience relating to her, there is a Court punitive and a fear of God, yet the expectation of reward is rather put into us, than born with us, and reveal'd, rather then Natural; and therefore the expectation of good is the ſecond band of Natural laws, but extrinſecal and adventitious, communicated to us by revelation, and by grace.

The imperfection of ſome proviſions in civil laws are ſupplied by the Natural obligation remaining upon perſons civilly incapable.

1. WHen laws make proviſion of caſes ὅτι τὸ πλεῖστον, in as many things as they can foreſee, or feel, and yet ſome things will emerge which cannot be foreſeen, and ſome contrary reaſons will ariſe; many times there is no care taken for ſome things and ſome perſons by any conſtitutions of Man. Here Nature as the common Parent of all juſtice and neceſſary obligations, takes the caſe into her protection.

This happens in many caſes:

1. Humane laws give meaſures of things and perſons which fit moſt men without a ſenſible error, but ſome it does not. Young perſons are at a certain age declar'd capable of making profitable contracts; at another age of making contracts that are hazardous, and they muſt ſtand to them, though they be miſchievous. At one age they may marry; at another they may contract a debt; at another they may make a Teſtament; at another they may be puniſhed with Capital inflictions. But in ſome perſons the malice is earlier and the wit more pregnant, and the ſenſe of their advantages brisk enough: and therefore the contracts which they can make; and the actions which they doe, and the part which they chooſe is really made, or done, or choſen; but they not bound to ſtand to it, by the civil law: and yet if they can chooſe they are naturally obliged. Both of them are neceſſary: The civil law cannot provide but by common meaſures all their rules are made by as common a meaſure as they can, and they are the beſt rules that have the feweſt exceptions: the beſt Carpenters make the feweſt chips: but ſome there muſt be. But then it is neceſſary that Nature ſhould provide, by ſingle proviſions in all the ſingle exceptions; for it is neceſſary it ſhould be done, and ſhe onely can doe it. She can doe it becauſe Nature hath provided an inſtructed, a judging and a diſcerning Conſcience, and the perſon that contracts or receives a benefit, can bind himſelf to man as ſoon as he can bind himſelf to God; becauſe the laws of God bind all our contracts with men. That is, plainly thus, God's laws provide not onely for general caſes but alſo for particular circumſtances; and of every thing God and Gods vicegerent, Conſcience, can take accounts; and therefore this abundance dance ſupplies the others defect; the perfection of God makes up the breaches of the imperfection of Man. Which rule is to be underſtood both of things and perſons. For all our duty is onely an obedience to God: and every one that can hope or fear is bound to this obedience; therefore there can be no gap here: God hath in every thing ſhut up every perſon that can uſe reaſon, by ſome inſtrument or other. And therefore Cicero ſaid well, Si regnante Tarquinio nulla fuiſſet Romæ ſcripta lex de ſtupris tamen contra illam legem ſempiternam Sextus Tarquinius vim Lucretiæ Tricipitini filiæ attulit: erat enim ratio profecta a rerum Natura, & ad recte faciendum impellens, atque à delicto avocans. There was no civil conſtitution againſt rapes, but Tarquin ought not to have done it; for there was an eternal law againſt it. For right reaſon proceeding from Nature drives us on to good and calls us off from evil. That is, he could not but know it was ill, and againſt reaſon, and againſt every thing by which he ought to be governed; and even to the Heathen God was not wanting, but bound theſe laws upon them by reaſon, and inclination, and neceſſity, and fame, and example, and contract, and hope, and fear, and by ſecret waies which we know not of. He made ſome inclinations and ſome reaſon to become laws, that Mankind might not live like beaſts and birds of prey: in all caſes, and in all times, and to all perſons he became a Lord and a Lawgiver ſome way or other.

Lib. 2. de lege.

3. Young perſons of twelve or fourteen years old can be ſav'd or damn'd; they can love or hate, they can Underſtand yea and nay, they can doe a good turne or a ſhrewd, they can lead a blind man right or wrong, they can bear true or falſe witneſs: and although the civil laws out of care leaſt their eaſineſs be abuſed by crafty people, make them ſecure from it by nulling the contract, that the deceiving perſon may not reap the harveſt of his fraud, yet there are very many caſes in which the Minor receives advantage, or at leaſt no wrong, and though it was fit he ſhould be ſecured, it was not fit he ſhould be enabled to doe a miſchief to another, ut levamen his, aliis ſit onus, as S. Paul in a like caſe, that they be eaſed and others burdened. For although the other Contractor be ſufficiently warned to take heed of the Minor, yet there may be need in it, or charity, friendſhip or Confidence; all or any of which if they might be deceived the Minor would ſuffer often, but the other Contractor but once. Therefore as the Civil law ſecures them from harme, ſo the law of Nature binds them to doe none, but to ſtand to ſuch contracts in which they have advantage or equality, and in which they were not abus'd. * The time when they come to be oblig'd is the time when they come to the uſe of reaſon * when they underſtand their duty * when a prudent man judges them fit to be contracted with * when they can uſe fraud to others * when they can conſider whether they be bound or no: theſe are the beſt marks and ſignatures of the time, and declare the obligation in all caſes where there is no deception evident.

4. 2. Sometimes both parties can contract: but becauſe they doing it without witneſſes, may recede from it, either conſentingly or againſt the will of one of them, the poſitive conſtitution of Man intending to provide againſt this inconvenience hath cut the civil tie in peeces and refuſes to verifie the contract, beſides that it cannot legally be proved. In this caſe Nature relieves the oppreſſed party, and ſupplies the eaſineſs of the civil band, and ſtrains that hard which the others let looſe. And this happens in clandeſtine contracts: againſt which in the matter of marriage all Chriſtian Countries have made ſevere edicts: but in caſe they be done, in ſome places they are pronounced valid, in ſome places declared Null. Where they are nulled, Nature is defeated in making proviſions and the parties are warranted to doe a miſchief. For if Mauritius and Cluviena contract marriage; and Mauritius repent his bargain where ſhall Cluviena be reliev'd? The law of the Church forbids it, and will puniſh her for doing it if ſhe complains. The Civil law takes no notice of it, for it cannot be legally prov'd: and the law of Nature is barr'd out, if it be declar'd Null; and then there is nothing left to hold him. It is the caſe of the Church of Rome who in the eighth Seſſion of the Councel of Trent declares all clandeſtine contracts to be null, and their mixtures to be fornication and uncleanneſs. But they have overacted their zeal againſt a temporal inconvenience, and burn their houſe to roaſt an egge; they deſtroy a law of Nature by a law of the Church; againſt the former practices, counſels and reſolutions, even of their own Church. * For if thoſe contracts are in themſelves naturally valid and not forbidden by God, then they cannot reſcind them: if they be not naturally valid, ſince they were alwaies poſitively forbidden, why were they eſteemed valid for ſo many ages? For till that Councel they were ſo, but finding that the former prohibitions were not ſtrong enough, they took this courſe to break them all in pieces: And out of deſire to prevent an accidental evil, they made it more ready to be done. For it was before but feared leſt they ſhould recede: but yet if they did, they were eſteem'd adulterers if they married again: and they themſelves knew when they were precontracted; and therefore ſtood convicted and pinch'd in their own Conſciences ſo long as the old laws remain'd, and men did not receive warrants to break the moſt ſacred bands in the world: but by this nullifying the contract, they have not onely leave to goe off, but are commanded; and if they be weary of this, they may contract with another, and there is nothing to hinder them, if Nature does not. This Nullity therefore is a vehement remedy that deſtroies the patient; beſides that it is againſt the law of Nature. The laws may forbid it to be done; but if it be, they cannot reſcind it; becauſe the civil conſtitution is leſs then the Natural, and convenience is leſs then Conſcience, and man is infinitely leſs then God.

* Navarrus Enchyrid. c. 25. Et congregatio Cardinalium quos talis & tam putidi pudoris decreti, decretis revocat rem facti in aut dictam, & ſponſalia clandeſtina etiam poſt concilium rata manere, ſicut & ante. Conſuluerunt ſc. famæ Concilii, non propriæ, qui rem tam certam, & ſibi tam planam & gratæ palam non erubuerunt.

5. 3. Some pretend to doe a greater good, and to doe it, break a contract juſtly made: and if the civil conſtitution allowes it, the law of Nature reclaimes, and releeves the injur'd perſon. This was the caſe of the Phariſees who denied to releeve their Parents out of zeal to fill the Treaſure of the Temple, and thought that their voluntary religion excus'd from their Natural duty. The Church of Rome gives leave to either of the perſons who are married ſolemnly, and contracted rightly to recede from their vow and enter into religion, and declares the marriage ſeparate and broken. Here Nature calls upon the obliged party, and ought to prevail above any other pretence; it being firſt in poſſeſſion and faſter in obligation: and if it be naturally an evil to break a lawful contract made without fraud, and which is in our power to kee p; then it ought not to be done for any good in the world.

6. 4. Hither alſo are to be reduc'd, obligations by Unſolemne ſtipulations, by command of Parents, by intermination of curſes, by meer delict amongſt perſons, againſt whom lies no civil action, as of ſervants to their Lords, ſons to their Fathers: concerning which proper accounts are to be given in their own places. Here onely they are to be noted in the general obſervation of caſes in which the law of Nature hath made an obligation, when the civil power could not, or would not, or did againſt it.

7. But it is proper to diſcuſſe a difficult queſtion which intervenes upon this rule. The caſe is this; By the law of Nature every man hath power to make a Teſtament of his own Goods: But the civil law requires conditions of every Teſtator that the Teſtament ſhall be ratified by ſo many witneſſes, or elſe it ſhall be invalid. Sempronius dying leaves Caius his heir, and gives but a ſmall portion to his ſon Porcius, but declares this by an Unſolemne Teſtament. The like may happen in all donations and actions to which any ſolemnities of law are required.

Queſt.

8. THe queſtion is, Whether the Eſtate be due to Caius by the law of Nature, or is not Porcius the ſon to be releeved by the civil Conſtitution which makes the Unſolemne Teſtament to be invalid? To this it is commonly anſwer'd, That to make a Teſtament is not a law of Nature, but a right onely, which as a man may himſelf relinquiſh, ſo may the publike laws reſtrain for the publike good: for there being ſo many frauds in pretended Teſtaments it is neceſſary that proviſions ſhould be made to prevent the infinite evils that may happen. Now whatſoever is neceſſary, is alſo juſt; if the neceſſity be publike, real, and unavoidable by other means: and if it be juſt, the publike power hath ſufficient authority to reſtrain any mans right for every mans good.

9. 2. Every ſentence of the Judge in a clear caſe that binds in law, does alſo bind in Conſcience; but if the Judge of civil actions did know that Sempronius really did appoint the ſtranger Caius his Heir, yet by the law he were bound to declare for the ſon Porcius, and that the real unſolemne Will of Sempronius were to be accounted nothing: So that although the Law were made to prevent fraud, yet even when there is no fraud, and the Judge knowes there is none, yet the Unſolemne Teſtament is to be declar'd invalid by the law: which law becauſe it is juſt, and for a juſt cauſe, and by a competent Authority, muſt bind in Conſcience by the force of the words of S. Paul; Let every ſoul be ſubject to the higher powers. And therefore if the law be good and the Judge juſt in giving the inheritance from Caius to Porcius, certainly Caius muſt needs be unjuſt if he detains it.

10. 3. And this very thing is conſented to in the Canons of the Church, which are uſually fram'd, and ever to be preſum'd (ubi contrarium non conſtat) to be more agreeable to the meaſures of Conſcience; and yet in the Canon law, a Teſtament fram'd and ſign'd in the preſence of two witneſſes is not good, unleſs the Pariſh Prieſt be preſent; and that no man can lawfully detain a legacy upon the Warrant of ſuch a Will.

11. 4. For ſince every act of man conſiſts of the poteſtative and elective faculties, if either will be wanting, or power, the act is invalid. It is not therefore enough though the will be manifeſt and confeſſed; for if the man have no power, his will is ineffective.

12. But this opinion though relying upon fair probabilities and great authority, is not to be aſſented to as it lies, but with great caution and proviſions. For a right of Nature cannot be taken away by a civil power, intirely, and habitually, but onely quoad exercitium actûs; the exerciſe of the act of that right may indeed be impeded for great reaſons and to prevent great evils, ſince therefore the power of making Teſtaments is a Natural right, and is wholly ſuſpended ſuſpended in its act to prevent frauds in Unſolemne Teſtaments, where the caſe is evident and no fraud at all, although the civil law is ſtill valid becauſe it being eſtabliſhed upon a general cauſe, though it fails in a particular it does not fail in the General, and therefore ſtill is rate and firme; yet becauſe it does fail in the particular where that is known, there is a port open for Chancery, for conſiderations of piety, and religion. And therefore although in the caſe put, Porcius who is the natural Heir of Sempronius, is to take the advantage of the civil law againſt Caius; yet if Sempronius had made an Unſolemne Teſtament in behalf of his Natural Heir, that ought to have ſtood in the Court of Conſcience. My reaſon is, becauſe in the law of Nature, Porcius the ſon hath as much Natural right to inherit, as Sempronius the Father hath to make a Teſtament; and therefore although an Unſolemne Teſtament ſhall not be ſufficient to interrupt a Natural ſucceſſion, becauſe the rights of Nature on either hand are equal; yet the civil power can reſtrain his right when there is nothing complicated with it: for his own conſent is involved in the publike conſtitution, and he may conſent to the diminution of his own right, when no duty is infringed, that is, in thoſe things where onely his own rights are concerned.

13. When therefore any thing of the law of Nature is twiſted with the right of Nature, there is an obligation paſt which the civil conſtitution cannot annull. As if Sempronius command his ſon in an Unſolemne Teſtament, in private and without witneſſes to give ſuch a legacy to Titius his Nephew; although Titius cannot challenge it by vertue of that Teſtament, yet the ſon is bound to pay it by the law of Nature: for Civil conſtitutions have effect upon a meer right, but none againſt a duty of Nature: and therefore although the Teſtament of Sempronius ſhall not paſs into legal, external, judicial warranty, yet it binds the ſon, and is valid as to him by the law of Nature and Conſcience. And this was rarely well affirmed by Pliny: Hoc ſi jus aſpicias, irritum; ſi defuncti voluntatem, ratum & firmum eſt; mihi autem defuncti voluntas (vereor quam in partem Juriſconſulti quod dicturus ſum accipiant) antiquior jure eſt. If we regard the civil law ſuch Teſtaments are invalid; yet if we regard the will of the Teſtator it is firme: but though I know not how the Lawyers will take it, yet to me the will of the dead is to be prefer'd before the law: and more fully yet to Antonianus; Tu quidem pro certa tua diligentia admones me, codicillos Attiliani, qui me ex parte inſtituit hæredem, pro non ſcriptis habendos, quia non ſunt confirmati Teſtamento, quod jus nec mihi quidem ignotum eſt, cùm ſit iis etiam notum qui nihil aliud ſciunt. Sed ego propriam quandam legem mihi dixi, ut defunctorum voluntates, etiam ſi jura deficerent, quaſi perfectas tuerer. Conſtat enim codicillos iſtos Attiliani Manuſcriptos: licèt ergo non ſint confirmati Teſtamento, à me tamen ut confirmati obſervabuntur. Every one that knowes any thing knowes that in law Unſolemne Teſtaments are invalid: but I have another law of my own, if I know it was really the will of the Dead, I will verifie it though it want the ſolemnity of law: and this alſo was affirmed by Innocentius, ſaying, Electionem quæ juri naturæ conſentit, licèt non ſerventur, juris ſolennitates tenere. cap. Quod ſicut: de election.

Lib. 5. Ep. ad Calviſium.

Lib. 2. Epiſt.

14. And there is great reaſon and great piety in this ſenſe of the queſtion; For when a duty is any waies concerned, there is ſomething owing to God which no humane power can or ought to prejudice. For it is in Teſtaments where any duty of any one is engaged, as it is in contracts of marriage to which every one that can chooſe is capable of being naturally obliged: now the relative of the obligation cannot in humane Courts claim either the advantage of an Unſolemne Teſtament, or Unſolemn and clandeſtine Contract, yet the relative who is oblig'd to duty cannot be ſo quitted: and therefore the Father can oblige a ſon in duty to perform an Unſolemn Teſtament; and every contracted perſon is bound to perform privately what the other cannot challenge publikely: and this is not obſcurely intimated by the law: L. hac conſultiſsimâ C. de teſtam. Ex imperfecto autem Teſtamento voluntatem tenere defuncti non volumus, niſi inter ſolos liberos à parentibus utriuſque ſexus, viz. niſi liberi in ſola dividenda hæreditate voluntatem habeant patris, ſaith the Gloſs.

15. And for the confirmation of all this, it is remarkeable that they who affirme an Unſolemne Teſtament to be utterly invalid, and that the law of Nature is no remedy in this caſe, yet affirme that it is of force in the matter of piety; as in donations to Churches, the poor, and pious uſes, as appears in Imola, Ananus, Antonius Rubeus, Covarruvias and others: which conceſſion of theirs could not be reaſonable or conſiſtent with their opinion, but that it is made ſo by the foregoing conſiderations; which certainly are the beſt medium to reconcile duty and prudence, the laws Natural and Civil, the right of a man with the Government of a Commonwealth, and to ſtate the queſtion between the two parties who earneſtly diſpute it to contrary purpoſes.

16. For although the queſtion is probably diſputed on both ſides: yet there are on either hand inſtances in which the ſolemnity of the law does, and does not oblige reſpectively: which ſhewes that the probability is on either hand right and true; and the thing as it lies in the middle hath nothing certain or reſolv'd; but is true or falſe as it partakes of differing reaſons. Now the reaſon of the whole is; becauſe the ſolemnity of law is wholly to be regarded where there is not a bigger obligation; where God hath not bound, and Man hath bound, Man is to be obeyed: but where God hath bound directly, there God is to be obeyed whatever be pretended by Men: but if God hath onely bound indirectly and collaterally, as if it be a caſe favourable and pious, there the ſolemnity of law which is againſt it, is not to prevail; but yet is to prevail in the behalf and proſecution of it.

17. Thus if a Pupil makes a contract in his minority to his ruine, or ſignal detriment: he is to be releeved by the advantage of the civil law which makes his contract invalid, becauſe the perſon is declar'd incompetent; and he may lawfully take his remedy; and is not bound by the law of Nature to verifie it: becauſe he being leſs naturally capable to contract, the other is by the law of Nature bound not to doe him injury, and take unequal advantages when every man hath equal right: and therefore if he does prevaricate the Natural law of juſtice which is equality, he alſo may loſe the privilege which the others action paſs'd unto him; for the civil law declaring that Minors ſhall not be prejudic'd, makes up that juſtice or equality which Nature intends. For the Minor with his leſs portion of Underſtanding, and the defenſative and retreat given him by the civil law is made equal to the Contractor who is perfect in his Natural capacity. Equality muſt be done and had. And this is one way of inferring it.

18. Another way is, If the Minor receives advantage by the bargain; then there is equality; for the want of his Natural capacity is ſupplyed by the advantageous matter, and therefore ſuch contracts are valid though the one of the Contractors be legally incapable. But

19. 3. If the bargain give ſome advantage on either ſide, the Minor muſt not take the advantage offer'd him by the civil law to himſelf, unleſs he allow to the other his ſhare of advantage in the bargain: for otherwiſe there is inequality. But

20. 4. Neither one nor the other is to be done, nor the Contract to be reſcinded if the perſon was Naturally capable, that is, unleſs it be apparent by the Conſciouſneſs of his own weakneſs, or the iniquity and folly of the contract that he was leſs in Nature then the other; and therefore in this caſe the civil law reſcinding the Contract of the Minor does declare that he is incapable naturally as well as civilly: and the Civil conſtitution does no way interfere with the Natural, but Miniſters to it; making the natural inſtance even with the Natural reaſon: for this being alwaies alike, from the firſt to the laſt, the inſtance growing from imperfection to perfection, muſt in the progreſſion be defended and ſupplied and be fitted to the other.

21. But in General, the Rule is true which Panormitan affirmes in proſecution of what I have now diſputed; Quando jus civile aliquid diſponit contrà jus Naturæ, ſtandum eſt juri Naturæ: and in particular to this very inſtance of Unſolemne Teſtaments P. Alexander 3. being asked whether according to the cuſtome that was in the Dioceſs of Oſtia a Will could be valid which was not atteſted by ſeven or five witneſſes at leaſt, gave in anſwer, cap. cum eſſes. de teſtis: tales leges à Divina lege & Sanctorum Patrum inſtitutis & à generali Eccleſiæ conſuetudine eſſe alienas; & ideo ſtandum eſſe contra illas juri Naturali, ſecundùm quod in ore duorum aut trium ſtat omne verbum. Which words of his I onely admit ſo far as they are agreeable to the former meaſures and limitation. For that a word is true under the teſt of two or three witneſſes is not a prohibitive law or command of Nature; but it was urg'd by our B. Saviour to the Jews as a thing admitted in their law, and it is agreeable to the law of Nature; but yet not ſo, but that a greater caution may be in ſome caſes introduc'd by the civil conſtitution, as I affirm'd above *: viz. when the innocent and equal ſtate of Nature to which ſuch ſimplicity or ſmall duplicate of teſtimonies were ſufficient, becomes chang'd by frauds and artifices of evil men, or new neceſſities are introduc'd which Nature did not foreſee and therefore did not provide for, but God hath provided for them by other means, even by a power given to the Civil Magiſtrate. * Rule 16. n. 21.

22. Laſtly, to make up the meaſures and cautions of this diſcourſe compleat, it is to be added; that when the civil laws annull an Unſolemne Contract or Teſtament: it is meant, that ſuch are to be declar'd null when they come into judgement; not that the action, or tranſlation of any dominion, inheritance or legacy is ipſo facto void: and therefore he that is poſſeſs'd of any ſuch is not tied to make voluntary reſtitution, or to reveal the nullity of the donation, but to depart from it, when he is requir'd by law: for he hath the advantage of a Natural right or power in the donour, and that being firſt muſt ſtand till it be reſcinded by a competent power; for the whole queſtion being but probable on either ſide, the poſſeſſour or the Donee hath the advantage till a ſtronger then he comes and takes away that in which he truſted.

Sins againſt the laws of Nature are greater or leſs, not by that proportion, but by the greatneſs of the matter, and the evil conſequent, or the malice of the ſinner.

1. THis rule is intended to remedy a great error that is in the World and prevails very much to the abuſe of Mens perſwaſions in many caſes of Conſcience; viz. that all ſins which are Unnatural are the worſt: and to be a ſin againſt Nature is the higheſt aggravation of it in the world: which if it were true in theſi, yet becauſe when it comes to be reduc'd to practice it is wrap'd up in uncertain notices, it ought to be more warily handled. For when Men have firſt laid huge loads of declamations upon all Natural rights, and Natural wrongs, and then endeavour'd to draw forth a collective body of Natural laws, and they have done it by chance or as they pleaſe, they have put it within their own powers to make what things they liſt as execrable as murder or blaſphemy; without any other reaſon, but that they have called them Unnatural ſins.

Concerning which theſe things are conſiderable:

2. 1. All ſins againſt Nature are no more the moſt deteſtable then all ſins againſt God: becauſe if the Kind of ſins, or the General reaſon or object of its irregularity were all that were conſiderable in this, nothing could be the aggravation of a ſin more then this, that it were againſt God. Now becauſe all ſins are againſt God, and yet amongſt them there is difference, the greatneſs of this appellative is not the onely thing that is conſiderable. But this is, that as all ſins are againſt God, ſo all are againſt Nature, ſome way or other: and the reaſon that concludes againſt every ſin is that reaſon that is common to all wiſe men; and therefore it muſt be alſo Natural: I doe not mean, taught us without the help of revelation or inſtitution, but ſuch as all men when they are taught, find to be really, and in the Nature of things ſo conſtituted, to be reaſonable.

3. All voluntary pollutions are ſins againſt Nature; becauſe they are ſatisfactions of luſt in waies otherwiſe then Nature intended: but they are not all of them worſe then adultery or fornication. For although all ſuch pollutions are beſides natures proviſions and order: yet ſome of them are more ſingle evils then fornication; which although it be againſt Nature too, becauſe it diſhonours the body, yet it is by Name forbidden in the Commandement, which ſome of the others are not, but come in by conſequence and attendance: and fornication includes the crime of two, which the other does not alwaies; and it is acted with more vile circumſtances and follies, and loſs of time, and other foul appendages. It is ſaid to be againſt Nature to approach a woman during her Natural ſeparations. But if it be a ſin (which I ſhall conſider in its due place) yet it is of the ſmalleſt conſequence and malignity; ſo that for a ſin to be againſt Nature, does onely denote its material part, or the body of it; but does not alwaies ſuperinfuſe a venome and ſpecial malignity, or greatneſs of crime into it, above other ſins. But it is according as the inſtance is. * Every ſin againſt the duty we owe to our parents is Unnatural: but they have their heightnings and diminutions from other accounts, and in this they have variety.

* And

* And it is obſervable that there were ſome laws made concerning ſome of theſe and the like inſtances in the judicial law of Moſes: but none in the Moral: and therefore that the irregularity in ſome of theſe caſes though it hath met with a foul appellative, yet is to be eſtimated by more certain proportions then ſuch caſual appellations.

4. 2. The breach of a Commandement is a ſurer rule to judge of ſins then the doing againſt a Natural reaſon. For there are many things which are Unreaſonable which are not Unlawful: and ſome things which are in ſome circumſtances reaſonable, but yet in the law forbidden and irregular: ſuch are all thoſe things which are permitted for the hardneſs of our hearts. So was Polygamy to the Patriarchs, and to the Jewes. So is the breach of laws by an Univerſal deficiency of the people; which though it be infinitely Unlawful, yet for the Unreaſonableneſs in puniſhing all, it becomes permitted to all. Therefore to eſtimate the goodneſs or badneſs of an action by its being reaſonable or unreaſonable is infinitely fallacious, unleſs we take in other meaſures. It is unreaſonable that a man ſhould marry when he is fourſcore yeers old, but it is not unlawful. It is unreaſonable for an old man to marry a young maiden, but I find no ſin in it. Nothing is more againſt Nature then to marry June and December; and it is Unnatural to make productions by the mixture of an horſe and an aſs; and yet it is done without ſcruple. But in theſe and the like caſes, the Commandement and nothing elſe is the meaſure of right and wrong.

5. 3. When the Meaſure of the Commandement is obſerved, the degree of the ſin is not to be deriv'd from the greatneſs nor ſmalneſs of its Unreaſonableneſs in its own Nature, nor yet by its contradicting a prime or a ſecondary reaſon.

The reaſon of the firſt is, becauſe there are no degrees of reaſon in the Nature of things. Reaſon is an indiviſible thing, ſimple as the Underſtanding; and it onely receives increaſe by numbers, or by complication with matter and relations. It is as Unreaſonable to think a thought againſt God, as to kill a man. It is as Unreaſonable and Unnatural to ſpeak againſt experience, as againſt a neceſſary propoſition: againſt a truth in Mathematicks, as againſt a truth in Scripture; and in the proper natural reaſon of things there can be no difference in degrees, for a truth increaſes not, neither can it decreaſe.

* The reaſon of the ſecond is, becauſe that a reaſon is prime or ſecondary is accidental to the caſe of Conſcience, or to the efficacy of its perſuaſion. For before contracts were made or dominions diſtinguiſh'd, it was a prime truth that ſuch things as every one ſeiz'd on were his own by the priority of title. It was a ſecondary truth, that every one was to be permitted to his right for which he hath contracted, and which is in his poſſeſſion. Now theſe reaſons are prime or conſequent according to the ſtate of things to which they are fitted, but the reaſon from thence receives no increment, nor the fact any alteration.

6. And this is alſo true whether the reaſon be known to us with or without a teacher. For the higheſt truths of God are ſuch as are communicated by revelation; and it is all one whether God teaches us by Nature or by Grace, by diſcourſe or by experience. There is this onely difference, that in ſuch truths which are taught, ſome men can have an excuſe becauſe all are not alike inſtructed in them; but in thoſe things which are borne with us, or are conſented to as ſoon as ſpoken, it cannot be ſuppoſed but all men (that are not fools) know them; and therefore they can have no pretence of ignorance in such cases: So that sins against prime or secondary truths, against truths Original or Consequent truths born or taught doe not differ in the nature of the things, but may cause an accidentall difference in the person, and may take from him the excuse of ignorance, and so make the man more sinful, but not the action in it self and in its own Nature worse.

Rule 7.

Actions which are forbidden by the law of Nature either for defect of power, or for the incapacity of the matter, are not onely unlawful but also void.

1. THIS is true in contracts, and acts of donation, in vowes and dedition, and all rely upon the same reason. He that cannot give, and he that cannot be given cannot contract or be contracted with. Titius intends to marry Cornelia's servant, because he desires to have children, and to live comfortably with the wife of his youth. He does so; and in their first access he finds her whom he thought to be a woman, to be an Eunuch; and therefore not a person capable of making such a contract: she did ill in contracting, but she hath done nothing at all besides that ill, for the contract is void by the incapacity of the person.

2. Upon this account the Lawyers amongst the causes of the Nullities of marriage reckon Error personæ, the mistake of the person; though certainly this is not to be extended beyond the meer incapacities of Nature, if we speak of Natural nullities. Thus if I contract with Millenia whom I suppose to be a Lady, and she proves to be a servant, or of mean extraction, though if she did deceive me she did ill in it; yet if she could naturally verifie that contract, that is, doe all the offices of a wife, the contract is not naturally void; whether it be void upon a civil account is not here to be enquired: but by the law of Nature it is void, onely if by nature it cannot be consummate. For by a civil inconvenience or mistake the contracts of Nature cannot be Naturally invalid; because that is after Nature and of another consideration, and of a different matter. For that a mans wife should be rich, or free, is no more of the necessity of the contract of Marriage, then it is that she should be good natur'd, or healthful: with this onely difference, that if a man contracts upon certain conditions, the contract is void if the conditions be not verified; and for those things which are present and actual he can contract, but not for what is future, contingent and potential. A man may contract with a maiden to take her for his wife if she be free, or if she have such a portion; but not upon condition that she shall be healthful for seven years. Because whatever condition can be stipulated for must be actual before consummation of the Marriage: afterwards it is for better or worse: the want of any such condition is not so great an evil to the man as it is to the woman to be left after she is dishonour'd. So that if it be a thing which can be contracted for, and be actually contracted for, in the destitution of the condition the contract is void. But if there be no such expres stipulation made, there is nothing can be made a nullity by nature, but that which is a natural incapacity: and therefore if a Gentleman con-contracts with a ſlave whom he thinks to be a free woman, with a baſtard whom he thinks to be legitimate, with a begger whom he thinks to be a great Heireſs, the contract is Naturally valid; becauſe there is in it all the Natural capacity; if ſhe be a woman, if ſhe can be a wife, and can be his, there is no more requir'd to a verification of the contract in the law of Nature. By the way I deſire it be obſerved that to ſeparate or diſannull a contract is not the ſame thing with declaring it to be null of it ſelf or from the beginning. The reaſon why I inſert this here is leſt the explication of the Rule ſeem infirme upon the account of other inſtances: For if a man marries a woman whom he took for a maid and ſhe proves not to be ſo, by the Moſaick law ſhe was to be ſeparated by death or divorce: but this is not a nullity: but a divorce may be for that cauſe which was in being before the marriage as well as for the ſame reaſon after.

3. The other natural cauſe of invalidity is when the contract is made by him who had no power naturally to make it. This happens in caſe of precontracts. Spurius Feſcennius woes a Greek Virgin, and obtaining her conſent contracts himſelf to her, and promiſes to marry her within a certain limited time. But before the expiration of that time Publius Niger dies, and leaves his widow young and rich and noble; which advantages Feſcennius obſerving, growes in love with them and in a ſhort time quits his pretty Greek, and marries the rich Roman Lady. But being troubled in Conſcience about the fact inquires what he hath done, and what he ought to doe: and he was anſwer'd thus, If he was married to the Greek, he muſt return to her if ſhe will receive him, and quit his new lady; becauſe he was not a perſon capable to contract with her being married to another: a dead man may as well marry as that an Husband can marry to another, and quit that which had poſſeſs'd all his former power. For in all moral actions there muſt be a ſubſtantial, poteſtative principle that muſt have a proportion'd power to the effect; a thing cannot be done without a cauſe and principle in morality, any more then in Nature. If a woman goes about to conſecrate the holy Sacrament, it is χεὶρ ἄκυρος, it is an ineffective hand, ſhe ſins for attempting it, and cannot doe it afterwards; and it were wiſer and truer if men would think the ſame thing of their giving baptiſme, unleſs they will confeſs that to baptize children is a meer natural and ſecular action to which Natural powers are ſufficient; or that women have received Spiritual powers to doe it; and that whether a Prieſt, or a Woman does it is no difference, but matter of order onely. If an effect be ſpiritual, the agent muſt be ſo too, if the effect be gracious and precarious, ſo muſt the active cauſe; Thus it is in contracts, and donations, which cannot be done without the power of him that does it. But he who hath already given away his power, hath none to act withall: he cannot doe one action twice.

4. But this is to be underſtood onely after the actual ceſſion of the power and active principle; not after promiſes but after poſſeſſion. Therefore if Feſcennius was onely contracted or promiſed for the future though he ſin'd grievouſly in afterwards contracting with the other, yet it is valid. For a promiſe takes not away our dominion in a thing, but obliges us to uſe it in a certain manner. Bartolus appoints his Coſen Ancharanus to be his Proctor at a Synod, and promiſes that he will not revoke the deputation: but afterwards does; he is a breaker of promiſe; but the revocation is good. So it is in Teſtaments, and ſo in promiſes. For, if after promiſe we have no right in the thing which we have promis'd, then we have no power to performe it; but if we have a right, then the after act is valid, becauſe it hath a natural poteſtative cauſe; but if the

the power be paſt from us, as if Feſcennius were married to the Greek, he had not himſelf to give; for as he in the Comedy ſaid of ſervants

Τῷ σώματι γὰρ οὐκ ἐᾷ τὸν Κύριον
Κρατεῖν ὁ Δαίμων, ἀλλὰ τὸν ἐωνημένον.

The man hath not power over his own body, but the Maſter hath; ſo hath the wife over the Husband, and therefore he hath nothing now to give, and if he does, he does nothing; the man loſes his honeſty, but the wife does not loſe her right. But of the inſtance I am to ſpeak in its own place. Here onely I am to conſider the general Rule and its reaſon.

Rule 8.

When an act is forbidden by the law of Nature for the turpitude and undecency that it hath in the matter of the Action, the act is alſo void when the turpitude remains or hath a perpetual cauſe.

1. He that contracts a marriage with his Fathers wife, or any marriage, in which every illicite act is a new ſin, hath not onely ſin'd in making the contract, but the marriage is void by the law of Nature; and the reaſon is, becauſe no man can bind himſelf to ſin; ſo that here alſo there is a defect of power: no man can bind himſelf againſt God; and the law of Nature whoſe prime rule is to doe good and to eſchew evil cannot verifie an act which prevaricates her greateſt principle. Nature cannot give leave to ſin againſt Nature; it were a contradiction: for then the ſame thing ſhould be according to Nature and not according; and this is expreſsly affirm'd in the law; Quod leges prohibent, ſi perpetuam cauſam ſervaturum eſt, ceſſat obligatio: ut ſi ſororem ſibi nupturam aliquis ſtipuletur. He that promiſes to marry his ſiſter is not bound to verifie it, and if he have done it he is bound to quit her, becauſe every act of conjunction with her is inceſtuous, and a ſtate of ſin cannot be conſented to, nor verified by Nature who is an eſſential enemy to it.

L. Si ſtipuletur. de verb. oblig.

2. This is to be underſtood onely in things forbidden by the law of Nature, the Eternal law of God, or his poſitive temporary law; but is not true in things forbidden onely by men: the reaſon of them both is, becauſe no man hath power to contract againſt a Divine law: but if he have contracted againſt a humane law; his contract is eſtabliſhed by a Divine law, and is greater then the humane; where the Divine does not intervene by ſome collateral intereſt. The law of the Church of Rome forbids ſome perſons to contract marriage; and yet if they doe the contract is valid; becauſe the perſons being Naturally or by Divine law capable of contracting, they onely ſin'd who entred againſt law or leave, but they ſin'd then onely; for the after actions being no ſins, cannot be invalidated.

3. And yet if the contract be made againſt a Divine law, it is not invalid, unleſs the Divine law have a perpetual influence upon the ſtate, or renewed actions. If a Jew did buy and ſell upon the Sabbath he ſin'd againſt a Divine law; but his contract is valid. He that contracts with a woman of fornicati-

tions and lies with her for a price, hath ſin'd in ſo doing, but is bound to pay her the price of her luſt: becauſe nothing here is againſt the Divine law but the fornication; but the contract being extrinſecal to the Nature of the ſin, is not made null by that ſin: but that which is intrinſecally evil, is for ever ſo, and therefore muſt be broken in pieces.

4. In all other caſes, whatſoever is forbidden by the law of Nature is a ſin if it be done, but it is valid and effective to all purpoſes of that law. It is againſt the law of Nature to take a great price for a trifle, but if it be contracted for it muſt be paid. If a theef makes me promiſe to pay him 20 l. the next day; though he ſin'd againſt a Natural law in doing me that violence, and exacting of me that promiſe, yet the ſtipulation muſt ſtand.

The ſumme is this; Where ever there is power, and will, and in the permanent effect conſonancy to the prime meaſures of Nature, there the actions are valid, though they entred at the wrong door.

But, He that wants power, let his will be never ſo ſtrong, it effects nothing without: it is juſt like the King that commanded the waves of the Sea not to come to the foot of his chair; they came for all his will to the contrary.

He that wants will, wants alſo an integral part of the conſtitution of the act, and does nothing.

But when he hath a Natural and legal power, and an effective will, yet if the whole ſtate or the after-actions dwell in ſin, it cannot be permitted by Nature, but muſt be turned out of doors.

RULE 9.

The law of Nature can be diſpenſed with, by the Divine power.

Vide reg. 1. n. 43, 44. &c.

1. I Am willing publikely to acknowledge that I was alwaies ſince I underſtood it, a very great enemy to all thoſe queſtions of the School which inquire into the power of God: as whether by Gods abſolute power a body can be in two places: whether God can give leave to a man to ſin: and very many there are of them to as little purpoſe. But yet here I am willing to ſpeak in the like manner of expreſſion, becauſe the conſequent and effect of it goes not to a direct inquiry concerning the Divine power, for it intends to remonſtrate that becauſe God does actually diſpenſe in his own law, this prime law of God, or the law of Nature is nothing elſe but the expreſs and declar'd will of God in matters proportionable to right reaſon and the nature of Man.

2. But in order to the preſent inquiry; it is to be obſerved that Gods diſpenſation is otherwiſe then Mans diſpenſation; 1. God is the ſupreme Lawgiver, and hath immediate power and influence over laws, and can cancell theſe, and impoſe thoſe, new or old as he pleaſe. By this power it is that he can relaxe to particular perſons their perſonal obligation quoad hic & nunc & ſic; and if he does, the law ſtill remaining in its force and power to other perſons and in other caſes, this is properly diſpenſation. 1. 2. God is the ſupreme Lord, and can transfer dominions and take away Kingdomes, and give them to whom he pleaſe; 2.

pleaſe; and when he makes ſuch changes, if he commands any one to be his Miniſter in ſuch tranſlations, he does legitimate all thoſe violences by which thoſe changes are to be effected: and this alſo is a diſpenſation; but improperly.

3. 3. God alſo is the ſupreme Judge, and can puniſh and exauthorate whom he pleaſe, and ſubſtitute others in their room; and when he does ſo by command and expreſs declaration of his will; then alſo he diſpenſes in thoſe obligations of juſtice, or obedience, or duty reſpectively, by which the ſucceſſor or ſubſtitute, or Miniſter was hindred from doing that which before the command was a ſin, but now is none: and this alſo is another manner of diſpenſation. Some Doctors of the law are reſolved to call nothing Diſpenſation, but the firſt of theſe: and the other under another name ſhall ſignifie the ſame thing; but ſay they, He onely diſpenſes who does take off the obligation directly, by his legiſlative power without uſing his judicative and poteſtative, he who does it as an act of direct juriſdiction, not as a Lord, or a Judge, but as a Lawgiver: Now ſay they, God does never as a Lawgiver cancel or abrogate any law of Nature: but as a Lord he transfers rights, and as a Judge he may uſe what inſtruments he pleaſe in executing his Sentence, and ſo by ſubtracting or changing the matter of the laws of Nature, he changes the whole action. To theſe things I make this reply.

3. 1. That this is doing the ſame thing under another manner of ſpeaking, for when it is inquired whether the law of Nature is diſpenſable; the meaning is, whether or no that which is forbidden by the law of Nature may in certain caſes be done without ſin: but we mean not to enquire whether or no this change of actions from unlawful to lawful be that which the Lawyers in their words of art and as they define it call Diſpenſation: for in matters of Conſcience, it is pedantry to diſpute concerning the formes and termes of art: which Men to make their Nothings ſeem learning dreſs up into order and methods, like the dreſſings and paintings of people that have no beauty of their own: but here the inquiry is and ought to be more material in order to practice and caſes of Conſcience. For if I may by God be permitted to do that, which by the law of Nature I am not permitted, then I am diſpenſed with in the law of Nature, that is, a leave is given to me to doe what otherwiſe I might not.

4. 2. That the doing of this by any of the forenamed inſtruments or waies is a diſpenſation and ſo really to be called, appears in the inſtances of all laws. For if it be pretended that the Pope can diſpenſe in the matter of vowes, or a Prince in the matter of mariages; which are rate and firm by the law of nature; he cannot doe it by direct juriſdiction or by annulling the law which is greater then either King or Biſhop: for when a diſpenſation is given in theſe inſtances, it is not given but when there is cauſe: and when there is cauſe the matter is chang'd; and though the law remains, yet in a changed matter the obligation is taken off; and this is that which all the world calls diſpenſation, and ſo it is in the preſent queſtion; when God changes the matter or the caſe is pityable, or ſome greater end of God is to be ſerved, that is, when there is cauſe, God diſpenſes, that is, takes off the obligation. Here onely is the difference,

5. 3. In Divine diſpenſations God makes the cauſe; for his laws are ſo wiſe, ſo prudent, ſo fitted for all needs and perſons and all caſes that there is no defaillance or new ariſing caſe which God did not foreſee: but becauſe he hath ends of providence, of juſtice, of goodneſs or power to ſerve, he often introduces new cauſes of things, and then he gives leave to men to finiſh his de-

ſignes by inſtruments which without ſuch leave would be unlawful. But in Humane diſpenſations the cauſe is prepared before hand, not by the Lawgiver, but by accident and unavoidable defect: for without cauſe diſpenſations are not to be granted; but in both the diſpenſation is not without the changing of the matter, that is, without altering the caſe. God does not give leave to any man to break a Natural law, as long as he keeps that Natural law in its own force and reaſon; and neither does a Prince or Biſhop give leave to any Subject to break any of his Laws when there is no need; for the firſt would be a contradiction, and the ſecond a plain ruine of his power, and a contempt to his lawes: Therefore in the ſumme of affairs it is all one; and becauſe actions generally forbidden by the law of Nature may by God be commanded to be done, and then are made lawful by a temporary command, which he made unlawful by Nature or firſt ſanction; this is a direct diſpenſing with ſingle perſons in the law of Nature. And to ſay it is not a diſpenſation, becauſe God does not doe it by an act of ſimple juriſdiction, but by the intertexture of his dominative and Judicial power, is nothing but to ſay that God having made a law agreeable to reaſon, will not doe againſt that reaſon which himſelf made, till he introduces a higher, or another. For while all things remain as was foreſeen or intended in the law, both divine and humane laws are indiſpenſable, that is, neither God in his providence, nor Men in the adminiſtration of juſtice and government doe at all relaxe their law. If it be ſaid, a King can doe it by his abſolute power, though it be unjuſt: I confeſs this God cannot doe, becauſe he can doe no wrong: but if God does it, his very doing it makes it juſt: and this a King cannot doe. But if the queſtion be of matter of power, abſtracting from conſiderations of juſt or unjuſt; there is no peradventure but God can doe in his own law, as much as any Prince can doe in his. When the matter is chang'd, the Divine law is as changable as the humane, with this onely difference, that to change the matter of a Divine Natural law, is like the changing of the order of Nature; ſometimes it is done by Miracle; and ſo is the law alſo chang'd, by extraordinary diſpenſation; but this although it can happen as often as God pleaſe, yet it does happen but ſeldome as a Miracle; But in humane laws it can and does often happen, and therefore they are to be diſpenſed with frequently: and ſometimes the caſe can ſo wholly alter, and the face of things be ſo intirely new, and the inconvenience ſo intolerable that the whole law muſt paſs away into deſuetude and nullity; which can never happen in the Divine Natural law; becauſe the reaſon of it is as eternal as Nature herſelf; and can onely be interrupted by rare contingencies of Gods procuring, as the order of Nature is by Miracle; but will revert, becauſe Nature will return into her own channel, and her laws into their proper obligation.

6. 4. But now to the matter of fact that God hath diſpenſed not onely by ſubtraction or alteration of the matter, but by direct juriſdiction, that is, as he is a Judge, and a Lord, and a Lawgiver even in all the waies in which diſpenſations can be made appears in ſeveral inſtances.

7. 1. That the marriage of one Man and one Woman is by the law of Nature, appears by the inſtitution of marriage, and by Chriſts revocation of it to the firſt ſanction. It was ſo from the beginning: and if any thing be a law of Nature, that is one by the conſent of all men: and yet Moſes permitted divorces, and God and Moſes his ſervant permitted Polygamy when there was no neceſſity, no change of the matter or of caſe, but only that men had a mind to it.

For if the conjunction of male and female was eſtabliſhed in ſingulari conjugio at the firſt, when there might be a greater neceſſity of multiplying wives for the peopling the world, then as the world grew more populous the neceſſity could leſs be pretended; therefore this muſt be an act of pure juriſdiction: the cauſes of exception or diſpenſation grew leſs when the diſpenſation was more frequent, and therefore it was onely a direct act of juriſdiction. Though I confeſs that to diſtinguiſh dominion from juriſdiction, and the power of a Judge from that of a Lawgiver, I mean when both are ſupreme, and the power of a Lord from them both, is a diſtinction without real difference: for as he is our Lord he gives us laws and judges us by thoſe laws: and therefore nothing is Material in this inquiry, but whether the action can paſs from unlawful to lawful; though becauſe the Lawyers and other Schools of learning uſe to ſpeak their Shibboleth, I thought it not amiſs to endeavour to be underſtood by them in their own way. So again, That brother and ſiſter ſhould not marry is ſuppos'd to be a law of Nature: but yet God diſpens'd with it in the caſe of Cain and his ſiſter: and this he did as a Lord or as a Lawgiver; he made it neceſſary to be ſo, and yet it was not neceſſary he ſhould make it ſo; for he could have created twenty men and twenty women as well as one: But that which is inceſt in others was not ſo in him; but there was no ſignal act of dominion or of Judicature in this, but it was the act of a free Agent; and done becauſe God would doe ſo; whether this be juriſdiction or dominion, let who can determine.

8. 2. But in ſome things God did diſpenſe by changing the matter, uſing that which men are pleas'd to call the right of Dominion. Thus God did diſpenſe with Abraham in the matter of the ſixt Commandement; God commanded him to kill his Son, and he obeyed, that is, reſolved to doe it, and will'd that, which in others would be wilful murder. Now God was Lord of Iſaac's life, and might take it away himſelf, and therefore it was juſt: but when he gave Abraham command to doe it, he did not doe it but by diſpenſing with him, in that Commandement: It is true that God by his dominion made the cauſe for the diſpenſation; but yet it was a direct diſpenſation; and it is juſt as if God ſhould by his dominion reſolve to take away the lives of the men in a whole Nation, and ſhould give leave to all mankinde to kill all that people as faſt as they could meet them, or when they had a minde to it: And this was the caſe of the ſons of Iſrael, who had leave to kill the Canaanites and their neighbours. God diſpenſed with them in the matter of the ſixth and eighth Commandements: for it is not enough to ſay, That God as Lord of lives, and fortunes, had deveſted them of their rights, and permitted them to others: for that is not enough, that God as Lord hath taken away the lives and liberties and poſſeſſions of any man, or community of Men: for that act of dominion is not enough to warrant any man to execute the Divine decree; Nay though God hath decreed and declar'd it concerning a crime that it ſhall be capital, yet a man muſt have more then this to make it lawful to put that man to death. He muſt be a Miniſter of the Divine juriſdiction; he muſt have a power intruſted to him from God, and a Commiſſion to execute the Divine Sentence; and from hence it follows undeniably, that ſince the delegate power is a delegate juriſdiction and without this a man may not put a Capital offender to death; that therefore the ſupreme power from whence the delegation is commiſſionated is alſo a power of juriſdiction; and therefore if the words of their own Art are true, this leave given to doe that which without that leave were a ſin againſt the law of Nature, is properly and truly a Diſpenſation.

3. The

9. 3. The third way of dispensing is by applying the power of a Judge to a certain person or community, and by way of punishment to take from him what cannot be taken from him but by a superior power, or by the Supreme; Thus we are commanded by the law of Nature to give nourishment and to make provisions for our children; but if children prove rebellious and unnatural; God can command us to neglect that duty, and to expose them to the contingencies of fortune. It is by the law of Nature commanded to us to love and honour our Parents; to be loving and kind to our children: but if Parents inticed their children to idolatry, their children might lay their hands upon them and stone them to death. * It is a command and a prime rule of the law of Nature that we should doe as we would be done to: but even in this original rule and great sanction God did dispense with the Israelites, for they might not exact upon one another by Usury: but to strangers they might; what they hated to have done to themselves they were willing and expresly permitted to doe to others. In these and the like cases, although an act of dominion or judgement might intervene, yet that's not enough to warrant the irregular action; there must be an act of jurisdiction besides, that is, if God commands it or by expres declaration warrants it, then it may be done. Thus God as a Judge and being angry with David intended to punish him by suffering his Concubines to be humbled by his son in the face of all Israel, but though he did it justly; yet because Absalom had no command or warrant to doe what God threatned he was criminal. But Jeroboam and Jehu had commissions for what they did, though of it self it was otherwise violent, unjust, rebellious and unnatural, and therefore did need the same authority to legitimate it, by which it became unlawful. God often punishes a Prince by the rebellion of his Subjects God is just in doing it; but he hates the instruments, and will punish them with a fearful destruction unless they doe repent, in this case nothing can warrant the Subjects to strike, but an expres command of God.

10. Thus I conceive the thing it self is clear and certain; but for the extension of this, the case is yet in question, and it is much disputed amongst them that admit this rule in any sense, how many laws of Nature can be dispensed with: for if all, then the consequents will be intolerable; if not all, by what are they separated since they all seem to be establisht by the bands of Eternal reason. * Some say that the precepts of the second Table are dispensable, but not the first; But that is uncertain, or rather certainly false; for if God did please he might be worshipped by the interposition of an image; or if he essentially should hate that as indeed in very many periods of the world he hath severely forbidden it; yet the second Commandement and the fourth have suffer'd alteration and in some parts of them are exstinguished. * Others say that the Negative precepts are indispensable; but not the affirmative. But this is not true; not onely because every Negative is complicated with an affirmative; and every affirmative hath a Negative in the armes of it, but because all the precepts of the second Table, the first onely excepted, are Negative; and yet God can dispense with all of them as I have already prov'd.

11. But though it be hard to tell how far this dispensation and Oeconomy can reach, and to what particulars it can extend, because Gods waies are unsearchable, and his power not to be understood by us; yet since our Blessed Saviour hath made up a perfect Systeme of the Natural law, and hath obtained to himself an everlasting kingdome, so that his law must last as long as the world lasts, and by it God will governe mankinde for ever; by the eternal reasonablenes and proportions of this law we can tell what is indispensable and what not: and the measure by which alone we can gues at it is this, Every matter from whence the ratio debiti, or cause of the obligation can be taken is dispensable. Now becaus God is supreme over all his creatures, and can change all their affairs, and can also choose the manner of his own worship, therefore in these things he can dispense.

12. But in that essential duty which his creatures owe to him the case is different; for though God can exact more or fewer instances of affirmative duty, these or others, yet there cannot be an alteration of the main relation; and of the intrinsick duty, and the intercours of the soul with God in the matter of the principal affections there can be no dispensation. It is eternally and indispensably necessary that we love God: and it were a contradiction that either God should command us to hate him, or that we could obey him if he did. For obedience is love; and therefore if we obey'd God commanding us to hate him, we should love him in hating him, and obey him by our disobedience.

13. Now if it be inquir'd to what purposes of Conscience all this inquiry can minister; the answer to the inquiry will reduce it to practice; for the proper corollaries of this determination of the question are these.

14. 1. That our duty to God is supreme; it is onely due to him; it cannot be lessen'd, and ought not upon any pretence to be extinguished; becaus his will is the onely measure of our obedience; and whatsoever is in Nature, is so holy for God and for Gods service, that it ought to bend, and decline from its own inclination to all the compliances in the world which can please God. Our reason, our Nature, our affections, our interest, our piety, our religion are and ought to be Gods subjects perfectly; and that which they desire, and that which we doe, hath in it no good, no worthines but what it derives from the Divine law and will.

15. 2. That in the Sanction of the Divine laws the reason obliges more then the letter: For since the change of the reason is the ground of all mutation and dispensation in laws, it is certain that the reason and the authority, that in the thing, this in God, are the soul and the spirit of the law: and though this must not be used so as to neglect the law when we fancy a reason, yet when the letter and the reason are in opposition, this is to be preferr'd before that. If the reason ceases it is not enough of warrant to neglect the law; unles a contrary reason arises, and that God cannot be served by obedience in that instance, but when the case is not onely otherwise but contrary to what it was before; let the design of God be so observ'd as that the letter be obeyed in that analogy and proportion. It is a Natural law that we should not deceive our neighbour: becaus his interest and right is equal to any mans else: but if God have commanded me to kill him, and I cannot by force get him into my hand, I may deceive him whom God hath commanded me to kill; if without such a snare I cannot obey the command of God. But this is but seldom practicable, becaus the reasons in all Natural laws are so fixt and twisted with the accidents of every mans life, that they cannot alter but by Miracle, or by an expres command of God; and therefore we must in the use of this Rule, wholly attend upon the expres voice of God.

3. It

16. 3. It hence alſo will follow, that if an Angel from Heaven, or any Prophet, or dreamer of dreams, any teacher and pretendedly illuminate perſon ſhall teach or perſwade to any act againſt any natural law, that is, againſt any thing which is ſo reaſonable and neceſſary that it is bound upon our Natures by the ſpirit of God and the light of our reaſon, he is not to be heard: for until God changes his own eſtabliſhments, and turns the order of things into new methods & diſpoſitions, the natural obligations are ſacred & inviolable.

17. 4. From the former diſcourſes it will follow, that the Holy Scriptures of the New Teſtament are the light of our eyes, and the intire guide of our Conſciences in all our great lines of duty; becauſe there our Bleſſed Lord hath perfectly regiſtred all the natural and eſſential obligations of Men to God and to one another: and that in theſe things no man can or ought to be prejudic'd; in theſe things no man is to have a fear, but to act with confidence and diligence: and that concerning the event of theſe things no man is to have any jealouſies; becauſe ſince all the precepts of Chriſt are perfective of our Nature, they are inſtruments of all that felicity of which we can be capable, and by theſe we ſhall receive all the good we can hope for: and that, ſince God hath by his holy Son declar'd this will of his to be laſting, and never more to be changed by any ſucceeding law-giver, we muſt reſt here, and know that no power leſs then God can change any thing of this, and that by this law we ſhall ſtand or fall in the eternal ſcrutiny.

RULE X.

The law of Nature cannot be diſpenſed with by any humane power.

1. THe reaſon is, 1. Becauſe Nature and her laws have both the ſame Author, and are relative to each other; and theſe as neceſſary to the ſupport and improvement of humane Nature, as nouriſhment to the ſupport of humane bodies: and as no man can create new appetites, or make hay or ſtones to be our nouriſhment; ſo neither can he make that our Nature ſhould be maintain'd in its well-being without theſe laws. 2. The laws of Nature being bound upon us by the law of God, cannot be diſpenſed withall, unleſs by a power equal or the ſame, or ſuperior to that which made the Sanction: but that cannot be at all; therefore neither can they be diſpenſed with at all, unleſs it be by God himſelf. 3. Natural laws are all the dictates of Natural reaſon; and he that diſpenſes with the law, muſt have power to alter the reaſon: which becauſe it can never be done but by ſuperinducing ſomething upon Nature greater then her own natural need, and none can doe this but God, therefore none but he can diſpenſe.

2. But becauſe wiſe men have publikely ſaid it, Per jus Gentium & Civile aliquid detrahitur de jure Naturali, By the law of Nations and the Civil laws ſomething may be diminiſhed from the law of Nature; it is to be conſidered what truth they could ſignifie by thoſe words: for unleſs by ſome inſtances of caſe they had ſeen it lawfull, it is not to be ſuppos'd it could have been by ſo wiſe perſons made ſacred. But the following meaſures are its limit.

L. Manumiſſiones, & l. jus civile. ff. de juſtitia & jure. & in Sect. jus autem. inſtit. de jure Natur. Gentium & civili.

3. 1. Whatſoever is forbidden by the Natural law cannot be permitted by the Civil; becauſe where the higheſt power hath interpos'd, there the inferior and ſubordinate hath no authority: for all it hath being from the Superior, it cannot be ſuppos'd it can prejudice that from whence it hath all its being; for if it could be otherwiſe, then either the inferior muſt be above the ſupreme, or the ſupreme muſt ſubmit it ſelf to what is under it.

4. 2. Whatſoever is commanded by the law of Nature cannot be forbidden by the Civil law; for God who is here the Law-giver is to be heard; and he ſets up no authority againſt himſelf, nor gives any man leave to diſobey him. Theſe relie upon the ſame reaſons, and are deſcrib'd above.

5. 3. That which the law of Nature hath permitted, and no more, may be made up into a civil law, or it may be forbidden, according to that rule in the law, Quod licitum eſt ex ſuperveniente cauſa mutatur, That which is onely lawful by a ſupervening cauſe may be chang'd. For rights are before laws in time and Nature; and are onely ſuch licences as are left when there are no laws. Commands and prohibitions of Nature not being the matter of Civil laws, unleſs it be by way of corroboration; there can no laws be made in a Natural matter unleſs there be reſtraints or continued permiſſions of their firſt rights. For that which in morality we call indifferent, in Nature we call a right: that is, ſomething that is permitted me to doe or to uſe as I ſee cauſe for, is a thing upon which no reſtraint is made; that is, there is no law concerning it: but therefore the Civil law may reſtrain it, becauſe the liberty and its uſe may doe miſchief, and there is no law hinders it to be diſpos'd by men. For if I may by my private power or intereſt uſe any of it or deny my ſelf the uſe of it, much more may the Civil power doe it. I might not doe it my ſelf, if any law of God had forbidden me; but if no law of God hath forbidden, what can hinder but that the civil power may order it? Such are Natural liberty, commnnity, powers of revenge, of taking any thing, of killing any man that injures me.

6. 4. That which is confirm'd by the law of Nature, may by the civil power be altered and diſpenſed with: which happens in two caſes.

1. When the obligation ſuppoſes a foregoing act of the will, and is arbitrary in one of the terms of relation. Titius owes 1000 l. to Caius; and by the eſſential or Natural laws of juſtice is bound to pay him: but becauſe this ſuppoſes a private right in Caius, upon whom there is no reſtraint but he may uſe it, or let it alone; therefore Caius being at his liberty may refuſe to uſe his power of demanding the money of Titius, and forgive it him; and if he doe, Titius, although bound by the Natural law to pay him, is by the private power of Caius diſpenſed with. Becauſe in obligations as in arguments, if there be one leg that can fail, the concluſion is infirm. If one part can be looſed, the continuity of the whole is diſſolved.

2. The other caſe is like this, When the obligation is upon a condition, if the condition of it ſelf fails or be annulled by any juſt power or intereſt, the obligation which was introduc'd by the law of Nature can be reſcinded or diſpenſed with: for Nature binds and loſes according to the capacity of the things. It paſſes a temporal band upon temporal reaſons & neceſſities, & an Eternal band upon that whoſe reaſon can never fail, and where the neceſſity is indeterminable. And if a Natural law could bind longer then that reaſon laſts for which it did bind, then a Natural law could be unreaſonable, which is a contradiction. But then if the law does not bind in this caſe beyond the condition, then it is but improperly to be called a diſpenſation when it is relaxed:

laxed: but it is usual to call it so, and it is well enough; for it means this great direction to Conscience, that though the law of God be eternal, yet it's obligation may cease in the foregoing cases: For even Judges are said to dispense by interpreting the law, and applying that interpretation to particulars.

7. 5. The civil law can extrinsecally change the Natural law. For things may be alter'd or cease by an intrinsick or by an extrinsick cause. A Father ceases to be a Father when he dies, & he ceases to be a Father if all his children die: this alteration is by an extrinsecal cause; but to all effects and purposes it is the same as to the present case. Now although Nature cannot die, as Species doe not perish; yet Nature may change, as individuals may die: that is, if the matter of the law be subtracted, or so changed that it is to be governed with another portion of reason, then the law also must cease as to that particular. For as in the body of Man there is great variety of accidents & mutability of matter, but all that variety is governed by the various flexures of the same reason, which remains unchanged in all the complications and twistings about the accidents, & is the same though working otherwise: so it is in the laws of Nature, whose reason and obligation remains unchanged, even when it is made to comply with changing instances; but then it cannot but be said to change, even as Eternity it self hath successive parts by its coexistence with variety of times. Trebonianus swears to pay homage and acknowledgment for his Villa of Ramola, and the Royalties of Panizza, to his Landlord Calander and to his Heirs for ever: by the laws of Nature he is now oblig'd; but if Calander and his heirs be dead, or the land and possessions be alien'd, or swallowed up by an Earthquake, or drown'd in the sea, the law of Nature cannot bind him to that which is not, the matter of the obligation is subtracted, and therefore he is disoblig'd.

8. The summe is this: When Natural and prime laws are in prime & Natural instances whose matter is unchangeable, there the law of Nature cannot be prejudic'd by any but by the Lord of Nature: and the reason of this is no other but the necessity and constitution of Nature. God hath made it so, and it is so to be served, so to be provided for; and the law is a portion of the eternal law, an image of the Divine wisdome, as the soul is the image of the Divine Nature. But when the Natural laws are in a matter that can be prejudic'd, and doe presuppose contract, cession, condition, particular states, or any act of will, whose cause is not perpetual, the law binds by the condition of the matter; and the eternal law goes from its own matter as the immortal soul does from the body. Thus we say that Gods gifts are without repentance, and his love never fails, & his promises are for ever; and yet God does take away his gifts, & does repent of his loving kindnesses, & takes away his love, and will not give what he had promised: but it is not because he changes in himself, but the correlative of his actions and promises are changed.

9. So that now upon this account the whole question and practice about the Popes power in dispensing in the Natural law will appear to be a horrible folly without any pretence of reason; and the thing by its chiefest Patrons seems not at all to be understood. For since the rules of Nature are unalterable and Eternal, the laws being fram'd upon those rules complicated with matter, and persons, and events, is also eternal, excepting onely where the matter is or can be changed. Now if the matter be in prime instances, as the conjunction of Sexes, relation of Parents and children, &c. the law is the ſame for ever; onely this, if the matter by a miracle or extraordinary act of God be changed, by the ſame power the law is to be changed: but as we ſay rivers and ſeas run for ever, and yet Jordan was open'd, and ſo was the Red ſea, and the perpetual courſe of the Sun and Moon was once ſtop'd, but it reverted when the extraordinary caſe was paſt; ſo it is in the law of Nature, which in the prime inſtances and Natural matter is as unalterable as the courſe of the Sun and Seas.

But 2. Sometimes the matter changes alone, or is chang'd to our hand, as in conditional contracts; and in this caſe the law ceaſes, and the obligation goes off as to that particular.

But 3. Sometimes the matter is changeable by the will of the intereſted perſons, and by none elſe but themſelves, and they who have over them the power which themſelves have; ſuch as God, and under him, the ſupreme humane power, their own princes. Now to apply this to the Queſtion of the Popes power in giving diſpenſations, I conſider that

1. To eſtabliſh his power upon any words of Scripture, is to pretend that his power of diſpenſing is an act of juriſdiction and direct authority, that is, that he hath commiſſion to doe it with or without reaſon or cauſe founded in the thing it ſelf, but onely becauſe he will; & he that does ſo, ſaies he can doe more then (as many of the moſt learned Romane Doctors ſay) God can doe: for he diſpenſes in the law of Nature in no caſe but when he changes the matter, in the prime or ſecond inſtances of Nature reſpectively, which when the Pope can doe he alſo may pretend to a commiſſion of being Lord of Nature: But it is certain that for this there are no words of Scripture. But 2ly, If this power of diſpenſing be ſuch as ſuppoſes the matter already changed, that is, that there is a juſt cauſe, which is of it ſelf ſufficient, but is not ſo to him who is concern'd, till it be competently declared, then all the diſpute will be reduc'd to this, whether he be the moſt probable Doctor: for to expound when a Natural obligation ceaſes, is not an act of power but of wiſdome; & that the Pope is the wiſeſt man, or the onely wiſe man, it is alſo certain that there are no words of Scripture to affirm it. But beſides this in caſes of this nature, there needs no diſpenſation, for the law ceaſes of its ſelf; as in contracts made upon condition, when the condition is not performed. In humane laws where the ſubject is bound more by the authority then the matter of laws, the law may ſtill be obligatory after the ceaſing of the reaſon or matter of the law; and ſo there may be need of diſpenſation: but we ſpeak here of laws bound on us by God and Nature, in which the very ceaſing of the matter of it ſelf diſpenſes with the law. But 3ly, If it be yet more then this, and that in a changeable matter, I mean in things that are not prime inſtances of Nature and of laſting neceſſity, but in humane contracts, promiſes, laws and vows, which depend upon the pleaſure and choice of men, but yet are corroborated by the law of Nature, he pretends to a power of altering the caſe ſo to make way for diſpenſation; then the pretence reaches to this, that the Pope muſt be Lord of actions and fortunes, and the wills of others and the contracts of men; that is, in effect, that no contract ſhall be valid unleſs he pleaſe; and no man ſhall chuſe for himſelf, or if he does he needs not ſtand to it; and no man can have a right transfer'd to him by a contract, but it can be reſcinded againſt the will of the intereſted perſon: and if he can have any ſuch power to doe thus much miſchief, then juſtice will be the moſt contingent thing in the world; and the queſtion will not be a queſtion of Theology, but of Empire, & temporal regard: and therefore for this no words of Scripture can be pretended, becauſe no words of Scripture of the New Teſtament ever did transfer an Empire, or temporal power to a ſpiritual perſon for a ſpiritual reaſon: ſo that this will be a queſtion of war, not of peace and religion. To which I adde this by way of proviſion; That although ſupreme Princes have in ſome caſes power to reſcind contracts of their ſubjects and Parents of their children; yet this is onely in their own circuits, done by mutual conſent, in caſe of publick neceſſity or utility, of which by reaſon and the laws they are made competent Judges: which the Pope alſo may have in his temporal dominions as well as any other Prince: but this is not diſpenſation but the annulling of contracts or promiſes; it makes them not to be at all, not to ceaſe after they have a being, which is the Nature of diſpenſation, of which we now inquire. But the matter of this queſtion and the particular inſtance as it relates to the Biſhop of Rome is of another conſideration.

10. 6. The civil law can adde to the law of Nature; not onely new obligations by affixing temporal penalties; but by requiring new circumſtances to corroborate and conſummate an action: not that the civil law of a Prince or Republick can annull any thing which nature hath confirm'd, but it can hinder it from paſſing into a civil and publike warranty. Thus a clandeſtine contract is valid by the law of Nature; and in the Court of Conſcience there are witneſſes and Judges and executioners and laws and penalties to exact the performance of it: But when the civil or Eccleſiaſtick law hath commanded that in all contracts of marriage there ſhould be witneſſes, it muſt mean, that the contract ſhall not be acknowledged for legitimate unleſs there be; and therefore that the contract muſt be ſolemnly publiſh'd before it be civilly firme. No civil power can ſo enjoyne witneſſes as that if the contract be made without witneſſes it ſhall not be obligatory in Conſcience. For this obligation is before the civil law, and is bound by that power by which the civil power hath a being. But the civil power which cannot annull the act of Nature and Conſcience, can ſuperinduce ſomething upon it. It cannot make the contractors to goe back from what they have done, but to proceed to ſomething more, that what was firme in the inward may be confirm'd in the outward Court. By our laws the clandeſtine contract is civilly null before publication; but in our religion we beleeve it obligatory in Conſcience, and that it muſt come into publication. But by the laws of Rome the whole contract is nullified, and the perſons diſoblig'd, and the marriage after conſummation is diſſolv'd. This is againſt the law of Nature, but the other is a proviſion for it by additional ſecurity, that is, a taking care that the contracts of Nature may not be denied. For the confirmation of a Natural contract nothing is neceſſary but a Natural capacity not hindred by the Lord of Nature. Whatſoever therefore is ſuperinduc'd upon Nature cannot diſannul that to which all things competently neceſſary are ingredient, a condition brought in by a leſſe power cannot invalidate that which before that condition was valid: but as civil powers derive their authority from Natural laws and reaſon, ſo to theſe they muſt miniſter, and they may doe it by addition and ſuperfetation; but they may not violate them by irritation.

Rule II.

That the obligation to a Natural law does ceaſe in any particular, is not to be preſum'd by every one, but is to be declared by the publike voice.

1. THIS depends upon the foregoing diſcourſes and is Conſequent to them. For the ſeverall diſpenſations in the law of Nature being wrought by the change of their ſubject matter, the rule can never be chang'd; becauſe that is eternal and is abſtract from matter; but the law may be diſpens'd with, becauſe that is twiſted with matter which is not eternal. But then, becauſe the ſeveral matters of laws can be chang'd by ſeveral powers reſpectively, that power which alters the matter, and conſequently diſpenſes with the law, muſt by ſome evidence or other make the change apparent. If God by his power alters the caſe, and diſpenſes in the law, he alſo is to declare it: becauſe he muſt doe more; for he muſt give expreſsly a leave to doe proportionable actions: he having bound us to the law of Nature, leaves us ſo till he tells us otherwiſe: and the ſame alſo is the caſe if the matter be chang'd by man: for by the law of Nature we being bound to obey laws and performe contracts, muſt remain ſo bound till he that holds the other end of the ſtring lets it goe or tells us it is untied: becauſe he hath an intereſt in it, which muſt not depend upon the reaſon of another; but upon that which is common to both. For although we all agree that every rule of Nature is unalterable, and every law is to be obſerved, yet in every thing where a change can be pretended, every mans reaſon is equal; and therefore is not to be made uſe of in relation to others. For we all agree that theft is evil; but whether this action or this detention be theft, mens reaſons oftentimes cannot agree: and ſince every mans reaſon hath the ſame power and the ſame privilege, no mans ſingle reaſon can determine, becauſe there is no reaſon why yours more then mine. But therefore it is that there muſt be ſome common reaſon to declare the caſe, and the man to be at liberty, and the law to be looſe.

2. This hath no other variety in it, but this, that although the publike voice muſt declare concerning thoſe inſtances that concerne that matter of laws Natural which is in her keeping, as God is to doe in thoſe in which onely he hath immediate power; yet every private man can declare the obligation of a natural law to be loſe when he holds one end of the ſtring: If by a Natural law Caius be tied to doe me an act of kindneſs and Juſtice, it is my right; and as long as I will demand it, I hold the band of the Natural law in my hand: but if I let it goe, and will quit my right, the obligation is off, becauſe the matter is ſubſtracted. The reaſon of all is the ſame. No man is a good Judge in his own caſe where there is the intereſt of another twiſted with it: and it is unequal that my reaſon ſhould governe my neighbours intereſt; or that his ſhould governe mine: this would be an equal miſchief, and therefore ſomething indifferent to both muſt turne the ballance that there may be equal juſtice and equal proviſion. But if a man will quit his right there is no wrong done. He can ſufficiently declare his own will and acts of kindneſs, and then the law that combines with the matter, takes the ſame lot.

The exactneſs of Natural laws is capable of interpretation, and may be allayed by equity, and piety, and neceſsity.

1. WHatſoever can be diſpenſed withall, is either diſpenſed with by an abſolute power of juriſdiction, or for ſome cauſe in the nature of the thing: and if the laws of Nature can ceaſe to oblige without reaſon, but by the will and the command of the Supreme, of God himſelf, much more may the ſame will and power doe it when there is alſo a reaſon: and if there be a reaſon to take off the obligation wholly in ſome particulars, then much rather may there be a cauſe to take off ſome part of the exactneſs upon a proportionable cauſe; If it may be diſpenſed with, it may alſo be interpreted by equity; for this is leſs then that in the ſame kind. Every man is bound to reſtore his neighbours goods when they are demanded; but if he calls for his ſword to kill a man withall; there is equity in this caſe, and I am not guilty of the breach of the Natural law if I refuſe to deliver him the ſword when he is ſo violent and paſſionate. To pay debts is a Natural law; but if a rich man calls for a ſum of money which is his due, and I by paying him to day ſhall be undone, and he by ſtaying till next week ſhall not be undone, I doe not break the law of Nature if I detain the money a little longer and offer him ſatisfaction for the wrong, if he have received any. I promiſed my brother to ſee him upon the Ides of March; in my journey to him I broke my leg: now though I by the Natural law am bound to performe promiſes; and it is poſſible that for all my broken leg, I might get to him by the time, yet there is equity in it and piety that I forbear to goe with ſo great an inconvenience. Surgam ad ſponſalia quia promiſi, quamvis non concoxerim, ſed non ſi febricitavero: ſubeſt enim tacita exceptio, ſi potero, ſi debebo: ſaid Seneca. There is an equity and a reaſonableneſs in all theſe things. Effice ut idem ſtatus ſit cùm exigitur, qui fuit cùm promitterem, If the caſe be when I am to performe as it was when I promis'd, then I am bound pro rata portione; that is,

2. 1. If it become impoſsible, I am wholly diſoblig'd.

3. 2. If it become accidentally Unlawful; I am diſpenſed with.

4. 3. If it become intolerably inconvenient, I am in equity to be relieved. For in theſe caſes it is no breach of promiſe, but I am juſt if I deſire to doe it, and in the degree in which I am diſabled, in the ſame I am to be pitied. Deſtituere levitas non erit, ſi aliquid intervenerit novi. Eadem mihi omnia præſta, & idem ſum. It is not levity when I am the ſame, but my powers and poſſibilities are chang'd or leſſened. L. 4. de benef.

But this is to be underſtood and practis'd with theſe limitations:

5. 1. Not every change of caſe can excuſe or leſſen, or alter the obligation, but ſuch a change as makes the perſon pityable, or the thing more vexatious to the doer, then it could be of advantage to the other.

6. 2. If the cauſe does not continue, the firſt equity does not diſannul the obligation, but defers it onely, and it returnes when the cauſe ceaſes.

3. The

7. 3. The obliged perſon as he is not wholly diſoblig'd for the time, ſo neither for the thing it ſelf; for if it be matter of intereſt, though without violation of Natures law it may be deferred, and does not bind the man to a guilt, yet it does to a new duty, the duty of giving ſatisfaction to him who ſuffered injury: for ſince in the law of Nature all mens rights are equal, it is unnatural and unjuſt that to one there ſhould be remiſſion and eaſe and to the other a burden. For no man is to be better by the hurt and injury of another.

8. 4. If the cauſe be leſs, or if it be more, it ought not to be done unleſs an interpretative leave be juſtly or reaſonably preſum'd. In a great matter every man is preſum'd ſo charitable as to be willing to comply with his Brothers need or ſad accident. But if it be leſs, then the interpretative leave muſt be preſum'd upon the ſtock of friendſhip or experience, or ſomething upon which wiſe men uſually relie. Onely in this caſe, the preſumption ought to be leſs confident, and more wary.

9. This rule is to be underſtood principally in matters of juſtice, and relative entercourſes: for in matters of religion and ſobriety the caſe is different: becauſe in Natural religion and natural meaſures of ſobriety which are founded in prima natura in the very conſtitution of mans ſoul and body, in the firſt laws of God, and the Original Oeconomy of the body; the matter is almoſt as unalterable as the Rule.

CHAP. II.

Of the Law of Nature, or of all Man-kinde,

As it is commanded, digeſted, and perfected,

By our Supreme Lawgiver

JESUS CHRIST.

viz.

Of the Chriſtian law, the great Rule of Conſcience.

Rule I.

When the law of Jeſus Chriſt was eſtabliſhed, the old Teſtament, or the law of Moſes did no longer oblige the Conſcience.

1. THE Doctors of the Jews ſay that at the command of a Prophet, that is, of one that works miracles, it is lawful to break any Commandement, that onely excepted, which is concerning the worſhip of one God. Thus at the command of Joſhua the children of Iſrael brake the precept of the Sabbath at Jericho, and Samuel and Elias offer'd ſacrifice in places otherwiſe then the

the law appointed, and the Prieſts in the Temple did kill beaſts and labour'd upon the Sabbath and yet were blameleſs: and Circumciſio pellit Sabbatum, was their own Proverbe, on the Sabbath they circumcis'd their infants; and the Prophet Jeremie was author to the Jewes in ſecunda domo, that is, after they were taken captive that they ſhould change their computation by moneths, and not begin with Niſan. 1 King. 18 38.

2. For God being the ſupreme Lawgiver hath power over his own laws; as being a Creator he hath over his own creation: He that gave being can take it away: and the law may be changed though God cannot. For God is immutable in his attributes, but his works have variety, and can change every day; as light and darkneſs ſucceed each other, and ſummer and winter, and health and ſickneſs, and life and death, and perfect and imperfect; and he that commanded all men not to kill, might give a commandement to Abraham that he ſhould kill his ſon, and when he had eſtabliſhed the law of Moſes, it was in his power, without any imputation or ſhadow of change to give the world a New law, and a better.

3. To this purpoſe our Bleſſed Lord was indued with power from on high to give a new law; for he was a great Prophet, and did many and mighty miracles, and advanc'd the Spiritual worſhip of the only true God; and brought men from childiſh and imperfect uſages, to the Natural, Spiritual, Manly and Perfective manner of worſhipping God; and therefore it was neceſſary that a change ſhould be made: for in Moſes law the rites were troubleſome and imperfect, chargeable and uſeleſs, not able to waſh away ſins, nor to perfect the Spirits of the Saints; it exhibited nothing ſubſtantial, but by ſhadows pointed at the ſubſtance to be revealed afterwards: it was fitted to the weakneſs of imperfect people, and in ſome very great inſtances was exceeded by the lives and piety of ſome excellent perſons, as Moſes and David, who by humility, meekneſs, forgiveneſs and charity did acts of piety beyond the precepts of the law, and many did not divorce their wives, and yet by their law, all were permitted to doe it: for it might be ſaid of Moſes as by the lawgiver of whom Origen ſpeaks, who being asked if he had given to his Citizens the beſt laws; he anſwer'd, ὅτι ἐ τὰς καλλίστας, ἀλλ' ὧν ἠδυνάτο τῆς καλλίστας· not abſolutely the beſt, but the beſt he could, conſidering the incapacity and averſeneſs of his citizens: ſo did Moſes; he gave a better law then ever was before, and the beſt which that people and the ſtate of things could then bear: but it was but for a time, and the very Nature of the law required a better to ſucceed it, and therefore he that came and gave a better was not to be rejected, becauſe he diſannul'd the worſe: εἰ ὄ ἔστι πρὸς τὸν κατὰ φύσιν λεγόμενον μέσον βίον ἀφορῶντες καὶ ἃ προσοίσουσιν ἂν καὶ οἱ πολλοὶ, οἷς τὰ ἐκτὸς ὡς τὰ ἀγαθὰ ἢ κακὰ, καὶ τὰ τοῦ σώματος ὡσαύτως ὑπειλήφασι, νομοθετοῦσιν, τί τὶς τῶν τούτων ὠφελείαν νόμον ἀναιρεῖται βίου; If other lawgivers (ſaith Porphiry) regarding that middle kind of life which is ſaid to be according to Nature, and to thoſe things of which men are capable, who eſteem things good or evil by proportions of the body, have given laws Symbolical, yet what hurt does he, that brings in better? Adv. Celſ. 3. L. 1. de non eſu anim.

4. 1. For firſt it is certain, God himſelf did permit ſome things in Moſes law which himſelf had no pleaſure in: I inſtance in the matter of divorces, of which God by the Prophet ſayd, I hate putting away.

5. 2. The promiſes of Moſes law, in which the whole obedience was eſtabliſhed and for which it was exacted were wholly temporal and related to this life; and when the Prophets and holy men of the Nation began to ſpeak openly of reſurrection from the dead, and a life to come, it was an open proclamation of the imperfection and change of that law by which nothing of that was promiſed and nothing at all ſpoken of by which Mankind ſhould by obeying God arrive to that felicity which all wiſe men did ſuppoſe God did deſign to him.

6. 3. Although good things for this life were promiſed by the law of Moſes yet toward the end and expiration of it, the Nation ſuffer'd a new diſpenſation of things; and the godly men were often perſecuted, and the whole Nation continually baffled, and ſubdued by him that would; by the Aſſyrians, and Chaldæans, by the Perſians and by Antiochus, by the Syrians and the Romans, and therefore it was neceſſary they ſhould expect ſome better Covenant which ſhould be verified in the letter, and make recompence for the calamities which their beſt men here did ſuffer.

7. 4. The laws of Moſes were ſuch which were not of things naturally and originally good, but which did relate to time and place and perſon, but it was a law without which many ages of the world did live, and after it was eſtabliſhed it did onely bind that people; for neither did Moſes perſuade his Father in law Jethro to receive that law, neither did the Prophet Jonas perſuade it to the Ninevites, nor the Prophets ever reprove the not obſerving it, in the Aſſyrians, or Egyptians, the Idumeans and Moabites, the Tyrians and Sidonians, or any of their Neighbours, whoſe vices they oftentimes reprov'd ſeverely; and the beſt men of the firſt and ſecond world; Abel and Enoch, Noah and Melchiſedec, Sem and Job, Abraham and Iſaac, Jacob and Joſeph knew nothing of it, and yet were deare to God: But if the law had conſiſted of eſſential, prime and Natural rectitudes, it had been alwayes and every where; and if it conſiſt not of ſuch, it is not fit to be laſting, but it ſelf calls for a change when all the body and Digeſt of laws excepting ſome few that were before that law and ſhall be for ever, either were experiments of their obedience, or ſignifications of ſome moral duty implyed in the external ritual, or compliances with a preſent neceſſity, and to draw them far from imitation of the vile cuſtomes of the Nations, or were types and ſhadows of ſomething to come thereafter.

8. 5. The law of Moſes was a Covenant of works, and ſtipulated for exact obedience, which becauſe no man could perform, and yet for great crimes committed under Moſes law there was there no promiſe of pardon, no ſolemnity or perfect means of expiation, by the Nature of things and the neceſſity of the world, and the goodneſs of God a change was to be expected.

9. 6. That their law and Covenant ſhould be changed was foretold by the Prophets; particularly by the Prophet Jeremiah, I will make a new Covenant with you in thoſe daies, and in your minds will I write it: and when God had often expreſſed his diſlike of ſacrifices, in which yet the greateſt part of the legal ſervice was eſtabliſhed, God does alſo declare what that is which he deſires inſtead of it; even no other then the Chriſtian law, that we ſhould give to every one their due, and walk humbly with God; that they ſhould obey him, and give him the ſacrifice of a contrite and a broken heart: and if this be not a ſufficient indication of the will of God for the abolition of the Moſaick law, then let this be added which was prophecyed by Daniel, The Meſsias ſhall cauſe the ſacrifice and the oblation to ceaſe.

Jer. 31. 31, &c. Pſal. 50. & 51. & 40.

Iſaiah 1. Jer. 7. Micah 6.

7. It

10. 7. It was prophecyed * that in the dayes of the Messias the Gentiles also should be the people of God; but therefore they were to be governed by a New law, for Moses law was given to one people, had in it rites of difference and separation of themselves from all the world, and related to solemnities which could not be performed but in a certain place, and a definite succession and family; which things being the wall of partition and separation because Christ hath taken away or confounded in an inseparable mixture and confusion, God hath proclaim'd to the Jewes that Moses law is not that instance of obedience in which he will be any longer glorified.

* Jer. 23. Isaiah 43. Malach. 1.

11. From these premises the pretence of the Jewes for the Eternity of Moses law will be easily answered. For whereas they say that God called it, an Everlasting Covenant: it is certain that even amongst the Jewes, the word Everlasting did not always signifie infinitely, but to a certain definite period. For the law relating to the land of their possession, in which God promised to them an Everlasting inheritance; as their possession of the land is Everlasting, so is the Covenant, and they expir'd together: for all the demonstrations of the Spirit of God, all the miracles of Christ and his Apostles, all the sermons of the Gospel, all the arguments which were taken from their own books could not persuade them to relinquish Moses law and adhere to Christ: and therefore when all things else did fail, God was pleased to give them a demonstration which should not fail; he made it impossible for them to keep Moses law; for he broke their law and their Nation in pieces. But as to the word [Everlasting] and [Eternal] it was usual with them to signifie but to the end of a life, or of a family, and therefore much rather of a Nation. The band of marriage is Eternal, but it dies with either of the relatives: and the Oath of Allegiance is for ever, but that for ever is as mortal as the Prince. Thus also in Moses law, The servant whose eare was boared should serve for ever, that was but till the yeer of Jubilee: and Hannah carried up her son to the Temple when he was weaned that he might abide there for ever: Thus the Priesthood of Phinehas was said to be for ever; but God who said that he and his posterity should walk before the Lord for ever, did put a period unto it in Eli. But besides this, it is observable that the law and Covenant of Moses according to the manner of speaking of that and other Nations is used to distinguish it from the more temporary commands which God gave to persons and to families, and to the Nation it self in the wilderness, which were to expire as it were with the business of the day, but this was to be for ever, even as long as they enjoyed a being in the land of their Covenant: for thus we distinguish the laws of peace from the orders of warre: those are perpetual to distinguish from the temporality of these.

Exod. 21. 6. 1 Sam. 1. 22. 1 Sam. 2. 30.

12. These Arguments are relative to the Jewes and are intended to prove the abrogation of Moses law, against them. But to Christians, I shall alledge the words and reasons of the New Testament, so farre as the thing it self relates to Conscience. For not onely the Jewes of old, but divers Christian Bishops of Jerusalem, fifteen in immediate succession, did plow with an Oxe and an Asse, and were circumcised; the Converted Pharisees, the Ebionites, the Cherinthians and the Nazaræi still did beleeve that Moses law did oblige the Conscience: and amongst us there are or have been a great many Old Testament Divines whose Doctrine and manner of talk, and arguments, and practices have too much squinted toward Moses.

Iren. l. 1. c. 26. Epiphan. hær. 18, 28, 30, 66. Hieron. ep. 89. ad Augustin. Damasc. verb. Nazaræi. Euseb. l. 3. c. 27. August. hæres. 8, & 9.

13. But against all such practices or pretences I produce the decree of the Apostles at Jerusalem in the question of Circumcision: the abrogation of which disannuls the whole law: for I Paul say unto you, if ye be circumcised ye are debtors to keep the whole law: therefore by a parity of reason, we are not debtors to keep the law, when that great Sacrament and Sanction of the law is annul'd. To this purpose are those frequent discourses of the Holy Scriptures of Luke 16. 16. the new Testament: The law and the Prophets were until John; since that time the Kingdom of God is preached: where the two terms of the Law and the Gospel are expressly described; John the Baptist being the common term between
Rom. 6. 14. them both, so that now we are not under the law, but under grace; we are dead to
Rom. 7. 4. the law, and that band being separate, we are married to a new Husband, even to
Heb. 7. 12. Christ: who is also our High priest, after the order of Melchisedek, not after the order of Aaron; but then the Priesthood being changed there is made of necessity a
Gal. 3. change also of the law; for this was not to last but till Christs coming, for the law was given but till the seed should come: till then we were under the law as under a School-master, but when faith came, we are no longer under this pædagogy, it was but until the time appointed of the Father: and to this purpose S. Paul spends a great part of the Epistles to the Romanes and Galatians. For one of the great benefits which we receive by the coming of Christ is that we are now treated with by a covenant of faith, that is, of grace and pardon, of repentance and sincere endevours, the covenant of Moses being a prosecution of the covenant of works, can no longer oblige, and therefore neither can the law; for the law and the Covenant were the constitutive parts of that whole entercourse, they were the whole relation, and this is that which S. John said, The law came by Moses, but grace and truth came by Iesus Christ: and ever since he was made our Lord and our King, he is our Lawgiver and we are his Subjects, till the day of Judgement in which he shall give up the Kingdom to his Father.

14. But the greatest difficulty is behind: For not all Moses law is disannul'd, for some is injoyned by Christ; and some is of Eternal obligation; and such the Decalogue seems to be: the next inquiry therefore is, what part of Moses law is annul'd by Christ. To this I answer by parts.

Rule 2.

The Ceremonial law of Moses is wholly void.

1. FOR this is that hand writing of ordinances which Christ nailed to his Cross, and concerning this we have an express command recorded by the Apostle, Coloss. 2. 16. Let no man judge you in meat or in drink, or in respect of an Holyday, or of the New moon, or of the Sabbath dayes: and concerning the difference of meats not only their own Doctors say, the precept of Moses is not obligatory any where but in Palestine, but they have forgot the meaning of the names of some of them, or at least dispute it, which is not likely they would so strangely have lost, if the obligation also had not been remov'd. But as to us the case is confessed: for all the arguments before alleaged proceed of this part of the Mosaick law, if of any, this being chiefly made up of umbrages, figures, and imperfect services, relative to place and time, to families and separate persons, such which every change of Government could hinder, and which in the conflict and concussion with other laws did ever give place, even in that time when they were otherwise obligatory, which could not cleanse the conscience, nor take away away sins; but were a burden made to teach something else, like letters written upon little cubes, or given as appellatives to slaves that the children who were waited on by them might learn the Alphabet; but else they were a trouble to no real perfective purpose of our Spirits.

Quest.

2. I Know but of one difficulty which this thing can meet with, and that is made by the scrupulous inquiries of some tender or curious persons who suppose the difference of meats not to be so wholly taken away, but that still under the lawes of the Gospel we are bound to abstain from blood and from things strangled; pretending for this scruple, the Canon of the Apostles at Jerusalem: which injoyns this abstinence, and reckons it amongst the τὰ ἀναγκαῖα, things necessary: and this was for a long time used and observed strictly by the Christians: of which we have testimony from that law of Leo the Emperor, where having forbidden the use of blood stuff'd in the Entrailes of beasts, he affirmes that in the old law, and in the Gospel it was alwaies esteemed impious to eat it. And this was not onely for the present, and for compliance with the Jewes that by the observance of some common rites the Gentile converts might unite with the beleeving Jewes into one common Church, but they suppos'd something of Natural reason and decency to be in it; and the obligation to be eternal, as being a part of that law which God gave to Adam, or at least to Noah after the floud; for they who use to eat or drink bloud are apt to degenerate into ferity and cruelty and easinesse of revenge; and if Origen's fancy had been true, it had been very material; for he suppos'd that the Devils were fed with bloud: but however, certain it is that the Church did for divers ages most religiously abstain from bloud; and it was the great argument by which the Primitive Christians did confute the calumnies of the Heathens imputing to them the drinking of humane bloud: they could not be suppos'd to doe that, who so religiously abstain'd from the bloud of beasts, as we find it argued in Tertullian[a], Minutius[b], and Eusebius[c], who also tells of Biblis that she rather would die then eat bloud in a pudding: and in the Canons commonly called Apostolical[d] it is forbidden to a Clergy man to eat bloud, under pain of deposition, to a lay man under excommunication: which law was mention'd and suppos'd obligatory in the second Canon of the Councel of Gangra; and long after by the Canon of the Councel in Trullo; by the Councel of Wormes under Ludovicus Pius cap. 65. by Pope Zechary in his epistle to Boniface; and from hence the penitential books had warrant enough to impose Canonical Penances upon them that did tast this forbidden dish: and that they did so is known and confess'd.

3. But to the Question and inquiry, I answer, 1. That the abstinence from bloud is not a law of Nature or of Eternal rectitude as appears, first in that it was not at all impos'd upon the old world; but for a special reason given to the posterity of Noah to be as a bar to the ferity and inhumane blood-thirstinesse of which the old Giants were guilty, and possibly others might afterwards. For the Jewes reckon but six precepts given to Adam and his posterity after the fall. The first against strange worship. The second of the worshipping the true God. The third of the administration of justice. The fourth of discloshing nakednes, or a prohibition of uncleanness. The fifth against shedding bloud. The sixth against theft: and indeed here are the heads of all Natural laws; but because the old world grew cruel to beasts, and the Gyants were degenerated into a perfect ferity, and liv'd on bloud; therefore it pleas'd

God to superadde this to Noah, that they should not eat blood; that is, that they should not eat the flesh of beasts that were alive; that is, flesh with the blood: and it is not to be despised that the drinking of bloud is not forbidden; but the eating onely: meaning that the blood was not the main intention of the prohibition; but living flesh, that is, flesh so long as the bloud runs from it: Gen 9.4. flesh with the life thereof, that is, with the bloud: so run the words of the Commandement; and therefore the Doctors of the Jews express'd it by the not tearing a member of any live creature: which precept was the mounds of cruelty, God so restraining them from cruelty even to beasts, lest they might learne to practise it upon men. For God sometimes places some laws for defensatives to others, and by removing men afar off from impiety he secures their more essential duty. 2. But even this very precept is by all the world taught to yeeld to necessity and to charity, and cruelty to beasts is innocent when it is charity to men: and therefore though we doe not eat them, yet we cut living pigeons in halfs and apply them to the feet of men in fevers, and we rip the bellies of sheep, of horses, of oxen, to put into them the side of a Paralytick; and although to rude people and ignorant, such acts of security were useful, yet to Christians it is a disparagement to their most excellent institution, and the powers and prevalencies of Gods spirit, to think they are not upon better accounts secur'd in their essential duty. The Jews were defended from idolatry by a prohibition even of making and having images: but he is but a weak Christian who cannot see pictures without danger of giving them worship. 3. The secret is explicated by God in the place where he made the law: it was first a direct design to introduce mercy into the world, by taking care even of beasts: and secondly it was an outerguard against the crime of homicide: and Irenæus, Tertullian, S. Cyprian and S. Ambrose expound the meaning of the whole affair to be nothing else but a prohibition of homicide: for as God would have men be gentle to beasts[a], so if beasts did kill a man, it should be exacted of them[b]: neither the mans dominion over the beast could warrant his cruelty over them, nor the want of reason in beasts bring immunity if they kill'd a man, and the consequent and purpose of both these is express'd, vers. 6. whoso sheddeth mans bloud, by man shall his bloud be shed; and all this put together is a demonstration how dear lives are to God; even the life of beasts is in one sense sacred: for even then when they were given to Man for food, yet the life was not; they must first be dead before they might be eaten: but therefore the life of Man was sacred in all senses, and should be required of man and beast. But that God doth even take care for Oxen, in the matter of life, appears in this prohibition, flesh with the life thereof ye shall not eat; that is, you shall not devour the flesh even while it is alive; for the bloud is the life thereof; that is, when the bloud is gone you may eat, till then it is presumed to be alive. Now there can be no other meaning of the reason: for if blood were here directly prohibited to be taken and drunk or eaten, this reason could not have concluded it, [because it is the life, therefore you may not eat it] being no better an argument then this; you may not eat the heart of a beast, for it is the life thereof; but the other meaning is proper, ye shall not eat flesh with the bloud which is the life thereof, that is, so long as the bloud runs, so long ye must not eat; for so long it is alive: and a beast may be killed but not devour'd alive. So that the prohibition of bloud is not direct in the precept, but accidental, blood is forbidden as it is the sign of life and the vehiculum of the Spirits, the instruments of life; and so long as it runs so long the life abides ordinarily; and therefore Zonaras in his notes upon the Councel of Gangra expounds the word αἷμα or bloud suppos'd in that Canon as unlawful to be eaten or drunk, by ἐξεπίτηδες ἑψόμενον, καὶ πνικτόν, blood diligently or faſt running or following the wound, and thick; that is, as I ſuppoſe, blood digeſted, to diſtinguiſh it from ſerum ſanguinis or the watry bloud that is ſeen in beaſts after they have bled, that they might not have ſcruple in minutes and little ſuperſtitions: χωρὶς ζωτικοῦ αἵματος, without active blood, ſo Balſamo: and it is not impertinent to the main inquiry that it be obſerved that the Jews uſe [life] inſtead of bloud, and ſo does the Vulgar Latin, that we might the eaſier underſtand the meaning to be of life, or living bloud. But then this is nothing to eating the bloud when the beaſt is certainly dead: and therefore it is obſervable that they who did make a ſcruple of eating bloud did not all of them make a ſcruple of eating things ſtrangled in which the bloud remained: and therefore in ſome copies of the Apoſtolical decree mention'd Acts 15. the word πνικτὸν or ſtrangled is left out; and S. Auſtin obſerves that in his time in Africa the Chriſtians did not ſeverely abſtain from things ſtrangled. For if the caſe were the ſame between bloud running and bloud ſetled and dead, then the reaſon of the Commandement were nothing or not intelligible; and beſides it would breed eternal ſcruples: ſince in the very killing of beaſts there will ſome bloud remain, and in the neck pieces and ſome veins every body hath obſerved ſome bloud remaining even after the effuſion by the knife. 4. This could not be a law of Nature, becauſe not mention'd by Chriſt in all his law, which I have already prov'd to be a perfect Digeſt of the Natural law: onely that ſenſe of it which I have now given, is involv'd in a law of Nature, and conſequently enjoined by Chriſt, viz. under the precepts of mercy, according to that ſaying of the wiſe man, a good man will be merciful to his beaſt: and the Athenians put a boy to death becauſe he took delight to prick out the eies of birds and ſo let them flie for his paſtime, as ſuppoſing that he who exerciſed his cruelty upon birds being a boy, would in time deſtroy men too. 5. Upon the account of this interpretation we are to diſtinguiſh the material part from the formal; the bloud as it is ſuch a ſubſtance from the bloud as it is alive: juſt as the εἰδωλόθυτα are to be differenc'd: for to eat the meat when it is ſold in the ſhambles is a thing indifferent, ſaid S. Paul, though it was offered to idols; but this very meat might not be eaten in the Temples, nor any where under that formality, as S. Paul there diſcourſes: and therefore what the Apoſtles in their letter to the Churches call εἰδωλόθυτα, S. James in the deciſion of the queſtion calls ἀλισγήματα τῶν εἰδώλων pollutions of idols that is, all communications in their idolatrous portions and ſervices, and ſo it is for bloud, abſtain from life bloud, or bloud that runs while the beaſt is dying, that is, devour not the fleſh while the beaſt is alive, be not cruel and unmerciful to your beaſt: but if blood be taken in its own materiality when the beaſt is dead, it may be eaten as other things, without ſcruple: they being both in the ſame ſenſe as in the ſame obligation

There is a letter and a ſpirit in both of them. 6. One thing only I ſhall adde to make this appear to have been relative, temporal and ceremonial; and that is, that when God was pleas'd to continue the command to the ſons of Iſrael in Moſes law, he changed the reaſon, onely reciting the old reaſon for which it was impoſed to the poſterity of Noah, and ſuperadding a new one as relating to themſelves: For the life of the fleſh is in the bloud, and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your ſoules; for it is the bloud that maketh an atonement for the Soule. So that to the bloud there was superadded a new sacredness and religion, it was typical of the great sacrifice upon the Cross, the bloud of which was an holy thing, and it was also instrumental to their sacrifices and solennities of their present religion: and therefore this ritual is to cease after that the great sacrifice is offer'd and the great effusion of bloud is past. But as they had a new reason, so also had they a new injunction, and they were interdicted the eating of any thing strangled; which they taking to be a pursuance of the precept given to Noah, were the more zealous of it; and lest their zeal might be offended, the first Christians in their societies thought fit to abstain from it. But this ever had a less obligation then the former, and neither of them had in their letter any Natural obligation: but the latter was introduc'd wholly upon the Levitical account: and therefore did cease with it. 7. After this so plain and certain commentary upon this precept I shall the less need to make use of those other true observations made by other learned persons: as that this Canon was made for a temporary compliance of the Gentile Proselytes with the Jewish converts, that this was not a command to abstain from bloud, or strangled, but a declaration onely that they were not obliged to circumcision; but they already having observed the other things, it was declared they need go no further: that whereas these things were said to be necessary ἐπαναγκες, the meaning of the word is not absolute but relative; for it is ἐπ' ἀναγκης ἔχειν, to have a thing under some necessary condition, and so it happened to them to whom the Apostles wrote; for they were Gentile Proselytes before they were Christians, and so were tyed to observe the seven precepts of Noah, before the Jewes would converse with them, and therefore that this did not concerne the Gentiles after they were an intire Church: for although it did while the separation lasted, and that there were two Bishops in some great Churches as in Rome and Ephesus: yet when the Church was of Gentiles onely, or conversed not with Jewes, this could not relate to them. That bloud should be forbidden in the formality of meat is infinitely against the Analogy of the Gospel: The decretory and dogmatical words of Christ being, that nothing which enters into the mouth defiles a man: and the words of S. Paul are permissive and preceptive, Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, eat, asking no question for Conscience sake. For meat commendeth us not to God; for neither if we eat are we the better, neither if we eat not are we the worse: and the Kingdome of God consisteth not in meat and drink, but in righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. The result is this, that bloud as it is a meat cannot be suppos'd here to be directly forbidden as Naturally unlawful, or essentially evil, or of a proper turpitude: but if the Apostles had forbidden the very eating of bloud as meat, it must be supposed to be a temporary and relative command which might expire by the ceasing of the reason, and did expire by desuetude; but since it was not so, but a permitting the Gentile Proselytes and incouraging them for present reasons to abstain from running or life bloud in the sense above explicated, according to the sense of the Jewish Doctors and their Disciples, it no way can oblige Christians to abstain from bloud when it is dead, and alter'd, and not relative to that evil which was intended to be forbidden by God to Noah, and was afterwards continued to the Jewes. I end this with the words of Tertullian, Claves macelli tibi tradidit, permittens ejus omnia ad constituendam idolothytorum exceptionem. God hath given to us the keyes of the shambles, onely he hath forbidden the pollution of idols: in all other things you have your liberty of eating.

Math. 15. 1 Cor. 10. 25. Rom. 14. 17. De jejuniis.

8. I am onely now to give an account of the reasons of the Ancient Churches, ches, why ſo pertinaciouſly and ſo long they refus'd to eat boyl'd bloud, or any thing of that Nature, But for that it is the leſs wonder when we conſider that they found it injoyned by all the Churches where the Jewes were mingled, and the neceſſity laſted in ſome places till the Apoſtles were dead, and the Churches were perſecuted: and then men uſe to be zealous in little things, and curious obſervers of letters; and when the ſucceeding ages had found the precedents of Martyrs zealous in that inſtance, it is no wonder if they thought the Article ſufficiently recommended to them. 2. But if we liſt to obſerve that the Pythagorean Philoſophers were then very buſy and intereſted in the perſuaſions of Men and Sects, and Pythagoras and Plato and Socrates had great Names amongſt the leading Chriſtians, it is no wonder if in the percolation ſomething of the reliſh ſhould remain, eſpecially having a warrant ſo plauſible to perſuade, and ſo eaſy to miſtake as this decretal of the Apoſtles, and the example of the Ancients living in that time which the Heathens called the Golden age, Nam vetus illa ætas non polluit ora cruore. Metam. l. 15.

Single life, and abſtinence from certain meats, and refuſing of bloud, and ſeverity of Diſcipline, and daies of abſtinence were ſometimes perſuaded, ſometimes promoted, ſometimes urg'd, ſometimes made more neceſſary, by the Montaniſts, the Eſſens, the Manichees, the Novatians, the Encratites, the Pythagoreans, and the very Heathen themſelves, when becauſe they would pretend ſeverity it became fit that the Chriſtians ſhould not be or ſeem inferior to them in ſelfdenial, Diſcipline and auſterities. But I ſhall make no more conjectures in this matter, ſince if the Church at that time did injoyn it, the Canon was to be obeyed, and it may be in ſome places it was practis'd upon that ſtock; upon any other juſt ground, it could not, as I have already prov'd. Onely this; it cannot be denied but in the Weſterne Church where this decree and the conſequent Cuſtome was quickly worne out, though it laſted longer even to this day in the Greek Church, and Balſamo inveighs againſt the Latines for their careleſneſs in this Article; yet there were ſome intervals in which by chance this decree did prevail; but it was when the Biſhops of Rome were ſo ignorant that they could not diſtinguiſh the Old Teſtament from the New, but in ſome particulars did Judaize. I inſtance in Pope Zechary before mention'd; who in his decretal to Boniface the Arch-Biſhop of Mentz is very curious to warne him to forbid all Chriſtians with whom he had to doe, they ſhould abſtain from ſome certain ſorts of birds, as jack-dawes, crowes and ſtorks; but eſpecially that Chriſtians ſhould eat no hares, nor bevers, nor wild-horſes: and the Councel of Wormes determin'd ſomething to the like purpoſe, not much wiſer; but what was decreed then was long before reprov'd by S. Auſtin, affirming that if any Chriſtian made a ſcruple of eating ſtrangled birds in whom the bloud remain'd, he was derided by the reſt: and that this thing which was uſeful in the infancy of the Church ſhould be obtruded upon her in her ſtrength, is as if we ſhould perſuade ſtrong men to live upon milk becauſe their tender Mothers gave it them as the beſt nouriſhment of their infancy. Lib. 32. c. 13. cont. Fauſtum Manich.

5. This thing being cleared I know no other difficulty concerning the choice of meats in particular, or the retention of the Ceremonial law in general, or in any of its inſtances, but what will more properly be handled under other titles.

RULE

Rule 3.

The Judicial law of Moſes is annul'd, or abrogated, and retains no obliging power either in whole or in part over any Chriſtian Prince, Commonwealth, or Perſon.

1. Either the Judicial was wholly civil, or it was part of the Religion. If it was wholly ſecular and civil, it goes away with that Commonwealth to whom it was given; if it was part of the religion it goes away with the Temple, with the lawgivers authority by ceſſion to the greater, with the prieſthood, with the Covenant of works, with the revelation and reign of the Meſſias: and though the inſtances of this law proceeding from the wiſeſt Lawgiver are good guides to Princes and Common-wealths where the ſame reaſons are applicable in like circumſtances of things and in equal capacities of the Subjects, yet it is wholly without obligation. In the Judicial law theft was not puniſhed with death, but with the reſtitution of four-fold; and unleſs the neceſſities of a Republick ſhall inforce it, it were conſonant to the deſign of Chriſtian religion, the intereſt of Souls, their value, and pity, that a life ſhould not be ſet in ballance over againſt a ſheep or a cup. In the Judicial law of Moſes Adultery was puniſhed with death; but it will not be prudent for a Common wealth to write after this Copy unleſs they have as great reaſon and the ſame neceſſity, and the ſame effect be likely to be conſequent; it was highly fitting there, where it was ſo neceſſary to preſerve the Genealogies, and where every family had honours and inheritances and expectations of its own, and one whole tribe expected in each houſe the revelation of the Meſſias, and where the crime of Adultery was infinitely more inexcuſable by the permiſſion of divorces and Polygamy then it can with us. But with us and ſo in every Nation, many conſiderations ought to be ingredient into the conſtitution of a capital Law: but they have their liberty, and are onely tied up with the rules and analogies of the Chriſtian law: onely the judicial law of Moſes is not to be pretended as an example and rule to us becauſe it came from a Divine principle; unleſs every thing elſe fit it by which the proportions were made in that Common-wealth; for although God made Aprons for Adam and Eve, it would not be a comely faſhion for the Gallants of our age and Countries. But concerning this who deſires to ſee long and full diſcourſes, I refer him to Guilielmus Zepperus de legibus Moſaicis, and the Preface of Calvin the Lawyer to his Themis Hebræo-Romana.

2. But the thing in general is confeſs'd, and the arguments now alledged make it certain: but then why it ſhould not be ſo in every particular when it is confeſſed to be ſo in the General, I doe not underſtand; ſince there are no exceptions or reſervations of any particular in the New law; the law of Chriſtianity. But in two great inſtances this Article hath difficulty; the one is 1. The approach of a man to his wife during her uſual terme of ſeparation. 2. The other is concerning the degrees of kinred hindring marriage; both which being taken expreſs care of in the Judicial law, and yet nothing at all ſaid of them in the laws of Chriſt, are yet ſuppos'd to be as obligatory to Chriſtians now, as to the Jewes of old. Of theſe I ſhall now give account becauſe they are of great uſe in the Rule of Conſcience, and with much unquietneſs and noiſe talk'd of, and Conſciences afflicted with prejudices and authority, with great names and little reaſons.

Queſt.

3. WHether the Judicial law of mutual abſtinence in the dayes of Womens ſeparation obliges Chriſtian pairs?

4. The Judicial law declar'd it to be twice pœnal. Once it onely inferr'd a legal Uncleanneſs for ſeven days. Levit. 15. 24. But in the 20. Levit. 18. It is made Capital to them both; they ſhall be both cut off from the people.

5. From hence, Aquinas, Alexander of Ales, Bonaventure, and Scotus affirme it to be a mortal ſin for a husband then to approach to her: Paludanus and Cajetan deny it; and amongſt the Caſuiſts it is with great difference affirmd or denyed but with very trifling pretences, as if they were to give laws, and not to informe Conſciences upon juſt grounds of reaſon or religion.

6. They who ſuppoſe it to be unlawful affirme this law to be ceremonial, judicial and Moral. It is ceremonial becauſe it inferr'd a legal impurity; or ſeparation for ſeven days. It is judicial by its appendant ſentence of death, and a Capital infliction. It is moral, becauſe it is againſt charity as being hurtful to the child in caſe any be begotten by ſuch approaches. The whole ceremoniality of it is confeſſedly gone; but the puniſhment of it in the Judicial law being capital they urge it as an argument that it is moral. So that the whole weight lies upon this. That which was by the law of God puniſh'd with death, was more then a meer ceremony, and muſt contain in it ſome Natural obliquity and turpitude. And in this caſe we need not to go far in our inquiry after it; for it is becauſe of the great uncharitableneſs, as being a cauſe of monſtrous productions, or leproſies and filthy diſeaſes in the children: and as the former of theſe two ſignifies its morality; ſo this does formally conſtitute it: and this is confirmed by the words annexed to the prohibition: For the nations committed all theſe things, therefore I abhorred them: amongſt which, this in the queſtion being enumerated, it will follow more then probably, that ſince this thing was imputed to the Heathens who were not under Moſes law, it muſt be imputed becauſe it was a violation of the law of Nature. Levit. 20. 23.

7. To theſe things I anſwer; 1. That the puniſhment of all ſuch approaches under Moſes law with death, was no argument of any Natural turpitude and obliquity in the approach. For then circumciſion would be neceſſary by a Natural law, becauſe every ſoul that was not circumcis'd was alſo to be cut off from his people. But if for this reaſon it were onely to be concluded unlawful, then ſince this reaſon is taken away, and it is by no law of God puniſhable, nor yet by any law of man, it follows that now it cannot be called a Mortal or a Great ſin, to which no mortal puniſhment is annexed nor indeed any at all.

8. 2. But neither was it juſt thus in the law of Moſes. For by the law of Moſes it was nothing but a legal impurity, a ſeparation from the Temple and publike ſacrifices and ſome ſorts of commerce for ſeven dayes; and thus much was alſo impos'd upon the woman though ſhe was lock'd up and convers'd with no man even for her Natural accident: and if by the gravity or levity of a puniſhment we may make conjectures of the greatneſs of a ſin (of which I ſhall in the third book give accounts) then it would follow that every such approach was nothing but a breach of a legal rite or ceremony, since it was punished onely with a legal separation, which also was equally upon every innocent woman in that period. * Yea, but besides this it was made Capital. I answer, that could not be, if the case were the same; for two punishments are not in laws inflicted upon the same offence, directly and primarily: and therefore Radulphus Flaviacensis supposes here to be a direct contradiction in the letter of these two laws; and that they are to be reconcil'd by spiritual significations in which onely they are obligatory to us under the Gospel; but I doe not very well understand what he would have, nor any ground of his conjecture, but am content it is not material, since he confesses that the very letter oblig'd the Israelites, which how it is possible, and yet be contradictory, I shall never understand. * Hugo Cardinalis saies that the first of these punishments was on him who did it ignorantly; but it was Capital onely to him who did it knowingly and voluntarily. But this is not probable; for then it would be in effect so that the man might only contract a legal impurity; and the woman be sure to die for it:

Cip. 6. explan in Levit.

Enimvero durâ lege hîc agunt mulieres:

for although the man could often say truly, and might always pretend that he did it ignorantly, yet the woman could not: for it is not likely that she should with much probability at any time say she did it ignorantly, and since it cannot be but by a rare contingency, it is not likely to be the subject matter of a regular law, and provided for by a daily and perpetual provision; especially, since that case is already provided for in other periods, as being sufficiently included under them that by chance touch a woman so polluted: and therefore this does not reconcile the difficulty: but since it must be confess'd that on the woman (at least ordinarily) both these laws must have effect, and yet the woman cannot easily and ordinarily be suppos'd to be ignorant in such a case so as to need a law (for laws use not to be made for rare contingencies) it follows that this distinction is not sufficient to reconcile the difficulty. But Lyra and Abulensis have a better, saying that the legal impurity was the punishment onely when the fact was private: but it was Capital when it was brought before the Judge: and truly for this there was great reason. For since the woman also was to die, it is not to be supposed that she would accuse her Husband and condemn her self, and such things use not to be done publikely; it is therefore to be supposed that who ever did doe this so as to be delated for it and convicted must doe it ἐν χειρὶ ὑπερηφανίας with the hand of pride, in contempt and despight of Moses law; for which as S. Paul witnesses, a man was to die without mercy. * But now from hence I infer, that since the contempt and open despight of the law onely was Capital, it was not any natural turpitude that deserv'd that calamity; it was nothing but a legal uncleanness, which every child had that did but touch her finger.

9. But then for the next argument with which the greatest noise is made, and every little Philosopher can with the strength of it put laws upon others and restraints upon mens freed Consciences; I answer first upon supposition that it were true and real, yet it does not prove the unlawfulness of such addresses. For if the man and woman have a right to each other respectively, there is no injury done by using their own right. Nemo damnum facit, nisi qui id facit quod facere jus non habet, saith the law. But that is not the present case, for the married pair use but their own rights which God hath indulg'd. And therefore Paulus the Lawyer from the sentence of Labeo hath defin'd, that no man can be be hindred from diverting the water running through his own grounds, and ſpending it there, though it be apparent that his Neighbour receives detriment to whom that water would have deſcended. I know this may be altered by laws Cuſtomes and Covenants, but there is no eſſential injuſtice in it, if loſs comes to another by my uſing my own right. To which I onely adde this one thing, becauſe I am not determining a Title of law in open court, but writing Rules of Conſcience: that though every ſuch interception of water, or other uſing of our right to our Neighbours wrong be not properly injuſtice, yet unleſs he have juſt cauſe to uſe it, it is unlawful to doe ſo, becauſe it is Uncharitable; becauſe then he does it with a purpoſe to doe his Neighbour injury. And ſo it is in this caſe; If any man or woman in ſuch approaches intend hurt to the child, as hoping the child might not live, or if either of them deſign'd that the child ſhould by ſuch means become hated, or neglected in proviſions, and another preferred, then I doubt not but to pronounce all ſuch mixtures impious and abominable: and to this ſenſe thoſe words of S. Auſtin in this article are to be expounded: Per talem legem in Levitico poſitam non Naturam damnari, ſed concipiendæ prolis noxiam prohiberi. The thing it ſelf is not Naturally impure; but it is forbidden that hurt ſhould be intended or procur'd to the child: for although in the inſtance of Paulus, above reckon'd the injury is certain, and the perſon deſinite and known to whom it is done, and in the preſent queſtion both the event at the worſt is but uncertain, and the perſon to be injur'd not yet in being, and therefore the caſe is much more favourable here then there, yet when this caſe does happen, there can be no excuſe for it, becauſe it is the act of an evil mind, and an uncharitable Spirit. Qu. 64. ſuper Levit.

10. 2. Upon ſuppoſition that this allegation were true, yet it follows not that all ſuch approaches were unlawful: as appears in the caſe of a leprous wife with whom that it is lawful to have congreſs is ſo certain that it is told as an heroick ſtory of Dominicus Cataluſius a Prince of Lesbos that he did uſually converſe with his wife that was a leper, as ſtill knowing it to be his own fleſh, which no man hates: but if with a Leper (whoſe iſſue is as certain to be leprous, as in the other caſe to be any way diſeaſed) it be lawful, the effect notwithſtanding; then the argument ought not to infer a prohibition, or conclude it to be unlawful. The ſame alſo is the caſe of both men and women in all hæreditary diſeaſes, and in any diſeaſes which are reſident in any principal part with any of which if either of them be infected, it is (if this reaſon be good) equally unlawful for them to beget children, or to uſe the remedy which God hath given them againſt uncleanneſs.

11. If it be anſwered that there is difference in the caſe, becauſe the preſent queſtion being of ſhort, frequent and periodical ſeparations, the married perſons may expect Natures leaſure who will in a ſhort time return them to their uſual liberties: but if they have a leproſie, that goes not off, but abides: and therefore either a child muſt be gotten with that danger, or not at all; and ſince it is better for a child to be born a leper, or ſubject to leproſie then not to be at all; in this caſe there is indeed charity in ſome ſenſe, but no uncharitableneſs in any to the child; and there is a neceſſity alſo on the parents part. The ſame alſo is the caſe of a conſumption, or any hæreditary diſeaſe: but in the monethly ſeparations there is no ſuch need; becauſe the abſtinence is but ſhort, and though a child be not then begotten, he loſes not his being, as in the other caſes.

12. To this I reply; that the difference of case pretended is not sufficient, 1. because, a consumption or a leprosie are no such incurable diseases but that for the preventing of Uncharitableness, and sad effects upon the child, they may expect Natures time; and if it be said, that there is, or may be danger of fornication in so long abstinence; I answer, so there may be in the shorter, and is certainly to some persons; and if the danger be an excuse and can legitimate the congression even where there is hazard to have a diseased child begotten, in one case, then so it is in the other. For where there is the same cause in the same suscipient, there also will be the same effect: so that at least thus much will be gotten; that if there be a need, in the time of a short separation, then it is lawful; and if it can upon this account be innocent, it is certain that it is not naturally criminal. 2. Suppose even this affection or accident abides on the wife, as on the woman in the Gospel who after twelve years sufferance was cured hy the touch of our Saviours garment; then there is the same necessity as in an abiding leprosy, consumption, or hereditary disease, and yet in the Mosaick law those permanent emanations were to be observed by abstinence as much as the Natural and transient; by which it is certainly proclaimed to be wholly a legal rite; because if this can abide, and during its abode an approach be not permitted, although the Jewes were releeved by divorces and Polygamie, and concubinate, and so might suffer the law; yet Christians who are bound to an individual bed, will find a necessity, which if it were not provided for by a Natural permission, the case of some men would be intolerable and oftentimes sin be unavoidable, and that which by accident may be lawful and necessary, certainly is not essentially evil: for if it could, then he who is the Author of such necessity, would also necessarily inferre that evil, and so be Author of that too, which is impossible to be true of God, the fountain of Eternal goodness. But I adde also this consideration; that even in the Mosaick law such congressions were permitted after child-birth. For the legal impurity lasted but seven days upon the birth of a Man-child [according to the dayes of the separation for her infirmity shall she be Unclean] that is, for seven days she shall have the same law upon her as in her usual period, but no longer: for that which is added [Levit. 12. 4.] that she shall then continue in the bloud of her purifying three and thirty dayes; it is not for abstinence from her husband, but from entring into the Tabernacle, and from touching holy things: so that the uncleanness being determin'd five weeks before her purification was complete, must be in order to contact or to nothing.

13. But although upon supposition the allegation were true, yet the reason of it concludes not, yea the argument is infinitely the worse, since the supposition is false, and the Allegation is not true. For besides that the popular hæresies of Physick and Philosophy are now rarely confuted and reprov'd by the wise Physicians of these later ages, who have improved their faculty as much as any of the Schools of learning have done theirs, and the old sayings of Philosophers in this matter are found to be weak, and at the best but uncertain; the great experience of the world is an infinite reproof to them who say that by such congressions leprous or monstrous children are produced: for the world would have been long since very full of them if such evil effects were naturally consequent to those meetings. S. Hierome was the first who brought this pretension into the Christian Schools; (so far as I can learn;) afterwards the School-men got it by the end, and the affirmative hath pass'd ever since almost without examination. But the Schoolmen generally affirme (being taught to speak so by Aquinas) that it is partly ceremonial, partly moral, and that in this onely it is obligatory, ex damno quod ſequitur ex prole; which becauſe it hath no ground to ſupport it muſt fall into the common lot of fancies and errors when their weakneſs is diſcover'd. For although thoſe Phyſicians which ſay that this natural emanation is a καθαρσις or cleanſing, doe beleeve that with the principles of generation there may in ſuch times be ſomething minus ſalubre intermingled; yet beſides that theſe are oppos'd by all them who ſay it is nothing but a κένωσις or evacuation; both the one and the other are found to be imperfect, by the newobſervations and experiments made by a learned Man who finds that neither one or other can be the material part of Natures ſecret fabrick. But however, whether he ſays true or no, ſince things are ſo infinitely uncertain, and man is made ſecretly and faſhioned in ſecreto terræ, theſe uncertain diſputes are but a weak foundation of a pretence for a moral duty.

14. To the laſt objection: That God abhorred the Nation for [all theſe things] and amongſt them this is reckoned; and therefore there was in this ſome Natural impurity, for by no other law were they bound, and they could not be found to be tranſgreſſors againſt any other: I anſwer; that [all theſe things] are to be taken Concretè & Confusè, all indiſcriminately in an heap, not all by ſingular diſtribution; as appears (beſides this in queſtion) by the inſtance of marriage in certain degrees; which the ſervants of God did uſe, and yet God delighted in them; for Abraham married his Fathers daughter, and yet this was reckoned amongſt their Catalogues of crimes, and ſo alſo in the caſe of the Brothers wife, which is there reckon'd, yet we know it was permitted and enjoined in the caſe of heireſſes being childleſs widdows: but when this thing was by God inſerted into the Digeſt of their laws and made Capital, it happened to be mingled with other prohibitions which were of things againſt the laws of Nature. But to this objection I ſhall ſpeak again in the queſtion of Coſin Germans num. 36. and 37. of this Rule. Lev. 20. 17. 21.

15. The arguments now appearing to be invalid, I anſwer to the queſtion 1. That this abſtinence was a Moſaick law, partly ceremonial, partly judicial, but in no degree Moral. 2. That the abrogation of Moſes law does inferre the nullifying of this, and hath broken the band in pieces. 3. That the band which tyed this law upon the Jewes was fear of death and fear of a legal impurity: which fears being baniſhed, and no new one introduc'd by our Lawgiver, we are not under reſtraint: and if we will be careful to obſerve all that is commanded us in Chriſts law, it will be work enough, though we bind not on mens ſhoulders unneceſſary burdens. 4. It is a part of the ſpirit of bondage to be ſubject to ordinances; but God will now be ſerved by a more ſpiritual Religion, and to abſtain as in the preſent inſtance and to think it is a part of Gods ſervice, is ſuperſtition; it is to worſhip him with an inſtance that he hath not choſen, or commended: and therefore it is remarkable that when S. Paul gave order to married paires, μὴ ἀποστερεῖτε ἀλλήλους, Defraud not one another; he onely gives this exception, except it be by conſent for a time, that ye may give your ſelves to faſting and prayer; and come together again, that Sathan tempt you not, διὰ τὴν ἀκρασίαν ὑμῶν, for your want of power and command over your deſires and neceſſities. Abſtinence in order to ſpecial religion is allowed and commended, and that by conſent, and that but for a ſudden occaſion, and that ſo ſhort, that it may not become an occaſion of Satans temptations: whatſoever is over and beſides this may be upon the account of Moſes, but not of Chriſt and Chriſtianity. 5. I ſpeak this onely to take off a ſnare 1 Cor. 7.

from mens Consciences, laid for the unwary by unskilful Masters of Assemblies so that all I say of it, is, that it may be done lawfully. 6. But that which does onely recommend it, is, where there is necessity that it be done. 7. It is sufficient though the necessity be not absolute, if it be onely ordinary and probable: for if this were not so, instead of allaying stormes and appeasing Scruples and breaking Snares, they would be increased and multiplied: for it will be a hard thing in most cases of that Nature to say that the necessity is absolute. 8. But since there is in such congressions a Natural abhorrency amongst most persons, and a Natural impurity; if that which invites to it, be not at lest a probable necessity, it must be a great undecency and violence of a wanton Spirit. 9. It must alwaies be without scandal and reproach. For even among the Jews it was onely a legal impurity if done without scandal, but if with contumacy and owning of it, it came to outface the modesty and authority of the law, then it became deadly: and so it may now if that which is not of good report, be done and offered to the report of all them which can condemne the folly and impurity, but cannot judge of the necessity or the cause; and the fact by becoming scandalous is criminal, as much as when it is done without a probable necessity, and onely upon lustful consideration.

16. Some in their answers to this inquiry, make a distinction of the persons; affirming it in this case to be unlawful to ask, but lawful to pay a duty if it be demanded. But if it be Naturally unlawful it is then inexcusable in both: For neither must the one tempt to an unlawful act, nor the other consent to it: and there can be no obligation to pay that debt which no man can lawfully demand. Neither of them hath a right against Gods law; and therefore the case is equal in them both. He or she that complies does actually promote the sin, as well as the other that invites and therefore in Moses law they were equally criminal and punished with death. * But if it be not Naturally unlawful (as it appears it is not) then it may as well be demanded, as yeelded to; when there is a probable necessity; but concerning that, the passive party is to beleeve the other; for if it be known to be otherwise, he or she that consents, does consent to an act which is made unlawful by evil circumstances.

Of the prohibition of marriage in certain degrees.

17. But the next inquiry concerning an instance in the Judicial law is yet of greater concernment; For all those degrees, in which Moses law hath forbidden marriages, are supposed by very many now adayes that they are still to be observed with the same distance and sacredness, affirming because it was a law of God with the appendage of severe penalties to the transgressors it does still oblige us Christians. This question was strangely tos'd up and down upon the occasion of Henry the eighth's divorce from Queen Katherine the relict of his brother Prince Arthur; and according as the interest of Princes uses to doe, it very much imployed and divided the pens of learned men; who upon that occasion gave too great testimony with how great weaknesses men that have a Biasse doe determine questions, and with how great a force a King that is rich and powerful can make his own determinations. For though Christendome was then much divided, yet before then there was almost a general consent upon this proposition, that the Levitical degrees doe not by any law of God bind Christians to their observation. I know but of one Schoolman that diſſents; I mean Paludanus; or if there be any more I am ſure they are but very few,

but the other opinion

Defendit numerus, junctaq; Umbone Phalanges.

But abſtracting from all intereſts, and relative conſiderations, I ſhall give as full accounts of this as I can, becauſe the queſtions of degrees and the matters and caſes of inceſt are not ſo perfectly ſtated as the greatneſs of the matter and the neceſſities of the world require; and beſides this, it is at this day a great queſtion amongſt all men, Whether Brothers and Siſters children, or Coſen Germans may lawfully marry? which queſtion ſuppoſes that not onely the Levitical degrees are ſtill thought obligatory, but even all thoſe other degrees which by a parity of reaſon can be reduc'd to thoſe meaſures. I ſhall therefore give an account of the ſentence of all laws in this great queſtion, which can be ſuppos'd to oblige us.

Of Parents and Children.

18. Concerning this, I ſuppoſe it to be evident that Nature hath been as free in her liberties, as in her gifts,, open-handed enough to all; ſave onely that ſhe hath forbidden Parents and children, Higher and lower in the direct line for ever to marry. Juſt as Rivers cannot return to their fountains, nor Evenings back again to their own mornings from whence they ſet out, nor yeſterday be recalled and begin again to morrow. The Courſe and order of Nature is againſt it; and for a child to marry the parent is for to day to marry yeſterday, a going back in Nature.

——illum, illum ſacris adhibete nefaſtis
——qui ſemet in ortus
Vertit, & indignæ regerit ſua pignora Matri.

Papin. ſtat. Thebaid. 4.

19. To which may be added this other ſufficient Natural reaſon. That if a Son marries his Mother, ſhe who is in Authority greater by right of geniture, becomes minor in Matrimonio leſs upon the ſame material account upon which ſhe became greater; and the duty and reverence of a Mother cannot be paid to her by him who is her Husband: which I find well intimated by Phædra to Hippolitus, Matris ſuperbum eſt Nomen, & potens nimis.

It is a contradiction of rights that the ſame perſon ſhould be the ſuperior Mother, and the inferior wife: whith hath alſo ſome proportion between a Father and a Daughter, as being undecent that ſhe from him ſhould claim the rights of a wife, to whom ſhe owes the duty of a Father.

20. Beſides theſe, there is a Natural abhorrency of ſuch mixtures: Contra pudorem eſſe ſaid Paulus the Lawyer; it is againſt Natural modeſty: which was rarely verified in the tryal which the Emperor Claudius made (wittily and judiciouſly, like that of Solomon upon the two harlots) upon a wicked woman who called him (who indeed was her ſon) a ſtranger, a begger, the ſon of another woman, and ſuppoſititious, that ſo ſhe might defeat him of his Fathers inheritance. The Emperor eſpying her Malice, and ſuſpecting her machination found out this tryal: If he be not your ſon, yet becauſe he is young and handſome, rich and poſſeſs'd of the inheritance, the title of which you would ſnatch from him, you ſhall marry him, and ſo poſſeſs him and the inheritance too. She though desperately base, refus'd that offer, and though she was unnaturally malicious, yet would not be unnaturally incestuous; and chose to suffer the shame of discovery rather then the horrors of such a mixture.

21. But all this was not sufficient to make it to become a Natural law, without the authority of God intervening. This made it to be excellently reasonable to be established into a law, and therefore God did so, and declar'd it, and did not trust mans reason alone with the conduct of it: but then it became an Eternal law when God made it so: and that was at the very first bringing of a wife to Adam. For this cause shall a man leave his father and his Mother, (said God by his servant Moses declaring to us what God then made to be a law) and shall cleave unto his wife, and they shall be one flesh. This could not on both sides concerne Adam, who had no Natural Father and Mother, and therefore was a law given to all that should be born from him; when they took a wife or husband respectively, they must forsake Father and Mother, for between them and their children there could be no such intercourse intervening: and so the Jewes particularly Rabbi Selomoh expounds the place, and it was necessary this should then be declared, for as yet the marriage of Brother and Sister was not forbidden saith the Gemara Sanhedrin; and in obedience to this because Adam had no other, he laid aside the love of Earth and Rain, of which he was produc'd, said Isaac Abravanel: and by this, they usually reconcile the seeming difference between these words and the fifth commandement. A man shall leave his Father and Mother: and yet, he must honour his Father and Mother: he must never leave to honour them; but when he intends to marry, he must forsake all thoughts of contracting with either of them. Now the Mother and the wife being the opposite termes in the progression, he must leave one, and adhere or be united to the other, it must needs be that dereliction or forsaking, or going from the Mother, not relating to Honour but to the Marriage, means that the child must abstain and depart from all thoughts of such conjunction. A mother is not less to be lov'd, less to be honour'd after marriage then before; and therefore in no sense relating to this is she to be forsaken, therefore it must be in the other: and this, our Blessed Saviour recorded also in his law, where whatsoever is not sufficiently found, cannot pretend to be a law of Nature; as I have already prov'd.

Matth. 19. 5.

22. And now this being established and recorded as a law of Nature in that way onely that is competent, the disagreeing sentences of some men, and the contrary practices of Nations is no argument against it. Indeed I said in the first Chapter, that the consent of Nations is not sufficient to establish a Natural law; for God onely makes the sanction, but when he hath made it and declar'd it, the disagreeing practices of great portions of the world cannot annul the establishment. It is not sufficient to prove it to be a Natural law because wise people consent to it; but if God have made it so, it is a Natural law though half the world dissents: and therefore we are not in this affair to be mov'd at all, if wise men should in any age affirme the marriages of Sons and Mothers to be lawful. * So Diogenes and Chrysippus affirm'd upon a ridiculous conceit that Cocks and Hens did not abhor it. Against which impertinent argument, although it were sufficient to oppose the Narrative which Aristotle makes of a Camel, and the Scythian horse who brake his own neck out of detestation of his own act to which he was couzen'd by his keeper; for yet it is better to ſet down this reaſonable propoſition; That a thing is againſt the law of Nature when (being forbidden by God) it is unnatural to Men, though it were not againſt the Nature of Beaſts. But as the authority of theſe Men is inconſiderable and their argument trifling, ſo alſo the diſagreeing practice of ſome Nations in this particular is wholly to be deſpiſed.

23. But the Original and cauſe of this horrible and unnatural cuſtome we can ſo reduce to its firſt principle that there can remain no ſuſpicion but that they did prevaricate the law of Nature. For when Nimrod had married his Mother Semiramis, and preſently introduc'd the Worſhip of Fire, making that to be the Aſſyrians and Perſians God, he was gratified by the Devil. For (as Saidus Batricides the Patriarch of Alexandria reports) the Devil out of the fire ſpake to his firſt Prieſt that none ſhould officiate in his rites, unleſs he would firſt lie with his Mother, his Siſter, and his daughter. And Sham the Prieſt (for that was the name of the Beaſt) did ſo, and ſo together with his Prince became an Authentick preſident to all generations of degenerous brutes: and was imitated by all that Empire.

Καὶ τῶν δ' ὧδ' ἐξείργε νόμος.

But what Xenophon ſaid of the Perſians is alſo true of all the Nations together, who were debauched by their laws and accurſed cuſtomes; Non eò minus jus eſſe quia à Perſis contemnebatur. It is ſtill the law of Nature though prevaricated by the Perſians and their ſubjects and friends. For when any thing appears to be ſo τοῖς πλείοσις, καὶ ἀδιαφθόροις, καὶ μετὰ φύσιν ἔχουσιν, to moſt and to the uncorrupted Nations and to them who live according to Natural reaſon it is a great preſumption it is indeed a Natural law; and is ſo finally if a command of God hath interven'd in that inſtance: for by the Divine appointment it is made a law, and by the matter, order and uſe of it, it is Natural. But for the reſt to whom theſe things ſeem'd otherwiſe then God and Nature did decree: they were abuſed by none but by their own luſts; they were as a puniſhment of their vileſt ſins given over εἰς πάθη ἀτιμίας, to unnatural, to diſhonourable, and unreaſonable deſire, Michael Ephe. in Ariſt. ἠθικ. Ad Nicomach.

——Cui fas implere Parentem

But this was the product of their idolatry and ſome other baſeneſſes: of the firſt S. Paul is witneſs, that as a conſequent of their forſaking the true God they were given over to Unnatural luſts: and Lucan obſerves the latter of the Parthians, Rom. 1. 21. &c.

Now what is the effect of ſuperinduc'd crimes and follies is moſt contrary to Nature, and it were unnatural to ſuſpect that ſhe had not made ſufficient proviſions in this prime caſe, upon pretence, becauſe ſome unnatural perſons have ſpoil'd and defac'd or neglected her laws. inſert:

inſert. I find Socrates noted by ſome that he ſaid there is in the marriage of of Parents and children nothing to be reprov'd but the diſparity of age. But this is a miſtake; for though he brought that incompetent reaſon againſt it, yet for other cauſes he abhorr'd it: accounting it to be a law eſtabliſhed by God and Nature μήτε γονέας παισὶ, &c. That Parents and children ſhould abhor ſuch marriages. For God and all the world, Heaven and earth doe ſo: inſomuch that a Roman Philoſopher was in his dream warned not to bury the corps of a Perſian who had married his Mother.

Of Brothers and Siſters.

24. 2. But though Nature forbids this, yet the other relations are forbidden upon other accounts. Nothing elſe is againſt the prime laws of Nature, but a conjunction in the right aſcending and deſcending line. The marriage of Brothers and Siſters was at firſt neceſſary; and ſo the world was peopled: all the world are ſons and daughters deſcending from the firſt marriages of Brother and Siſter. But concerning this that I may ſpeak clearly, let it be obſerved that although the world does generally condemn all ſuch and the like Marriages under the title of Inceſtuous, yet that is not properly expreſſed, and leaves us to ſeek for the juſt grounds of reproof to many ſorts of unlawful marriages, and ſome others are condemn'd by too great a cenſure. The word Inceſt is not a Scripture word, but wholly Heathen; and ſignfied amongſt them all unchaſt and forbidden marriages, ſuch which were not hallowed by law and honour; an inauſpicious conjunction ſine ceſto Veneris, in which their Goddeſs of Love was not Preſident; marriages made without her girdle, and ſo Ungirt, Unbleſs'd. This word being taken into the civil law got a ſignification to be appropriate to it; for there were three degrees of unlawful marriages. Damnatæ, Inceſtæ, and Nefariæ. Damnatæ nuptiæ are ſuch which the law forbids upon Political conſiderations; ſuch as are between the Tutour or Guardian and the Orphan or Pupil, between a Servant and his Miſtreſs, between a Freed-man and his Patroneſs, and ſuch was in the law of Moſes between the High prieſt and a Widow; and in Chriſtianity between a Prieſt and a Harlot, and between any man and her whom he defil'd by Adultery while her firſt huſband was alive, all Marriages with Virgins profeſſed and vowed. There is in theſe ſo much unreaſonableneſs of being permitted, that by the law they ſtood condemned, and had legal puniſhments and notes of infamy proportionable. * Inceſtæ nuptiæ are defin'd in the law to be coitio conſanguineorum vel affinium; the conjunction of Kinred or Allyes, meaning, in thoſe inſtances which are by law forbidden: and theſe are forbidden upon differing conſiderations from the former, viz. for their neerneſs of bloud and relation which the laws would have diſſeminated more or leſs: for their approach to unnatural marriages, for outward guards to the laws of Nature, for publike honeſty, and compliance with the cuſtomes of their Neighbours, of the ſame intereſt or the ſame religion, or for neceſſary entercourſe. But becauſe unskilful perſons ſons or unwary have called Unnatural mixtures by the name of inceſtuous, as inceſtuous Lot, and the inceſtuous Corinthian, thererefore whatever any law calls inceſt, they think they have reaſon to condemn equally to thoſe abominable conjunctions. But neither ought inceſt to be condemn'd with a hatred equal to what is due to theſe; neither ought theſe to be called inceſt: for in true ſpeaking theſe are not Inceſtæ nuptiæ, but Nefariæ, and Naturæ contrariæ, wicked or abominable, and contrary to Nature: for although the law ſometimes calls thoſe mixtures which are between Kinred by the title of Nefariæ, or Impious, yet it is to be underſtood onely of that Kinred which is by the law of God and Nature forbidden to marry: ſo the Gloſſe in authentic. de inceſt. nupt. affirmes, ſo Archidiaconus, Johannes Andreus, Covarruvias and the beſt Lawyers: and the word is derived from the uſage of it in the beſt Authors: Feræ quoque ipſæ veneris evitant Nefas; The conjunction of Parents and children is nefas veneris, and the marriages nefarious. Now of this deep tincture none are, excepting marriages in the right aſcending and deſcending line. The marriages of Brothers and Siſters is inceſtuous, and the worſt degree of it: and ſo forbidden by the laws of all civil Nations; but therefore they are unlawful onely becauſe forbidden by poſitive laws; but becauſe the prohibition is not at all in the laws of Chriſt, therefore it cannot be accounted againſt the prime law of Nature, of which that is a perfect Syſteme. Not that it can in any caſe of preſent concernment or poſſibility become lawful, or for any reaſon be diſpenſed withall by any power of man; for it is next to an unnatural mixture, it hath in it ſomething of confuſion, and blending the very firſt partings of Nature, it is of infinite vile report, intolerably ſcandalous, and univerſally forbidden. But though this be enough, yet this is all:

C. lex illa. §. inceſt. 36. q. 1. L. ſi adult. cum inceſt. in prin. D. de adult.

25. *Michael of Epheſus ſaies that at the firſt theſe marriages were indifferent, but made unlawful by a ſuperinduc'd prohibition. And indeed if they had been unnatural, they could not have been neceſſary. For it is not imaginable that God who could with the ſame facility have created a thouſand men and as many women, as one, would have built up mankind by that which is contrary to Humane Nature: and therefore we find that among the wiſeſt Nations ſome whom they eſteemed their braveſt men did this. Cimon the ſon of Miltiades married his Siſter Elpinice, non magis amore quàm patrio more ductus, ſaid Æmilius Probus, not onely led by love but by his Countries cuſtome. So Archetolis the ſon of the brave Themiſtocles married his ſiſter Mnaſiptolema. Alexander the ſon of Pyrrhus King of Epirus married his ſiſter Olympias, Mithridates married his ſiſter Laodice, Artemiſia was ſiſter and wife to Mauſolus King of Caria, ſo was Sophroſyna to Dionyſius of Syracuſe, Eurydice to Ptolemæus Philopater, Cleopatra to Ptolemæus Phyſcon, Arſinoe to Ptolemæus Philadelphus whom when Sotades had reprov'd upon that account ſaying, ἐκ εἰς ὀσίλυν τρυμαλιὰν τὸ πέσζον ὠθεῖς, he impriſon'd him. But I need not bring particular inſtances of Egyptians: for Diodorus Siculus affirmes that they all eſteem'd it lawful, and Dion Pruſæenſis ſaies that all the Barbarians did ſo.

well noted by the obſervator upon the Mythologies of Natalis Comes under the title of Jupiter. But that which moves me more then all this is the anſwer which Thamar gave to her Brother Amnon: Now therefore ſpeak unto the King, for ſurely he will not withhold me from thee, and yet ſhe was his Fathers daughter, his ſiſter by the Paternal line: and Abraham told the King of Gerar concerning Sarah his wife; and yet indeed ſhe is my Siſter, ſhe is the daughter of my Father but not the daughter of my Mother, that is, the daughter of Terah as was generally ſuppos'd, of which I ſhall yet give further accounts. * Now it is not to be ſuppoſed that either Abraham before or David after the law would have done or permitted any thing againſt the law of Nature: and if it was againſt a poſitive law, as it hapned in the caſe of Amnon and David, the marriage might be v lid though forbidden, and the perſons be excuſed upon ſome other account, which is not proper here to be conſidered.

27. But I again renew what I ſaid before, th's d ſcourſe is not intended ſo much as ſecretly to imply that it can now at all be or be made lawful, or is at any hand to be indured. For the marriage of Brother and ſiſter is againſt a ſecondary law of Nature; that is, it ſtands next to the Natural prohibition and is againſt a Natural reaſon, though not againſt a prime Natural law. Every reaſon indeed is not a ſufficient indication of a law, nor a Natural reaſon of a Natural law; but when the reaſon is eſſential to Nature or conſign'd by God, then it is: and as a reaſon approaches neerer to this, ſo the action is more or leſs Natural or Unnatural: and this is the caſe of Brother and Siſter. For the reverence which is due to Parents hath its place here alſo propter recentem admodum parentum in liberis imaginem; and therefore it is with greater reaſon forbidden: and if it were not, the whole world might be filled with early adulteries. For the Dearneſſes of Brother and Siſter, their cohabitation, their likeneſs of Nature and manners, if they were not made holy and ſeparate by a law would eaſily change into Marital loves, but their age and choice would be prevented by their too early careſſes: and then ſince many Brothers might have the ſame kindneſs to one Siſter, or might have but one amongſt them all, the miſchief would be horrible and infinite.

Quantum eſt quod deſit?

28. For theſe and other accounts, which God beſt knew, he was pleas'd to forbid the Marriage of Brothers and Siſters: This law the Jewes ſay, God gave to Adam under the title De non revelanda turpitudine; but yet ſo, that it was not to be of force till Mankind were multiplied: but then it took place as men did pleaſe. But this they ſay upon what ground they pleaſe; for it is highly improbable that the law of Nature ſhould be allowed years of probation, or that it ſhould be a prime law of Nature, which the Nature of things and the conſtitution of the world did make neceſſary to be broken. But becauſe God did afterwards make it into a law, and there is now very great reaſon that it ſhould be a law, and the reaſon is Natural, and will be perpetual, and all Chriſtian Nations, and all that have any form'd religion have agreed to prohibite ſuch marriages; He that ſhall doe ſo unreaſonably, and as things now ſtand, ſo unnaturally and ſo fooliſhly as either to doe it, or teach it, muſt be of no religion, and of no people, and of no reaſon, and of no modeſty.

Of

Of Mothers in law, and their Husbands Children.

29. That the marriage of theſe is not againſt the law of Nature S. Auſtin does expreſsly affirme in his queſtions upon Leviticus; ſaying that there is forbidden the diſcovering his Fathers nakedneſs; but this is not to be underſtood of the Father while he is alive, for that is forbidden in the prohibition of Adultery; Sed ibi prohibetur Matrimonium contrahi cum illis quas ſecluſâ lege licet Uxores ducere; marriage is there forbidden to be made with them with whom otherwiſe it were lawful to contract: But for this there can be no no reaſonable and fair pretence. For a Mother in law and a Mother are all one in the eſtimation of all the laws of the world, and therefore were alike in the prohibition: and the contrary was never done but by them who had no pretence for it, but quod libet licet; whatſoever a man hath a mind to doe that he may doe: for this was the argument which Phædra courts Hippolytus withall.

Nec quia privigno videar coitura noverca
Terruerint animos nomina vana tuos.
Iſta vetus pietas ævo moritura futuro
Ruſtica Saturno regna tenente fuit.
Jupiter eſſe pium ſtatuit quodcunque juvaret;
Et fas omne facit fratre marita ſoror.

The impiety of their Gods ſeemed to be their warrant, and their pleaſure was all theit reaſon, their appetite was their argument. But this we find ſufficiently condemned by S. Paul, it is a fornication which is not ſo much as named amongſt the Gentiles, that one ſhould have his Fathers wife. Cajetan ſuppoſes that this Corinthian did lie with her while his Father was alive; becauſe the Apoſtle calls her not the widow, but the wife of his Father. I am of his opinion, but not for thát reaſon; becauſe that expreſſion he uſes not ſo much to deſcribe the perſon as to aggravate the crime: but that it was in his Fathers life time I am induc'd to beleeve by the word πόρνεια, fornication, which though it be often uſed for adultery, yet I find it not us'd for nuptiæ nefariæ, or that which is uſually called inceſt. But however, that which S. Paul notes here and ſo highly abominates is not the adultery, but the impiety of it; not that it was a wife, but his Fathers wife; and therefore although even ſo it were a high crime and of a deep tincture, yet the unnaturalneſs and the ſcandal of it S. Paul here condemnes: It was the ſame that Antiochus did to Stratonice the wife of his father Seleucus, and that which Reuben did to the Concubine of his Father Iacob; a thing ſo hateful to all Nature that the very naming of it is a condemnation; and therefore is all one with the prime Natural law of prohibition of the conjunction of Parents and Children: for ſhe that is one fleſh with my Father, is as neer to me as my Father, and thats as neer as my own Mother; as neer I mean in eſtimation of the law, though not in the accounts of Nature, and therefore though it be a crime of a leſs turpitude, yet it is equally forbidden and is againſt the law of Nature, not directly, but by interpretation.

Of Uncles and Nieces.

30. Now if the neereſt of kin in the collateral line were not forbidden by a law of Nature, much leſs are they primely unlawful that are further off. The Aſcending and Deſcending line cannot marry, but are forbidden by God in the law of Nature: So Mothers in law and their Husbands children: And Brothers and Siſters are by the laws of all the world, and for very great reaſon forbidden, but not by the law of Nature. But for all other degrees of Kinred

it is unlawful for them to marry interchangeably when and where they are forbidden by a positive law, but not else; and therefore the marriages of Uncles and Nieces, or Aunts and Nephews become unlawful as the laws of our superiors supervening make it so, but was not so from the beginning, and is not so by any law of Christ.

31. In the Civil law of the Romans it was lawful for the Uncle to marry the Brothers daughter, and this continued by the space of 250 years from the dayes of Claudius to the reign of Constantine or thereabouts: and though this began among the Romanes upon the occasion of Claudius his marrying Agrippina, yet himself affirmes (as Tacitus makes him to speak) Nova nobis in Fratrum filias conjugia, sed aliis Gentibus solennia, nec lege ullâ prohibita. Indeed it is new to us but to other Nations usual and lawful: and the newness of it scar'd Domitian so that he refus'd it; and not many did practise it; onely I find that a poor obscure Libertine T. Alledius Severus did it, as Suetonius observes: but it was made lawful by the Civil law, and allowed in the rules of Ulpian; and when Nerva had repeal'd the law, Heraclius reduc'd it again and gave the same permissions.

Lib. 12. Annal.

32. But that which moves me more is that it was the practice of the Jews, the family of Abraham, and the Councel of the wise men to doe so, as Ben Maimon the famous Jew reports. In monitis sapientum habetur ut in uxorem ducat quis ante alias, neptem ex sorore, seu ex fratre neptem, juxta id quod dicitur, a carne tua nè te abscondas: And Josephus does suppose that when Abraham said of Sarah, she is my Sister the daughter of my Father, the truth is, she was his Fathers Grandchild, that is, the Daughter of Abrahams brother: for unless it had been a known thing in that Nation that Abraham's family would not have married their German Sisters, it could have been no security to Abraham to pretend her to be so: for she might be his wife and his sister too, unless such marriages had been unlawful and rejected. But then when Abraham was reprov'd for his lie, he help'd the matter out with a device; she was his Fathers daughter, that is, by the usual idiome of that family, the child of his Father descending by his brother: and this was S. Austin's opinion, Nam qui maximè propinqui erant solebant fratres & sorores appellari, and Cicero calls his Cosen Lucius, Brother; so Lot is called Abrahams Brother, though he was but the son of his Brother Haran, just as neer as his wife Sarah was to him, whom for the like reason he called Sister. But of this I shall yet give a farther account. But whether Josephus said true or no, Abraham said true, thats certain; either she was his half Sister or his Brothers daughter; either of which is forbidden in Leviticus; and this sufficiently declares that they have their unlawfulness from a positive law, not from any law of Nature.

33. If it were needful to instance in any other great examples of such marriages, it were very easie to doe it. Amram the Father of Moses married his Aunt as some suppose, Diomedes and Iphidamas among the Greeks married their Mothers Sisters, and Alcinous took to wife Arete his Brothers daughter. Andromede was promised to her Uncle Phineus. One of the Herods married his Brothers daughter, and yet was not (so fas as we find) reproved for it; and he gave his own daughter to his Brother Pherotas; and some suppose this to be the case of Othniel in the dayes, and under the conduct of Joshuah. For the words in the story are these, [And Othniel the son of Kenaz the Brother of Caleb took it: and he gave him Achsah his daughter to wife:]

wife: but of this I ſhall give a particular account: for this being againſt the law of Moſes by which they were bound, was not to be ſuppoſed eaſily to have been done by ſo piouſperſons: but all that I contend for, is, that it was not unlawful before the law of Moſes: againſt theſe marriages there was no opus ſcriptum in cordibus, no law of Nature, but they became unlawful upon another account, and therefore it was unlawful to them onely to whom that account was to be reckon'd.

Of the marriage of Coſen Germans.

34. From the premiſes it will abundantly follow, that no perſon ought to be affrighted with the pretences of any fierce and miſperſwaded perſon that the marriage of Coſen Germans is againſt the law of Nature: and in this caſe a man need leaſt of all to fear; for the law of Nature is a known and evident thing, it is notorious and felt, and if any man ſhall need to be told what is againſt Natural reaſon which is the matter out of which all Natural laws are fram'd, he may as well have need to be reminded when he is hungry or thirſty. For although ſome perſons have got a trick to ſcare their Proſelytes from a practiſe to which they have no mind, by telling them it is againſt the law of Nature, when they can prove it upon no other account to be unlawful, ſo making the law of Nature to be a ſanctuary of ignorance and an artifice to ſerve their end, juſt as the pretence of occult qualities is in natural Philoſophy; yet concerning the law of Nature, it being imprinted in our hearts, explicated by Chriſtianity, relying upon plain, prime, Natural reaſon, a man may as much need to be told when himſelf does a thing againſt his own will, as when he does againſt his own reaſon and his own Nature. Onely it is certain that when education and our Countrey Cuſtomes have from the beginning poſſeſſed our underſtandings and our practices, ſo that we never ſaw any other uſage of things or heard talk of any other, it looks as if it came from Nature and were ſomething of her eſtabliſhment: So S. Paul to the Corinthians, does not even Nature her ſelf teach that it is a ſhame for a man to wear long hair? That is, even in Nature there is the ſignification of ſome difference in that matter, which cuſtome hath eſtabliſhed into a law: but in ſuch caſes as theſe, a wiſe man can eaſily diſtinguiſh words from things, and appearances from firm eſtabliſhments. But that the law of Nature hath nothing to doe in the marriage of Coſen Germans, ſave onely that ſhe hath left them to their liberty, appears from all the premiſes, which in this inſtance as being farther remov'd muſt needs conclude ſtronger then in their own.

35. But then in the next place if the inquiry be made what it is in the judicial law of Moſes, which is the main of our preſent inquiry; ſuppoſing the judicial law of Moſes could in any of its inſtances oblige Chriſtians, yet Coſen Germans were ſtill free to marry: for I doe not ſo much as find it pretended by any one to be there forbidden, except S. Ambroſe, who diſputing fiercely againſt Paternus for marrying his ſon to his Granchild by another venter, that is, ſo as the young Gentleman was Uncle to his wife, in anger againſt that, ſaies that by the law of God (meaning in Leviticus) Coſen Germans are forbidden to marry, much more (ſaies he) Uncle and Niece: Qui enim leviora aſtringit, graviora non ſolvit ſed alligat. He that binds to the leſs, does not untie the greater. But the event of this, is, onely that S. Ambroſe is by all learned men condemn'd for an ἁμάρτημα μνημονϵυτικὸν a ſlip in his memory: and men ought to be wary leſt great names abuſe them by opinion and miſtaken zeal.

S. Amb. ep. 66. ad Paternum.

But the law is this, Levit. 18. 6.

None of you ſhall approach to any that is neer akin to him, to uncover their Nakedneſs, I am the Lord.

Here the Queſtions uſe to be,

1. What is meant by [None of you?]
2. What is intended by [Neer of Kin to you?]

36. None of you] Vir vir non accedet: ἀνθρωπος ἀνθρωπος in the Lxx. A man, a man ſhall not approach; ſo it is in the Hebrew: that is, ſay the Rabbins, the Jew and the Gentile ſhall not. I ſhall not contend for it, or againſt it. I ſuppoſe it may well be admitted that potentially all mankind was included, that is, all who were borne to Iſrael, or adopted by being Proſelytes were bound to this law, Jews and Gentiles too when they became Jews in religion, but that it included others that converſed not with the Nation, that were ſtrangers to their laws, is as if we ſhould ſay the Parthians were to be judg'd by the Gallick laws, or the Perſians guided by the Greeks. But the purpoſe of them who would introduce this ſenſe, is, that it might be intimated that theſe degrees here mention'd were forbidden by the law of Nature, and conſequently obliging all Chriſtendome: the contrary whereof becauſe it appears from the premiſes, I ſhall onely adde, that no Nation of old did obſerve all theſe laws, and that there was never any ſufficient argument to inforce upon us their obligation, and becauſe it muſt needs remain to us as it was before the law, if they were not obliged then neither are we. But this I ſuppoſe they might be, and ſome of them were oblig'd by ſpecial laws before the collection and publication of the body of Moſes law. For as the law of Chriſt is a collection and perfect explication of the law of Nature and eſſential reaſon: So Moſes law was a collection of all the wiſe and prudent laws by which God govern'd thoſe Nations and thoſe ages which were before Moſes. Thus the law of the Sabbath was one great member of this collective body of the Moſaick law; but it was given before the ſolemnities of Mount Sinai. The law that the Brother ſhould raiſe up ſeed unto his Brother who dyed without iſſue, was alſo given to that family before the publication of it by Moſes as appears in the ſtory of Judah and Thamars quarrel about Onan and the reſt. And thus alſo I ſuppoſe that all or moſt of theſe laws of marriage were given to the nations of the Eaſt and South, deſcending upon them by the tradition of their fore-fathers; from God derived to Adam in part, and in part to Noah, and ſomething of it to other Patriarchs and eminent perſons, and at laſt by the commandement of God united into a Digeſt by Moſes.

37. And upon this account it is that God ſaid that the Canaanites had polluted themſelves in all theſe things, and therefore the land did ſpue them out, which although it cannot infer that theſe laws did Naturally oblige, as I have already diſcourſed*, yet that they were by ſome means or other bound upon them is probable enough, though in this matter there be no certainty. But in this there is; For that all mankind was not bound by all theſe laws of conſanguinity and affinity appears in all the foregoing inſtances: and the marriages of the Patriarchs muſt conclude them to be as impious as the Canaanites in theirs, or elſe that theſe laws did not oblige all Mankind: and if not from the beginning, then not now: if theſe laws were not natural, they are not Chriſtian, which alſo will further appear in the ſequel.

* Supra n. 14.

2. But

2. But there will be more consideration upon the second Quære; what is meant by [Neer of Kin to you?]

38. Our English is not sufficiently expressive of the full sense of it. The Latin is something neerer to the Hebrew, Vir vir non accedet ad propinquitatem carnis suæ; to the neerness of his flesh, πρὸς οἰκεῖα σαρκὸς, or as other books πρὸς οἰκείαν σαρκὸς, ad domesticam carnis suæ, to her that is so neer of Kin, that they usually dwell in the same house, that is, Parents and Children Brothers and Sisters, or our Parents Brothers and Sisters. In these cases there being ever the same account of consanguinity and affinity; this rule takes in all that is there forbidden. But it is highly observable that there is great difference between Propinqui and Cognati. God never forbad to marry our Kinred, but he forbad to marry the neerness of our flesh. Which Phrase when we rightly understand this whole question will be quickly at an end.

39. For [Neer of Kin] is an indefinite word and may signifie as uncertainly as [great] and [little] doe: nothing of it self determinately, but what you will comparatively to others: and it may be extended to all generations of mankind where any records are kept, as among the Jews they were: from Judah to Joseph the espoused of the B. Virgin, from Benjamin to Michol, from Levi to Heli: and thus it is in great proportion amongst the Spaniards and Welch, and in all Nations in their greater and more noble families. The Welch doe to this day esteem him neer of Kin to them whom the English doe not: and since we see the prohibition of marriage with Kinred hath been extended sometimes, and sometimes contracted, it is necessary that all Lawgivers doe express what is meant by their indefinite terms.

40. Hemingius gives a rule for this as neer as can be drawn from the words and the thing. Propinquitas carnis (saies he) quæ me sine intervallo attingit. That is, she that is next to me, none intervening between the stock and me: That is, the propinquity or neerness of my flesh above me is my Mother, below me is my Daughter, on the side, is my Sister, This is all: with this addition that these are not to be uncover'd for thy own sake; thy own immediate relation they are: All else which are forbidden are forbidden for the sakes of these: for my Mothers or my Fathers, my Sons or my Daughters, my Brothers or my Sisters sake; onely reckon the accounts of affinity to be the same: affinitates namque cum extraneis novas pariunt Conjunctiones hominum, non minores illis quæ è sanguine venerunt: said Philo. Affinity makes conjunctions and relations equal to those of Consanguinity: and therefore thou must not uncover that Nakedness which is thine own in another person of blood or affinity, or else is thy Fathers or thy Mothers, thy Brothers or thy Sisters, thy Sons or thy Daughters nakedness. This is all that can be pretended to be forbidden by vertue of these words [Neer of Kin] or [The neerness of thy flesh.] De leg. special.

41. And this we find expressed in the case of the high Priests mourning: The High Priest might not be defiled for the dead among his people, but for his kin that is neer unto him, he may; that is, For his Mother and for his Father, and for his Son and for his Daughter, and for his Brother, and for his Virgin Sister. This is the propinquitas carnis, she that is immediatly born of the same flesh that I am born of, or she out of whose flesh I am born, or she that is born out of my flesh, is this [Neer of Kin.] There is no other propinquity but these, all else are remov'd; and when a bar does intervene, all the rest are or may be accounted Kinred, but not neer of Kin, not the neernes of my flesh, which only is here forbidden. Le. it. 21. vers. 2.

42. Onely this more: That since the prime Natural law does forbid the marriage of the ascending and descending line, that is, Fathers and children, and so consequently and by a stronger reason, Grandchildren, and downwards for ever in descent; God was pleased to set a περιφυλακὴ, a bar and a hedge round about this to keep men off, far off from it, that if men would be impious they might not at first come to the highest step: and therefore as God plac'd the prohibition of Brother and Sister under, so on the side of it he forbad the marriage of Uncles and Aunts: for they are thy Fathers or thy Mothers neer Kin, they are to them the propinquitas carnis; therefore for the reverence of Father and Mother the Jews were bidden to keep of one step more, for the last step of lawful is soon pass'd over into the first step of unlawful, and therefore God was pleas'd to set them further off. And the Christian Divines and Lawyers well understanding this, express the prohibition to this sense; that Uncles and Aunts are not to be married, because they are loco Parentis, they are quasi Parentes, images of Fathers and Mothers, for the reverence of which, the marriage of our Uncles and Aunts respectively are forbidden. * This is just as it was forbidden to the Jews to make an image; which thing could not have any Moral or Natural obliquity; but it was set as a περιφυλακὴ, a guard and a hedge to keep them off from worshipping them, The case is the same here: For the Jews were as apt to comply with the Egyptians and Canaanites in their incestuous mixtures, as in their idolatrous worshippings; but therefore the hedges were plac'd before them both. But half an eye may see the different accounts upon which in this place there was pass'd an equal prohibition.

43. But besides all this, what better determination can we have of these indefinite words of [Neer of kin] or [the neerness of thy flesh] (for those are the words in the Hebrew, so they are to be rendred) then the express particulars made by God himself in that very place; where none are reckon'd in the equal collateral line, but Brothers and Sisters and their affines or allies, their Husbands and wives respectively; none in the Unequal collateral line, but Uncles and Aunts and their allies; in the ascending and descending line, Fathers and Mothers, their children and their Grandchildren with their allies; in all which there is nothing at all that concerns Cosen Germans, neither upon any thing of this account can they be suppos'd to be forbidden, or to be the neerness of our flesh.

44. But if any scrupulous person shall inquire further and suspect that some degrees or persons are forbidden to marry that are not here expressed, but included by a parity of reason, as it happens in another instance: for it is not forbidden to marry our Mothers Brothers wife; but because here it is made unlawful to marry Fathers Brothers wife, it is to be concluded also for the other, there being the same degree and the same reason.

45. I answer to this by parts; 1. It is very likely that it is so intended that in equal cases there is an equal prohibition; but it cannot certainly be concluded and relied upon that it is so. 1. Because upon this account cases of fear and scruple might very much be multiplied to no purpose. For I remember that Fagius reckons out of the books of the Rabbins twenty persons forbidden to marry, which yet are not reckon'd in Leviticus. 2. Because of the rule of the law. l. Mutus 43. D. de procur. Quòd lege prohibitoriâ non vetitum est, permissum intelligitur. In negative precepts that which is not forbidden, is presumed to be allowed. And to adde more out of fear is either to be wiser then the Lawgiver, or to suspect him to be apt to quarrel by unknown measures, and secret ſecret rules of interpretation. 3. Becauſe I find that amongſt wiſe Nations the ſame degree does not alwaies admit the ſame prohibition. To marry my Fathers Siſter was forbidden, and it was not forbidden to marry my Brothers daughter, but it was ſometimes practis'd amongſt the Hebrews; and they give this reaſon for it; becauſe young men daily frequenting the houſes of their Grandfathers and Grandmothers converſe with their Aunts, and are therefore forbidden to marry leſt ſuch converſation ſhould become their ſnare: but to the houſes of their Brethren their addreſs is not ſo frequent, their converſation more ſeparate, and their intereſt and expectations leſs, and therefore to marry the daughters of their Brother might with more ſafety be permitted becauſe there is leſs temptation. Thus by the laws given to the ſons of Noah, the Jews obſerve that it was permitted to marry the Siſter by the Fathers ſide, but not our Siſter by the Mother. It was Abraham's caſe; for as Saidus Batricides the Patriarch of Alexandria about 700 yeers ſince in his Eccleſiaſtical Annals tells out of the Monuments of the Eaſt: » Thare begat Abraham of his firſt wife Jona, and ſhe being dead he married Tebevitha, and of her begat Sarah, Abraham's wife: and this is it which he ſaid, [ſhe is the daughter of my Father, but not the daughter of my Mother:] from whence they ſuppoſe this not to be permitted, and that the other was; for ſo R. Jarchi gloſſes thoſe words of Abraham now quoted: Quoniam inter gentes ratio conſanguinitatis Paternæ nentiquam habebatur: becauſe among the Gentiles (meaning, by the law of Nature, or the law given to Noah) there was little or no account made of Kinred by the Fathers ſide in the matter of marriages. * So amongſt the Romans after the time of Claudius, it was permitted to marry the Brothers daughter, but not the Siſters daughter, as appears in the rules of Ulpian, but the reaſon of this particular inſtance I confeſs I cannot learn, I onely obſerv'd it to this purpoſe that amongſt wiſe Nations, the ſame degree hath not the ſame prohibition.

46. But I am willing enough to admit it with theſe cautions. 1. That there be not onely the ſame degree but the ſame reaſon: For as Ulpian well obſerves in his rules: In quarto [gradu] permittitur [connubium] extra eas perſonas quæ parentum liberorúmq; locum habent: therefore ſaies he they adde that the Great Aunt by the Fathers and by the Mothers ſide, and the Siſters neece may not be married quamvis quarto gradu ſint, although they are in the fourth degree: becauſe the prohibition is not alwaies for the neerneſs or for the degree, but for the proper reaſon; and if you could ſuppoſe a woman to live to ſee ſix generations of her line, yet it is unlawful for her to marry that ſixth degree of Nephews, and not unlawful to marry the firſt degree of Coſens.

47. 2. In the deſcending line the caſe is otherwiſe then in the equal line. Here the further off the perſons are the leſs reaſon ſtill there is they ſhould be forbidden: but in the deſcending line the further the perſons are remov'd the greater cauſe there is they ſhould be forbidden: therefore there is no compariſon between the cognation of Uncles and their Neeces, and the cognation of Coſens in the equal lines: becauſe the reaſon diſtinguiſhes them, not the Kinred or neerneſs to the common Parent.

48. 3. It is true which is affirmed in the law, In pari Cognationis gradu, par idémque jus ſtatuatur: when the Cognation is the ſame, the law is ſo too; that is, If it be meaſured in the ſame kind of Cognation: aſcending compar'd to aſcending, equal collateral to equal collateral, unequal to unequal; for when the compariſon is of things in the ſame order; then not onely the degree but the reaſon is moſt commonly the ſame too, and that is principally to be regarded.

49. But though I am willing enough to admit this rule with theſe cautions, yet many others will not, nor think it reaſonable that any thing ſhould be ſuppoſed to be forbidden in the Levitical law, but what is there ſet down, excepting the deſcent of children in which it is not eaſy to prevaricate beyond the degrees forbidden expreſsly, if a man had a mind to it; and it was never heard of, that a marriage was thought of between a woman and her Great Grandfather: and they give this reaſon why they limit themſelves to the degrees expreſſed. Becauſe unleſs God had intended there a perfect enumeration of all the perſons forbidden to contract marriages mutually, it cannot be imagined why he ſhould be pleas'd to repeat ſome degrees twice which are equally forbidden in the ſeveral inſtances: for if the parity of cognation were to be the meaſure, then thoſe degrees which are twice repeated might without ſuch repetition have better been reduc'd to the Rule, under which they were ſufficiently prohibited.

50. 2. But whether it be, or be not ſo, yet it can no way reach to the caſe of Coſen Germans: For there is in Leviticus no degree equally neer that is forbidden, except of ſuch perſons which are in the place of Parents, who are prohibited upon another account.

51. But that which ought to put it paſt all queſtion that the marriage of Coſen Germans was not prohibited by the Levitical law either expreſsly or by conſequence and parity of reaſon, is this: Becauſe it was practis'd by holy men both before and after the law, and ſo ordered to be done by God himſelf. In the law there are no words againſt it, no reaſon againſt it expreſs'd or intimated in a parity of prohibition given to ſomething elſe, and it was frequently practis'd amongſt perſons of a known religion, and was by God given in command to ſome perſons to doe it; therefore nothing is more certainly warranted, excepting onely expreſs Commandements.

52. The particulars I relate to in Scripture are theſe; Jacob married his Coſen German Rachel the daughter of his Uncle Laban. Amram the Fa-Exod. 6. 20. ther of Moſes begat him of his Coſen German Jochabed. That ſhe was his Aunt is commonly ſuppoſed, but the L x x and the Vulgar Latin report her to be his Aunts daughter, though by the ſtile of the Hebrewes ſhe was called his Aunt: juſt as Chanameel is called in ſome books the Jer. 32. 12. Uncle of the Prophet Jeremy, when he was really his Uncles Son; and ſo the Vulgar Latin Bibles read it; and Loth was called brother by Abraham when he was his Brothers Son. * Caleb having promiſed his Daughter Achſah to him that ſhould take Kirjath-Sepher, ſhe fell to Othniel the Son of Kenaz Calebs Brother; ſo Pagnine and Arias Montanus read it [Filio Kenaz Fratris Caleb] meaning Kenaz to be Calebs Brother: So that Othniel and Achſah were Brothers children; for it cannot be ſuppoſed that Othniel was Calebs Brother and ſo was Uncle to Achſah; for that being forbidden in the law of Moſes under which Othniel and Achſah lived was
Num. 33. not a thing ſo likely to be done, and conſented to by Caleb; as I have already noted.

53. But the matter was made more notorious in the caſe of Zelophehads Numbers 36. daughters; who becauſe they were heireſſes were commanded to marry their kinred kinred; and they married their Fathers Brothers ſons. This was a ſpecial caſe, but therefore it was a ſpecial command; and what was in all caſes lawful was made in this caſe neceſſary. For if the woman was an Heireſs ſhe was to pleaſure her own family rather then ſtrangers. And this was not onely amongſt the Jews but amongſt the Greeks and Latines, as appears by that of the Comedy

Lex eſt ut orbæ, qui ſunt genere proximi Ter. in Phor.
Iis nubant, & illos ducere eadem hæc lex jubet.

If the woman was without children (adde alſo) and without a Father, that is, if her Father be dead, the next of kinred was bound to marry her: and therefore when Æſchylus calls the marriage of certain Coſen Germans λέχεα ὧν θέμις ἔιργϛ marriages which the law forbids, and affirms μιαίνεσθαι γῆν the family is ſtaind by it: the Scholiaſt addes that therefore theſe marriages are unlawful becauſe the Fathers were alive; and ſo it was not unlawful upon the ſtock of kinred; but becauſe the maid was ἐπίκληρος an Heireſs and might not marry without her Fathers leave. This woman was called among the Greeks ἐπιδικαζομένη, a woman determin'd by law, and already judg'd to ſuch a marriage; παρεῦχον, and ἐπίκληρον, or ἐπικληρεῖτις, and to them that were ſo, it was not free to marry any one, they muſt marry their Kinred In Danaidib.

And we find in the old Civil law that one Caſſia was declar'd inheretrix upon condition, Si Conſobrino nupſiſſet: if ſhe did marry her Coſen German. l. 2. C. de inſtit. & ſubſt. and Papinian l. 23. & 24. D. de ritu nuptiarum affirms, conditionem illam, ſi conſobrinam duxeris, hæreditatis inſtitutioni utiliter adjici poſſe; it is a legal and a fair condition and may be the limit of an inheritance that the Heireſs be bound to marry her Coſen German. And this in ſome meaſure was the caſe of Ruth whom Boaz Great Granfather to King David did marry by the right of a Kinſman. Now it is true (ſaith he) that I am thy neer Kinſman, howbeit there is a Kinſman neerer then I: which Kinſman becauſe he refus'd to marry Ruth, Boaz took her to wife, and ſhe became a mother in the line of the Meſſias; for Chriſt came out of her loines according to the fleſh. Ruth 3. 12.

50. Into which line becauſe this Argument hath led me, I offer it to conſideration as the laſt and greateſt example of the lawfulneſs and holineſs of ſuch marriages under the law of Moſes, and as a warranty to all ages of the Chriſtians; The B. Virgin Mary the Mother of our moſt B. Saviour was married to her Coſen German (as was ſuppoſed upon this reaſon:) For her huſband Joſeph was the ſon of Heli (ſaith S. Luke) that is, the legal ſon of Heli, for Jacob begat him (ſaith S. Mathew) Now Heli and Jacob were Brethren the ſons of Matthan who was Grandfather to Joſeph and Mary; for unleſs by the cognation of Joſeph and Mary the ſame genealogy had ſerv'd for them both, the reckoning of the Genealogy of Joſeph could not have proved Jeſus to have deſcended from David. But if this inſtance ſhould fail, and that their conſanguinity (for they were Coſens) did ſtand at further diſtances; yet there are examples and reaſons and authentick preſidents already reckon'd enow to warrant us in this inquiry. Luke 3. 23.

51. By all which it appears what was the ſtate of theſe marriages under the law of Moſes, and yet all the ſcruple at which weak perſons ſtart or ſtumble, is derived from that Sanction in Leviticus, which in deſpite of all reaſon and all precedents and all obſervations whatſoever, they will needs ſuppoſe to be a Natural and moral law, ſo making eleven Commandements: for certain it is that the ten Commandements was to the Jews the ſum of their Moral law: in which, ſince ſome things that were ceremonial were inſerted, it is not likely that any thing that was moral ſhould be omitted. In the ten words of Moſes there was nothing leſs then their whole Moral law, though ſomething more there was: but this of forbidding Coſens to marry was no where put: If it had been put in Leviticus it was but National and temporary: for I have proved it was not againſt the law of Nature which permitted neerer relatives then Coſen Germans to marry: I have alſo proved that the Sanction of Moſes did onely oblige Jews and Proſelytes: That if they had oblig'd all, yet Coſen Germans are not there expreſsly forbidden, and if they be not there expreſsly forbidden they are not forbidden at all; but in caſe that other degrees of equal diſtance and reaſon were there forbidden, though not expreſſed, yet this of Coſen Germans is not by any conſequence or intimation of that forbidden, becauſe no degree is there forbidden which can involve this, but it hath a ſpecial caſe of its own in which this is not at all concerned, and all this I ſtrengthned with examples greater then all exception.

56. It remains now that we deſcend to the Chriſtian law, and enquire whether our great Maſter and Lawgiver Jeſus Chriſt hath forbidden Coſen Germans to marry? But this is ſoon at an end, for Chriſt ſpake nothing at all concerning marriage but one ſentence which reduc'd it to the firſt ſtate of Nature, ſave onely that he left us in all things bound by the laws of Nations and our juſt ſuperiors, of which two laſt I ſhall give account in the following periods. But of that which Chriſt ſaid the ſum is this onely: For this cauſe ſhall a man leave Father and Mother and cleave to his wife, and they two ſhall be one fleſh. By which words he did eſtabliſh all that was Natural and Moral in this affair. [A man ſhall leave Father and Mother] by theſe words are forbidden the marriage of Parents and children. [He ſhall cleave to his wife] by this is forbidden concubitus maſculorum. [His wife] by this is forbidden adultery or the lying with another mans wife, and extra-nuptial pollutions. [Erunt duo] They two, by that is forbidden Polygamy, [In carnem unam] ſhall be one fleſh, by this is forbidden beſtiality or the abuſe of Caro aliena, the fleſh of ſeveral Species; which are all the unlawful and unnatural luſts forbidden by God in the law of Nature, and that which was afterwards given to all mankind, and inſerted in the Levitical law as the conſummation and main deſign of the other prohibitions which were but like hedges and outer guards to theſe.

57. There is in the New Teſtament onely one law more which can relate to this queſtion of marriages [Provide things honeſt in the ſight of all men] and [Follow after things which are of good report] That is, Whatſoever is againſt publike honeſty, the law of Nations, the common ſenſe of Mankind, that is not to be done by Chriſtians, though of the inſtance there be no ſpecial prohibition in the laws of Jeſus Chriſt: and Modeſtinus the Lawyer ſaid well, In nuptiis non ſolum quod liceat, ſed etiam quid honeſtum ſit, ſemper eſt reſpiciendum. Concerning which leſt there be a miſtake in it, I premiſe this caution in general, that we doe not take falſe or weak eſtimates of Publike fame and honeſty. Nothing but the laws of God and Men or the univerſal ſentence of that part of mankind with whom we any waies converſe is the meaſure of publike honeſty. Thus for a Biſhop to ride on hunting in his Pontificals, or for a Prieſt to keep an alehouſe is againſt publike honeſty: of the ſame nature are, for a woman to paint her face, or to goe in mans apparel. But when a thing is diſputed on both ſides by good and learned Men, to doe either is not againſt publike honeſty. Thats a certain rule; for when a thing is called good and honeſt by wiſe and good Men, the queſtion is divided, and therefore cannot be united againſt either of them. * Upon this account S. Paul reprov'd the inceſtuous Corinthian becauſe he had done a fact which was not ſo much as nam'd, that is, approv'd amongſt the Gentiles, that one ſhould have his Fathers Wife. Caracalla indeed did it afterwards, and it was before his time done in the family of Seleucus; but theſe were inſolent examples, ever diſallowed by the Romans and all the Nations within their circuit: and conſequently the Greeks had long before S. Pauls time been more reſtrain'd in their too great licentiouſneſs of marriages. And when the cuſtome of this thing had procur'd a licence for it amongſt the Scots, S. Margaret, wife to Malcome III. their King did reduce the contrary law of Nations, and forbad a ſon to marry his fathers wife, or a Brother to marry his Brothers widow.

58. Beyond this the New Teſtament having nothing, if we reduce this to the preſent queſtion we muſt conſider whether the marriage of Coſen Germans be againſt publike honeſty or good report, that is, whether it be condemn'd by the law of Nations and the prevailing ſentences or practiſe of wiſe men.

59. Concerning this, I find that Plutarch ſpeaking of the ancient laws and uſages of the Romans in marrying their Kinred, ſaies it was a practice before it was a law: and there happened to be a caſe of a good man who had a great advantage by marrying his Coſen German: upon occaſion of which the people made a law that it ſhould be permitted to any one to doe it ψηφισάμεν☉. πᾶσιν ἐξεῖναι γαμεῖν ἄχρις ἀνεψιῶν, τὰ ὑπ' ἀνωτέρω κεκωλύσθαι. Now this was very ancient; and before this law for it I find no law againſt it, onely if Claudius in Tacitus ſaid true they were diu ignorata, no notice of them, or but ſeldom examples. Concerning which diſcourſe though men are pleas'd to talk as ſerves their turnes, yet it is very certain that the elder the times were, the more liberty there was of marrying their Kinred. However there was an early law for it and none againſt it, that I find; and when it began to be conſidered, tempore addito percrebuerunt ſaid Tacitus, they in time grew frequent. In the Oration of Sp. Liguſtinus in Livy there is this clauſe, Pater mihi Uxorem fratris ſui filiam dedit: My Father gave to me wife his own Brothers daughter: and Quintilian mourning for the immature death of his Son, affirms that he was deſign'd to be ſon in law to his Uncle. So Cicero pro Cluentio ſaies that his Siſter married Melinus her Coſen German: and Auguſtus Ceſar gave his daughter Julia to Marcellus the ſon of his Siſter Octavia. The brave Brutus who was the example of a rare moral man and a noble Patriot was married to Portia the daughter of his wiſe Uncle Cato; and that incomparable Prince Marcus Antonius the Philoſopher and Emperor was married to his neereſt Coſen Annia Fauſtina; ſhe was his Coſen German. But thus it was at the beginning; and thus it was at the ending of the Roman ſtate and Empire. At the beginning; the two daughters of Servius Tullius were married to their Coſen Germans Lucius and Aruns, the Nephews of Priſcus Tarquinius, Livy indeed ſaies it was not certain whether theſe young Gentlemen were Uncles or Coſen Germans to their wives; that is, whether they were ſons or Nephews to Tarquinius Priſcus, but Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus contends earneſtly that they were Nephews. and state we find that Constantius the Emperor gave his Sister to her cosen Julianus.

60. These and all the foregoing examples of the wisest, of the best, of the most holy Persons, Patriarchs, and Kings, Consuls and Philosophers, Lawgivers and Saints; the practice and customes of the greatest and most civil Nations are infinitely sufficient to dash in pieces this weak pretence (if any should make use of it) that the marriage of Cosen Germans is against publike honesty, and so consequently not of good report; For that which God never forbad, but sometimes did actually command, which the Patriarchs did practise, which the church of the Jews never scrupled at, but alwaies were accustomed to it, which wise men and good men have done without reproof: which was admitted by the law of Nations; and is no where contradicted in Scripture, which records many authentick precedents of such marriages, in all reason ought to be of good report. And certainly nothing hath done dishonour and so lessen'd the fame and good opinion of such marriages, as the very making a question concerning its lawfulness, and making a scruple even after the question is well determin'd. To be suspected, lessens the fame of any man or any thing. The doing justice to this article will doe it reputation enough.

61. If we now shall inquire how the civil law of the Romans did determine of these marriages we shall be helped much in the cure of the former fear. For if the law of the Romans allowed it, that law which had so many brave and wise composers, and which so many Nations allowed of and practis'd, and still do in very many Kingdomes and Republikes, we have no reason to think it can be of ill report. But concerning this the matter is not very disputable, it is notorious that the Civil law did allow it. l. 1 § duorum inst. de nupt. l. 3. & l. non solum. §. 1. D. de ritu nupt. l. C. de inst. & subst. * Paulus the Lawyer said; Si Nepotem ex filio & neptem ex altero filio in potestate habeam nuptias inter eos me solo authore contrahi posse Pomponius scribit, & verum est: and Antoninus the Emperor said, Non videri potest sub specie turpium nuptiarum viduitatem tibi induxisse cum te filio sororis suæ consobrino tuo, probabili consilio Matrimonio jungere voluerit: I need in this say no more. It was alwaies permitted in the Greek and Roman Laws, till the time of Theodosius, who being over-ruled by S. Ambrose, forbad it by an expres law; tantum pudori tribuens continentiæ ut consobrinorum nuptias vetuerit tanquam sororum, said Aurelius Victor; he thought it more nice and modest if he should inlarge the Laws and restrain what was not restrain'd before: But this as it arose suddenly, so as suddenly was extinguish'd; for it was abrogated by Arcadius and Honorius his sons, whose constitution to this purpose is in Justinian l. celebrandis C. de nuptiis, in which these words are remarkeable, [Revocatâ prisci juris authoritate, restinctisq; calumniarum fomentis, matrimonium inter Consobrinos habeatur] The law that forbad them was occasioned and fomented by calumnies; which being dispersed, the authority of the Ancient law was recalled.

62. This onely I am to admonish; That in the Theodosian Code the law of these Emperors seems to say otherwise, as is to be seen under the titles of [si nuptiæ ex rescript. petant: & de incestis nuptiis.] But the forgery is notorious enough. For when Alaric King of the Goths had commanded his Subject Arrianus the Lawyer to make a Breviary of the Code, he fitted those laws to the Customes of his own Countrey, and so abus'd the law of Arcadius and Honorius, as appears plainly by comparing those constitutions which pass'd under the fingers of Arrianus, with those which under the same Rubricks are in the the Code of Juſtinian. For in this there is not one word ſpoken of the marriage of Coſen Germans under thoſe Titles. And as he hath done in the Breviary of the Theodoſian Code, ſo he hath done in the Epitome of Caius inſtitutions (he, or ſome ſuch fellow as bad) and made the civil law as he pleaſed expreſsly againſt the known Sanction of all the old law of the Braver Romans. * The ſame alſo was done by Theophilus who recited this law according to the manners of his own time, and recites the law of Juſtinian exactly contrary to Juſtinian's ſence by clapping a perfect Negative to his direct affirmative. But Curtius the Latin interpreter of Theophilus hath ſet it right again according to the true intent of the Civil law. But it may be I doe not well to trouble the Queſtion with theſe little things, when the great lines of duty are ſo plain and legible: and concerning this we have a full teſtimony from S. Auſtin; who having obſerved that in his time Coſen Germans did not often marry; Experti ſumus (ſaies he) in conjugiis conſobrinorum etiam noſtris temporibus .... quàm rarò per mores fiebat, quod fieri per leges licebat, quia id nec Divina prohibuit, & nondum prohibuerat lex humana. That is, for Coſen Germans to marry was neither prohibited by the laws of God nor man: and ſo we have a teſtimony beyond exception concerning the Civil law, and the law of God, and the law of the Church till his time. Now if it be objected that he ſaies it was done but ſeldome, it is no wonder. S. Ambroſe and Theodoſius a little before that time had cauſed ſome reſtraint and made the matter uneaſy and beſides this; If any man could obſerve concerning any one ſort of perſons how ſeldom they marry, that is, how few examples any one man can obſerve of any degree though never ſo diſtant, this will appear but light, as the dew upon a flower, or the down of a thiſtle. It is lawful for a Father and his Son to marry a widow and her daughter; and for two Brothers to marry two Siſters; and no man queſtions any thing of it: but quàm rarò hoc per mores fiat; how many examples can any one man reckon? Can he tell ſo many in one age and of his own notice, as to make them up a multitude? and yet this would be but a weak argument againſt it; and not worth a further conſideration.

L. 15. c. 16. de civit. Dei.

63. That which is to be inquired next into is the Canon law; and that indeed does forbid it: but how, and to what purpoſe, and with what obligation will not be wholly uſeleſs to conſider.

64. 1. In the very firſt Canons of the Church (excepting onely that one fram'd in the Councel of Jeruſalem Acts 15.) which are commonly called the Canons of the Apoſtles there is a caution againſt inceſtuous marriages, but the inſtances are onely, [He that marries two Siſters, or his Brothers Widow, or Daughter.] The penalty is, He may not be received into Holy Orders: but for the matter of Coſen Germans it was not forbidden: Until S. Auſtins time and thereabouts it was true that Nondum prohibuerat lex humana, Divina nunquam: Gods law had never, and till then mans law had not forbidden it, that is, it was then in all ſenſes lawful: and in the Synod of Paris almoſt ſix hundred years after Chriſt, thoſe are defined to be unlawful marriages quæ contra præceptum Domini contrahuntur, which are againſt the Divine law; None elſe; amongſt which the preſent caſe is not to be ſuſpected: and in the old Canons of the Church all the prohibited inſtances were compris'd in theſe verſes, which was their Authentick Table:

Nata, Soror, Neptis, Matertera, Fratris & Uxor,
Et Patris Conjux, Mater, Privigna, Noverca, Uxoríſque

Uxorisque Soror, Privigni Nata, Nurúsque,
Atque Soror Patris, conjungi lege vetantur.

C. lit. extr. de sctir. sponsal.

But in some assemblies of the Bishops about this time, a little before or a little after, the manners of the Nations being spoil'd with warres, rudeness and Barbarisme, they contracted incestuous marriages: and it was therefore thought fit that as the marriage of Uncles and Nieces were forbidden as a hedge to keep them farther off from Father and Mother, Son or Daughter, so this of Cosen Germans was set as a προφυλακη or an outward Court to keep them from marrying Brother and Sister. And therefore Harmenopulus saies they were forbidden by the laws of the Greeks. And it was amongst them no more then was highly needful for a reason which every one knows. But both there and in the Latin Church, when the prohibition of Cosens marriage is joind in the same decree with the marrying of Sisters, the cause is rendred too suspicious. * And yet there was an external cause that had influence upon these Sanctions of the Church. The Goths then prevaild by the sword, and the Church to comply with the Conquerour was forward to receive this law from them: for the Goths had it before the Romans, and it is very probable that those barbarous people were the great presidents and introducers of the prohibition.

65. 2. These laws were made by time and accidents, and were extended or contracted as it pleased the Popes of Rome, who (as one observes) were for a long time iniquiores & invidi in maritos, apt and easie to make all restraints upon marriages. If it were seasonable and fit it were not useless to observe many instances out of the Canon law to this purpose. But I forbear, that which I now observe, is, that the prohibition amongst them began with Cosen Germans then it went to the third and fourth degrees; then to seven, then to four again, sometime to six, as in the Synod at Cabaillon; sometimes usque dum generatio agnoscitur, aut memoria retinetur, as long as any memory of kinred remains, and that will be very far in Wales, where they reckon eight degrees and special names of Kinred after Cosen Germans, and then Kin for ever, and truly these Canonists proceed as reasonably as their Principles would admit. For if Cognation or Consanguinity was the hindrance of marriage, where ever they could reckon that, they had some pretence to forbid marriage: but if they onely forbad it upon the accounts of Nature, or by the precedent of the Divine law given to Moses they were to stop there where Nature stop'd, or the Divine law. But that they would not, as knowing it to be an easie thing to make laws at the charge of other mens trouble.

Concil. Tolet. 2. c. 5. Concil. Worm.

66. 3. The reasons why the Projectors of the Canon law did forbid to the fourth or to the seventh degree, were as fit a cover for this dish as could be imagined. They that were for four gave this grave reason for it. There are four humors in the body of a man to which because the four degrees of consanguinity doe answer, it is proportionable to Nature to forbid the marriage of Cosens to the fourth degree. Nay more; there are four Elements; Ergo, To which it may be added, that there are upon a mans hand four fingers and a thumb. The thumb is the stirps or common Parent; and to the end of the four fingers, that is, the four generations of Kinred we ought not to marry, because the life of a man is but a span long. There are also four quarters of the world; and indeed so there are of every thing in it, if we please, and therefore abstain at least till the fourth degree be past. Others who are graver and wiser (particularly Bonaventure) observe cunningly, that besides the four humours of the body, there are three faculties of the Soul, which being joined together make seven, and they point out to us that men are to abstain till the seventh generation tion. Theſe reaſons ſuch as they are, they therefore were content withall, becauſe they had no better: yet upon the ſtrength of theſe they were bold even againſt the ſenſe of almoſt all mankind to forbid theſe degrees to marry.

67. 4. When the Canoniſts appointed what degrees of Kinred they would have reſtrain'd from mutual marriage, they took their precedent and meaſure from the Civil law, making this their ſtandard, that ſo long as by the Civil law inheritances did deſcend, ſo long by the Canon law it ſhould not be permitted to kinred to marry: and upon this account they forbad marriage to the ſeventh degree, becauſe ſo farr the laws appointed inheritances to deſcend. Now that this is a weak and a falſe ground appears, becauſe inheritances deſcend even to the tenth degree: and yet ſuppoſe it otherwiſe: yet the Popes and other compilers of the Canons overſhoot their mark extremely: becauſe while they forbidding marriages to the ſeventh degree pretended to follow ſome proportions and uſages of the Civil law, do yet reckon the degrees otherwiſe then the Civil law does, and conſequently doe forbid marriage to the fifteenth civil degree excluſively. For whereas by the Canon law ſo far as either of the perſons is diſtant from the Common Parent, ſo far he is diſtant from the other in the equal line: ſo that by this computation Coſen Germans are diſtant in the ſecond degree and no more. But by the Civil law there are accounted ſo many degrees as there are perſons beſides the Common Parent, ſo that in this computation Coſen Germans are diſtant in the fourth degree; and conſequently the ſeventh Canonical degree is the fourteenth civil degree, the unequalneſs and unreaſonableneſs of which, all Lawyers will deride. The ſame is in proportion to be ſaid of their later reduction of the Canonical prohibition to the fourth degree incluſively.

68. 5. Theſe laws gathered by the Roman Canoniſts are not now, nor ever were they, obligatory but by the conſent of the People, and the allowance of Princes. For Biſhops in their meer ſpiritual impreſſes have no proper legiſlative power, where Princes are Chriſtian: and if the Prince pleaſe he may inlarge or reſtrain their power, ſo that he make no intrenchment on the Divine law, and doe what is uſeful and profitable, Fac legi tuæ ſepem, ſaid the Jews: it makes the law firm if you put a hedge about it; and where viler people who had no fear of God were apt to marry Siſters or Aunts, it was not ill to prohibit ſomething that was lawful, leſt they ſhould run into what is unlawful. But this is matter of prudence onely and ought to be ſeparated from the queſtion of lawful or unlawful. But then when the Prince does not bind, the Subjects are free. Honeſta & juſta eſſe quæ Regi placent, & regno utilia. Thoſe things which pleaſe the King and are profitable to the Kingdome are honeſt and juſt. It was truly ſaid but ill applyed by Antiochus Seleucus.

69. 6. Theſe laws are neither allowed by the Prince, nor by the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate in England, and becauſe they were uſeleſs and burdenſome they were laid aſide; for they were but drains for money and levies of rents; for even under the Pope the way was, and is now, open enough to Coſen Germans if they have gold enough to purchaſe the lead. And ſo it was when the Civil law was tun'd to the aire of the Canon law and both to the manners of the Goths. Coſens might marry with a diſpenſation from the Prince; a form of which is to be ſeen in Caſſiodore. But this is one of the many bleſſings of the Proteſtant religion that we are not tied to pay money for leave to doe a lawful action; ſo that as the Jewes were wont to ſay, He that hath married a wife that is L. 7. variarum.

too neer of Kinred, let him turn Proſelyte and then ſhe is not of Kin to him, I may in ſome ſenſe uſe in the conteſt between our laws and thoſe of the Roman Churches: He that hath or deſires to marry a wife of his kindred which is not to neer by Gods law but is by the Popes law, let him become a Proteſtant, and then though nothing can be allowed to him which God hath forbidden, yet that leave which God hath given him, Man ſhall not take away.

70. 7. If it were at all conſiderable what is done by the Canon law, there is a new device brought in of ſpiritual kinred; and marriages forbidden to be between ſuch as anſwer at the Font for the ſame child; that is, if we value the Roman Canons, all Mankind are in perpetual ſnare, and that to no purpoſe.

71. 8. But as for the preſent inquiry it is conſiderable that the Canon law it ſelf does not pretend it to be againſt the Divine law, but does it wholly upon other accounts, as I have already inſtanc'd; and this appears in the epiſtle of Rabanus to Cardinal Humbert. Quod Pontifices uſque ad ſextum vel ſeptimum gradum conjugium prohibent, magis ex conſuetudine humana quam ex lege Divina eos præcepiſſe credendum. The Canons did not intend to ſignifie it to be againſt the law of God for Coſens to marry in the degrees forbidden by the Canon law.

72. 9. And after all, the laws of England doe expreſsly allow it; as is to be ſeen in the tables of marriage ſet up in Churches uſually, and in the Statute of 32 of Henry 8. chapter 38. And it is obſervable that in England they were allowed to doe it ever ſince they were Chriſtians, unleſs they were Papiſts. For till Pope Gregories time and Auguſtine the Monk (though Chriſtianity had been here almoſt 500 yeers before it was us'd by the Britains: and P. Gregory did not think it fit that Auguſtin ſhould put a reſtraint upon them (as is to be ſeen in the Britiſh Councels collected by that learned and good man Sr Henry Spelman) but it was no little intereſt and power, which the Popes afterwards procured in the families of Princes and other great perſonages by giving leave to them to marry their neer relatives; and their poſterity for their own ſakes would in all likelyhood preſerve that power to which (as things then went) they did owe their legitimation.

73. Although I have paſs'd thorough all laws that can oblige us, in this preſent inquiry; yet becauſe the chief diſquiſition is concerning the Natural law, and whether or no any prohibition can from thence deſcend upon the marriage of Coſen Germans is the main queſtion; it will be proper here to adde one topick more, that is, the Prudence or reaſonableneſs of the thing.

74. Concerning which it is obſervable, that whoever ſhall goe about to aſſign the proper reaſons why certain degrees are forbidden to marry by the law of God, will by experience find it to be too hard for his head: and Rabbi Menahen Racanatenſis obſerved, Quod ad rationem attinet interdictorum inceſti, Magiſtri traditionum de ea nihil certi acceperunt. The Maſters of traditions have received no certain account of thoſe reaſons for which God forbad inceſtuous mixtures: Indeed if we could find out the prime and proper reaſon; then by proportions to it we could better underſtand how far the prohibitions were to be extended. But this is to be deſpair'd of. But yet Men have ventur'd to give ſuch reaſons as they could, which how far they are applicable to the preſent queſtion ſhall be conſidered.

1. That

75. 1. That Kinred ought not to marry is therefore decreed, nè emulatio fiat in eadem domo, ſaies one. The ſame degree of Kinred will be apt to love the ſame man, and ſo emulation will ariſe. * Well ſuppoſe that: But if it does; the marrying one of them will determine all the reſt, and quiet the ſtrife. But becauſe this proves too much, it proves nothing at all. For upon the ſame account, a young man ſhould not marry in a family where there are many daughters, nè æmulatio fiat in eadem domo to avoid emulation and competition.

76. 2. Coſens would do better not to marry (ſaies another) nè habeat duas neceſsitudines una perſona; that one perſon may not be a double Relative: for ſo names will be confounded and the ſame perſon ſhall be Father and Coſen to his own child. * But what if he be? and what if a King be both a Lord over and a Son under his own Mother? what if a man be a Father and a Judge, a Brother in law and a Natural Brother, as when two Brothers marry two Siſters? The more relations and neceſſitudes there are, it is ſo much the better, and a twofold Cord is not eaſily broken. Cicero de Sa.

77. 3. It were well that Coſens might not marry, that by their Kinred they might be defended from the injury of their Husbands, in caſe they ſhould need it. * Well ſuppoſe this too: yet, 1. This does not at all concern the Man, for he will not need a defence by his Kinred againſt his wife. 1. 2. For the woman, unleſs ſhe marries all her kinred, the other may be a defence againſt the violence of one whom ſhe does marry; and will be more likely to prevail in the defence againſt a Kinſman, then againſt a ſtranger. 2. 3. But if a woman be brought to that paſs, her Coſen ſhall doe her little advantage againſt her Husband; for ſuch defences doe but exaſperate and make eternal animoſities: but the laws are the beſt defences. 3. 4. If the Coſen will be a ſure defence againſt the Husbands injury: then if the Coſen be married to her, he will be ſure to do her no injury. For he that will doe evil himſelf, is but an ill ſecurity to be ingag'd againſt another, and he that will prevaricate in the duty of a Husband, will hardly ſecure the peace of the woman by the duty of a Kinſman. 4.

78. 4. S. Auſtins ſcruple is this. Ineſt neſcio quomodo humanæ verecundiæ quiddam naturale ac laudabile ut cui debet cauſa propinquitatis verecundum honorem ab ea contineat quamvis generatricem tamen libidinem. There is in the Modeſty of Mankind ſomething that is Natural and laudable; by which they abſtain from congreſſion with them to whom they own the honor of Reverence and modeſt baſhfulneſs. This indeed is a good account where the modeſty of Nature does really make reſtraints and owes duty and reverence: and therefore is one of the moſt proper and Natural reaſons againſt the marriage of Parents and children, and is by the allowance of ſome proportions extended to Brother and Siſter: but if it be ſent out one ſtep further, you can never ſtop it more, but it ſhall go as far as any man pleaſe to fancy: therefore let it ſtop where God and Nature hath fix'd its firſt bounds; and let not the pretence of a Natural reaſon or inſtinct, carry us whether Nature never did intend; for it is certain ſhe gave larger commiſſions, however the fears, or the ſcruples, or the intereſt of ſome men have made them to ſpeak otherwiſe: and I remember concerning Cicero who ſomtimes ſpeaks againſt the marriage of Coſens, that it is but too reaſonable to ſuppoſe he did it to remove ſuſpicion from himſelf; it having been objected againſt him by Q. Fuſius Calenus in Dio that he was too kind and amorous to his own daughter. Filia matris pellex tibi jucundior atq; obſequentior quàm parenti par eſt; So unequal, ſo uncertain a way it is to truſt the ſayings of a man, when ſo frequently the mans opinion is not cauſed by his reaſon, but by a ſecret intereſt. Lib. 46.

79. 5. Pope Gregory in his Epiſtle to the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury tries another way: Experimento didicimus ex tali conjugio ſobolem non poſſe ſuccreſcere. If Coſen Germans marry they will have no children. But the good man did not remember that the whole Nation of the Jews came from the marriage of the two Coſen Germans of Jacob, Rachel and Leah; and although by this diſcourſe it ſeems it was an uſuall practice to doe it; for from the practice onely he could pretend to an obſervation of this event; yet as to the event of the thing it ſelf; it is a very great experience which the world hath, by which his obſervation is confuted.

80. 6. But the beſt reaſon given againſt the convenience of it; for none pretends higher; is, that it were better if Coſen Germans ſhould not intermarry propter multiplicandas affinitates, as S. Auſtin expreſſes it, ut conjugiis augeant neceſſitudines, that ſo they might ſcatter friendſhips and relations in more families for the diſſemination and extenſion of charity. For Coſens being already united and loving, it were well by marriage to endear others which are not ſo loving, not ſo united. Of this every one makes uſe that is pleas'd to diſſwade
1. theſe marriages. But to this I anſwer, 1. That ſuppoſe this were well and without objection as to the material part, yet this does no waies prove it unlawful, and indeed is not by the contrivers of it intended it ſhould: as appears in
2. Philo and Plutarch from whom S. Chryſoſtom and S. Auſtin did borrow it. 2. There may be one inconvenience in it, and yet many conveniences and advantages which may outweigh that one; and that there are ſo, will appear in the
3. ſequel. 3. This very reaſon when Philo the Jew had urg'd in general for the ſcattering friendſhips and not limiting alliances to one family, he addes, Quod reſpiciens Moyſes alias etiam multas propinquorum nuptias vetuit: Meaning that this argument is ſufficiently provided for by the reſtraints that Moſes made, and if we marry out of thoſe limits, the friendſhip is enough ſcattered. For beyond Brother and Siſter, Uncles and Nieces, the relation is far enough off to be receptive of and to need the renovation or the arreſts of friendſhip.

81. 7. It were well if Coſen Germans did not marry leſt by reaſon of their uſual familiarity, converſe and natural kindneſs, fornications ſhould be ſecretly procured; it being too ready for Natural love to degenerate into luſt. I anſwer that therefore let them marry as the remedy. For it were a hard thing that Coſens who doe converſe and are apt to love ſhould by Men be forbidden to marry, when by God they are not. For this aptneſs to love being left upon them, together with their frequent converſation is a ſnare; which becauſe God knew he permitted them to their remedy; and if men doe not they will find that their prohibition of marriage will not be a ſufficient ſecurity againſt fornication. For Brothers and Siſters where the danger is ſtill greater, God hath put a bar of a poſitive law, and Nature hath put the bar of a Natural reaſon and congruity and the laws of all Mankind have put a bar of publike honeſty and penalties, and all theſe are ſufficient to ſecure them againſt the temptation: and this was obſerved by a wiſe man long ſince in this very inſtance:

Xenophon. l. 5. de Cyri inſtit. ὡυτίκα δ' ἐχ ἐρᾷ ἀδελφὸς ἀδελφῆς, ἀλλ' ὃ αὐτός· ἐδὲ πατὴρ θυγατρὸς, ἀλλ' ὃ αὐτός. The Father is not in love with the Daughter; nor a Brother with his Siſter: the reaſon is, ἡ γὰρ φόβος ἡ νόμος ἱκανὸς ἔρωτα κωλύειν, fear and the laws are reſtraint enough for this love: but becauſe to Coſens this bar is not ſet, the greater propenſity they have to love, the more need there is they ſhould be permitted to marry. * And this very thing was obſerved by Rabanus in his Epiſtle to Humbert. Hujuſmodi prohibitiones adulterii occaſionem præbere; ſuch laws of Reſtraint are occaſions of Adultery and therefore he infers from thence, Bonum eſſe ut prætermiſſis illis prohibitionibus legis Divinæ ſervetur conſtitutio. It were good if ſtanding in the meaſures of the Divine law, we ſhould lay a ſnare for no mans foot by putting fetters upon his liberty, without juſt cauſe, but not without great danger.

82. I know of no more reaſons pretended againſt this affair; I think theſe are all; and I am ſure they are the moſt conſiderable. But then on the other ſide, although it were hard to require any more reaſon for the marriage of Coſen Germans, then we doe for any other marriage, that is, that we love the perſon, that ſhe be vertuous and fitted for our condition, yet I ſay ex abundanti, that there are conveniences and advantages which are not contemptible, nor yet are ſo readily to be found in the marriage of other perſons.

83. 1. There is the advantage of a great and moſt perfect parity of condition that is regularly to be expected. There is no upbraiding of Kinred, greatneſs or weakneſs of fortune occaſion'd by the difference of elder or younger Brother; (for this being in all families is not a reproach to any) and here is the greateſt probability of a ſimilitude of paſſions, humors and affections, and they that have experience in œconomical affairs know that theſe things are not contemptible.

84. 2. It is obſervable that when God intended to bleſs a family and a Nation, there he permitted, and in ſome caſes commanded the marriage of Coſen Germans, as in the families of Iſrael. And although it was lawful for one tribe to marry into another, as appears in David who married Michol Saul's daughter of the tribe of Benjamin; and the Benjamitiſh families were reſtored by the intermarriages of the other tribes after that ſad war about the Levits concubine; and Hillel the Phariſee was of the tribe of Benjamin by his Father, and of Judah by his Mother, yet this was done ſo ſeldome, that it was almoſt thought not lawful; but the moſt general practice was to marry in their own neerer Kinred, in their own tribe.

85. 3. In the caſe of the ἐπίκληροι or Heireſſes it was commanded both in the Hebrew and in the Attick laws that Coſen Germans ſhould marry, leſt the inheritance ſhould goe from the family; of which I have already given an account; but now I onely obſerve the reaſonableneſs and advantage. S. Auſtin's [largiùs ſparge amicitias] is nothing; for when any conſiderable advantage is to be done, certainly our own are to to be preferred before ſtrangers. And the ſame alſo is true in proportion, when any one of the family is paſſionately and to pious purpoſes in love with his Coſen.

86. 4. In the caſe of an Aunts Daughter to be married to her Coſen by her Mothers Brother, there is this advantage to be gotten to the female ſide; ſhe preſerves her Fathers name in her own iſſue, which ſhe had loſt in her own perſon and marriage.

87. 5. In the accidents of houſhold converſation, and in the ſatieties of a Huſbands love, the ſtock of Kinred comes in by way of auxiliary forces to eſtabliſh a declining or tempted love: and they underſtood this well, who made it an objection againſt the marriage of Kinred, leſt the love being upon two accounts ſhould be too violent, as Ariſtotle in the ſecond book of his Politicks, ſeems to intimate. But I ſuppoſe that they who are concerned in ſuch marriages, will not fear the objection; but they have reaſon to value the advantage.

Ovid. 10 Met. ——dum pietas geminato creſcit amore while the marital love is ſupported with the cognation.

88. 6. S. Auguſtins argument is to me highly conſiderable. « Fuit anti-
Lib. 15. c. 16. de civit. Dei. quis patribus religioſæ curæ, ne ipſa propinquitas ſe paulatim propaginum ordinibus dirimens longius abiret, & propinquitas eſſe deſiſteret, eam nondum longe poſitum rurſus matrimonii vinculo colligare, & quodammodo revocare fugientem. The dearneſs of Kinred will quickly wear out, and Coſens will too ſoon grow ſtrangers, therefore the Patriarchs had a religious care to recall the propinquity which was dividing and ſeparating too faſt; and as it were, to bind it by the ties of marriage, and recall it when it was flying away. And indeed there is no greater ſtability to a family, no greater band to conjugal affections then the marriage of Coſens.

89. I ſhould now ſpeak no more to this queſtion, but that I have often met with a trifling objection concerning which I could never find any reaſonable pretence, or ground of probability to warrant it. Second Coſens may not marry, but are expreſsly forbidden, therefore much rather firſt Coſens though they be not nam'd. To this I anſwer that I never knew the marriage of ſecond Coſens forbidden, but by them who at the ſame time forbad the marriage of the firſt: and indeed I have ſearched and cannot fixe my eye upon any thing that I can imagine to be the ground of the fancy: therefore I can ſay no more to it; but that the law of God does not forbid either, nor the laws of our Church or State, nor the laws of Nature or Nations, or right reaſon, but theſe marriages have advantages in all theſe. And we find that Iſaac married his ſecond Coſen, and that was more for it then ever could be ſaid againſt it. Abraham was careful and Rebeccah was careful that their children reſpectively ſhould marry within their own Kinred: for it ſo was deſign'd becauſe thoſe families were to be greatly and ſpecially bleſſed; and they called one another into the participation of it. I conclude this queſtion with as much warranty to the marriage of Coſen Germans as can derive from the Premiſes; they may without ſcruple own it, and ſay

Viderit amplexûs aliquis laudabimur ambo.

I know no other pretences of any inſtance obliging Chriſtians, derived onely from the Judicial law. Theſe two doe not oblige; and therefore the Rule is true in its direct affirmation.

Rule 4.

The ten Commandements of Moſes, commonly called the Moral law, is not a perfect digeſt of the law of Nature.

1. THE Jews in their Cabala ſay that the law of God was made before the creation of the World two thouſand yeers and written in black burnt letters on the back ſide of a bright ſhining fire; according to that of David, Thy word is a lanthern unto my feet, and a light unto my paths. Their meaning is, (for under Phantaſtick expreſſions they ſometimes intended to repreſent a material terial truth) that the Decalogue or their Systeme of Moral precepts was nothing but an expres or the Tables of the law of Nature; long before Moses time given and practis'd by their Fathers. But this was not a perfect Systeme; it was the best that ever was since Adam brake the Tables of the Natural law and let sin and weak principles into the world; and it was sufficient in the present constitution of the world; but even this also was but like a Pædagogue to bring us to Christ. In the Scholes of Moses they practised the first rudiments of perfection; but Christ was the last and therefore the most perfect Lawgiver; and they that did commence under Moses the servant of God, were to proceed under Jesus Christ the son of God: and therefore the Apostle calls Christ τέλος τοῦ νόμου: and if we will acknowledge Christ to be our lawgiver, and the Gospel to be his law, called in the New Testament, The law of liberty, a Royal law; then we must expect that our duty shall be further extended then to a conformity in our lives to the ten words of Moses. Rom. 7. 4.

2. I doe not here intend a dispute whether Christ hath given us laws of which neither before Moses nor since there are no footsteps in the Old Testament; for I think there are none such, but in the letter or in the analogy they were taught and recommended before: but this I say; that some excellencies and perfections of morality were by Christ superadded in the very instances of the Decalogue; these also were bound upon us with greater severity, are indeared to us by special promises, and we by proper aides are inabled to their performance; and the old commandements are explicated by new commentaries, and are made to be laws in new instances to which by Moses they were not obliged; and some of those excellent sayings which are respersed in the old Testament, and which are the dawnings of the Evangelical light, are now part of that body of light which derives from the Son of righteousness: insomuch that a commandement which was given of old, was given again in new manner, and to new purposes, and in more eminent degrees; and therefore is also called a new commandement. Thus the conversation Evangelical is called an old Commandement and a new one. So that in the whole this will amount to the same thing as if they were new Commandements. I will not therefore trouble this article with those artificial Nothings; or endeavour to force any man to say Christ hath given us new Commandements; but this I suppose to be very evident; That we are by Jesus Christ oblig'd to doe many things to which the law of Moses did not oblige the sons of Israel: but whether this was by a new Imposition, or a new explication of the old, it matters not, save that some men will be humor'd in their own manner of speaking. 1 Joh. 2. 7, 8.

3. I give an instance; The Christians are obliged to love their Brethren, and their Neighbours: The Jews were so too: but Christ commanded us to love those whom the Jews did not call Brethren or Neighbours; even all that have the same Nature, even all that are in calamity. For to the question ask'd by the Pharisees, and who is our Neighbour? Christ answer'd by the Parable of him that fell among the Thieves: He that is in need is our neighbour. The Jews understood this to mean nothing but one of the same Nation or Religion, the rest they hated. Here then is a new duty; to which the Jews in the same latitude and in the same expressions were not bound by the Decalogue; and this is as much as a new Commandement: for it is new to me if it imposes a new duty. So if God forbids incest: and by it onely means the conjunction of Parents and children, if afterwards he commands us to abstain from Brother and Sister, Uncles and Aunts; this is a new law under the old words. The Jews Levit. 19. 18.

Jews might hate their enemies; but Christians have none, that is, they have none whom they are to repúte such by a legal account. The seven Nations in Palestine were legally and properly to be accounted Enemies; but to Christians all are to be esteemed as Brethren in some account or other; ἐδεὶς ἐχθρὸς τῷ σπουδαίῳ, To a good man no man is enemy: So that by alteration of the subject matter, the old law is become new, that is, we have a new law. Lex vetus amorem docet in proximos, nova in extraneos. The old law teaches love to Neighbours, the new to strangers, that is, to such whom the Jews called so; but yet the Christians are to treat as Neighbours. For that is a duty to us which was not so to them; and we may perish for omitting that, to which they were not obliged so much as under the pain of a legal impurity.

Hierocles.

Tertull.

4. But not onely in the object of our duty; but in the expression and signification of action Christ is a New lawgiver. They and we are bound to love our Brethren; but the precept of love did not bind them to what we are bound: We must die for our Brethren; and of this we have an express commandement, which it is certain they had not; and no sign of it in their Moral law. And it is not the same words, but the same intension of duty that makes the same law. The Jews were bound to love their wives; but an easiness of divorce did consist with that duty exacted by that law, but it will not doe so in ours. Now as in moral actions a degree alters the kind; so it is in laws; for every new degree of duty that is requir'd supposes a new authority or a new Sanction to inferre it; for the same law does not in one age directly permit an action, and in another forbid it; it does not reward that person which in another it will condemne.

1 John. 3. 16. Joh. 15. 12, 13.

5. But I adde other instances. If Repentance be a precept, and not onely a privilege; it is certain that in the Gospel there is a precept which was not permitted, much less injoin'd; for this obedience supposes Christ to be our Redeemer in Nature before he is our lawgiver, and therefore that it could be no part of their Moral law. But Repentance is not properly and primarily a law of Nature; for though it was the first action of religion that we find was done in the world, yet it is such a one as supposes Nature lapsed; and therefore at the most can be but adopted into the law of Nature: but yet because it is as much a part of the law of Nature, as Restitution is a part of Natural Justice, this instance is not altogether an improper illustration of this Rule.

6. But there are also many things for which provisions are made in the law of Nature; for which there is no caution in the Decalogue. I instance in the matter of incest; and if any man will reduce it to the fifth Commandement, it is certain he must then suppose, onely the mixture of parents and children to be, and that of Brother and Sister not to be incestuous; for these cannot come under the Title of Father and Mother; and if it be refer'd to the seventh Commandement it will be as improper as to suppose jeering to be forbidden in the sixth. I could adde that there being but two affirmative precepts in the Decalogue, there is no caution against sins of omission in any other instances.

7. I will not instance in those precepts which relate to our B. Lord himself, and are superinduc'd by Christianity upon the law of Nature; such as are [faith in Jesus Christ, hope of eternal life, fraternal correption, avoiding scandal, custody of the tongue in many instances, the Sacraments, to stand fast in Christian liberty, searching the Scriptures, humility, mortification, bearing the infirmi- infirmities of the weak] and many more; all which proclaime Chriſt to be our lawgiver; but doe not properly denote the imperfection of the Decalogue as it is a Syſteme of the laws of Nature.

8. But I adde from the very ſtock of Nature many others. For though by the Decalogue we are forbidden to doe evil, yet we are not commanded to doe good: and that is a material conſideration; and cannot by way of reduction be brought hither: becauſe they are wholly different things, and are the effects of ſeveral reaſons, and to be incouraged by diſtinct promiſes or immunities reſpectively, and are not conſequent to each other. For the ſons of Iſrael and all the world are bound to doe evil to no man, but are not bound to doe good to every man: The firſt is poſſible, the ſecond is not: and the Jewes never underſtood that they were bound to give almes by the ſixth Commandement: and in Nature the obligation to doe good is upon a poſitive account; as the obligation it ſelf is. Of the ſame Nature is Gratitude, readineſs to help a man in need, to keep a ſecret intruſted to us, to performe promiſes: all which are of greater concernment to mankind then to be intruſted onely to analogies, uncertain inferences and ſecret corollaries, and yet for theſe there is no proviſion made in the ten commandements.

9. Neither can this meaſure of the Decalogue be reprov'd by ſaying that all theſe laws of Nature, and all the laws of Chriſt may be reduc'd to the Decalogue. I know it is ſaid ſo very commonly, and the Caſuiſts doe commonly uſe that Method, that the explication of the Decalogue be the Summe of all their Moral Theology; but how inſufficiently, the foregoing inſtances doe ſufficiently demonſtrate: and therefore how inartificially will alſo appear in the violence and convulſions that muſt needs be uſed to draw all theſe diſſonancies into one center. I remember that Tertullian (I ſuppoſe to try his wit) finds all the Decalogue in the Commandement which God gave to Adam to abſtain from the forbidden fruit. In hac enim lege Adæ data omnia præcepta condita recognoſcimus, quæ poſtea pullulaverunt data per Moſen. And juſt ſo may all the laws of Nature and of Chriſt be found in the Decalogue, as the Decalogue can be found in the precept given to Adam: but then alſo they might be found in the firſt Commandement of the Decalogue, and then what need had there been of ten? It is therefore more then probable that this was intended as a digeſt of all thoſe moral laws in which God would expect and exact their obedience; leaving the perfection and conſummation of all unto the time of the Goſpel: God intending by ſeveral portions of the Eternal or Natural law to bring the world to that perfection from whence Mankind by ſin did fall; and by Chriſt to inlarge this Natural law to a ſimilitude and conformity to God himſelf as far as our infirmities can bear. It was very well ſaid of Tertullian, Intelligimus Dei legem etiam ante Moyſen; nec in Oreb tantum, aut in Sina & in Eremo primum, ſed antiquiorem, primum in Paradyſo, poſt Patriarchis, atque ita ex Judæis certis temporibus reformatam: ut non jam ad Moyſi legem ita attendamus, quaſi ad principalem legem, ſed ad ſubſequentem quam certo tempore Deus & gentibus exhibuit, & repromiſſa per Prophetas in melius reformavit. The law of God was before Moſes, neither given in Horeb nor in Sinai, in the wilderneſs [nor in the land] but firſt given in Paradiſe; afterwards to the Patriarchs, and then being reformed it was given to the Jews: ſo that we are not to look after Moſes law as the principal, but to the law that comes after the law of Moſes, which being promiſed by the Prophets God in the fulneſs of time gave unto the Gentiles in the times of reformation.

10. The

10. The effects of this Rule in order to Conſcience are theſe:

1. 1. That we acknowledge Chriſt to be our Lord and Maſter, our lawgiver and our Teacher.

2. 2. That we underſtand the ten Commandements according to his Commentary.

3. 3. That the Cuſtomes, explications, gloſſes, and uſages of the Jews may not be the limit of our practice.

4. 4. That we expect not juſtification by our conformity to the Decalogue.

5. 5. That we endeavour to goe on to perfection; not according to the pattern which Moſes, but which Chriſt ſhewed in the Mount.

6. 6. That we doe not reckon any Syſteme of the Natural law, but the books of the New Teſtament.

7. 7. That we doe not eſteem it ſufficient for us to live according to Nature (as the expreſſion is commonly uſed) but that we live according to Grace, that is, the meaſures of reformed Nature. For in this ſenſe theſe words of Juſtin Martyr are true and uſeful, τὸ κατὰ φύσιν ζῆν ἐπαίνου τινὸς ἄξιον ἐστιν, To live according to Nature is the ornament or praiſe of one that is yet an Unbeliever: meaning that the Diſciples of Jeſus muſt doe more. For according as the world growes in age, ſo alſo it is inſtructed in wiſe notices; and it muſt paſs on to glory by all the meaſures and progreſſions of grace; and all that law by which we live in all the periods of the world is nothing elſe but the ſeveral degrees and promotions of the law of Nature. For children are governed by one meaſure and young men by another, and old men ſtill by a more perfect; and yet the whole is nothing elſe but right reaſon drawn into laws, and that which fits our Nature bound upon us by the decree of God: ſome laws fit our Natures as they are common to us and beaſts: ſome fit us as we are next to Angels; and ſome fit us as we are deſign'd to immortality, and the fruition of God: and the laws of Nature do grow as our Natures doe. And as we ſee is in matters of ſpeculation, thoſe principles enter into us, or are drawn from their hidden places, in our age of which we had no ſign in our youth; and when we are children we admire at thoſe things and call thoſe diſcourſes deep and excellent which when we are grown up we are aſham'd of as being ignorant and pitiful. So it is in our manners, and ſo it is in our practical notices; they all grow till they arrive at their ſtate and period: but becauſe the Eternal laws of God, that is, thoſe laws which are not fitted to times and perſons and relations, but to the Nature of man, that is, to all Mankind, intend to bring us to God and to all that perfection of which we are capable; therefore it is that they alſo muſt increaſe according to the growth of Nature: when therefore the Nature of man was rude and in its infancy, God drew out of the Eternal fountain but a few of theſe Natural laws: but he ſtill ſuperadded more as the world did need them, and at the laſt by his Son, who by his incarnation hath adorn'd our Nature with a robe of glory, hath drawn out all thoſe by which we are to converſe with God and men in the beſt and greateſt Entercourſes: that he might enable our Nature to diſpoſitions proper and immediate to a ſtate of glory. Not but that they all were potentially in the bowels of the great Commandements; but that God did not by any Prophets or Lawgivers draw them all forth, till the great day of reformation, at the Revelation of the Son of God. But in this the ſentence of Irenæus is wiſe and full. Conſummata vitæ præcepta in utroque Teſtamento cùm ſint eadem, eundem oſtenderunt Deum qui particularia quidem præcepta apta utriſque præceptis, ſed eminentiora & ſumma, ſine quibus ſalvari non poteſt, in utroque eadem ſuaſit. The precepts of perfect life are the ſame in both Teſtaments, and doe demon-demonſtrate the ſame God of both; who indeed hath given ſeverally ſeveral inſtances of Commandements; but the more eminent and the chief, without which ſalvation is not to be had, are the ſame in Both. Meaning, that there are the ſame general lines of Religion, and of Juſtice in the old and in the new; but the ſpecial and particular precepts are ſeverally inſtanc'd by Chriſt and Moſes.

All the explications of the Moral law which are found in the Prophets and other holy writers of the Old Teſtament, are to be accounted as parts of the Moral law, and equally obliging the Conſcience.

1. HE that will explicate the Moſaick law according to the perfections of the Goſpel, does expound the words of a child by the Senſes and deepeſt policies of a witty man. I have ſeen ſome parts of Virgil chang'd into impure Feſcennines; and I have alſo ſeen them chang'd into the ſenſe and ſtile of the Goſpel; but Virgil intended neither, though his words were capable of both; and yet the way to underſtand Virgil is by the Commentaries of men of his own time, or Nation, or learned in the language and cuſtomes of the Romans. So it is in the Decalogue of Moſes. If Chriſtians underſtand it by all the ſeverities and inlarged notices of the Goſpel, they accuſe their own Commentary as too large, or the practice of the Jews who never obeyed them at that rate; and therefore all thoſe wilde reductions of all good and bad to that meaſure is of no good uſe, but it is full of error, and may have ſome ill effects; of which I have already given caution: but then becauſe they may be explicated and can admit a commentary, as all laws doe beyond their letter; there is nothing more reaſonable, then that the commentaries or additional explications of their own Prophets and Holy men, and the uſages of their Nation be taken into the ſacredneſs of the text and the limits of the Commandement.

2. Thus when God had ſaid, Thou ſhalt doe no murder; when Moſes in another place addes theſe words, Thou ſhalt not hate thy Brother in thy heart; nor be mindful of an injury: this is to be ſuppoſed to be intended by God in the Commandement; and to be a juſt commentary to the text, and therefore part of the Moral law. When they were commanded to worſhip the God of Iſrael and no other: this was to be underſtood according to Davids commentary; and when he had compoſed forms of prayer to God, to pray to him was to be ſuppos'd to be a duty of the Commandement. God commanded that they ſhould honour Father and Mother, which appellative when Moſes and the Holy Writers of the Old Teſtament had given to Princes and Magiſtrates, and had in another place expreſsly commanded obedience to them, it is to be ſuppoſed that this is an explication of the fifth Commandement. Lev. 19. 17, 18.

3. This alſo is to be extended further, and by the ſayings of the Prophets they could underſtand what things were permitted by Moſes, which yet God loved loved not: and that the Commandement had a further purpose then their usages would endure: and though (as our Blessed Lord afterward expres'd) Moses permitted divorces for the hardness of their heart; yet that from the beginning it was not so, and that greater piety was intended in the Commandement they were sufficiently taught by the Gloss which God himself inserted and published by the Prophet Hosea, I hate putting away. In this and all other cases the Natural reasonableness of things, Natural justice, and Essential piety, and the first institution of them were the best indications of these effects which such sayings of the Prophets and other Holy Men ought to have in the enlargement of the Moral law, or restraint of privileges and liberties.

4. The use of this Rule in order to the Government of Conscience is to describe of what usefulness in our religion, and what influence in our lives is the Old Testament; all the Moral precepts which are particulars of the Natural law or universal Reason are either explications of the Decalogue or precepts Evangelical, by which the old Prophets did prepare the way of our Lord, and make his paths strait. It is the same religion theirs and ours as to the Moral part: intending glory to the same God by the same principles of prime reason, differing onely in the clarity and obscurity of the promises or Motives of Obedience, and in the particular instances of the general laws, and in the degrees of duties spiritual: but in both, God intended to bring Mankind to Eternal glories by religion or the Spiritual worshippings of one God, by justice and sobriety, that is, by such waies as Naturally we need for our Natural and perfective being even in this World. Now in these things the Prophets are preachers of righteousness, and we may refresh our souls at those rivulets springing from the wells of life, but we must fill and bath our selves in fontibus salvatoris in the fountains of our Blessed Saviour: for he hath anointed our heads, prepar'd a table for us, and made our cup to overflow and of his fulness we have all received, Grace for Grace.

5. But this is at no hand to be extended to those prohibitions or reprehensions of their prevarications of any of the signal precepts or religion, by which as themselves were distinguish'd from other Nations, so God would be glorified in them. For sometimes the Prophets represented the anger of God in a ceremonial instance: when either they sin'd with a high hand in that instance, that is, with despite and contempt of the Divine Commandement, or when the Ceremony had a mixture of morality, or when it was one of the distinctions of the Nation, and a consignation of them to be the people of God. But this will be reduc'd to practice by the next Rule.

Rule 6.

Every thing in the Decalogue is not obligatory to Christians, is not a portion of the Moral or Natural law.

1. When Moses deliver'd the ten Commandements to the people, he did not tell them in order which was second, which was fifth: and upon this account they have been severally divided as men did please to fancy. I shall ſhall not clog theſe annotations with enumerating the ſeveral wates of dividing them; but that which relates to the preſent inquiry is whether or no the prohibition of graven images be a portion of the firſt Commandement; ſo as that nothing is intended but that it be a part or explication of that: and that it contain in it onely the duty of confeſſing one God, and entertaining no other Deity viz. ſo that images become not an idol, or the final object of our worſhip as a God; and therefore that images are onely forbidden as Dii alieni, not as the repreſentations of this one God, and they are capable of any worſhip but that which is proper to God: or elſe it is a diſtinct Commandement; and forbids the having, or making, and worſhipping any images with any kind of religious worſhip. Theſe are the ſeveral effects which are deſign'd by the differing diviſions of the firſt Table; I will not now examine whether they certainly follow from their premiſes and preſuppoſitions; but conſider what is right, and what follows from thence in order to the integrating The Rule of Conſcience. That thoſe two firſt Commandements are but one was the doctrine of Philo the Jew (at leſt it is ſaid ſo) who making the Preface to be a diſtinct Commandement; reckons this to be the ſecond; Deos ſculptiles non facies tibi, nec facies omne abhominamentum Solis & Lunæ, nec omnium quæ ſunt ſupra terram, nec eorum quæ repunt in aquis, Ego ſum Deus Dominus tuus Zelotes, &c. And the ſame was followed by Athanaſius, This book hath theſe ten Commandements in Tables; The firſt is ἐγώ εἰμι Κύριος ὁ Θεός σα· The ſecond, thou ſhalt not make an idol to thy ſelf, nor the likeneſs of any thing: and this diviſion was uſual in S. Cyrils time who brings in Julian thus accounting them. I am the Lord thy God which brought thee out of the land of Egypt: The ſecond after this: Non erunt tibi Dii alieni præter me, non facies tibi ſimulacrum, &c. and the ſame way is followed by S. Jerome and Heſychius: Theſe make the introduction to be one of the Commandements; and thoſe which we call the firſt and the ſecond to be the ſecond onely.

4. In this great contrariety of opinion that which I chooſe to follow is the way of the Church of England, which as it hath the greater and more certain authority from Antiquity, ſo it hath much the greater reaſonableneſs. For when God had commanded the worſhip of himſelf alone excluding all falſe Gods: In the next words he was pleas'd alſo to forbid them to worſhip him in that manner by which all the Gods of the Nations were worſhipped, which was, by images: inſomuch that their images were called Gods, not that they thought them ſo; but that the worſhipping of falſe Gods, and worſhipping by images were by the idolaters ever join'd. Now this being a different thing from the other: one regarding the object, the other the manner of worſhip;

2. it is highly reaſonable to beleeve that they make two Commandements. 2. God would not be worſhipped by an image, becauſe none could be made of him; and therefore it is remarkable that God did duplicate his caution againſt images of him, by adding this reaſon to his precept, Remember that ye ſaw no ſhape, but onely heard a voice: which as it was a direct deſign of God that they might not make an image of him, and ſo worſhip him as the idolaters did their falſe Gods, ſo it did indirectly at leaſt intimate to them, that God would be worſhipped in ſpirit and truth, that is, not with a lying image: as every image of him muſt needs be: for it can have no truth when a finite body repreſents an infinite Spirit. And this is moſt likely to be thus: becauſe this being a certain digeſt of the law of Nature, in it the Natural Religion and worſhip of God was to be commanded, and therefore that it ſhould be ſpiritual and true, that is, not with falſe imaginations and corporal repreſentment, was to

3. be the matter of a Commandement. 3. Since the firſt Table did ſo deſcend to particulars as by a diſtinct precept to appoint the day of his worſhip: it is not unlikely that the eſſential and Natural manner of doing it ſhould alſo be diſtinctly provided for, ſince the circumſtantial was: but that could not be at all, if it was a portion of the firſt Commandement: for then the ſenſe of it muſt be according to the firſt intention, that images ſhould not become

4. our Gods. 4. The Heathens did not ſuppoſe their images to be their Gods, but repreſentments of their Gods, and therefore it is not ſo likely that God ſhould by way of caution ſo explicate the firſt Commandement; when there was no danger of doing any ſuch thing; unleſs they ſhould be

5. ſtark mad, or fools and without underſtanding. 5. When God forbad them to make and worſhip the likeneſs of any thing in heaven and earth; he ſufficiently declar'd that his meaning was to forbid that manner of worſhipping not that Object; for by ſaying it was the likeneſs of ſomething it declar'd that this likeneſs could not be the Object of their worſhipping; for becauſe it is the image of a thing, therefore it is not the thing they worſhip'd; and it cannot be ſuppos'd of a man that he can make the image of the Sun to be his God, when he makes that image of the Sun, becauſe he thinks the Sun is the moſt excellent thing. When therefore in the firſt Commandement he had forbidden them to acknowledge the Sun, or any thing elſe but himſelf to be God; In the next he forbids the worſhipping himſelf or any thing elſe by an image. But of this I ſhall ſpeak more afterwards; becauſe it relates to the moral duty.

5. But I obſerve that all thoſe Modernes who confound theſe two Commandements have not that pretence which the Ancients had; and have quitted all that by which ſuch confuſion could have been in any ſence tolerable. For Philo and thoſe Ancients who followed him; reckon the firſt Commandement to be; [I am the Lord thy God, &c.] by which God would be acknowledged to be the Lord: and the ſecond did forbid any ether beſides him. So that there might be ſome appearance of reaſon to make the firſt Commandement affirmative, and the ſecond Negative; The firſt to declare who is God; The ſecond to forbid Polytheiſme, The firſt to declare his Entity; the ſecond to publiſh his Unity: The firſt to ingage their duty to him who had ſo lately endear'd them by freedom from captivity: The ſecond to forbid the adopting the Gods of the Nations with whom they were now to converſe.

I con-

I confeſs that theſe reaſons are not ſufficient; for they multiply where the re is no need; and make a diviſion without difference; and leave all thoſe periods which are about images to be of no uſe, no ſignification; and concerning their own practice and religion in the matter of images, though it is certain they wholly deriv'd it from the Commandement, yet they take no notice of any warrant at all deriv'd from thence; but ſuppoſing that they did make the diviſion for theſe reaſons, and that theſe reaſons were good, yet all the Modernes quit all this pretenſion; and allow but three Commandements to the firſt Table, and divide the ſecond into ſeven; to effect which they make two Commandements againſt Concupiſcence: concerning which I will not ſay they might have reckon'd more according to the multiplication of the objects; four as well as two: but this I ſay, as it is wholly without neceſſity, and very deſtitute of any probability; ſo it is done againſt the very order of words. For although Moſes in Deuteronomy reckons the Concupiſcence of the wife firſt, yet in Exodus, which is the copy of the Decalogue as it was given, Moſes reckons the Concupiſcence of the houſe firſt: So that the ninth Commandement lies in the body of the tenth; and the tenth lies part of it before the ninth, and part of it after: which is a prejudice againſt it greater then can be outweigh'd by any or all the pretences which are or can be made for it: eſpecially ſince by the opinions of the Roman Doctors, theſe two cannot as they lie here make two objects: for to covet another mans wife, is the ſame as to covet another mans ſervant, that is, as a poſſeſſion; for multitude of wives was great riches, and the peculiar of Princes, as appears in Nathans upbraiding David, and the caſe of Solomon: but to covet the wife propter libidinem is forbidden by the ſeventh Commandement, as the Roman Doctors teach, and under that they handle it. Therefore the wife, and the ſervant and the beaſt of another man being here forbidden to be deſir'd as matter of Covetouſneſs make but one object, and conſequently but one Commandement: and if becauſe a difference can be fancied, the wife and the houſe make two objects: then the ſervant makes a third: for a houſe differs from a wife no more then a ſervant from a houſe, the uſe of theſe is as different as of thoſe and can make as diſtinct objects of appetite and deſire; and therefore either they all muſt make but one Commandement, or they muſt make more then two.

6. But the Church of Rome and the Lutherans have ſeveral intereſts, for other reaſons they have none in ſo doing. The Church of Rome confounds the two Commandements, leſt the worſhipping of images ſhould appear to be forbidden. For if it be a diſtinct Commandement which forbids the worſhip of images; then becauſe all falſe objects of worſhip are ſufficiently forbidden in the firſt; it will not be a competent anſwer to ſay, we doe not worſhip images as Gods, we doe not make idols of them; for to worſhip any thing as God is not forbidden in the ſecond Commandement, but in the firſt: but therefore leſt the ſecond Commandement ſhould ſignifie nothing, it follows, that the taking of images into religion, or the worſhipping God whether true or falſe by an image is there forbidden. But if theſe two Commandements were one, then they ſuppoſe, that this of forbidding images being a purſuance of the prohibition of having any other Gods, expounds it ſelf onely to mean, the making images to be God, which becauſe they doe not; they hope to ſtand upright in the Scrutiny concerning this Commandement.

7. But to this I return this account: That although it be certain that if theſe Commandements be divided, it will follow that this manner of Religion by image-worſhip, is particularly forbidden as a falſe manner of worſhipping and conſequently is upon no pretence to be introduc'd into religion; yet if we ſhould ſuppoſe them to be but one Commandement, it will not follow that images are not forbidden to be us'd in religious worſhippings. For if God forbad them to make Deos ſculptiles, Engraven Gods, that is, to worſhip ſuch Gods as may be depicted or engraven, ſuch as the Sun and Moon, Apis and Jupiter; the oxe of Egypt or the fire of Perſia; then by the ſame reaſon we conclude that Deus ſculptilis is no God, and therefore to make the God of Iſrael to be a God depicted or engraven does diſhonour and depreſs him to the manner of an idol. For therefore in the Decalogue recited by Philo and in the ſenſe of all the Ancients; the reaſon againſt making an engraven God is, Ego ſum Deus tuus Zelotes, Iam thy God, I am thy Jealous God; that is, I who cannot be repreſented by ſuch vanities, I am thy God, but they are not, who can. * Adde to this; that ſince the Doctors of the Roman Church make the Decalogue to be the fountain of all Moral Theology and by that method deſcribe all caſes of Conſcience; it is neceſſary that they take into the body and obligation of every Commandement not onely what is expreſs'd in the letter and firſt ſignification, but the Species, the relations, the ſimilitudes, the occaſions, any thing that is like the prohibition, and concerning which we cannot tell whether it be or no; and upon this account if they can retain images or think to honour God by the uſe and worſhipping of them; they may be confident of any thing, and may as well uſe ſome pollutions of the fleſh, as ſuch pollutions of idols.

8. But there is alſo more in it then thus. For although it is uſually ſuppoſed by learned perſons, that Philo the Jew, Athanaſius, S. Hierom, and S. Auſtin are of opinion that the two Commandements are not to be divided, but are all one: yet if we look into their ſayings we ſhall find them to have other effects then they ſuppoſe. For they making the Preface to be the firſt Commandement, [I am the Lord thy God which brought thee out of the land of Egypt] doe ſuppoſe that the object of Religion and Divine worſhip is ſufficiently declar'd in that they think the ſame of that as all other men doe of the following words: [Thou ſhalt have no other Gods but me] viz. That God propoſing himſelf as their God, whom onely they were to worſhip, did by that ſufficiently exclude the worſhip of all falſe Gods, or giving Divine worſhip to any thing beſides himſelf: So that when the object is ſufficiently provided for as it is in the firſt Commandement however it be computed, the former arguments will return upon them, and it will be moſt probable that the next proviſion be made for the manner of the Divine worſhip; and then the uſe of images in religion and the Religious worſhip of them will be by a neceſſary and immediate conſequent forbidden: for the forbidding Deos ſculptiles: forbids not onely other Gods; but forbids them with that reaſon and demonſtration. They that can be ingraven or painted are no Gods, and therefore images and falſe Gods are equally forbidden, where ever an image is join'd to a God, there is a falſe God, or no true God: for an image and the true God are inconſiſtent. So that where ever there are two Commandements before that of taking Gods Name in vain, as it is amongſt all the Ancients (Clemens Alexandrinus onely excepted) there it is moſt likely that the firſt provides for the object of Divine worſhip affirmatively, and the ſecond for the manner negatively: and the effect of this will be, that they are in their Diviſion of the Decalogue almoſt wholly deſtitute of authority or warrant from the Ancients, for they all make four Comman-

Commandements in the firſt Table, at leaſt; The Jews uſually indeed did reckon five: taking in that of honouring our Parents, but they alwayes made that of the Sabbath to be the fourth; by all which it muſt needs be, that they muſt lie under the ſame objection which they would fain avoid: and though they confound thoſe two which we uſually now reckon the two firſt; yet becauſe the Jews and ancient Chriſtians who reckon'd otherwiſe did account one Commandement to the ſame purpoſe as we reckon the firſt; that which follows can never be prov'd to mean any thing but a prohibition of that manner of Divine worſhip by images; for it implies that to worſhip God by an image, is to worſhip an idol: an image of God when it is worſhipped is an idol, for neither can the true God have an image, neither will he be worſhipped by an image. Now though this will not at all concerne the images of Saints, but onely the worſhip of God by an image, yet even this alſo when they think this image worſhip ſhall be a worſhipping and honouring of God indirectly, and an act pleaſing to him, will come under this Commandement, as certainly and more apparently then fornication or intemperance ſhall come under the ſixth or ſeventh; whither their Doctors uſually reduce them.

9. This thing more I am willing to adde concerning the diviſion of the Decalogue: That when the Ancients did reckon the preface or introduction to be the firſt Commandement; it is not certain that they put the words of [Thou ſhalt have no other Gods but me] to the Second: For as for Philo, he does not recite them at all, but reckons the ſecond otherwiſe then it is in Moſes books, and it is not certain how he thought in this queſtion to him that well conſiders his copy of the Decalogue. For he thus begins [I am the Lord thy God who brought thee out of the land of Egypt. Thou ſhalt not make any graven Gods to thy ſelf: nor any abhomination of Sun and Moon: nor of any thing that is on the earth, or that creeps in the waters: I am thy Lord, the jealous God, &c.] Now in this which is firſt and which is ſecond is plain enough though Philo does not number them: but whether the words of that which we call the firſt Commandement, by him are underſtood in the firſt or in the ſecond does not hence appear. But then for S. Athanaſius whom the adverſaries reckon theirs, the caſe is yet clearer againſt them: for [I am the Lord thy God] he reckons to be the firſt, omitting all that which follows until the ſecond Commandement: but the ſecond he plainly and perfectly reckons as we doe, [Thou ſhalt not make to thy ſelf an idol, or graven image, nor the likeneſs of any thing] So that it is probable, He begins the firſt Commandement with the Preface: but it is certain he reckons the ſecond as we doe. S. Hierome and S. Auſtin are pretended for them; but they alſo teſtifie againſt them, and againſt themſelves by an uncertain and contradictory ſentence (as I have ſhewed:) indeed the Apoſtate Julian is much more for them and does confound thoſe which we call the two Commandements, but yet reckons one before them, juſt as Philo: ſo that excepting Julian there will be found in antiquity, Vel duo vel nemo, ſcarce one or two that is on their ſide. However againſt them there is a great authority and very great probabilities of reaſon: of which in the following periods, I ſhall adde a more full account: In the mean time as the Church of Rome is deſtitute of any juſt ground of their manner of dividing the Ten Commandements, ſo they will find it will not ſerve that intereſt they have deſign'd.

10. But then for the Lutheran Churches they have indeed as little reaſon for their diviſion, and a much leſs intereſt and neceſſity to ſerve and to provide for.

They therefore thrust the second into the first: lest it should be Unlawful to make, or to have Pictures or images; for they still keep them in their Churches, and are fearful to be aspersed with a crime forbidden in the second Commandement; they keep them I say, but for Memory onely, not for worship or direct Religion. But in this they are more afraid then hurt. For suppose the second Commandement to be distinct and wholly against images and their worship; yet every thing in the Commandement is not Moral, though the Commandement it self be. For God was pleas'd to appoint such temporary instruments of a Moral duty as were fitted to the necessities of that people; but such instruments were but like temporary supporters; plac'd there but till the building could stand alone. But whether this clause of having or making images be refer'd to the first or to the second Commandement, it is all one. If to the first, it means that therefore they are not to be made by them, lest they become the object of Divine worship. If to the second, then they were not to be made lest they become instruments of a false manner of the Divine worship: but in both, the prohibition is but Relative, as appears in the Parallel places of Levit. 19. v. 4. But especially Levit. 26. v. 1. Ye shall make ye no idols, nor graven image, neither rear ye up a standing image, neither shall ye set up any image of stone in your land [to bow down unto it] for I am the Lord your God: by which it is plain that the prohibition is not terminated on the image but referring to religion; and is of the same Nature as the forbidding them to converse with idolaters, or to make marriages with them; which God himself express'd to be lest they learn their evil customs; and all the reason of the world tells us, that such clauses whose whole reason is relative and instrumental, may be supplied by other instruments, and the reason of them or their necessity may cease, and consequently there can be no part of a Natural law, whose reason without a Miracle and the change of Nature can never alter. So that this fear of theirs being useless, they may without prejudice and interest follow that which is more reasonable. And this was sufficiently indicated by the act and words of God himself who gave order for the brazen serpent to be made, and the images or rather Hieroglyphicks* of Cherubim to be set over the propitiatory; which it is not to be supposed he would have done if it had been against his own Eternal law: He suffered them not to worship them; but to make them; to show that this was not against the Moral part of the Commandement, though that was: and the Ark could endure the five golden Mice and the five golden hemorrhoids because though they were images yet they were not idols, that is, were not intended for worship: but because Dagon was, it fell before the Ark; that could not be suffer'd: and in Solomon's Temple beside the pomegranates and other imagery, there were twelve brasen bulls; but they were not intended for worship, and therefore it was free to the Jews to use them or not: but the calves of Dan and Bethel because they were fusiles Dei, graven images us'd in Divine worship were an abhomination: and upon the shekel of the Sanctuary was impress'd the image of Aarons rod and a pot of Manna, or thurible: it was lawful while there was no danger of worshipping them.

* Vid. Manasseh Ben Israel in Concil. q. 30. & Tertul. l. 2. contr. Marcion. c. 22. Gab. Vasquez. disp. 104. c. 6.

11. This then is the first instance of the Rule: The having or making of images though it be forbidden to the Jews in the second Commandement, yet it is not unlawful to Christians. But of this I shall say more in the following periods.

12. Now concerning the Religion of images, that is, worshipping God by them directly or indirectly; whether that be lawful to Christians; although

I have ſufficiently declar'd the negative already, by reproving the great ground of that practice, I mean, the thruſting the two Commandements together, and have proved that they ought not to be ſo confounded; or if they ought, yet that the worſhip of images is not concluded from thence to be lawful or permitted, yet I hope it will be neither uſeleſs nor unpleaſant if I determine this caſe upon its proper grounds, in theſe two inquiries: 1. Whether it be lawful to make a Picture or image of God? 2. Whether it be lawful to worſhip God by a picture?

Queſt.

WHether it be lawful to make a picture or image of God?

13. I anſwer negatively: and that upon the plain words of God in Deuteronomy which upon the account of the fifth Rule are to be accounted as an explication of the Moral law, and therefore obligatory to Chriſtians: as relating to the matter of the Commandement, giving a Natural reaſon for a Natural duty, and purſuing that with argument which before he had eſtabliſhed with authority, and writing that in the Tables of the heart which at firſt he deliver'd to Moſes in Tables of ſtone. Take ye therefore good heed unto your ſelves, Deut. 4. 15. 16.
for ye ſaw no manner of ſimilitude, in the day when the Lord ſpake unto you in mount Horeb out of the midſt of the fire: leſt ye corrupt your ſelves and make you a graven image, the ſimilitude of any figure, the likeneſs of male or female, &c. Now why did God ſo earneſtly remind them that they ſaw no image, but becauſe he would not have them make any of him. And this is frequently preſs'd by God in that manner which ſhewes it not onely to be impious to doe it againſt his Commandement, but fooliſh and impoſſible and againſt all Natural reaſon. To whom will ye liken God? or what likeneſs will ye compare Iſai. 40. 18.
unto him? ſaid God by the Propher. Meaning that there is none, there can be none, and you may as well meaſure Eternity with a ſpan, and graſpe an infinite in the palm of your hand, as draw the circles and depict him that hath no colour or figure, no parts nor body, no accidents nor viſibility. And this S. Paul argued out of Aratus.

Καὶ τοῦ γὰρ γένος ἐσμέν.

We are his ofspring: that is, we are made after his image and ſimilitude; Chriſt is the Prototype, and we are efformed after his image who is the firſtborn of all Creatures: Man is made after the likeneſs of God; Not man in his body; but Man in his ſoul, in his will and powers of choice, in his underſtanding and powers of diſcerning, in his memory, and powers of recording, and he that cannot make the image of a will, or by a graven image repreſent the underſtanding of a man, muſt never hope to make any thing like God: there is no way to doe that, but to make a man; and that although it be but an imperfect image of God, yet an image it is, and the beſt that is upon the earth. But now from hence the Apoſtle argues, For- Acts 17. 29 aſmuch then as we are the ofspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or ſilver, or ſtone graven by art, and mans device: If the inviſible, inexpreſſible part of man is the image of God, and we are his ſons by Creation expreſſing in our Souls ſome little things of his infinite perfection, it cannot be ſuppoſed that this image can make an image like God; and if it cannot be like him; it is not to be made for him; for nothing is more unlike him then a lie. The Athenians were dull people and knew not how to anſwer S. Pauls argument; but we are now adaies taught to eſcape from this. For it is said, that it is true; Gods essence cannot be depicted or engraven; but such representations by which he hath been pleas'd to communicate notices of himself, can as well be describ'd with a pencil as with a Pen, and as well set down so that ideots may read and understand as well as the learned Clerks. Now because God was pleas'd to appear to Daniel like the Ancient of dayes, and the Holy Ghost in the shape of a Dove, and Christ in the form of a man, these representations may be depicted and describ'd by images without disparagement to the Divinity of God.

14. To these I give these answers; First the vision of Daniel seeing the ancient of daies, tells of no shape, nothing like an old man: but by that Phrase did seem to signifie the Eternal God; he tells of a head and hair like pure wooll, that is, pure and white, one of the Synonyma of light or brightness, like that of his garment, like snow; his wheels were a burning fire, his throne a fiery flame; that is in effect, when Daniel was asleep he had a vision or Phantasme in his head: where he had a representment of the Eternal God, in a circumfusion and a great union of light and glory, which he when he was awake express'd by metaphors imperfectly telling, what phantasme that was in which he perceiv'd the representment and communication of God; that is, he there set down the shadow of a dream of a bright shining cloud: for the metaphor is a shadow, and his vision was a dream, and what he dreamt he saw was but the investiture of God; like as when God by his Angel went in a cloud of fire before the sons of Israel, nay, not so much, for that was really so, this but a Prophetick extasie in his sleep: the images of which are but very unfit to establish a part of Divine worship, and an article of practice, against Natural reason and the letter of a Commandement. But, 2. I demand, whether did Daniel see the eternal God then or no? If he did not, then at the most it was but an angel of light in the place of God: and then this can never inferre the lawfulness of making any image of God, for it was onely Gods Angel, or a globe of glory instead of God and not God that appear'd in his own person. But if it be said he did see God, it apparently contradicts the Scripture: No man hath seen God at any time: and again, The eternal God whom no man hath seen or can see. The issue then is this, Daniel did not see God the Father, neither could he: Therefore God the Father was not represented to him by any visible species: therefore neither can we by any help or authority from this dream. And it is not sufficient to say, that though Daniel did not see Gods essence, yet he saw the representment: for he did not see any representment of God; he did not see God by any thing that express'd his person: for as for essences, no man can see the essence of a Bee, or a Bird: but sees it by some proper representment, but yet by that representment he properly and truly sees the bird: but Daniel did no way see Gods person or Nature, not so much as by any phantasme or image: an Angel of light, or the brightness of an Angel he might dream of in the extasie: but in no sense could he be said to see God, except onely by his Angel or Embassador. So that when it is said, No man can see God, it cannot be meant, that Gods essence can not be seen; for this had said no great matter: for no essence can be seen, but it must mean that God dwells in an inaccessible light whither no man can approach out of which he will send no emissions of representment or visibility; for if he had so done at any time, or would doe at all; it were not true, that no man had seen him, or could see him: for if he had communicated himself personally in any representment or visibility, then he had been seen, and in that instance and at that time he were not the invisible God. 3. Suppose Daniels vision had had been of God himſelf; yet as it was done to him by ſpecial favour ſo it was for a ſpecial purpoſe; it was for a deſign of Prophecy and to declare future events in the matters of warre and peace; not to eſtabliſh a practice prejudicial to a Commandement: and it is ſtrange that a viſion or nights dream expreſs'd by way of rapture and clouds of Metaphor, communicated to one man, ſignifying uncertainly, told imperfectly after the manner of raptures and prophetick extaſies, intended to very diſtant purpoſes, never ſo extended by his own Nation or us'd to any ſuch end, ſhould yet prevail with Chriſtians (who are or ought to be infinitely remov'd from ſuch a childiſh Religion, and baby tricks) more then an expreſs Commandement, and Natural and eſſential reaſon, and the practiſe both of all the Jews and the beſt Chriſtians. There is nothing in the world though never ſo bad, but by witty and reſolved men may have more colours laid upon it to ſet it out, then this can from this pretenſion. 4. The viſion it ſelf if it were expreſs'd in picture as it is ſet down, would be a moſt ſtrange production of art, and a horrid repreſentation of Nature; and unleſs ſomething were ſuppos'd which is not expreſs'd, it would be a ſtrange new Nothing. For [the Ancient of dayes] does by no violence ſignifie an old man; for it being a repreſentment of Eternity, is the worſt of all expreſs'd by an old man; for that which is old is ready to vaniſh away; and nothing is more contrary to eternity. Again, here is no mention of the appearance of a man. There is indeed mention of a head, but neither of Man nor beaſt, bird nor fly expreſs'd: and hair like pure wool, but in what it is like excepting onely the purity is not told, nor can be imagined: after this there is nothing but a throne of flames and wheels of fire, and all this together would make a ſtrange image, a Metaphor to expreſs eternity, a head of I know not what light without ſubſtance, viſibility without a figure, a top without a bottom, the whiteneſs of wool inſtead of the ſubſtance of hair, and a ſeat upon wheels and all in flames and fire: that it ſhould ever enter into the head or heart of an inſtructed man to think that the great, the immenſe, the inviſible, the infinite God of heaven, that fills heaven and earth and hell ſhould be repreſented in image or picture by ſuch a thing, by ſuch a nothing is as ſtrange and prodigious as the combination of all the daughters of fear and ſleep and ignorance, 5. After this viſion of Daniel it was in the Church of the Jews eſteemed as unlawful as ever to make an image of God; and by this the primitive Chriſtians did not beleeve a warrant or confidence could be taken to doe any thing of that Nature: and they that now adaies think otherwiſe have a new underſtanding and a new religion, defying a Commandement andwalking by a dream; and are ſuch whom a precept cannot draw, but they follow what they underſtand not, and what was not intended to conduct their religion, but to ſignifie onely the events and great changes of the world. 6. If becauſe mention is made of the Antient of dayes in Daniel, it were lawful to picture God like an old man; we might as well make a door and ſay it is Chriſt, or a vine and call it our Maſter, or a thief and call it the day of judgement: a Metaphorical or Myſtical expreſſion may be the vail of a myſterious truth, but cannot paſs into a ſign and ſignification of it: it ſelf may become an hieroglyphick when it is painted, but not an image which is a μορφὴ εἰδικὸς and the moſt proper repreſentation of any thing that can be ſeen and is not preſent. They that paint a child to ſignifie Eternity doe it better then they who by an old man ſignifie him that can be no older to morrow then he was yeſterday. But by this I onely intend to note the imprudence and undecency of the thing: the unlawfulneſs is upon other accounts which I have reckon'd.

15. Concerning

15. Concerning the humanity of our B. Saviour, that being a creature he might be depicted, I mean it was naturally capable of it: it was the great instrument of many actions, it convers'd with mankind above thirty years together, it was the subject of great changes, and the matter of a long story, and the conduit of many excellent instructions, and therefore might without all question be described as well as Cesar's or Meletius, Marc Anthony or the Kings of the Gentiles. It might be done: and the question being here onely of the making or having of it, abstractedly from all other appendages or collateral considerations, I need say no more of it under this title; but that it is neither impious nor unreasonable of it self to have or to make the picture or image of Christs Humanity, or rather of his humane Body. For against this there is neither reason nor religion, and if it be made accidentally unlawful that is not of present consideration.

16. But for the usual image of the Holy Ghost in the forme of a dove the pretence is great and fairer; no less then the words of Scripture. For in this instance that reason ceases for which God did prohibite the making of his image; for here they did not onely hear a voice, but also they saw a shape; for the Holy Ghost descended in the likeness of a dove: ἐν σωματικῷ εἴδει: in a bodily shape. So S. Luke. To this I answer, that the Holy Ghost did not appear in the shape of a dove at all; but the dove mention'd in the story relates only to the manner of his descending, and hovering over Christ. And
1. this 1. appears by the words in S. Matthew εἶδε τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ θεοῦ καταβαῖνον, ὡσεὶ περιστερὰν, He saw the Spirit of God [descending like a dove]
2. that is, as doves use to descend, hovering and overshadowing of him. 2. The word ὡσεὶ, which signifies an imperfect resemblance, or a limited similitude, does not inferre the direct shape of a dove; but something of it; the motion or the quantity, the hovering or the lighting, like that of his appearance on the day
Act. 2. 3. of Pentecost; cloven tongues ὡσεὶ πυρὸς, as it were of fire; that is, something of it; to shine it may be but not to burn; to appear bright but not to
3. move. 3. This appears yet more plainly in the words of S. Luke, Καὶ καταβῆναι τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον σωματικῷ εἴδει, ὡσεὶ περιστερὰν ἐπ' αὐτόν. The Holy Ghost did descend in a bodily shape; as a dove upon him: where the [bodily shape] cannot mean the bodily shape of a dove, for then it must have been ὡσεὶ περιστερᾶς, as of a dove, like that of the Acts, ὡσεὶ πυρὸς; but it must wholly be referred to καταβῆναι: he descended as a dove uses to doe: but then for σωματικὸν εἶδος the bodily shape, it was nothing but a body of light; the greatest visibility, called by the Apostle, μεγαλοπρεπὴς δόξα, the excellent
2 Pet. 1. 17. Glory: which indeed was the usual investiture of Gods messengers in their appearances and visibilities: and that there appear'd a fire in Jordan at that time,
4. Justin Martyr against Tryphon the Jew affirmes expresly. 4. That this similitude was relative to the motion or the manner of a doves descent is so much the more probable because this acceptation and understanding of it is more agreeable to the design and purpose of the Holy Ghost's descending. For by [flying] the Jews did use in their Symbolical Theology to signifie, a Divine influxe or inspiration saith Rabbi Jaccai upon the ninth of Daniel: This descent therefore of the Holy Ghost in the manner of a doves flight signifies the gift of the spirit of God to his holy Son; who received him not by measures but the fulness of him: and from his fulness we all receive our portions.

17. I cannot deny but that amongst learned men there is great difference of apprehension concerning it; and the generality of men without examining it suppose suppose the H. Ghost to have descended being invested with the direct shape of a Dove [ἐπελθοντ@. ἐν εἴδ@ περιστερᾶς πάντως@, so Justin Martyr: for he expresses the words otherwise then all the four Evangelists; they all say, ὡσὶ περιστερὰν, meaning as a Dove descends; he changes the case and makes it to be the shape or forme of a Dove: φάσμα ὄρνιθ@, so Origen calls it; the Phantasme or appearance of a bird; yet I will for the present suppose it so; because the ancients did generally beleeve so: but then I answer to the objection; That 1. although the Ancients did suppose it so; yet in the sixth Councel, that at Constantinople Can. 83. it is expressly forbidden to depict Christ like a Lamb, or the Holy Spirit like a Dove. 2. Suppose the fancy of the Ancients to have some reality in it; yet it amounted to no more then this, It was nothing but a light or fire effigiated into such a resemblance; or like a bright cloud which represents strange figures imperfectly, any thing according to the heart or fancy of them that behold it; and therefore is not so imitable as if it were a direct and proper appearance: So the Gospel of the Nazarens expresses it, καὶ εὐθὺς περιέλαμψε τὸν τόπον φῶς μέγα. Presently a great light did shine round about the place; and their apprehension of a dazeling light in such a resemblance is but an ill warrant to make a standing figure and proper imagery. 2. Tertullian supposes it was really and properly a very Dove indeed: and if so, the whole business is at an end: for any Dove may be pictured; but the Holy Ghost must not be pictur'd in that shape, though his errand and design was ministred to by a Dove. 3. And that indeed is the proper and full solution of this objection. Supposing that the shape of a Dove did appear, yet this no way represented him, or was to be used as a sign of him; and therefore it is observable when God had told the Baptist how he should know the Messias, and that the Holy Ghost should consign and signifie him, he makes no mention of a Dove; but of descending onely: not onely plainly intimating that the mention of a Dove was for the similitude of Motion not of shape, but also to signifie that the Holy Ghost himself was not at all to be represented as a Dove. But then if there was the shape of a Dove, as the Ancients suppose, it looks downwards not upwards; and was a Symbol not to signifie any thing of the Divinity or the personality of the Holy Spirit; but to signifie something in Christ, or in Christs body the Church, to represent the excellency and sweetness of Christ and of the Church, his perfection and our duty, the state of his institution and of our religion, and so they who thus teach of the apparition of a Dove, express the Symbol. The Dove was to represent that great meekness which was in Christ, and which he would insert into his institution as no small part of a Christians duty: which our B. Saviour was pleas'd also to express in the same similitude, [be as harmless as Doves.] Philo saies that in the Jewes Discipline a Dove signifies Wisedome, that is, a good, a wise, a Gentile, and Debonaire comportment, not the severity of retirement and a Philosophical life, but of a civil, sweet, and obliging conversation. Some say that this Dove did relate to that Dove which signified to Noah by an olive branch of peace that God was again reconcil'd to the world; and so did it please God to use the like Symbol when he would signifie that reconcilement which was by Christ to be effected, and of which the other was but a weak representment, and type, or figure. The world was now also to be renewed at the appearance of this Dove. But because this no way relates to the person or the Nature of the H. Ghost, it can no way hence be inferred that the H. Ghost may be represented by an image. This apparition if it was at all was Symbolical of something below, not representative of any thing above: and in that ſence and to that purpoſe I doe not doubt but it may be lawful to make a picture of the dove that was ſeen, if I ſay, it was at all; and of the fiery tongues ſitting upon the Apoſtles; for theſe were not repreſentative of the Nature or perſon of the Holy Ghoſt but deſcriptive of the impreſſion that from the Holy Goſt was made upon them: and of this Nature is the expreſſion of the Baptiſt. He ſhall baptize you with the Holy Ghoſt and with fire; that is, from his baptiſme, or by his immiſſion you ſhall receive graces and gifts whoſe effect is properly expreſs'd by fire, which alſo ſhall be its Symbol.

18. And after all this; if it ſhould pleaſe God any perſon of the Bleſſed and moſt holy Trinity ſhould appear in any viſible ſhape; that ſhape might be depicted; of that ſhape an image might be made; I mean, it might naturally; it might if it were done for lawful ends, and unleſs a Commandement were to the contrary; and therefore ſo long as God keeps himſelf within the ſecret receſſes of his ſanctuary, and the Majeſty of his inviſibility, ſo long it is plain he intends the very firſt ſenſe and words of his Commandement: but if he ſhould cancel the great reaſon of his Commandement; and make that by an act of his own to become poſſible which in the Nature of things is impoſſible, that is, that an image can be made of God; I ſhould beleeve that God did intend to diſpenſe in that part of the Commandement, and declare that he intended it onely for a temporary band: For if the reaſon of the commandement were taken away; either the Commandement alſo ceaſes to oblige; or muſt be bound upon us by another reaſon, or a new Sanction, or at leſt a new declaration; or elſe it would follow that then his viſible appearance would become a ſnare to mankind. But becauſe yet he hath not yet appear'd viſibly and hath by no figure or idea repreſented the Godhead; and that it is a truth which muſt laſt as long as Chriſtian Religion laſts, that No man can ſee God, therefore it follows that it is at no hand lawful to make an image of God or relating to the Divinity. If a Dove be made it muſt not be intended to repreſent the Holy Ghoſt, * for beſides that no Dove did appear, nor ſhape of a Dove, yet if it did, it related not to the perſon of the Holy Ghoſt, but to the impreſſion made upon the perſon on whom the light deſcended: and if the figure of the crucifixe be made, or of Jeſus in the fleſh; it is wholly relative to the Creature, not to him as God; for that is impious, and unreaſonable and impoſſible to be done in any Natural proportion. And the like alſo is to be ſaid of thoſe expreſſions in Scripture, of the hand of God, his eye, his arme; which words although they are written yet they cannot, ought not to be painted: I doe not doubt but it is lawful to paint or ingrave an eye or a hand; but not an eye or hand of God, that is, we may not intend to repreſent God by ſuch ſculpture or picture; becauſe the Scripture does not ſpeak them to that end; that by them we may conceive any thing of God; for as Heſſelius well notes, theſe and other like expreſſions are intended to repreſent ſome action of God: ſuch as is that of Pſal. 78. aliàs 77. verſ 65. who brings in God, excitatum tanquam dormientem, tanquam potentem crapulatum à circo: awaken'd out of ſleep, and as a gyant refreſh'd [filled, gorged,] with wine: by which if any man ſhall repreſent God in picture, his ſaying, it may as well be painted as written, will not acquit him from inſufferable impiety.

ctrine and practice both of the Jews and primitive Chriſtians. Concerning the Jews Tacitus ſaies of them Mente ſolâ, unúmq; numen intelligunt: profanos, qui Deum imagines mortalibus materiis in ſpecies hominum effingunt. They acknowledge but one Deity, whom they underſtand in their mind onely: eſteeming all them to be profane who efforme the images of their Gods of corruptible matter into the ſhapes of men. And the teſtimony of S. Clemens of Alexandria is very full to this purpoſe: Deum ex Moſis Diſciplina nec hominis effigie, nec ullâ aliâ re repræſentari, God by the law Moſes was not to be repreſented in the ſhape of a man or any other figure: and for the Chriſtians that they alſo underſtood themſelves to be bound by the ſame law to the ſame religious abſtaining from making images of God is openly and generally taught by the Doctors of the Chriſtian Church for the four firſt ages together; as without ſcruple appears in the expreſs words of Origen[a], Tertullian[b], Euſebius[c], Athanaſius[d], S. Hierom[e], S. Auſtin[f], Theodoret[g], Damaſcen[h], and the Synod of Conſtantinople as is reported in the ſixth action of the ſecond Nicene Councel: the ſenſe of all which together with his own Polydore Virgil[i] thus repreſents; Cùm Deus ubiq; præſens ſit, nihil à principio poſt homines natos ſtultius viſum eſt, quàm ejus ſimulacrum pingere, Since the world began never was any thing more fooliſh then to picture God who is preſent every where: for this is (according to the ſharp reproof of the Apoſtle) to change the glory of the incorruptible God, into the ſimilitude ἐν ὁμοιώματι εἰκόνος[k], ſo it is in the Greek; into the ſimilitude of an image of a corruptible man, and of birds and beaſts, &c. then which words nothing can be plainer to condemn the picturing God: a thing which the very Heathens did abhominate, ſaid Silius Italicus of the Temple of Cadiz; they had no images, no pictures of the Gods, but the houſe was fill'd with Majeſty and a holy fear. And this they did not of ignorance, nor of cuſtom; but out of reaſon and wiſe diſcourſe. When Seneca intreated his friend Lucilius to make himſelf worthy of God, he tells him how: Finget autem non auro, non argento: non poteſt ex hac materia imago Dei fingi ſimilis: Not with gold and ſilver; for of theſe an image like to God can never be made. And therefore Tacitus ſaies of the Germans, that they nec cohibere parietibus Deos, nec in ullâ humani oris ſpeciem aſſimilare ex magnitudine cœleſtium arbitrantur, They think they doe not know the nature of the Gods, if they ſhould thruſt them into walls, or depict them in the reſemblance of a Man or woman; Nullum ſimulacrum finxiſſe antiquitatem, ſaid Macrobius; The old world never made an image (meaning of God) Quia ſummus Deus natáq; ex eo mens, ſicut ultra animam ita ſupra naturam ſunt, quò nihil fas eſt de fabulis pervenire; becauſe the ſupreme God, and the mind that is borne of him, as it is beyond our Soul ſo it is beyond all Nature, and it is not fit that fables and fictions ſhould be addreſſed to him, Queſt. Whether it be lawful for Chriſtians to worſhip God by an image?

21. Concerning which the beſt ground of reſolution is the Commandement; which it is certain the Church of the Jews did underſtand ſo, that they accounted it idolatry to worſhip God in any image whatſoever; Thus the Iſraelites were idolaters when they made the golden calf, for ſo they proclaim'd, Theſe are thy Gods ô Israel who brought thee out of the land of Egypt: and to morrow is a solemnity to Jehovah; said Aaron. The calf they intended as an image of their God and by it they intended to worship him, which is not improbable saies Bellarmine; which is certainly true said Ferus: and which is affirm'd by the Spirit of God; they chang'd their glory into the similitude of a calf that eateth hay: that is, they represented God who was their glory, by a golden calf; And concerning Micah though his Mother made an image, yet that it was for the worshipping of the God of Israel appears in all the story; for upon this account he hoped that the Lord would bless him, he took a Levite for his Priest, he asked councel of the Lord; yet these also he called his Gods which were but the images of God, by which it apears he was an idolater because he worshipped the true God by an image, which he had forbidden. The same was the case of Gideon who made a Covenant with them that God should be their King, yet he made an Ephod; that is, instituted a forbidden service to him; which thing became a snare to his house; and being a prevarication of this Commandement, was in its Nature an idolatrous worship; and yet it was but a superstitious or false worship of the true God: And this is affirm'd by the Christian Doctors. Non vult Deus in lapidibus coli, said S. Ambrose, God will not be worshipped in stones or graven images: and S. Austin affirmes that God in this Commandement did prohibit, nè quis colat ullam imaginem Dei nisi unam eandem quæ cum ipso est Christus: that we should worship no image of God but him that is the lively image of his person, that is, Jesus Christ: and this is so affirmd by all the Fathers, so confirm'd by the doctrine and practice of the Church, so adher'd to by all the Doctors of the Jews, that Vasquez finds himself constrain'd to confess, clarè deducitur, non licuisse tum verum Deum in aliqua imagine venerari: it is clearly consequent, that then it was not lawful to worship the true God in any image or representment.

22. But it is said, that though it was not then, yet now it is: for that was only a temporary precept, relative to the Jews because of their proneness to idolatry. So Catharinus affirmes, totum hoc præceptum esse positivum, non morale. This whole Commandement is positive, not moral: for however something related to the Jews, yet by this Commandement is onely forbidden to worship the images of false Gods, or the image of the true God with Divine worship.

Ut vid. est ap. Bellar. de imag.

23. Against this I have many things to say, 1. That idolatry is a sin against the law of Nature, or of prime religion; therefore whatsoever was idolatry in the Jews, is the same sin in the Christians. Indeed in the Intercourses between Man and Man, though the relative duty be bound upon us by the Commandement of God, yet the instances can be altered by humane authority and consent; as new kinds of incest; several instances of Murder, of treason and the like; but where not onely the law but the instances also are of Gods appointment; what is once is alwayes, unless God change the particular, which he never did in the present question. One case there is in which the particulars even of the present article can vanish: viz. when a particular is commanded apparently for a transient reason, and hath in it no essential reason no Natural rectitude; but the worshipping of God by an image is against Natural reason as I have proved by the unlawfulness and unreasonableness of making an image of God and shall further prove in the sequel; therefore although by reason of the Jews proneness to direct and prime idolatry the Commandement put new and accidental necessities (I mean the not having or making any pictures) yet the prohibition of worshipping God by an image having a Natural and essential rectitude and conformity to the Simplicity of a Natural and to the Spirituality of the Christian religion, it cannot be changed as the fancies cies or the intereſts of Men ſhall require, and of this beſides the apparent reaſonableneſs of the thing we have an expreſs teſtimony from Origen. Cæterum Chriſtiani homines & Judæi ſibi temperant ab his propter illud legis, Dominum Deum timebis ... Item propter illud, Non erunt tibi Dii alieni præter me, & non facies tibi ipſi ſimulacrum, &c. aliáq; multa his ſimilia quæ adeo nos prohibent ab aris & ſimulacris, ut etiam emori jubeant citiùs quàm contaminemus noſtram de Deo fidem talibus impietatibus. Both Chriſtians and Jews abſtain from theſe [worſhippings] becauſe the law ſaies; thou ſhalt have no other Gods but me: And thou ſhalt not make to thy ſelf any Graven image, and for many other things like theſe; which ſo ſeverely reſtrain us from altars and images, that they command us to die rather then to pollute our faith of God with ſuch impieties. The ſum of which is, that Chriſtians as well as Jews underſtood themſelves bound equally by this Commandement; and they were to ſuffer death rather then image-worſhip. L. 7. con. Celſ.

25. 2. To worſhip falſe Gods, or to give Divine honour to an image which is not God, is all one kind of formal idolatry; they may differ Materially, as the worſhipping of Silver does from bowing the head to Gold; but they are formally the ſame thing; for it is a making that to be our God which is no God; and this is ſufficiently forbidden in the firſt Commandement: Now ſince there are more ſins againſt that Commandement then one; let us ſuppoſe that the two firſt (as we reckon them) are but one: yet the next muſt be that which is forbidden in the explication; that is, to worſhip the true God with a falſe image; it is making God to be like an idol by repreſenting him in the ſame cheap impoſſible way; by uſing him like the falſe Gods, by making his image to become an idol; by giving him a forbidden, hated worſhip, by honouring him with a lie; all which if they be not great violations of the Commandement to which they doe belong; then there is but one kind of ſin there forbidden, and this is an act of ſo great ſimplicity and incommunicability that it hath neither Brother nor Siſter, Mother nor Daughter, Kiff nor Kin, analogy nor correſpondencies, addreſſes nor degrees: If it have not, why are ſo many particulars reduc'd to this Commandement by all Caſuiſts, friends or foes in this Article: If it have, this ſuperſtitious and forbidden worſhip being here nam'd in the Commandement, and ſtanding next to the prime idolatry, muſt at leſt have the degree of the ſame obliquity.

26. 3. He that makes an image of God and worſhips it; gives it the worſhip of God, whom it repreſents, or a different. If he gives a different and conſequently a leſs worſhip he does not worſhip God in the image; but his worſhip ſuch as it is is terminated on the image; and then comes not into this inquiry: it is no more then loving a bird for Lesbia's ſake, or valewing a pendant for her ſake that gave it me; and this may be a civil valuation, and is to be eſtimated according to its exceſs or temper. But if by the image I mean to worſhip God; then I joyn them together in the act of adoration, and make them the ſame integral object: but then I give to both the ſame worſhip; and therefore unleſs they can both be united into an identity, I muſt needs give Divine worſhip to that which is no God; which is direct idolatry. If an image of God paſs the worſhip, which I give unto God, then it goes firſt to the image, then to God; therefore it muſt needs be the ſame: for that which paſſes from the image to God muſt not be leſs then what is fit to be given to God: But if it be the ſame; then it ought not at all to paſs upon that: If it be leſs then Divine it muſt not be given to God; if it be not leſs, it muſt not pass upon that which is not God. If it be less, it is impiety when it is offer'd to the Prototype, if it be the same and not less, it is idolatry when it is offerd to the image.

26. But I need not make use of both parts of the dilemma; for it is certain that every relative worship must be the same in the middle and the end; and it is confessed by most of those who worship God and his Christ and his Saints by images, that the same honour is given to both. Eundem honorem deberi imagini & exemplari saies Almain: ac proinde imagines S. Trinitatis, Christi, & Crucis cultu latriæ adorandas esse: The images of the Trinity, of Christ, and of the Cross are to be ador'd with Divine worship. The same is the opinion of Alensis, Aquinas, Bonaventure, Albertus, Richardus, Capreolus, Cajetan, Coster, Valentia, the Jesuits of Colen, Triers and *Ment*z; who approved Costers opinion; and indeed generally of all the Roman Schooles, if we may beleeve a great Man amongst them; Constans est Theologorum Sententia, imaginem eodem honore & cultu honorari & coli quo colitur id cujus est imago, said *A*z*orius:* and he supposes this to be the mind of the Councel of Trent, and insinuated by the second Nicene, and certainly he was in the right. For though the Councel of Trent us'd much caution in their expression of this invidious article, and expres'd no particular honour, but that due honour and worship be given to them; yet when at the latter end of the decree it approves the Second Nicene Councel and refers to that in the Article; it is plain that the Councel of Trent intended such honour and worship to be due, as the Councel of Francfurt said was not due; neither is it to be imagined they durst contradict so constant an opinion, or openly recede from their great Aquinas. They have amongst them many fine devices, to make this seem what it is not; but that which is sufficient is this, that no distinction, no artifice will file the harshness off from this: for whereas the great thing that they say is this, that this worship being not for the image but for Gods sake pass'd through the image; does not give Divine honours to the image. But I reply: Is it a Divine honour that is given to the image or no: is it the same that is given to God; or is it another? If it be the same then though it be not for the image, but for God, yet it is for God that the Divine worship is given to the image; that is, it is for Gods sake that what is due to God alone is given to that which is not God; that is, for Gods sake they commit idolatry. But if it be not the same, then how doe they worship God by the image? Idem est motus ad imaginem & exemplar; saies Aristotle, and upon this account they suppose what is done to the image accrues to God; but then as they must take care that nothing be given to God that is less then himself, I mean that he be not worshipped with less then a Divine worship; so they may also remember, that by one motion and act of worship they cannot give less to the image then they doe to God; whatsoever is less then another is not the same with another: if therefore the worship given to the image be in any sense less then that which is given to God, then it is not the same: if it be not the same, then by the same motion, by the same act of worship there are two kinds of worship given: which is a contradiction, that one should be two: and also evacuates their great pretence of the reasonableness or possibility of doing worship to God by an image; because upon this account the same does not pass at once to both.

Instit. Morsl. part. 1. l. 9. c. 6.

27. 4. A good man is more an image of God then any Painter or Engraver can make: but if we give Divine honours to a good Man it were idolatry: therefore much more if we give it to an image. I use this instance to take off the trifle of worship Relative, and worship Terminative; for if we should offer offer sacrifice to a man, build temples and altars to him over against his doors, burn lamps, make vowes, appoint Holy-daies, processions, Letanies, institute fraternities, give him the appellatives of honour which we usually ascribe to God, it would not serve our turnes to say; we doe it to God whose image this man is, and we intend the honor to God finally; there it rests, it onely passes thorough the good man, to be united to the glories of God; it were idolatry without all contradiction. I find that acts of humility have been done to the poor for Christs sake; and the actions were refer'd to Christ just as all other acts of charity and almes use to be; but if Divine honour be done to them it is so far from being entertaind by God as the correlative of that worship, that it is a dishonour to him; he being curious of his own peculiar, and having given no warrant no instance that can amount to any thing of that Nature, and he will be worshipped as Plato's expression is τῷ μᾶλλον ἀρέσκοντι ζῴπῳ; in that way (not that we chuse, but) that he best likes. He that will pass worship to God by the mediation and interposition of a creature, must doe it by using that creature in all the endearments and regards for Gods sake of which it is capable. Thus by reverencing the Grey head and rising up to him, we doe honour to the great Father of Men and Angels: by releeving the poor we doe honour to Christ; but neither is Christ honour'd by us if we have a rich present to a King for Christs sake, or call a poor begger, My Lord: but when for Gods sake we pass those regards to several estates of Men which are the best usages which prudently they can rerequire, then the good we doe to them, whether it be honour or releef, relates to God: But for Gods sake to give Divine honours to a man; is as if to honour the Master we made his servant equal; or out of reverence to the body we should wear the shoo upon our head: and this argument must needs conclude against the worshippers of images; for although Vasquez, and I think he alone of all the world, owns the worst that this Argument can infer, and thinks it lawful to give Divine worship relatively or transitively to a man; yet when that whole Church excuses their worshipping of Saints by saying they give onely such veneration to them as is proportion'd to them, not Latria but Dulia, that is, not Divine worship in any Sense, for so they would be understood to speak and doe; it must needs be certain, that this argument is not to be answer'd, nor yet to be outfac'd. However, this is certain; that when the Arrians who beleeved Christ to be a meer creature, though they could not deny but that (according to the expres words of Scripture) he was the expres and bright image of his Fathers glory, yet becaus they gave to Christ Divine honours for his relation sake to his Father the Eternal God they were by the Fathers of the Church expresly call'd idolaters, as is to be seen in the first, third and fourth Orations of S. Athanasius against the Arrians and in S. Cyril in Joh. l. 9. c. 41. and divers other places: and whatever Vasquez or any man else is pleas'd to think of it; yet S. John was twice rejected by an Angel when he would have given Divine honour to him: when he would haue worshipped him: and yet that Angel represented God, and was the servant of Jesus. And upon this account we may worship every Creature; every fly, every Tulip, even the Onyons of Egypt; for every plant is more an image of God then a dead peece of Mettal, or Marble can be Præsentémque refert quælibet herba Deum.

And it is in images as it is in the matter of Oaths, of which our B. Saviour said that he that swears by Heaven, or by the Earth, by the Temple, or by the Gold, it is all a case: it all alike refers to God and does him dishonour if the matter be vain or false; so it is in images: every creature of God represents him and is capable of transmitting honour to him, as a woodden image: and yet because the best images of God are not susceptive of Divine honours so much as by relation, much less shall the worse images: and if it be idolatry to give such to a man, though with an intuition upon God: to doe so to a dead image which hath less likeness to God cannot be put of by a distinction, and a vain imagination. * I will not aggravate the evil practices or Doctrines which are in the Church of Rome, concerning this Question, but it is obvious to observe, that although this distinction of relative and terminative is invented by superstitious persons to make the question hard, and to themselves greater opportunity of quieting the Scruples of tender persons: yet they doe give, and openly profess to give Divine honours to that which is no God, which I thus demonstrate. The Cross on which Christ sufferd is but a creature: but to the image of this they give a relative Divine honor, therefore to the Exemplar, which is that Cross whereof the other are but images, they terminate the Divine honour. So Jacobus Almain in the words a little before quoted: "The same honour is owing to the image and the Exemplar; and therefore the images of the Trinity, and of Christ, and OF THE CROSS are to be ador'd with the worship of Latria; [that is, Divine.] To this purpose is that clause in the Pontifical published by the authority of Clement the eighth; Crux legati quia debetur ei Latria, erit à dextris. The Legats Cross must be on the right hand; because Latria or Divine Honour is due to it. Now this being the image can challenge but this Divine honour relatively; but the Cross that Helena found at Jerusalem was the Exemplar, therefore to that the Divine worship is due ultimatè & terminativè, it rests there; which is as down right idolatry as can be defin'd. But Aquinas proves it ought to be so by this Argument, That in which we place the hope of our salvation to that we exhibit the worship of Latria, or Divine worship: but in the Cross we place the hope of our salvation, for so the Church sings,

I could adde many more things to the same purpose; but because I Intend not an accusation of any one, but institution to every one that needs it; I shall onely observe that this distinction is us'd with them as Miracles and the gift of tongues was; not for them that beleeve, but for them that beleeve not: so is this, for strangers, and them that make objections, not for the obedient that worship images and break the Commandement: for they must or may doe more then give a relative worship: but yet because it concernes us and them, I adde this observation.

28. 5. That if Divine worship, or Latria be in any sense given to an image, no distinction can save it harmless: For if it be given at all, it is not chang'd in kind, by being alter'd in circumstance. It is that kind of worship which all the

the world underſtands to be proper to God; now whether it be for it ſelf or for any other thing, is nothing but an inquiry for what cauſe this incommunicable worſhip is communicated to them; that is, a looking after the cauſe of a thing, which no cauſe can legitimate, and whether this be proper or improper, yet ſtill it is idolatry in one of the ſenſes; whether it be direct or indirect, it ſtill gives but an appellative and ſpecificates the idolatry: for that which in its whole Nature is unlawful, and unnatural, cannot be lawful in a certain reſpect. Idololatræ dicuntur qui ſimulachris eam ſervitutem exhibent quæ debetur Deo, ſaid S. Auſtin: He who gives that to an image which is due to God is an idolater: But he who anſwers that he does that thing but in this or this manner, confeſſes the thing done and tells you how: but if the manner deſtroyes the thing, then it is not the ſame worſhip; and then what need the diſtinction of the manner which muſt ſuppoſe the ſame matter; but if the manner does not deſtroy the thing, then for all the diſtinctions it is idolatry. L. 1. de Trin. c. 6.

29. 6. I conſider that in the firſt Commandement where Atheiſme and Polytheiſme, and Allotheiſme are forbidden directly and principally, and whatever is like it, or even with, or under it; the preface or the reaſon of it is expreſs'd by God; [I am the Lord thy God] plainly declaring that whatſoever is introduc'd againſt that Commandement is alſo againſt that reaſon: God is not our God, if we acknowledge none, or if we accept of many, or any other; ſo that by this precept and upon this account, idolatry in the object is forbidden. But in the next precept, or (if it be the ſame with this) in the next periods of this Commandement, there is another thing forbidden upon another reaſon: Thou ſhalt not worſhip any graven image, for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, meaning that as his being our God infers that none elſe muſt be made our God or have Divine honours done to it; ſo the ſuperaddition of this attribute and appellative of God, that as he is our God, ſo alſo he is a jealous God, in this very matter of Entercourſe with us, infers that we muſt not onely doe what he bids, but alſo in his own way, the thing and the manner too are taken care of. And if he had in the ſecond precept onely forbidden Divine worſhip to be given to any artifice or to any Creature; the proper reaſon for it had been [for I am the Lord thy God] but when to other words he puts another reaſon, it is certain it muſt mean ſomething new and not ſignified in the firſt periods: But then, becauſe the worſhipping of any image of God with Divine worſhip for the ſake of the Exemplar is that which is neereſt and likeſt the manner of the Gentiles; and does inſenſibly ſteal the heart of man away, and depreſſes our great thoughts of the Eternal immenſe God into the circumſcription of an image, and draws the mind from ſpiritual to material entercourſes, and therefore does by immediate conſequence leſſen the honour of God and the propriety of the Divine worſhip, that all this ſhould be forbidden is juſtly inferred from the reaſon; for of theſe things no better reaſon in the world can be given, then that God is a jealous God; and will not have his honour directly or indirectly given to any thing to whom himſelf is not pleas'd expreſsly to impart it; and therefore there is a Natural proportion in the reaſon to the prohibition: for ſince it is uſual in Scripture to call idolatry by the name of fornication or adultery: God is pleaſed here alſo to forbid that manner of worſhip which he accounts adulterous, and declares he will not endure it becauſe he is jealous: and let it be imagined, what can be the effect of that reaſon? ſomething ſpecial muſt be apportion'd to it, leſt it be to no purpoſe: but that images be not taken for very God, that they may not finally and for themſelves receive Divine honour is the effect of the first reason, and of the first precept: whatsoever is next to this, must be what is also next expres'd, that is, Not that images be not worshipped for God; but that in the worshipping the true God which is commanded in the first period, we doe not bow the head and knee before images which is forbidden in the second periods: And if men were in their proportion as jealous of their duty and of avoiding Gods anger and escaping the Divine judgements, and of preserving their Eternal interest, as God is of his Honour; they would never so much intricate their duty, and brande the Commandement, and doe that which is so much against the letter of it, and against the doctrine of that Church to whom the law was given, and against so much reason; and for the doing of which they are forc'd to use so much violence of answer, such convulsions of distinction: a jealous Man will not endure such comportments in his wife; for the justification of which she is so hardly put to it, that she must have half a dozen answers before she can please her self, or think that she does well; and which after all, will look but like pitiful excuses. But above all excuses it would seem the worst, if she should say I doe admit another man but not as my Husband, but with a less regard and another sort of complication then I use to him; and that which I doe I doe it for his sake, he is so like him that he is his very picture; and he is his very great friend, and what I do, is for that very regard. A jealous man would hardly take this for satisfaction. And if it be consider'd that there is nothing so clear but something may be said against it, and παντὶ λόγῳ λόγος ἀντίκειται Every word can be contradicted by a word; and then how many presumptions, how many reasons, how many expres words, how many ages, and how many religions doe joyn in the condemnation of worshipping God by an image; it may very well be concluded that our jealous God will not endure half so much disobedience, wilful ignorance and obstinacy in such persons as against so much reason and religion and for so few and trifling pretences will worship God and his Christ by images against the words of his own Commandement.

30. 7. If it be inquired how an image can be an idol; the answer must be; by giving to it Divine worship, or something that is due and proper to God: Now whoever knowes it to be an image of a thing, if he have any use of reason, if he be not a changeling, beleeves better of the Exemplar then of the image; and knowes that the worship sticks not in the image: he cannot worship it for it self, but for something to which it relates, or for something that adheres to it, or is deriv'd upon it; still the honour goes beyond the Natural or artificial image. The image hath no worth of its own beyond the art or Nature; and can be estimated, but as Silver, or Marble, or Carved; and therefore no religion passes upon it for its own sake: Since therefore whatsoever passes on it is for the sake of that which it represents; an image that is understood to be an image can never be made an idol; or if it can it must be by having the worship of God pas's'd thorough it to God; it must be by being the analogical, the improper, the transitive, the relative (or what shall I call it) object of Divine worship. Now that this consideration may have its effect, I shall not need to say that an idol and an image is all one; though that be true in Grammar; and Erasmus said that S. Ambrose knew no difference between them, but that every image (made for religion) is an idol; and that he himself saw no difference: but because the Church in some ages hath supposd a difference; I shall also allow it: but find all the danger of any such allowance taken away by the instance of the brazen Serpent which did pass under both Notions, for it was a meer image or representment of a Serpent and the commemoration of Gods delivering his people from them: but when it came to be us'd in a religious worship then it was an idol; permitted when it was a bare image, but broken when it pass'd into an idol. An image or an dol doe not differ in themselves but by use and custome of speaking: the Church calling it an image so long as it is used lawfully: but it is an idol when it is us'd unlawfully, that is in plain speaking, an image is lawful to be made or kept for some purposes, but not for other. It is lawful for story, for memory of an absent friend or valued person that is away, for the moving an affection, for ornament and the beauty of a place; but it is not lawful to have them, not lawful to make them with designes of ministring to religion or the service and worship of God: which I choose to express in the words of the Author of the famous books under the name of Charles the Great, Nos imagines in basilicis positas, idola non nuncupamus; sed nè idola nuncupentur, adorare & colere eas recusamus. We doe not call all images by the name of idols, but lest they become idols we refuse to worship them. But yet this I adde, that although in the use of the two Greek words, εἰκὼν and εἴδωλον, and of the Latine, idolum and imago, Men have troubled themselves with finding material differences; yet although it might be of some use in inquiring the meaning of the Ancient Doctors of the Church in the question of images, yet it will be wholly impertinent as to the Commandement. For God forbidding images used the word פסל which signifies properly a graven image; and because there were more sorts besides this, God was pleas'd to forbid תמונה which the LXX render by παντὸς ὁμοίωμα, the likeness of any thing: and it conteins sculptile, fusile, ductile, conflatile, that is, all sorts of representations, flat or extant, painted or carved; and the force of this word can be eluded by no distinction. But then as to the meaning of these words in the use of the Ancient Doctors, this is certain: that although about the time of the Second Nicene Councel, this distinction of idolum and imago was brought into the Christian Church, yet it was then new, and forc'd, made to serve the ends of new opinions, not of Truth: for in Tertullian's time there was nothing of it, as appears by his words in his book de idololatria. c. 3. Ad hoc necessaria est vocabuli interpretatio: εἶδος Græcè formam sonat; ab eo per diminutivum εἴδωλον deductum aquè apud nos formulam fecit. Igitur omnis forma, vel formula idolum se dici exposcit: éstque idololatria, omnis circa omne idolum famulatus & servitus. Every image (meaning, of God) is an idol, and all worship and service about them is idolatry. This is plain, and short. And that once for all I may make it clear, that an idol and an image was all one in the sense of the word and of the Ancient Church it is undeniably so used in Cicero lib 1. de fin. bonor. & mal. Imagines quæ idola nominant, quorum incursione non solum videamus sed etiam cogitemus, &c. and for the Church S. Chrysostome is an authentick witness, for he calls the pictures by which they then adorn'd their houses by the names of idols, οἰκίας κατασκευῶμεν εἴδωλα πανταχῆ ἑξόανα ἱστῶντες, we trim our houses, placing every where idols and pictures. L. 4 p. 17.

31. Upon this account we may understand the meaning of the primitive Fathers who would not endure that a picture should be made, or kept, who condemn'd the art it self, as deceiving and adulterous, who said that God forbad the very trade it self: So Tertullian, Jam verò ipsum opus personarum quæro an Deo placeat qui omnem similitudinem vetat fieri, quanto magis imaginis suæ? Can the making visors please God who hath forbidden all similitudes or images and pictures to be made, and how much more any image De spect. c. 23.

Stromat. l. 6 & in Protrep. p. 41. edit. Paris. L. 4. con. Celf. of himself? Nobis enim eſt aperte vetitum artem fallacem exercere; ſaid S. Clement ſpeaking of pictures and images, the very art is forbidden to Chriſtians. The ſame is affirmed by origen, and long after by S. Chryſoſtome; but Tertullian ſaid, that the Divel brought painting and carving into the world; and addes, Toto mundo ejuſmodi artibus interdixit ſervis Dei, that God hath forbidden to all his ſervants in all the world to uſe ſuch arts. But they are to be underſtood by their own words ſpoken when they had the ſame reaſon and leſs heat; for that the very making of images was forbidden by God by way of caution onely and proviſion, not for any turpitude or unreaſonableneſs in the thing, but for the danger which then was pregnant themſelves affirme: Similitudinem vetans fieri omnium ..... oſtendit & cauſas, idololatriæ ſc. ſubſtantiam cohibentes: ſubjicit enim non adorabitis ea, &c. So Tertullian. To the ſame purpoſe is that of Origen; ſpeaking of the Jews, There was no painter or ſtatuary admitted into their cities, their laws driving away all this kind of people, ne qua occaſio præberetur hominibus craſsis, neve animi eorum à Dei cultu avocarentur ad res terrenas per hujuſmodi illecebras: leſt any occaſion ſhould be given to rude people of drawing their minds from the pure worſhip of God to earthly things. Now if this ſenſe was alſo in the Commandement, it is certain that this was but temporary; and therefore could change: and that it was changeable appears in this that God by a Divine Spirit aſſiſted Bezaleel and Aholiab in the like curious arts; and by other inſtances which I have already reckon'd*: Now this ſenſe and ſeverity might perpetually oblige the Jews; becauſe during the whole abode of their Synagogue there was almoſt an equal danger by their perpetual converſation with idolatrous Nations: and therefore it was very well ſaid of Tertullian in the matter of the brazen Serpent, "If thou regardeſt the law, thou haſt Gods law, Make not the likeneſs of any "thing: But if thou conſiderest that afterwards Moſes did command them to "make the likeneſs of a Serpent, doe thou alſo imitate Moſes, and againſt "the law make no likeneſs, unleſs God alſo give thee a Commandement as he "did Moſes. Meaning that the ſingular example was no prejudice to the law: Exceptio firmat regulam in non exceptis: This part of the Commandement was by God diſpens'd within that inſtance and in a few more; but theſe few confirm the rule in all things and inſtances, beſides themſelves, for they ſay, that without Gods leave we may not break this Commandement. In Tertullian's time this very neceſſity did ſtill abide, and therefore they had the ſame zeal againſt images and whatſoever gave ſubſtance to idolatry; thats Tertullian's phraſe for Painters and Statuaries. But then this alſo is to be added: That all thoſe inſtances in the Old Teſtament of the brazen Serpent, the bulls, the Pomegranats, the Cherubims, the curious works of Bezaleel, are not to be us'd as arguments againſt the morality of the ſecond Commandement: becauſe theſe were ſingle cauſes, and had their ſpecial warrant or approbation reſpectively from the ſame fountain whence the prohibition came, at leaſt let them prevail no further then they ought; let them mean no more then they ſay, and let us goe no further then the examples: by which we find images made, for other uſes, but not for worſhip: and therefore the Commandement may be moral in all the periods of it, this onely excepted which relates to the making of them.

But when we conſider further that Solomon caus'd Golden Lyons to be made about his throne and the Jews imprinted images on their money, and in Chriſts time they us'd the images of Ceſar on their Coin, and found no reprover for ſo doing, this ſhowes that there was ſomething in the Commande-

ment that was not moral; I mean the prohibition of making or having any images: For to theſe things we find no command of God, no diſpenſation, no allowance poſitive: but the immunity of reaſon and the indemnity of not being reproved, and therefore for ſo much as concernes the making or having pictures and images we are at liberty without the warranty of an expreſs Commandement from God: The reaſon of the difference is this, The firſt inſtances (excepting that of the brazen ſerpent which becauſe it was to be inſtrumental in a miraculous bleſſing muſt ſuppoſe a Divine Commandement; like a Sacrament or Sacramental) were of images us'd in the Tabernacle or Temple, and ſo came within the verge of Religion; and for their likeneſs to the main ſuperſtition might not be ventur'd upon without ſpecial leave or approbation: and therefore God gave command for the images of the Tabernacle, and by his Majeſtatick preſence in the Temple approv'd all that was there. Upon what confidence Solomon ventur'd upon it; and whether he had a command or no I find not recorded, but ex poſt facto we find it approved. But for the other images which related wholly to civil uſe; right reaſon and the common notices of things was their ſufficient warrant; while they could have no end in diſobedience, no temptation to it, no reward for it; when it did not contradict any Natural or Religious reaſon; there was no danger of idolatry, no ſemblance of Superſtition. So that the reſult is this; The Jews were forbidden to make or have any images; and this was becauſe of their danger: but this was no moral law. But the very making and having them for worſhip is forbidden as the thing it ſelf is. Juſt as adultery and wanton looks are forbidden in the ſame Commandement, and are acts of the ſame ſin; ſo is worſhipping and having them for worſhip, it is that which S. Paul calls in the matter of uncleanneſs, Making proviſion for the fleſh to fulfil the luſts thereof. Making images and pictures to this end, is providing for the fleſh: For this alſo is fornication and ſpiritual whoredom. And as we may look upon a woman; and be innocent; ſo we doe not look upon her for luſt: ſo may we have or make pictures and images,; but for worſhip we may not: and in this ſenſe of the words even this period of the Commandement is alſo moral; and obliges us as much as the Jewes: but if thoſe words did abſtractedly and without their relation bind the Jews; it did never bind us but by way of caution and prudence; that is, when we are in the ſame dangers as were the Iſraelites, in the rudeneſs and infancy of their Church eſpecially. * And this we find in Tertullian; that when he had affirm'd the very art of painting and engraving to be unlawful; to them who enquire what then ſhall the poor men doe who have no other means to get their living; he anſwers; let them paint tables and cupboards, and remove their art from danger of religion to neceſſary and fit proviſions for life; let them doe things as like as they were enabled by their art; ſo they were unlike the violations of religion; and therefore the Church celebrates on the eighth of November the memory of Claudius Nicoſtratus and their fellows who choſe to die rather then make images for the Heathen Temples; they were excellent ſtatuaries, but better Chriſtians. By which it is plain that he means the very art as it miniſtred to idolatry; for abſtracting from that miniſtery and that danger it was lawful enough,

Qui fingit ſacros auro vel marmore vultus,
Non facit ille Deos; qui colit ille facit.

He that worſhips the image he makes it an idol; and he that deſignes any aſſiſtance to the idolatry, or knowingly miniſters to it, he adopts himſelf himself into a partnership of the crime. To which purpose was that of Tertullian, Facio (scil. imagines) sed non colo: quasi ob aliam causam colere non audeat, nisi ob quam & facere non debeat, scilicet ob Dei essentiam utrobique: imò tu colis, qui facis ut coli possint. He answers the objection of them that say, I make images, but I doe not worship them: as if (saies he) there were any reason forbidding thee to worship them; but the same for which thou oughtest not to make them; I mean, the Omnipresence of God. Nay thou worshippest them, who makest them that they may be worshipped. But in all other senses the making a picture, is not making an idol; and therefore that severe sense of the Commandement though as it is most probable it did oblige the Jews, and all persons in equal danger; yet because the reason may cease, and the danger be secur'd, when it is ceas'd, the obligation also is null; and therefore though that was in the Commandement; yet it is no part of its morality; but that excepted, every other clause is moral and Eternal.

De idol. c. 6.

32. 8. And all this is perfectly consenting to the analogy of the Gospel which is a spiritual worship, unclothed of bodily ceremonies, strip'd naked of beggarly rudiments, even those which God had commanded in the Old law; Christ placed but two mysterious ceremonies in the place of all the shadowes of Moses: and since Christianity hath shak'd off that body and outsides of religion, that law of a carnal commandement, that we might serve God in spirit and truth, that is, proportionable to his perfections, it cannot be imagined that this spiritual religion which worships God in praises and love, in charity and almes, in faith and hope, in contemplation and humility, in self-denial and separations from all corporal adherencies that are not necessary, and that are not Natural, I say it cannot be imagined that this spiritual religion should put on a phantastick body, which as much as it can, separates from a real: that Christianity should make a Vizor for God, who hath no body, and give that to him which the Heathens gave to their Devils; Daemoniis corpora contulerunt; they gave a body to their Daemons saies Tertullian, when they made images to them; that he who under the law of carnal ordinances could not endure an image, should yet be pleas'd with it under the pure and spiritual institution of the Gospel. A Christian must γνησίως θεοσεβείας ἀσπάζεσθαι worship God with genuine and proper worshippings, that is, ψυχῆς φιλῇ καὶ μόνῃ δουλείᾳ with the pure and only worship of the Soul. Now if the Ceremonials of Moses were contrary to this spirituality, and therefore was taken away by the Gospel: it cannot be imagined that images which are more contrary to a spiritual worship, should be let in by Christ, when they were shut out by Moses. * To this purpose they are excellent words which were spoken by Clemens Alexandrinus. "Moses many ages before made a law that there should "be no graven, no molten, no painted image or likeness of a thing made "amongst them, that we should not attend sensible things, but pass to those "which are perceiv'd by the understanding onely. For the daily custome of see-"ing him (in effigie) makes that the Majesty of God becomes vile and contem-"ptible, and by material Substances (Gross images) to worship that es-"sence which is onely discerned by the mind, is by the sense to undervalue the "Eternal mind.

De idol. c. 7.

Stromat. 5.

33. 9. And upon these accounts we find that the Christians were great haters of image-worship, and even of images themselves: and did deride the heathen follies, who in the midst of their witty disputations and wise discourses of God, did so unman themselves and baffle their own reason as to worship this invisible God by looking upon a contemptible image. To this purpose purpose Origen discourses wisely; "God hath chosen the folly of the world, L. 7. con Cels.

"those amongst the Christians whose lives were most simple, modest, and "more pure then that of the Philosophers, that he might put to shame those "wise men who blush not to speak to liveless trunks as if they were Gods or "images of the Gods. For what sober Man does not easily discerne him who "after his excellent and Philosophical discourses of God or of the Gods,
"does presently look upon images, and offers prayers to them, or by the be"holding them as some conspicuous sign, strives to lift up his mind to the "imagination of an intelligible Deity? But the Christian though but un-
"learned yet he beleeves verily that the whole world is the temple of God,
"and he prayes in every place, shutting his bodily eyes, but lifting up the eyes
"of his mind .... and being rap'd as it were beyond this world, he makes his "prayers to God for great things. This is the advantage, the Spirituality and devotion of the Christian. Concerning which it were easy to bring many ancient Testimonies; which whoever is desirous to see, may find them frequently in the Fathers of the four first ages: but especially in Irenæus l.1.cont. hær. c.24. Origen. l.7. contr. Cels. Tertull. de idol. c.5. and de coron. mil. and de Spect ac. c.23. Clemens Rom. Recogn. l. 5. and Clem. Alex. strom. 1, & 5. S. Chrysost. in Synod.7. Act. 6. and in 1 Cor. 8. Epiph. hær. 29. Amphiloch. apud Syn. 7. action. ead. Optatus l. 3. contr. Donat. S. Ambrose ep.31. ad Valent. S. Austin in Psal. 113. all which speak of this Article so as needs no commentary, and admits of no evasion, decretorily and dogmatically and zealously.

34. Now against this heap of plain testimonies there is not any one cleer sentence and dogmatical proposition to be brought; and if there could be brought forty particular instances of a contrary practice, though there are not three to be had in pure antiquity and in authentic testimony, yet it could not in any degree abate the certainty of this doctrine: because the Doctors of those ages say that where ever there is any such thing, it is unlawful. Epiphanius did rend in peeces the veil at Anablatha neer Bethlehem, because it had in it the picture of a man; and this is so notorious that Alfonsus à Castro calls him an Iconoclast: but Epiphanius gives this account of it to the Bishop of Jerusalem, Contrà authoritatem Scripturarum esse ut in Christi Ecclesia hominis pendeat imago; and, istiusmodi vela contra religionem nostram veniunt: It is against the authority of the Scriptures, it is against our religion that the image of a man, that such veiles should be in the Church: and Lactantius as plainly, Dubium non est quin religio nulla sit, ubicunque simulachrum est; where an image is, it is certain there is no Religion: and S. Austin answers all pretensions to the contrary which can readily be drawn from Antiquity. "I know "(saies he) many that are worshippers of pictures but such as neither know "nor exhibit the force of their Profession, but they are such who are superstitious in their very religion, such which the Church would condemn, and daily seek to correct like evil children. This being the doctrine of the Primitive Church; if a contrary practice comes in, it is certain it is by corruption of faith and manners. The Temples of Gods and the images of Gods they had in equal detestation: not that they hated publike places of worship; but Templa, non Ecclesias, or Dominicas; for we must know that in the language of the Fathers by Temples they did mean such as the Gentiles had; such as the Holy Scriptures call the place of Micah's images; [an house of Gods] according to that famous saying of Isidore: Templi nulla ratio quod non coronat simulachrum: It is no Temple that is without an image, and it is no Church that hath one according to the Primitive L. 2. c. de orig. erroris. Judges 17. 5.

Christian doctrine: and it was remarkeable what is told by Ælius Lampridius in the life of Alexander Severus, that when Adrian the Emperour had commanded Churches to be built without images, it was supposed he intended them for the service of Christ: then which there needs no greater or cleerer instance of the doctrine and practice of the Holy Primitives.

35. But the best and most perfect account that can be given of the Christian religion in this article, is by the Ecclesiastical laws. The Councel of Eliberis in Spain made a Canon: placuit picturas in Ecclesia esse non debere nè quod colitur aut adoratur in parietibus depingatur. Pictures must not be in Churches, lest that which is worshipped or adored be painted upon the walls. From which plain place Bellarmine, Perron, Binius and divers others take great pains to escape: it matters not how, as to the question of Conscience; it is sufficient what Agobardus Bishop of Lyons above 800 years agoe saies in this very particular. " Now error is so grown, and is perspicuous that they " approach neer the heresy of the Anthropomorphites and worship images, " and put their hope in them, the cause of which error is, that faith is de- " parted from mens hearts, and they put their confidence in what they see. " But as when we see Souldiers arm'd or Husbandmen plowing or mowing " or gathering grapes in picture, or the pictures of huntsmen pursuing their " game, or of Fishermen throwing their nets, we doe not hope to receive " from them a Mullet, or a Monethis pay, handfuls of barley or clusters of " grapes: So if we see winged Angels painted, Apostles preaching, Mar- " tyrs dying, we are not to expect any aid or good from the images we see, " because they can neither doe good nor hurt. Therefore for the abolishing of " this superstition, rectè ab Orthodoxis Patribus definitum est, it was rightly " defin'd by the Orthodox Fathers that pictures ought not to be in Churches " lest that which is worshipped (viz. God or his Christ) be painted upon their " walls. To the same purpose the Fathers of the fourth Councel at Constan-
Syn. 7. Act. 6. tinople did quote the words of Epiphanius as we learn from the acts of the second Nicene Councel, in these words. " Take heed to your selves and " hold the traditions which ye have received, decline not to the right hand or " to the left: and remember my beloved sons that ye bring not images into " the Churches, nor into the Cœmeteries of the Saints: but by remembrance " place God in your hearts. To the same purpose was it decreed by another
An. Dom. 753. Synod at Constantinople of 338 Bishops, under Constantius Copronymus; forbidding all use of images in Churches or out of them: and so much of their decree as forbad the worship of images was followed by Charles the Great, and the learned men of that age, and confirm'd by the Synod at Franckfurt where the Bishops of Italy, France and Germany were called by the Emperour to that purpose To these if we adde the Councel of Mentz, and the second Senon. 2, c. 26. Councel of Sens *, who commanded populum moneri nè imagines adoret, that the people should be warned that they doe not worship images; we have testimony enough of the Christian doctrine and usages of the best Men, and the best times.

Eliber. can. 36 In ecclesia non oportere depingi quod colitur et adoratur. Vnum etiam inpio Concilio Eliberino latum est de prohibendis imaginibus. Carolus loc. Theol. l. 5. c. 4. concil. 4. de pict. & imag.

36 Concerning the Christian doctrine; I suppose my self to have said enough in this Article. But besides the premises there is something peculiar to be superadded which concernes both Jews and Gentiles, and the uninstructed Laity of the Christians.

37. 1. Concerning the Jewes I have already made it appear that their religion ligion was perfectly againſt images: But I have two things to adde which relate to them: Firſt that in the diſputations between the Jewes and Chriſtian Doctors in the Primitive Church, they never objected againſt the Chriſtians that they either had images or did worſhip them: as is evident to them that read the conference between Juſtin Martyr and Tryphon; and in the book which Tertullian wrote againſt the Jewes, and in diverſe other rencontres; in which the Jew was forward to object all that he could aſperſe the Chriſtian withall, and he on the other ſide as ready to defend his cauſe. But not one word in any of them of objection againſt the Chriſtians in the matter of images, which is an evident argument, that the uſe of images was not as yet known to the Church of the firſt ages.

2. For when the doctrine and manners of the Chriſtians began to be ſullied and degenerate; and ſhe who was a pure Virgin and dear to Chriſt began to fornicate with ſtrange imaginations; the Jew inſtantly became clamorous and troubleſome in the Article; profeſs'd himſelf to be ſcandaliz'd at the whole religion, and in all diſputations was ſure to lay it in the Chriſtians diſh. There was a famous Dialogue written a little before the time of the ſeventh Synod in which a Jew is brought in, thus ſpeaking to the Chriſtian; Scandalizor in vos Chriſtiani quia imagines adoratis: Scriptura quippe ubique præcipit non facere quenquam ſibi ſculptile, vel omnem ſimilitudinem. I am offended at you Chriſtians becauſe ye worſhip images; whereas the Scripture every where commands that no man ſhould make to himſelf any graven image or the likeneſs of any thing. Of the ſame accuſation Leontius Biſhop of Cyprus takes notice in his Apology againſt the Jews: and that the Jews make great noiſes with this accuſation of the Chriſtians, and put very much upon it, we may ſee in the Epiſtle of Ludovicus Carretus, and the Catechetical Dialogues of Fabianus Fiogus. * But this obſervation is very remarkable out of the Jewiſh Talmud: For in the firſt part of it which they call the Miſna there is not one word of declamation or reproof againſt Chriſtians in the matter of images (as hath been long ſince obſerved by learned Men:) for this was made about two hundred years after Chriſt, in all which time the Chriſtians did hate images as much as the Jews did. But in the Gemara Babylonicum which is the ſecond part of the Talmud that is of authority amongſt them, which was finiſhed about five hundred years after Chriſt, at which time alſo images began to be receiv'd in Churches: there and in all the Commentaries of the Rabbins publiſhed in the tenth or eleventh age, the Jews call the Chriſtian Churches בית עבודה זרה Beth havoda zara The houſe of idolatry: and it will be impoſſible that ever they can become Chriſtians ſo long as they ſee images worſhipped in our Churches: and the ſecond Commandement left out of the Catechiſmes of thoſe with whom eſpecially they doe converſe.

Syn. 7. Act. 5.

38. That which I am to ſay concerning Heathens is this: That it is impoſſible that thoſe Chriſtians who worſhip images of God ſhould diſtinguiſh their manner of worſhipping the true God from the manner by which the Heathens worſhipped their Gods. For they did not ſuppoſe their images to be Gods, and therefore they would laugh at the Chriſtians if they had nothing elſe to ſay againſt them but that God is not a ſtone, or Mettal poliſhed by the Ingravers tool. Thus Arnobius brings in the Gentiles ſpeaking, Neque nos æra, neque auri argentique materias quibus ſigna confiunt, Deos eſſe & religioſa decernimus eſſe Numina, ſed eos ipſos in his colimus, quos dedicatio infert ſacra, &c. we doe not think the gold, or the braſs, or the ſilver, of which we make our images to be Gods: but in theſe images we worſhip them.

Hoc Deus eſt quod imago docet, ſed non Deus ipſa, Hoc videas, ſed mente colas quod cernis in ipſa.

The image is not God, but repreſents him: your eye upon the image and your mind upon God. Quis enim alius eſt niſi ſi ſit planè fatuus, qui hæc Deos eſſe putet, non autem Deorum donaria & ſimulachra: None but fools (ſaid Celſus) will call them Gods, which are but images of the Gods: and it is very pertinent which Lucian told the Matron, who took it ill that ſhe was complemented too high and compar'd in beauty to the Goddeſſes; "I never did (ſaies "he) Fair Lady, compare you to the Goddeſſes, but with their images made "by the beſt workmen of ſtone, or braſs, or ivory. And I doe not think it "impious to compare things with men, if thoſe things are made by Men, un- "leſs you will ſuppoſe that Phidias made Minerva, or that to be the Heaven- "ly Venus which a great many yeers agoe Praxiteles made at Cnidus. But "take heed, for it is an undecent thing to think ſuch things of the Gods, "whoſe true repreſentations (as I ſuppoſe) no Humane induſtry can make. The ſame is to be ſeen in Athenagoras[a], in Arnobius[b], in Lactantius[c], S. Auſtin[d], and divers others. Signa ad Junonis ſoſpitæ cruore manavere, Said Livy[e]; The ſigns (meaning the images in Juno's Temple) did drop bloud: and Clemens Romanus[f] brings in the Heathens ſaying, "We worſhip viſible images to "the Honour of the inviſible God; and they could ſometimes laugh at their Gods whom their Prieſts expos'd to worſhip, and yet themſelves knew them to have been a plum-tree.

It was a great queſtion amongſt the Carpenters whether this wood ſhould be a God or a ſtool: now they that talk'd thus, knew what that was which their Myſtick perſons call'd a God: they were ſure they could be but images of them. So that theſe Chriſtians who worſhip God by an image, although they otherwiſe ſin againſt the firſt Commandement then Heathens doe, who worſhip falſe Gods; yet they ſin equally againſt the ſecond Commandement, and by images tranſmit worſhip to their God reſpectively. I doe not doubt but the ruder among the Heathens did ſuppoſe the very image to be their God, or that their God did dwell in their Temple, and in their image, or that a Divine power was communicated to it; for ſome are ſuch very children as to think the woodden Poppet to be a woodman: and therefore when the Prophets diſcourſed againſt them in the matter of images they called them wood and ſtone, Gold and Silver, and repreſented the folly of putting truſt in things that had no life, which themſelves plac'd there, which Cats did ſit upon and birds build their neſts in: but either by theſe arguments they did reprove thoſe fools amongſt them who did ſuppoſe them to be Gods indeed (who alſo ſinn'd directly againſt the firſt Commandement, and committed idolatry in the object of their worſhip) or thoſe better Spirits and wiſer heads among them, who though they derided that folly, yet they put their truſt in the images, as ſuppoſing them inveſted with power from their God, and that by them he would doe them benefit.

3. Now

3. Now how far differing this is from the practice of Chriſtians in ſome times and places, we may gueſs by the complaints made by learned men, particularly by Caſſander, and Polydore Virgil, and Heſſelius the Regius Profeſſor at Lovain; but without the aid of their teſtimony, it is plain by their publick and authoriz'd treatment of their images, they conſecrate their images, they hope in them, they expect gifts and graces from them, they clothe them and crown them, they erect Altars and Temples to them, they kiſs them and bow their head and knee before them, they light up tapers and lamps to them, which is a direct conſumptive ſacrifice, & reliquam obſervationem circà eas ſimiliter ut gentes faciunt; they doe to their images as the Heathens doe to theirs; they are the words of Irenæus by which he reproves the folly of ſome that had got the pictures of Chriſt and Pythagoras and other eminent perſons: but that which is moſt to be reproved and can be leſs excus'd is their prayers and forms of dedicating their golden or woodden images; "Sanctifie ô God this form of the B. Virgin, that it may bring ſaving help to thy faithful people, that thunders and lightnings may be driven away the ſooner, that immoderate rains or flouds, and civil warrs or the invaſion of Heathens may at the preſence of this be ſuppreſſed. As bad or worſe are in the Pontifical in the dedication of an image of the Croſs, and of S. John, and at the hallowing the Agnus Dei. Now theſe things are as bad as can be; and yet done to images (I doe not doubt) for their ſakes whom they repreſent; but yet with ſome regard to the image it ſelf, for ſo they valew our Lady of Hales, our Lady of Walſingham, of Loretto, of Sichem, Aſpricollis, Prurietana, Ardilleriana, more then our Lady of Noſtredame, or Florence, or S. Denis. Now when the relatives of one terme do differ, it is for themſelves that the difference is, not for the correlative which is ſtill the ſame: and here for the common people to diſcern the niceties and the intricate nothings that their learned Men have devis'd to put a Vizor upon this folly; is ſo impoſſible that it will not be eaſie to make them underſtand the termes though a learned man were by them at every cringe they make. They cannot tell whether the worſhip be to the image or the exemplar; which is prime and which is ſecondary; they cannot diſtinguiſh of Latria, and dulia, and Hyperdulia, nor can they skill in proper or improper worſhip, mediate and immediate, univocal, equivocal, and analogical, nor ſay how much is for this, and how much for that, or which is ſimple and which is allayed, which is abſolute and which is reductive. And although men in the Schools, and when they have nothing to doe but to make diſtinctions which no body can underſtand, can ſeparate word from word, form from matter, real from notional, the ſhadow from the body, a dream from a viſion, the skin from the fleſh, and the fleſh from the bone, yet when they come to action and clothe their theoremes with a body of circumſtances, he that attends the preſent buſineſs of devotion and deſire, will not find himſelf able or at leaſure then to diſtinguiſh curiouſly; and therefore it was well ſaid of Heſſelius of Lovain; Images were brought into uſe for the ſake of the Laity, and now for their ſakes they are to be remov'd again, leſt they give divine worſhip to the image, or fall into the hereſie of the Anthropomorphites; (he might have added) or leſt by worſhipping God by an image they commit the ſin of ſuperſtition and idolatry, breaking the ſecond Commandement. For the ſame folly which in the Heathens was reprov'd by the Primitive Chriſtians, the ſame is done now adayes by Chriſtians to their images. I ſhall conclude this with a ſtory out of an Italian who wrote commentaries of the affairs of India: when the poor Barbarians of Nova Hiſpania in the Kingdome of Mexico had one day of a ſudden found their idols taken down and broken, they ſent four principal perſons of their country to Alfonſus Zuaſus the licentiate who had commanded it; they complaining of the injury ſuppos'd alſo, and told him, they did beleeve it to be done without his conſent or knowledge, as knowing that the Chriſtians had idols and images of their own, whom they valued, and ador'd and worſhip'd: and looking up and eſpying the image of S. Sebaſtian whom Alfonſus had in great veneration hanging by his bed ſide, they pointed at him with their finger ſaying, the ſame regard which he had to the image of S. Sebaſtian, the ſame they had to theirs. The Governour being troubled with this quick and not barbarous diſcourſe; turn'd him about a little, and at laſt told them, that the Chriſtians did not worſhip images for their own ſakes, but as they repreſented holy perſons dwelling in heavenly places: and to demonſtrate that, took down the image of S. Sebaſtian, and broke it in pieces. They replyed that it was juſt ſo with them; and that they were not ſo ſtupid to worſhip the images for their own regards; but as they repreſented the Sun and Moon and all the lights of heaven. Alfonſus being yet more troubled, was forc'd to change the ſtate of the queſtion: by ſaying that the object was differing though the manner was not, that the Chriſtians did by their images paſs honour to the great Creator of the world, but they did it to creatures, to evil Spirits, and falſe Gods: which was indeed very true, but it was a removing the queſtion from the ſecond Commandement to the firſt: For although in relation to the firſt the Heathens have the worſt of it; yet as to the ſecond theſe Chriſtians and the poor Indians were equal: and the wit of man cannot tell how they differ.

40. But I ſhall adde this, that though it be impoſſible to know how the worſhip of God by an image ſhould come into the world; unleſs it be as Tertullian ſaid of the very art of making images, that it came from the Divel; yet it is obſervable that it never prevail'd any where but in a degenerating people. The Jews at firſt were pure worſhippers of the God of their Fathers, but at any time when Sathan ſtood at their right hand and made Iſrael to ſin, then they would play the fool with images. In the pureſt times of Chriſtianity they kept themſelves clean from images; but as they grew worſe, ſo they brought in Superſtition, and worſhip of images, and ſo it was amongſt the Heathens too. While they kept themſelves to the principles of their inſtitution and tradition which they had from the Patriarchs of Nations who had been taught by God, and liv'd according to Nature; they worſhipped God ſimply and purely.

Si Deus eſt animus——
Hic tibi præcipuè pura ſit mente colendus.

a pure and immaterial ſubſtance is diſhonour'd by any worſhip but that of a pure and a holy mind; and the ancienteſt Romans for 170 yeers together worſhip'd without an image, ſaid Varro; who addes this judgement of his own, quod ſi adhuc manſiſſet caſtius Dii obſervarentur: if the ſame had been ſtill obſerved; the Gods had been more purely, more chaſtly worſhipped. The word which Varro uſes is very proper and according to the ſtile of Scripture which calls idolatrous worſhippings by the name of fornication. But Varro addes this reaſon. Qui primi ſimulachra Deorum populis poſuerunt eos civitatibus ſuis & metum dempſiſſe, & errorem addidiſſe. The introduction of images brought in error and caſt out fear, Stultè verebor ipſe cum faciam Deos.

if I worſhip what I make, I will not fear what I worſhip. Well and wiſely did he ſuppoſe (ſaid S. Auſtin) that the greatneſs of their Gods might ſoon become deſpicadeſpicable by the fooliſhneſs of images: and it might reaſonably prevail againſt the old ſuperſtition, to ſuppoſe that he who governed all the world ought to be worſhipped without an image. The ſame teſtimony we have in Plutarch in the life of Numa. The Gods had houſes and cells but no images, as ſuppoſing it to be impious to expreſs the greateſt things by the baſeſt; and knowing that there is no other way of coming to God but by the mind.

41. From hence I inferre that neither God nor Nature, neither reaſon nor religion brought images into the worſhip of God; but it was the invention of ſuperſtitious men, or rather of the enemy of Mankind that he might draw the heart of man from contemplation of the inviſible and depreſs it to low phantaſmes and ſenſible adherences, to diminiſh the fear of God, and to produce confidencies in dead ſubſtances cloth'd with accidents of art; to amuſe the fooliſh, and to entertain the weakeſt part of him that is wiſer, and that religion might be capable of tricks and illuſions which could not happen to immaterial and Spiritual worſhippings. But that all the reaſon of the world is againſt it; may be the rather preſum'd becauſe although the patrons of images offer at ſome reaſons for the uſe of images in ſtory and ornament and inſtruction; yet no man pretends to any reaſonableneſs of worſhipping God by an image, or giving Gods due to an image: Some of them ſay that the ſame worſhip paſſes from the image unto God, and therefore it is lawful, and God is not diſhonoured: but upon no reaſonable account can it be ſaid, that therefore it is good, that it pleaſes God, that it promotes his honour, that it is without danger; and however any man may intend to paſs the relative honour that way, yet no man hath any warrant that God will accept it, or that he will endure it, that way; that he will receive his ſacrifices moſt readily when they are firſt waſh'd (ſhall I call it? or foul'd) in the Borborus, by the pollutions and abhominations of images: for that they are called ſo in Scripture is evident; but they are never commended there, not one good word of them is there recorded: but of the worſhip of them nothing but prohibition and execration and foul appellatives. There is no neceſſity of it, no advantage by it, no man is help'd by it, no command, no licence, no promiſe, no Scripture for it; all the religions that ever God did inſtitute are expreſsly againſt it, and to ſumme up all, it is againſt the law of Nature: of which I need no other witneſſes but the teſtimony of all thoſe wiſe perſonages who affirme the two Tables of Moſes to be moral in every precept excepting that of the Sabbath, and to be of the law of Nature. So Irenæus expreſsly: So Tertullian, S. Cyprian, Origen, S. Auguſtine, and generally all antiquity. The ſumme of all I expreſs in the words of S. Paul, ὁ Θεὸς ὁ ποιήσας κόσμον ἐκ ὑπὸ χεῖρῶν ἀνθρώπων θεραπεύεται. God is not worſhipped with mens hands, that is, with the productions of art and imagination.

42. I conclude that the ſecond Commandement is a Moral and Natural precept in the whole body and conſtitution of it; if the firſt words of it be relative to the laſt; that is, if the prohibition of making images be underſtood ſo as to include an order to their worſhip: but if theſe words be made to be a diſtinct period; then that period was onely obligatory to the Jews: and to Chriſtians in equal danger, and under the ſame reaſon; and therefore can alſo paſs away with the reaſon which was but temporary, tranſient and accidental: all the reſt retaining their prime, Natural, and eſſential obligation.

Of the Jewiſh Sabbath, and the Lords day.

43. There is one inſtance more in which the Rule is more apparently verified; which I mention'd a little above: and that is the precept of the Sabbath: which God inſtituted for many reaſons. 1. To be a perpetual memorial of the Creation, and that God might be glorified in the works of his hands by the religion of that day. 2. To preſerve the memory of their deliverance from the captivity of Egypt, Deuter. 5. 14. and upon the ſame account to doe eaſe and remiſſion τοῖς δούλοις λογικοῖς καὶ ἀλόγοις to ſervants reaſonable and unreaſonable. R. Moſes Ben Maimon in his Moreh Nebochim affirmes that the end of the Sabbath is, Septimam vitæ partem homini præſtare liberam, & vacuam à labore & defatigatione, tum conſervare & confirmare memoriam, & fidem Creationis Mundi, that we ſhould ſpend the ſeventh part of our life in eaſe and reſt; and preſerve the faith and memory of the Article of the worlds creation,

L. 3. c. 43.

Homer.

Ἑβδόμῃ νῦμαρ ἦλθε καὶ τῷ πεπάλεκτο ἅπαντα.

becauſe upon the ſeventh day all things were finiſh'd: and therefore according to that of Linus cited by Euſebius,

Ἑβδόμη εἰν ἀγαθοῖς, καὶ ἑβδόμη ἔξοχα τελεῖται,
Ἑβδόμη ὅτι πρῶτόν ποτε, καὶ ἑβδόμη ἔξοχα τέλειον.

The ſeventh day is the day of the worlds Nativity, or the feaſt of its birth, it is the chiefeſt and moſt perfect of dayes. 3. S. Auſtin hath another fancy; and he intends to offer at no higher rate: Dici probabiliter poteſt, obſervandum Sabbathum Judæis fuiſſe præceptum in umbra futuri quæ ſpiritualem requiem figuraret, quam Deus exemplo hujus quietis ſuæ fidelibus bona opera facientibus arcanâ ſignificatione pollicebatur. It may be ſaid probably that the precept of the Sabbath to the Jews was a type and ſhadow of that Spiritual reſt which God by his example did by a ſecret ſignification promiſe to the faithful that did good works. I acknowledge that there is a fair proportion in the ſign and in the thing ſignified; but whether this was ſo intended by God, or ſo underſtood by the Jewes is but probabiliter dictum, a probable conjecture taken onely from the Natural ſimilitude of the things.

S. Aug. l. 4. de Genes. ad lit. c. 11.

44. But allowing this: the conſequent of all will be; that what was for temporary reaſons eſtabliſhed cannot paſs an eternal obligation. Concerning which it is to be obſerved that thoſe are to be called temporary or tranſient reaſons, not onely when the thing ceaſes to have a being; ſuch as thoſe laws which were to ſeparate the Jews from the Gentiles, and thoſe which related to the tabernacle, or the land of their dwelling, or the manner of their ſacrifice, or their addreſſes to their chief city; for theſe ceaſe by ſubtraction of the matter and the natural abolition of the material cauſe; becauſe the wall of partition is taken down; and the law of Ceremonies is aboliſhed, and the people are exterminated from their Country, and their ſacrifices are ceas'd, and their City is deſtroyed, and their temple burnt: but that reaſon alſo is tranſient and temporal, which in a like inſtance paſſes into a greater of the ſame kind. Thus the deliverance of Iſrael from the Egyptian bondage, though being a matter of fact it is eternally true that it was once done, yet it is a temporary tranſient reaſon becauſe all Gods people now rejoice in a greater deliverance and from a bondage that was infinitely worſe; from the ſlavery of ſin, and the powers of Hell.

Hell. And thus alſo the great reaſon of the Sabbath, I mean Gods reſt from the works of the Creation is a temporary tranſient reaſon; becauſe there is now a new Creation; vetera tranſierunt, old things are paſs'd away and all things are become new; and the Goſpel is νέα κλίσις a new Creation, and our Natures are regenerate and reform'd and made with new principles of a new life to higher ends then before; and therefore though the work of Gods creation is to be remembred and God to be glorified by us in his works, yet when there is a greater reaſon, the ſolemnity muſt relate to that, and the leſſer duty can be well ſerved by that day which can alſo miniſter to the greater.

45. And therefore we find that ſomething of this very reaſon is drawn into the obſervation of the Lords day, or the firſt day of the week, by Juſtine Martyr, τὴν τῆ ἡλίε ἡμέραν κοινῆ πάντες τὴν συνέλευσιν ποιύμεθα, ἐπειδὴ πρώτη ἔζιν ἡμέρα ἐν ᾗ ὁ Θεὸς τὸ σκότ@. καὶ τὴν ὕλην τρέψας κόσμον ἐποίησε, καὶ Ἰησοῦς χριστὸς ὁ ἡμέτερ@. σωτὴρ τῇ αὐτῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἐκ νεκρῶν ἀνέστη. We celebrate conventions or aſſemblies commonly upon the Sunday, becauſe it is the firſt day in which God ſeparated the light from the darkneſs and made the world, and on the ſame day Jeſus Chriſt our Saviour aroſe from the dead. The firſt of theſe looks more like an excuſe then a juſt reaſon; for if any thing of the Creation were made the cauſe of a Sabbath, it ought to be the end not the beginning; it ought to be the reſt not the firſt part of the work; it ought to be that which God aſſign'd, not which man ſhould take by way of after juſtification. Apol. 2.

46. But in the precept of the Sabbath there are two great things. One was the reſt, the other the religion of the day. The reſt was in remembrance of their deliverance from Egypt; and therefore they kept their firſt Sabbatick reſt upon the very day in which their redemption was completed, that is, as ſoon as ever Pharaoh and his hoſt were overthrown in the Red ſea; and this becauſe it was external, ritual, National, relative and temporary, abus'd by ſuperſtition, and typical of ſomething to come, without all contradiction is ſo perfectly ceremonial and conſequently abrogated, that there can be no greater wonder then to ſee ſome Chriſtians ſuch ſuperſtitious obſervers of the reſt of that day, that they equal even the greateſt follies of the Jews; who as Munſter out of the Rabbins obſerves, thought it unlawful to put an apple to the fire to be roaſted upon that day, and would not pour wine upon Muſtardſeed, nor take a clove of garlick from its skin and eat it, nor thought it lawful to purſue a skipping flea, nor to kill any creeping thing that had variety of ſexes, nor to climb a tree leſt they break a bough, nor by ſinging to ſtill the crying of a child, nor to play upon the harp, nor by walking on the graſs pluck up a leaf with the ſhooe. Theſe trifles as they were ſuch which even the Jew was no waies oblig'd to, ſo they are infinitely againſt Chriſtian liberty and the analogy and wiſedome of the Religion.

47. But the Jews ſay that Enoch and Noah, Abraham and Jacob kept a feſtival to God, a memorial of the Creation. If ſo, yet we find no reſt obſerved by them, nor any intermiſſion of their journeys; but it is reaſonable to beleeve that by ſome portions of their time they did ſpecially ſerve God, as well as by ſome actions of their life, and ſome portions of their eſtate: and to this it is not improbable that Moſes did relate when to the words in Deuteronomy; Remember to keep the day of the Sabbaths to ſanctifie it ὃν τρόπον ἐνετείλατό σοι Κύρι@. ὁ θεός σου, according as the Lord thy God had commanded thee, meaning, at the beginning of the world: But in this part of the precept there was nothing of reſt, but much of holineſs and proper ſanctification.

48. Now concerning this the resolutions will be easie; That God should be serv'd and glorified by us is a part of Natural and essential religion: this cannot be done with nothing; there must be bodies, and gifts and places and time to doe it in: The Patriarchs did bind themselves or were bound by God to certain circumstances; for that which is indefinite and unlimited, shall neither be done constantly nor regularly: but since the day of the creations ending was afterwards made the rule of fixing a day, it is also probable that that also was the limit and rule for the Patriarchs religious solemnity: This indeed is denyed by S. Irenæus and Tertullian and some others, affirming that the Patriarchswho kept no Sabbath were yet pleasing to God,but because certainly it was so to the Jews, upon a reason which though it can be involv'd in a greater, yet it cannot totally be forgotten; it is more then probable that the religion of the day must never be forgotten; but God must have a portion of our time for his service, and the blessing which they were both in and before the law, to commemorate, must also by implication or else expressly be remembred.

49. Upon this or some equal account the Primitive Christians did keep the Sabbath of the Jews; not onely for their complyance with the Jews till the distinction were confess'd and notorious; but because the moral Religion which was serv'd by that day was not brought into the religion of the Lords day as yet; therefore the Christians for a long time together did keep their Acts 15. 21. conventions upon the Sabbath, in which some portions of the law were read*:
Can. 16. and this continued till the time of the Laodicean Councel; which also took
A. D. 364. care that the reading of the Gospels should be mingled with their reading of the law: which was in a manner the first publick reasonable essay of uniting the religion of both dayes into one.

50. At first they kept both dayes with this onely difference that though they kept the Sabbath, yet it was after the Christian, that is, after the spiritual manner: in these exuberancies and flouds of religion which overflow'd their channels,one day of solemnity was not enough: but besides that they by their Sabbath meetings had entercourse with the Jews in order to their conversion, and the Jewish Christians in order to the establishment of their religion, they were glad of all occasions to glorifie God: but they did it without any opinion of essential obligation; and without the Jewish rest, and upon the account of Christian reasons. Of this custome of theirs we find testimony in Epist. ad Mag. Ignatius, ἀλλ' ἕκας Θ. ἡμῶν σαββατιζέτω πνευματικῶς μελέτην νόμων χαίρων, ὐ σώμα Θ. ἀνέσι, δ'ημιυργίαν Θεῦ θαυμάζων, ὐκ ἔωλα ϗ χλιαρὰ πίνων, ϗ μεμερημνώα βαδίζων ϗ ὀρχήσι ϗ χορῶις νέων ὐκ ἔχυσι χαίρων. That was their way of observation of the Sabbath. "Let every one of us keep the "Sabbath Spiritually, delighting in the meditation of the law not in the "ease of the body, wondring at the works of God, not in indulging to deli-"cious banquets, and softer drinkings or dancings that doe not better the "Understanding. So that they kept the Sabbath not as did the Jews; who as Munster affirm'd suppos'd it to be a keeping of the Sabbath if they wore better clothes,or eat more meat, or drank the richest wines: Idleness and luxury, and pride are the worst ceremonies of the religion of the Sabbath: the proper imployment of that day is religion, which the Jews, and from them some of the most ancient Christians signified by [meditation of the law.] But then he addes; Καὶ μ τὸ σαββατίσαι ἑορταζέτω πᾶς ὁ φιλόχειςΘ. τ κυριακὴν τ ἀναστάσιμον, τ βασιλίδα, τ ὕπατον πασῶν ἡμερῶν. After they they have kept the Sabbath let every one that loves Christ keep the day of the Lord; the day of the memorial of his resurrection; which is the Queen and the Supreme of all other daies: and without further testimony we find it affirmd in general by Balsamo ὡς ἀπὸ τῶν ἁγίων πατέρων ἐξισώσαντων διὰ λόγου τὰς Κυριακὰς τοῖς σαββάτοις. The Sabbath day and the Lords day were almost in all things made equal by the Holy Fathers and some of them called them Brethren: so Gregory Nyssen; some, καλῶς ἡ ζωγρὶς τὸ σάββατον τῇ Κυριακῇ, so Asterius, an excellent combination or yoke of the Sabbath and the Lords day: and ἡμέρας ἑορτῶν, so the Canon of the Apostles, the feast daies which Zonaras well explicates to the present Sense, but the Constitutions of S. Clement (which is indeed an ancient book) gives the fullest account of it; τὸ σάββατον μνήμη ἐστὶ τῆς κτίσεως ὅτι τὸ μὲν δημιουργίας ἐστὶν ὑπόμνημα ἡδὲ ἀναστάσεως. Let the Sabbath and the Lords day be kept festival; that, because it is the memorial of the Creation, this of the resurrection: and therefore whereas it is in the Commandement; sixe dayes shalt thou labour, &c. he saies, that servants are to labour but five daies: and upon this account it was in the Greek Church especially, and is to this day forbidden to fast upon the Sabbath and the Lords day.

51. The effect of which consideration is this; that the Lords day did not succeed in the place of the Sabbath; but the Sabbath was wholly abrogated, and the Lords day was meerly of Ecclesiastical institution. It was not introduc'd by vertue of the fourth Commandement; because they for almost three hundred yeers together kept that day which was in that Commandement; but they did it also without any opinion of prime obligation, and therefore they did not suppose it moral. But there was together with the observation of the day a peece of natural religion which was consequently Moral; that is, a separation of some time for the glorification of God and the commemoration of his benefits: not that it can be reasonably thought that the assignation of a definite time can be a moral duty, or that an indefinite time can be the matter of a Commandement: and therefore I suppose it to be unreasonable to say, that although the seventh day is not moral: yet that one day is, or at least that some time be separate is moral; for that one day in seven should be separate can have no natural, essential and congenite reason, any more then one in ten, or one in six; for as it does not naturally follow that because God ceased from the Creation on the seventh day, therefore we must keep that holy-day, so neither could we have known it without revelation, and therefore what follows from hence must be by positive constitution: Now if it be said that it is moral that some time be set apart for Gods service: I say it is true, that it is necessary, naturally necessary that it be so, but this cannot be the matter of a special Commandement; because it being naturally necessary that God should be solemnly worshipped this must suppose a time to doe it in, as a natural circumstance, and needs not a Commandement; which is sufficiently and unavoidably included in the first Commandement, in which we are bound to serve God with religion. The fourth Commandement enjoin'd a definite time, but that was ceremonial and abrogated: but an indefinite time is not a duty of this Commandement, but suppos'd in that which commands us to worship God. For we may as well worship God and doe no action, as worship him in no time. The definite time here nam'd is taken away, and the indefinite time cannot be a distinct duty, but yet in imitation of the reasonableness and piety of that law, and in commemoration of a greater benefit then was there remembred, a day of more ſolemne Religion was us'd by the Chriſtian Church; for as on the the Jewiſh Sabbath they remembred the Creation and their redemption from Egypt: ſo on the Lords day they commemorated the works of God, and their redemption from Sin, Hell and the Grave: but the firſt reaſon was to yeeld to the ſecond; as the light of a leſſer ſtar falls into the glories of the Sun, and though it be there yet it makes no ſhow, becauſe a bigger beauty fills up all the corners of the eyes and admiration: and now the Lords day hath taken into it ſelf all the Religion but not the Reſt of the Sabbath; that is, it is a day of ſolemn worſhipping of God and of remembring his bleſſings, but not of reſt ſave onely as a vacancy from other things is neceſſary for our obſervation of this: becauſe as the Italians ſay, Io non pua cantare & portare la Croce, I cannot ſing and carry the Croſs too; a man cannot at once attend to two things of contrary obſervation.

52. That we are free from the obſervation of the Sabbath S. Paul expreſsly affirmes; adding this reaſon, feaſts, new moons, and Sabbath daies, and Coloſſ. 2. 16. meats and drinks are but the ſhadow of things to come, but the body is of Chriſt: Where by the way let it be obſerv'd that upon the occaſion of this and ſome other like expreſſions the Chriſtians have ſuppos'd that all the rites of Moſes were types and figures of ſomething in Chriſtianity, and that ſome myſtery of ours muſt correſpond to ſome rite of theirs: this fancy makes ſome impertinencies in the diſcourſes of wiſe men, and amuſes and entertains the Underſtandings of many with little images of things which were never intended, and hath too often a very great influence into doctrines: whereas here the word σκιὰ τῶν μελλόντων [The ſhadow of things to come] means, a ſhadow in reſpect of the things to come, that is, if theſe rituals be compared to the τὰ μέλλοντα, thoſe things which were to come, they are but very ſhadows, and nothings: σκιὰ or ſhadow ſignifies not in relation but in oppoſition to Corpus. The ſhadow, that is, a religion conſiſting but in rituals and exterior ſolemnities; but Chriſtianity is the body, that is, that durable, permanent, true and ſubſtantial religion which is fit for all men, and to abide for all ages: And therefore Heſychius by Corpus Chriſti in this place underſtands the word of doctrine; that is, a religion which conſiſts in wiſe notions, ἐν ἀληθείᾳ in truth, not in external rituals that ſignified nothing of themſelves, but ſomething by inſtitution. Others by [the body of Chriſt] here, underſtand the Chriſtian Church: in which ſenſe the word is us'd
1 Cor. 12. 27. by S. Paul to the Corinthians; and in this very place it means ſo if the words be read as ſome Greek copies doe, that is, with conjunction and reference to the next verſe: τὸ δὲ σῶμα τοῦ χριστοῦ μηδεὶς ὑμᾶς καταβραβευέτω, &c. Let no man make a gain of you who are the body of Chriſt. However that S. Paul affirms the cuſtoms of the Pythagoreans in abſtinence from fleſh and wine; and of the Jews in their feaſts and Sabbaths to be no fit matters in which men are to be judg'd, that is, for the not obſerving of which they are to be condemned, but to be ſhadows and umbrages, not ſubſtantial parts of religion, is evident by the antitheſis however it be underſtood: but in order to other purpoſes I obſerved here that he does not mean they are types and figures; for the Pythagorean vanities did never pretend to this, but they and the other too are but ſhadows, empty and unprofitable in reſpect of the religion which Chriſt brought into the world. They were ineffective and inſignificative; but onely preſent Entertainments of their obedience, and divertiſements and fixings of their thoughts apt to wander to the Gentile Cuſtomes; but nothing of Natural religion.

53. Now although the primitive Chriſtians did alſo meet publikely upon the Jewiſh Sabbaths, yet that they did it not by vertue of the fourth Commandement appears becauſe they affirm'd it to be ceremonial and no part of the Moral law, as is to be ſeen in Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, S. Cyprian and others before quoted: numb. 41. And in the Councel of Laodicea the obſervation of the Jewiſh Sabbath which till that time had continued amongſt Chriſtians was expreſsly forbidden: Non oportet Chriſtianos Judaizare & in Sabbato vacare, ſed operari eos in eadem die, Dominicam præponendo eidem diei. Si hoc eis placet, vacent tanquam Chriſtiani, Quòd ſi inventi fuerint Judaizare, anathema ſint. Chriſtians muſt not keep the reſt of the Sabbath, but work upon that day, preferring the Lords day before it. If they will reſt on that day let them reſt as Chriſtians; but if they reſt as Jews let them be accurſed: that is, if they will keep the day holy, let them ſanctifie it as Chriſtians ſhould ſanctifie their day, that is, onely with ſuch a reſt as miniſters to the opportunities of religion, not ſo as to make the reſt to be the religion of the day. Can. 29.

54. The Jewiſh Sabbath being abrogated; the Chriſtian liberty like the Sun after the diſperſion of the clouds appear'd in its full ſplendor; and then the diviſion of dayes ceas'd, and one day was not more holy then another, as S. Paul diſputes in his epiſtle to the Galatians, and from him S. Hierom; and when S. Paul reprov'd the Corinthians for going to law before the unbeleevers, who kept their Court dayes upon the firſt day of the week, he would not have omitted to reprove them by ſo great and weighty a circumſtance as the prophaning the Lords day; in caſe it had been then a Holy day, either of Divine or Apoſtolical inſtitution: for when afterward it grew into an Eccleſiaſtical law, and either by law or cuſtome was obſerved together with the Jewiſh Sabbath, Conſtantine made a favourable edict that the Chriſtians ſhould not be impleaded on thoſe two feſtivals. Of which I onely make uſe to this purpoſe, that among the Gentiles theſe were law-daies; and therefore the Corinthians muſt needs have been prophaners of that day by their law-ſuits, and therefore have been upon that account obnoxious to the Apoſtolical rod; if the day had then in any ſenſe of authority been eſteemed holy. Gal. 4. 10. In hunc locum. Apud Euſeb.

55. But although there was no holineſs in any day; yet they thought it fit to remember the great bleſſings of God which were done upon certain dayes. An action cannot be ſeparated from time; it muſt be done ſome day or other, and moſt properly upon the Anniverſary, or the monethly, or weekly minds, but yet this they did with ſo great indifferency of obſervation, that it cannot look leſs then that there was a providence in it. For although all the Chriſtian Church that kept the Sunday feſtival, did it and profeſs'd to doe it in remembrance of the Reſurrection of our Lord, yet that the day of its memory was not more holy then any day, and was not of neceſſary obſervation; it appears by the Eaſterne Churches and all the Diſciples of S. John who kept the feaſt of the Reſurrection of our Lord, I mean the Anniverſary, the Great, the prime feaſt, and that which was the meaſure of all the reſt, not upon that day of the week on which Chriſt did riſe, but on the day of the full Moon, when ever it ſhould happen. Now this muſt needs be a demonſtration, that the day of the reſurrection was not holy by Divine or Apoſtolical inſtitution: The memory of the bleſſing was to be eternal; and though the returning day was the fitteſt circumſtance, yet that was without obligation; for if the principal was mutable, then the leſs principal could not be fix'd, and this was well obſerved by S. Auſtin; Hoc in iis culpat Apoſtolus, & in omnibus qui ſerviunt Crea- Contr. Adam. Man. c. 16.

Creaturæ potius quàm Creatori. Nam nos quoque & Dominicam diem & Paſcha ſolenniter celebramus; ſed quia intelligimus quò pertineant, non tempora obſervamus, ſed quæ illis ſignificantur temporibus. He firſt eſteemed it to be a ſerving "the Creature more then the Creator to obſerve any day as of divine inſtitu-"tion; but then if it be objected that we alſo obſerve the Lords day and "the feaſt of Eaſter; he anſwers, It is not the day we keep, but we re-"member the things done upon that day. For the day is indifferent, and Iſai. 66. 23. hath no obligation. God himſelf declar'd his diſlike of the Religion or difference of daies, by an Evangelical Prophet: and what God the Father did then ſufficiently declare, his Holy Son finiſhed upon the Croſs; and his Apoſtles publiſhed in their Sermons: onely ſuch dayes are better circumſtanc'd, but not better daies. The ſame is affirm'd by S. Hierome upon the fourth chapter to the Galatians.

56. But now that we are under no Divine law or Apoſtolical Canon, concerning the Lords day; we may with the more ſafety inquire concerning the Religion with which it was accidentally inveſted. S. Cyprian and S. Auſtin ſuppoſe that becauſe Circumciſion was commanded to be on the eighth day, it did typically repreſent the Lords day, which is the eighth from the Creation: The Councel of Foro-Julium ſaith, that Iſaiah prophecyed of this day; and that the Jewiſh Sabbath was the type of this day, was the doctrine of the Fathers in the Councel of Matiſcon. This is the day which the Lord hath made; ſaid the Pſalmiſt, as he is expounded by Arnobius and divers others: Exultemus & lætemur in eo, qui à lumine vero noſtras tenebras fugaturus illuxit; nos ergo conſtituamus diem Dominicam in frequentationibus uſque ad cornua altaris. "Let us rejoice and be glad in it, becauſe the Sun of righteouſneſs diſperſing "the clouds of darkneſs hath on this day ſhin'd upon us: Let us therefore keep "the Lords day in ſolemn aſſemblies even unto the hornes of the altar. Upon this day Chriſt finiſh'd the work of our redemption which was greater then the ceſſation from creating the world; on this day he roſe again for our juſtification, and therefore this is called by S. Ignatius The Queen of daies; upon this day Chriſt twice appear'd to his Apoſtles after the reſurrection; upon this
1 Cor. 16. 2. day S. Paul appointed the collection for the poor, and conſequently enjoin'd or ſuppos'd the aſſemblies to be upon this day: upon this day the Holy Ghoſt deſcended upon the Apoſtles; and on this day S. Peter preach'd that operative Apoc. 1. 10. Sermon which won three thouſand Souls to the Religion: on this day S. John was in extaſie and ſaw ſtrange revelations: ſo that it is true what Juſtin Martyr ſaid, Our B. Lord himſelf changed this day; that is, by annulling the Sabbath and by his reſurrection and excellent appearances and illuſtrations upon that day; not by precept, but by indigitation and remarking that day by ſignal actions and an heap of bleſſings; ſo that it is no wonder that S. Cyprian and S. Leo, S. Ignatius and S. Auſtin, the Councels of Laodicea, Matiſcon and Foro-Julium, of Paleſtine and Paris ſpeak ſo much of the advantages and prerogatives of this day, the celebration of which was ſo early in the Chriſtian Church that it was, though without neceſſary obligation, or a law, obſerved in all ages and in all Churches. It is true that Socrates ſaid; σκοπὸς μὲν ἦν γένοντο τοῖς ἀποστόλοις ὲ περὶ ἡμερῶν ἑορταστικῶν νομοθετεῖν; It was the purpoſe of the Apoſtles to make no laws concerning Feſtival dayes: but it is alſo very probable what one ſaid; that it deſcends from Apoſtolical inſtitution, Servatâ tamen libertate Chriſtianâ, that is, the Apoſtles did upon the Lords day often meet, break bread, and celebrate the memory of Chriſt; and by their practice recommended the day as the moſt fitted for their Synaxes or Conventions; but they made no law, impoſed no neceſſity, but left the Church to her Chriſtian Liberty, and yet (that I may uſe the words of the Fathers in the Councel of Matiſcon) juſtum eſt ut hanc diem celebremus per quam facti ſumus quod non fuimus. It is fit we celebrate this day becauſe of the bleſſing of the reſurrection happening on this day by which we became that which before we were not.

Queſt.

AND now if it be inquired how we are to celebrate this day?

57. I anſwer; That we are ſufficiently inſtructed by thoſe words of the Laodicean Councel; vacent tanquam Chriſtiani: there is a certain rule and meaſure by which Chriſtians keep their Feſtivals. The Jewiſh manner was a perfect reſt: The Chriſtian manner is an excellent religion and devotion; but no reſt excepting ſuch a reſt as miniſters to religion: Abſtinence from ſuch works, which if we attend to, we cannot attend to the religion that is commanded, is eſſentially neceſſary, when the keeping of the day religiouſly and ſolemnly becomes neceſſary. There are alſo ſome corporal works which are proper celebrations of the day, or permitted in all religions upon their Feſtivals: ſuch as are acts of publike or private benefit: works of neceſſity, little things, and unavoidable; which are ſometimes expreſs'd in this verſe, Parva, neceſſarium, res publica, res pia fratri.

Among the old Romans in their moſt ſolemn feſtivals ſome things were ſpecially permitted,

Quippe etiam feſtis quædam exercere diebus
Fas & jura ſinunt: rivos deducere nulla
Religio vetuit, ſegeti prætendere ſepem,
Inſidias avibus moliri, incendere vepres,
Balantúmque gregem fluvio merſare ſalubri. Macrob.

It was lawful to turn the water leſt it might do miſchief, or that it might doe good; to ſtop a gap in a hedge, to prevent a treſpaſs, to lay ſnares for birds, to water the cattel, to burne weeds: and no religion forbids things of this Nature.

58. But beſides the laws and practices of Heathens in the Natural religion and obſervation of feſtivals; we may be inſtructed by the ſame religion amongſt the Jews and Chriſtians: Reading and meditating the law was the religion of the Jews upon their feaſts and Sabbaths: Moſes of old hath them that preach him in every city being read in the Synagogues every Sabbath day; ſaid S. James. "They met εἰς ἱερὰς πύπους, as Philo calls their Synagogues, and they "heard Moſes and the Prophets read and expounded: there they did all the "actions of Natural religion; there they taught piety and holineſs, juſtice "and government, Oeconomical and Political affairs; and the meaſures of "things good and bad and indifferent; and though in their Synagogues the expoſition and meditation of the law was their principal imployment; yet in their Tabernacle and in their Temple which were their places of worſhip, they offer'd ſacrifice and ſang hymnes and praiſes and glorifications of God. This was the duty and the Religion of their Sabbath; not as it was a ſpecial ſeparate feaſt; but becauſe this was the imployment fitted for all ſpiritual and religious feaſts whatſoever.

Act. 15. 21. V. Act. 13. 27. 14. 27. 44. Luk. 4. 16. 31. & 13. 10.

Sancta dies oritur, linguíſque animíſque favete,
Hoc dicenda bono ſunt bona verba die.

All holy dayes are dayes design'd for holy offices, for the celebration of the Divine name and the Divine Attributes; for charitable and holy discourses. That rest which God superadded, being onely commemorative of their deliverance from the Egyptian servitude, was not moral, nor perpetual; it could be dispensed with at the Command of a Prophet; it was dispens'd with at the Command of Joshuah, it was broken at the siege of Jericho, it alwaies yeelded when it clash'd with the duty of any other Commandement; it was not observ'd by the Priests in the Temple, nor in the stalls by the Herdsman, nor in the house by the major domo; but they did lead the oxe to water, and circumcis'd a Son; that is, it yeelded to charity and to religion, not onely to a moral duty but to a Ceremonial; and therefore could not oblige us: But that which remain'd was imitable, the natural religion which was us'd upon the Jewish festivals was fit also for the Holy dayes of Christians.

59. And this also plainly was the practice of the Christians, and bound upon them by the command of their Superiors. 1. It was not σαμβατικὸς ἀνὴρ Ep. ad Magn. as S. Ignatius expresly affirmes; the rest of the body is no essential duty of the Christian festivals: that was a Judaical rite; but the Christian is bound to labour, even upon that day; saies that holy Martyr: for then there had been no positive inhibition. And the Primitive Christians did all manner of works upon the Lords day; even in the times of persecution when they are the strictest observers of all the Divine Commandements: but in this they knew there was none: and therefore when Constantine the Emperor had made an edict against working upon the Lords day; yet he excepts and still permitted all agriculture or labours of the Husbandman whatsoever: for God regardeth not outward cessation from works more upon one day then another, as S. Epiphanius disputes well against the Ebionites and Manichees. L. omnes c. de feriis.

60. Thus far was well enough when the Question was concerning the sense and extent of a Divine Commandement; labour is a Natural duty, but to sit still or not to labour upon a whole day is no where by God bound upon Christians.

61. 2. It was not ἀνὴρ σαμβατικὸς, but it is μελέτη νόμου, and δημιουργίαν Θεοῦ Ibidem. θαυμάζων, so the same Father: The meditation and exercise of the word of God, and admiring the works of God, that was the work of Christian festivals: and that they might attend this, they were commanded to abstain from servile works more or less, these or others respectively in several times and Apol. 2. places. This we find in Justin Martyr speaking of the Christian Sabbath and "Synaxes; the Citizens and Countrymen are assembled together, and first "are read the Scriptures of the Prophets and Apostles; then the Priest or "President makes a Sermon or exhortation to them to practice what they "heard read, then all goe to prayers, after this they receive the Holy Eucha- "rist, then they give almes to the poor. This is the manner of the Christian festivity. Now what cessation from the secular workes is necessary in order to the actions of religion; all that we may suppose to be accidentally the duty also of the day. To this purpose is that saying of S. Gregory; Dominico L. 11. ep. 3. die á labore terreno cessandum est, atque omni modo orationibus insistendum, ut si quid negligentiæ per sex dies agitur per Diem resurrectionis Dominicæ precibus expietur. On the Lords day we must cease from worldly labour, and by all "means persevere in prayer: that whatsoever in the six dayes was done amiss "may be expiated by the prayers of the seventh, the day of the Lords re- "surrection

"rection. In the Synod at Tours in France; the Religion of this day was also strictly injoin'd. Oportet Christianos in laude Dei & gratiarum actione usque ad vesperam perseverare. Christians must persevere in praising God and giving thanks to his holy Name untill the Evening: that is, untill the Evening song be finished, for then the Ecclesiastical solemnity is over: They who were tied to this long office, could less be permitted to doe any secular business, and according as the piety of the Church increased, so the prohibitions of labour were the more strict; for that which was wholly relative must increase and diminish according to the diminution or inlargement of the correspondent. Constantine forbad all labour but the labours of Husbandry: but affirmes the Lords day to be the fittest for dressing or setting of Vines, and sowing Corne. Leo and Anthemius Emperors forbad all publick pleasures, vexatious suites or actions, arrests, and law-daies, appearances in Courts, advocations and legal solemnities on the Lords day. The third Councel of Orleans permitted waggons, and horses and oxen to travel upon Sundaies, but forbad all husbandry that the men might come to Church. In an old Synod held at Oxford I find that on the Lords day Conceduntur opera carrucarum & agriculturæ; and I find the like in an old injunction of Queen Elisabeth, Corn may be carried on Sundaies when the Harvest is unseasonable and hazardous. In these things there was variety; sometimes more sometimes less was permitted. Sometimes fairs and markets, sometimes none: In which that which we are to rely upon is this;

L. omnes 3. Cod. de feriis. Can. 21.

1. That because it was a day of Religion; onely such things were to be attended to, which did not hinder that solemnity which was the publick religion of the day.

2. Nothing at all to be admitted which was directly an Enemy to religion, or no friend.

Of the first I have already produc'd sufficient witness. Of the second there is the less doubt, not onely because Natural reason does abhorre all irreligious actions especially upon a day of religion; but because all the pious men and lawgivers of the Christian Church have made complaints and restraints respectively of all criminal or scandalous actions upon that day. Witness S. Ignatius in his Epistle to the Magnesians, Tertullian apolog. c. 42. S. Gregory in his Epistle to Augustin Arch-bishop of Canturbury; and S. Augustin Bishop of Hippo, in his 64 Epistle to Aurelius; the 23 Canon of the Councel of Toledo, the edict of Leo and Anthemius, all which complain of and forbid the evil usages of the prophaner men who spend the Lords day, which by the Church of God and in imitation of God himself and in celebration of the greatest Mystery of our redemption was appointed for the solemn service of God, in riotous eating and immoderate drinkings, vain feastings, and wanton dancings, Enterludes and Songs, as if they intended to verifie the scoff of Rutilius,

Septima quæque dies turpi damnata Veterno,
Ut delassati turpis imago Dei.

In Itinerar.

and that the rest of the day did represent God to have been weary, but therefore was designed for wine and the licentiousness of his servants.

3. The rest of the day was so wholly for the ends of religion, so meerly relative to the publick services of the Church, so nothing of the proper and absolute duty of the day, that the Fathers of the Church affirme it to be better to work then upon that day to be idle and do nothing. So S. Austin expresly; melius faceret .... in agro suo aliquid utile quam si in agro otiosus existeret: &

melius fœminæ eorum die Sabbati lanam facerent quàm quæ totâ die in neomeniis suis publicè saltarent. To doe something that is profitable in the field is better then to sit there idle, and to spin is beter then to dance.

4. In those places where the offices of the Church are not expensive of the whole day, it is lawful to doe (upon just cause) any work that is not forbidden by our Superiors, or scandalous to our Brethren; in those portions of the day which are unimployed: and to deny this is called perverseness and contrary to faith, cap. perven. de Consecr. dist. 3. Quidam perversi Spiritûs homines prava inter vos aliqua, & Sanctæ fidei adversa seminarunt, ità ut die Sabbati aliquid operari prohiberent. They that forbid all manner of work as unlawful by Divine law upon the Sabbath are prædicatores Antichristi, preachers of Antichrist: for he when he comes (saies S. Gregory) diem Sabbathi atq; Dominicum ab omni faciet opere custodiri: shall forbid all working upon the Sabbath and the Lords day.

5. The Lords day being set apart by the Church for Religion ought to be so imployed as the laws of the Church enjoin; and no otherwise; and although it were an act of piety (not onely to attend to publick offices, but even) to attend to especial and more frequent private devotions on that day then others, yet this is without all obligation from the Church; concerning whose intention to oblige we can no waies presume but by her words and laws when she hath declar'd her self.

6. The question concerning particular works, or permitted recreations is wholly useless and trifling: for quod lege prohibitoriâ vetitum non est, permissum intelligitur, saies the law: all that is permitted which in the Negative precept is not forbidden: but as for some persons to give themselves great liberties of sport on that day is neither pious nor prudent; so to deny some to others is neither just nor charitable. The plowman sits still in the Church and the Priest labours; and the wearied man is permitted to his refreshment, and others not permitted because they need it not; and there is no violation of any Commandement of God, even when there is a prophanation of the day indulged upon pious and worthy considerations.

Glos. ordinar. in 28. Matth.

62. I end this with the words of Gerson: Quilibet eo die abstineat ab omni labore aut mercatione aut alio quovis laborioso opere secundum ritum & consuetudinem patriæ, quam consuetudinem Prælatus Spiritualis illius loci cognoscens non prohibet; quòd si aliqua super tali consuetudine dubietas occurrat, consulat superiores: "Upon the Lords day we are to abstain from all merchandizes or other laborious "work according to the Custome and law of the Country: provided that "the Bishop knowing of any such custome doe not condemne it: and if "there be any doubt concerning it, let him inquire of his Superiors. In all these cases, Custome and the Lawes, the analogy of the Commandement, and the designes of piety, Christian liberty, and Christian Charity are the best measures of determination.

In Decal.

63. I have now done with the two great exceptions which are in the Decalogue, and are not parts of the Moral law. All the rest are Natural precepts of Eternal obligation; and are now also made Christian by being repeated and renewed by Christ, and not onely left in their prime, Natural necessity, but as they are expounded into new instances of duty, so they put on new degrees of obligation.

64. As a supplement to this Rule, and in explication of many emergent Questions

Queſtions concerning the Matter of the Divine Laws, and their reſpective obligations, it will be uſeful to enumerate the ſigns and characteriſticks by which we can without error diſcerne which Precepts are Moral, and which are not: for this is a good and a general inſtrument and Rule of Conſcience and uſeful in many particulars.

The meaſures of difference to diſcerne between Moral precepts and precepts not moral in the all laws of God.

65. 1. All Moral laws are ſuch whoſe prime and immediate Meaſures are Natural reaſon: but of precepts not Moral the reaſons may be œconomical or Political, ſome emergency of ſtate or accident, a reaſon that paſſes away or that is introduc'd by a ſpecial bleſſing or a ſpecial caution, a perſonal danger, or the accidents of converſation. That we ſhould obey our Parents is a Moral law. This we know, becauſe for this we naturally and by our very Creation, and without a Tutour have many reaſons, and ſee great neceſſities and find abundant uſefulneſs. For whoever is in need cannot be releeved but upon ſuch conditions as they who are to releeve them will impoſe upon them: Love and obedience are but gratitude and neceſſity; becauſe all children are imperfect and helpleſs perſons; living upon the love and care of Parents and Nurſes: they derive their Natures and their birth, their education and maintenance from them, that is, they owe to them all that for which any Man can be obeyed and loved; they have on them all the marks and endearments of love and fear; they are in reſpect of their children uſeful and powerful, better in themſelves, and beneficial to their deſcendants; and therefore the Regal power is founded upon the Paternal.

Αὐτὰρ ἐγὼν οἰκῆϊ ἄναξ ἐσσι ἠμετέροιο.

And unleſs where God did ſpeak by expreſs voice, he never did ſpeak more plainly, or give power to one man over another ſo plainly as to Parents over their Children; their power is the fountain of all other, and the meaſure of all other; it hath in it the end and uſefulneſs of all Government, it hath love and it hath caution, it is for the good of the Subjects; and though it keeps the honour in it ſelf yet the advantage ever paſſeth on to others: And then if we conſider that children are a part of their Parents, that the Parents are bleſs'd and curs'd in them, that there is in them toward their children a Natural affection, that the little image of immortality in which Men deſir'd to laſt for ever is ſupplied to them by ſucceſſion, which preſerves their Name and Memory; that Parents are more wiſe, and more powerful, and before in time, and uſeful in all regards; that children cannot at firſt underſtand, nor doe, nor ſpeak; that therefore Naturally they muſt be in the poſſeſſion of them that can; that no man will quit his intereſt without juſt reaſon; and theſe reaſons of Subjection being prime and Natural, and ſome of them laſting, and all of them leaving an obligation and indearment behind them, they cannot paſs away without leaving indelible impreſſions; it muſt neceſſarily and Naturally follow that children muſt pay to their Parents the duties of love and obedience,

Ὅστις γ' τὺς τεκόντας ἐν βίῳ σέβει,
Ὅδ' ὅσι' κἀν ζῶν κἀν θανῶν θεοῖς φίλος. Eurip.

It is the voice of Nature: He that honours his Parents is dear to God.

Now

* Now when there is ſo much prime and Natural reaſon: or if there be but any one that is ſo, which by Nature we are taught, it is Gods mark upon an Eternal precept: and whatſoever God hath commanded that is Naturally reaſonable, that is, if it be Naturally known, or if it be a reaſon that is not relative to times and perſons, a reaſon that will not paſs away with the changes of the world; a reaſon that injoines a thing that is perfective of our Nature, and which cannot be ſupplyed by ſomething elſe; all that is to be confeſſed to be a part of the Moral law. But on the other ſide if we take the inſtances of circumciſion, and enquire whether this can be an Eternal law; beſides the waies of diſcovering this by the lines and meaſures of revelation, we can alſo tell by the cauſes of its injunction: it was appointed as a mark of a family, a ſeparation of a people from other Nations, the ſeal of a temporary Covenant, a violence to Nature, not Naturally apt to ſignifie or to effect any thing beyond the wound made by the ſharp ſtone, a rite for which no Natural reaſon can be given; and therefore it was never written in our hearts, but given in tables that could periſh.

66. 2. That of which no reaſon can be given is not a moral precept. Becauſe all Moral laws being alſo Natural are perfective of humane Nature, and are compliances with our Natural needs, and with our Natural and meaſur'd appetites; they are ſuch in which all mankind feels a benefit; and where he ſees his way; they are and have been found out by the Heathen, drawn into their digeſts of Laws; and there was never any law pretended to be Moral, but they that did pretend it, offer'd at a reaſon for it, deriv'd from the fountains of Nature. For every Moral law being Natural; either it muſt be Naturally conſonant to the underſtanding, or onely to the Natural deſires: If to the underſtanding; then there is a diſcernible reaſon; if onely to the deſires; then the meaſure might be this, that whatſoever we Naturally deſire ſhall become a Natural duty; which if it could be admitted, would inferre all the miſchiefs and diſorders of the world. Upon this account all Sacraments and Sacramentals are excluded from being moral laws becauſe they depending wholly upon Divine inſtitution, whoſe reaſons are very often ſecret and unrevealed, we can neither Naturally know, nor Naturally conſent to them, and therefore can ſtand bound to them no longer then to the expiration of that period for which they were invented.

67. 3. The conſequents of Natural reaſon are no indications of a Moral Commandement. For Moral laws are few, and founded upon prime reaſon, ſuch as appears ſo to all diſcerning perſons; but when once men begin to argue, and that their art or obſervation is alſo to be relyed upon; it is ſo often deceived and alwaies ſo fallible, that Gods wiſedome and goodneſs would never put our Eternal intereſt upon the diſputations of men. It is ſaid by ſome men to be of the law of Nature that Spiritual perſons ſhould be exempt from ſecular juriſdiction; but becauſe they inferre this from ſome proportions of Nature, the Natural diſtinction of Spiritual and Temporal, by two or three remote and uncertain conſequences, it is to be deſpiſed; though we had not 1. ſo many precedents in the Old Teſtament to the contrary, and 2. the example of our Bleſſed Lord, who being the head of all Spiritual power was yet ſubject to the Civil Magiſtrate; and 3. the expreſs words of S. Paul ſpeaking of the ſecular Magiſtrate; and commanding every Soul to be ſubject to them; that is, Prieſts and Monks, Apoſtles and Evangeliſts and Prophets (as S. Chryſoſtome thence argues,) and all this 4. beſides the Notoriety of the thing thing it ſelf; Spirituality being a capacity ſuperadded to perſons, who by a former that is a Natural duty are ſubordinate to ſecular ſuperiours. But beſides ail this; If the deduction of Conſequents ſhall be the meaſure of Moral duties, then the wittieſt diſputant ſhall be the Lawgiver, and Logick will be the Legiſlative; and there will be no term or end of multiplication of laws: for ſince all truth depends upon the prime and Eternal truth, and can be deriv'd from thence and return thither again, all actions whatſoever that can be in any ſenſe good or uſeful will be in all ſenſes neceſſary and matter of duty. There is a chain of truths, and every thing follows from every thing if we could find it out: but that cannot be the meaſure of laws; for beſides that a thing is reaſonable, there muſt be a Divine Commandement; and if a good reaſon alone is not ſufficient to make a Moral law, a bad one is not ſufficient to declare it. That all who are oblig'd by a law ſhould at leaſt by interpretation conſent to it, is ſaid by many to be of the law of Nature; yet this is ſo far from being a Moral Commandement, that in ſome very great Communities of Men, the Clergy who are not the ignobleſt part of the people have no vote in making laws, nor power to chuſe their repreſentatives. Indeed it is very reaſonable and full of equity that all ſtates of men who are fit to chooſe for others, ſhould at leaſt be admitted to chooſe for themſelves; yet becauſe this relies not upon any prime Natural reaſon that neceſſarily infers it; but is to be truſted to two or three conſequences and deductions, men have leave to uſe their power, and may chooſe whether they will in this thing uſe the abſolute power of a Prince, or the more compliant poſter of a Father. This is better, but that is not evidently againſt a moral Commandement.

68. 4. A law that invades the right of Nature is not alwaies the breach of a Moral Commandement: By the law of Nature no man is bound to accuſe himſelf, but becauſe it is not againſt the law of Nature if he does, and onely againſt a privilege or right of Nature, [1.] the complicated neceſſities of Men, [2.] the imperfection of humane Notices, [3.] and the violence of ſuſpition, [4.] and the dangers of a third perſon, [5.] or the intereſt of the Republick, [6.] or the Concernes of a Prince may make it reaſonable that a Man be ask'd concerning himſelf; and tyed to give right anſwers. A Natural right is no indication of a Moral law. But of this I have already ſpoken upon another occaſion.

69. 5 Every Conſonancy to Natural Reaſon is not the ſufficient proof of a Moral law: For as we ſay in Natural Philoſophy; that τὰ φυσικὰ and τὰ κατὰ τὴν φύσιν, Things Natural and things according to Nature are not all one: It is according to Nature that they who have the yellow jaundies ſhould look of a yellow colour: but this is not a Natural affection, but præternatural all the way: So it is in Moral inſtances, it is conſonant to Nature that we ſhould not boile a Kid in her mothers Milk, but this makes no moral law, for it is not againſt a Natural law if we doe. * There are ſome little rationalities and proportions and correſpondencies of Nature which are well and decent and pretty, but are not great enough to eſtabliſh a Commandement, or to become the meaſure of eternal life and death. Nothing leſs then the value of a Man, or the concernment of a man is the ſubject of Moral laws, and God having given to a man reaſon to live juſtly and uſefully, ſoberly and religiouſly, having made theſe reaſonable and matters of Conſcience by a prime inſcription, hath by ſuch prime reaſons relating to God or man bound upon us all Moral laws. Man onely is capable of laws, and therefore to man onely under God can Moral laws be relative.

Vid. Aquinat. 12. q. 95. art. 2.

6. Whea

70. 6. When God gives a law and addes a reaſon for it; it is not alwaies the ſign fication of a Moral law though the reaſon be in it ſelf Eternal, unleſs the reaſon it ſelf be proper, relating to the Nature of the thing, and not matter of Empire. For example, when God commanded the people of Iſrael to give the firſt born to him or to redeem it, he addes this reaſon, I am the Lord: Now although this reaſon be eternal, yet it is not a proper reaſon for this; but a reaſon by which he does or might injoin all Commandements: and it is alſo matter of Empire and Dominion, by which he can remonſtrate his abſolute ſupreme Legiſlative power, which is reaſon ſufficient for our obedience, but yet it is extrinſecal to the Nature of the precept, and therefore upon this account it cannot be called Moral, whoſe reaſon is alwaies Natural, proper and immediate. But yet even this very reaſon although it is a matter of Empire, yet when it is put to a Commandement as a proper reaſon and refers to the matter of the law, it is a certain token of Morality: for thus this is the preface or the reaſon affixed to the firſt Commandement; and ſomething like it is in the ſecond: For here when God ſaies, I am the Lord; it is a proper, Natural, eſſential reaſon inferring that therefore we muſt have no other Gods, nor to any other thing that is not God give Divine honour.

71. 7. When God in the old Teſtament did threaten the Heathens or puniſh them for any fact, it was not a ſufficient argument to conclude that fact to be done againſt a Moral Commandement; unleſs other things alſo concurred to the demonſtration. This I made to appear in the inſtance of ſome marriages: and it relies upon this reaſon; becauſe the Nations were oblig'd by the precepts of Noah, all the inſtances or particulars of which were not Eternal in their obligation.

72. 8. All the inſtances or purſuances of a Moral law, are not as Moral or neceſſary as their fountain; but that Moral law is onely to be inſtanc'd in thoſe great lines of duty, which are nam'd or apparently deſign'd in the letter or Analogy of the law. That thoſe who miniſter at the Altar ſhould be partakers of the Altar is a Moral law, and a part of natural and eſſential juſtice and religion: in purſuance of this, the Prieſts did eat of the ſacrifice; and were maintain'd by tithes and offerings; and thus this Moral law amongſt them was inſtanc'd and obeyed: but though theſe were the waies in which the Jews did obey a Moral law; yet theſe inſtances are not Moral and Eternal; becauſe the Commandement can be performed without them: and though the Oxe be muzled when he treads out the Corne, yet if he eats his fill before and after his work there is no breach of the Commandement. Thus alſo it is commanded that we ſhould riſe up to the Grey head; which is a purſuance of the fifth Commandement, but yet this expreſſion of reverence to old Men, is neither neceſſary at all times nor yet to be done by all perſons: another expreſſion may doe all the duty that is intended, and he that with civil circumſtances gives an almes to an old beggar hath done more regard to him then he that gives him a complement: For although Moral Commandements are ſometimes ſignified with the inveſtiture of circumſtances or particular inſtances, yet becauſe great reaſon is their meaſure, prime, natural, eſſential and Concreated reaſon, it is eaſie to make the ſeparation.

73. 9. The ſtrong, violent and firme perſuaſions of Conſcience in ſingle perſons, or in ſome communities of Men is not a ſufficient indication of a Moral law. The weak Brother of whom S. Paul ſpeaks durſt not eat fleſh, but but thought it an impiety next to unpardonable, but he was abuſed: and there are at this day ſome perſons, ſome thouſands of perſons againſt whoſe Conſcience it is to dreſſe meat upon the Lords day, or to uſe an innocent permitted recreation: Now when ſuch an opinion makes a Sect, and this Sect gets firme confidents and zealous defenders, in a little time it will dwell upon the Conſcience as if it were a Native there, whereas it is but a pitiful inmate and ought to be turned out of doors.

74. 10. The conſonant practices of Heathens in a matter not expreſsly commanded by God to them, is no argument that what they did in that inſtance was by the light of Nature, or a duty of a Moral Commandement. The Heathens paid tithes to Hercules, they kept the ſeventh day ſacred, they forbad their holy perſons to make ſecond marriages; but it will be too great an eaſineſs upon this account to ſuppoſe theſe to be matter of Eſſential duty: not onely becauſe (as Tertullian obſerves) the Devil was willing to imitate the ſerity or cuſtomes and rites of Gods Church, to make his own aſſemblies the more venerable, Symbolical, alluring and perſuaſive; but becauſe the Nations to whom God commanded tithes, Sabbaths and the like, had entercourſe with many others, and were famous in the world by bleſſing and Miracles, by the laws and Oracles of God, by excelent Government and the beſt learnings: The Phœnicians conveyed many Hebrew cuſtoms into Greece and ſome learned perſons went to School in Paleſtine and taught their own Nation ſome myſteriouſneſſes which themſelves learnd under the Jewiſh Doctours; and when the Judaizing Chriſtians did pertinaciouſly retain circumciſion; they might upon this ground have pretended it to be conſonant to the law of Nature; becauſe even the Gentiles, the Egyptians, the Arabians, all the Nations that deſcended from Iſhmael and Eſau, and divers other nations their neighbours did uſe it. But, Conſent is no argument, when it is nothing but imitation.

75. 11. The appendant penalty of temporal death impoſed by God Almighty upon the breakers of a law, does not prove that law to be of eternal obligation. I inſtance in the gathering ſticks upon the Sabbath, the omitting Circumciſion, the approaching a wife in diebus pollutionis; all which were made ſacred by the greateſt penalty, but yet had not the greateſt obligation, they were not Moral.

76. 12. When two laws are in conflict and conteſt and call for an impoſſible obedience, one muſt yeeld to the other; but that which muſt yeeld is not moral and Eternal. The obſervation of the Sabbath, and doing acts of charity did often enterfere in the actions and occurrences of our Bleſſed Saviours life; but the Sabbath was alwaies made to yeeld to charity. Thus Sacrifice and mercy, the outward work and the inward, the letter and the Spirit doe often make contrary pretenſions; but ſacrifice, and the outward work, and the letter are to yeeld and to comply, and therefore are but the expreſſions or inſtances, or ſignifications of a Moral duty; but of themſelves have no morality. This holds in all inſtances and hath no exception.

77. 13. By the not conſidering of theſe meaſures a great part of Mankind have been deceiv'd; but they could onely be ſecured by the firſt; which becauſe it is alſo poſſible to be miſtaken in the application, by reaſon of the miſcarriages and confidence of ſome men; therefore the laſt reſort of all Moral laws is to the Scriptures of the new Teſtament; in which whatſoever is commanded to all

all Mankind is either moral in its Nature or is so by adoption; which last clause I put in, by reason of the Sacraments, and some glorious appendages of Morality, and heroical acts of charity commanded by Christ: the observation of which although it be not moral, or of prime Natural necessity, yet because they are commanded by Christ whose law is to oblige us as long as the Sun and Moon endures: to us Christians and to all to whom the notice of them does arrive, it is all one in respect of our duty, and hath no real difference in the event of things. But if from the old Testament Men will (as it is very often attempted in several instances) endeavour to describe the measures of Moral laws, the former cautions are of necessary observation.

Rule 7.

There is no state of Men or things but is to be guided by the proportion of some Rule or precept in the Christian law.

1. That is, where there is no law to restrain us, we may doe what we please; but where we are tyed up to rules and measures, we have no Lawgiver or fountain of religion but God, who in these last daies hath spoken to us onely by his Son, who as he is supreme in all things, so he is every way allsufficient, and as by him onely we can be sav'd, so by him onely and by his Spirit we must be govern'd. To this purpose we beleeve that he hath taught us all his Fathers will: He is the Author and finisher of our faith; and therefore to him and to an obedience to him we must bring our understanding: we pray that his will may be done here as it is in heaven; and therefore he is perfectly to rule our wills here, for we are sure he does rule all above: we have no lawgiver but him, no rule but his will; no revelation of his will but in his word: and besides this we have no certain place where we can set our foot. The laws of the Jews were either for them and their Proselytes alone, or were adopted into the Christian Code; right reason gives measures of things, but of it self makes no laws unless it be conducted by a competent authority; The Prophets were either expounders of Moses law, or preachers Evangelical; that is either they call'd to obedience in things not Moral, or if they did, they onely spake the Sermons of the Gospel; and whatsoever was excellent in all the world was but a derivation from the wisedome of the Eternal Father; and all this was united into a Systeme of Holy precepts at the appearing of the Eternal Son: and since there is no name under heaven by which we can be saved but onely the Name of Jesus, and he saves us not onely by procuring pardon for them, but by turning us from our iniquities, by efforming us anew, by reforming whatsoever was amiss in manners and persuasion, by conforming us to the similitude of the Holiness and perfections of God, and brings us to glory by the waies and methods of Grace, that is, never leaves us till our graces are perfect and even with Eternal felicities, it follows that we must goe to him, that he must teach us and guide us, that he must governe us and persuade us, that his laws must be our measures, his wisedome must be our star, his promises our aimes, and we may as well say there can be two principles as that besides him there can be any eternal and supreme lawgiver. One is more then all the numbers of the world.

2. And

2. And if we look into the Nature of his Lawes we ſhall handle this truth as the people on mount Sinai did ſee thunder: all excellencies have as perfect Unity as any one hath; and there can be but one juſtice, and it is the ſame grace of mercy which dwells in the bowels of all the good men and women in the world, and of temperance there can be but one general meaſure, and unchaſtity is a certain prevarication of one excellency that is known to all the world; and as for religion ſince there is but one God, and he is to be worſhipped as himſelf pleas'd, and to convey his bleſſings to us by what Mediator and by what inſtruments himſelf ſhall elect; there can be in theſe things no variety, unleſs there be a plain deficiency in the means of the Divine appointment. All the duty of Mankind is in Religion, juſtice and ſobriety; and in all theſe things God by Jeſus Chriſt hath given us many laws, and beſides them he hath given us no other, we have but one Lord, and therefore but one Lawgiver and meaſure of juſtice: we have but one faith, and therefore but one Religion; we have but one Baptiſme, or ſolemnity of renunciation of the fleſh, the world and the Devil, and therefore but one Rule for our comportment; one meaſure of Sobriety according to the Unity of our Nature, which being made after the image of God, is one as God is one. If therefore our Bleſſed Lord be a perfect Lawgiver, his law alone muſt be the meaſure of our duty and obedience; but if he be not a perfect Lawgiver, whither ſhall we goe to underſtand the will of God? Maſter whither ſhall we goe? for thou haſt the words of eternal life, ſaid S. Peter; there's the queſtion and the anſwer too, and they together make the argument a demonſtration. For if we can obtain Eternal life by the words of Chriſt, then they contain in them the whole will of God; for he that fails in one is imperfect and loſes all: and therefore in the words of Chriſt there is a perfect proviſion for an intire obedience, becauſe they are a ſufficient way to life Eternal. John. 6. 68.

3. The effect of this Conſideration is; that all the meaſures of Good and Evil muſt be taken by the Evangelical lines: Nothing is to be condemn'd which Chriſt permits, and nothing is to be permitted which he condemnes. For this is the great prerogative and perfection of Chriſts law above that of Moſes; ſome things by Moſes were permitted for neceſſity, and becauſe of the hardneſs of their hearts, thus divorces and Polygamy became legally innocent, becauſe a perfect law was too hard for that people, and like a yoke upon a young Oxe would have galled them, not ſubdued them; and if he had ſtrain'd too hard, the ſilver cords of Diſcipline would have been firſt broken and then deſpiſed. But when Chriſt came he gave perfect laws, and more perfect graces; he made the capacities of his obedience larger, and fitted the law and the Subject by even and Natural and gracious proportions; and permitted nothing which his Father lov'd not; and now every plant that God hath not planted muſt be rooted up: and therefore this law muſt needs be abſolute, and alone, and unalterable, and perfect, and for ever: and this appears infinitely upon this account; that although our Nature is ſuch that it will alwaies be growing in this world towards perfection, and therefore that it is imperfect, and our obedience will be imperfect: yet even this Chriſt does not allow or poſitively permit; but commands us to be perfect, that is, to goe on towards it, to allow nothing to our ſelves either of crime or of ſuſpicion, to be perfect in our deſires, to be reſtleſs in our endeavours, to be aſſiduous in our prayers, never to think we have comprehended, never to ſay it is enough: and if our Bleſſed Maſter does not allow of any imperfection of degrees:

but thrusts the most imperfect forwards to perfection it must be certain that in his provisions and his laws there can be no imperfection, but he hath taken care for all things on which eternity depends, and in which God is to be glorified and obeyed. And therefore in no case can it be allowed to any man, or to any company of Men to doe any thing which is not there permitted.

Quest.

4. UPon the account of this Rule it is to be inquired whether it can be lawful for a Prince or Republick to permit any thing for the publick necessities of the people which is forbidden by the laws of Jesus Christ.

5. To this I answer with a distinction: That if the Question be whether in any cases there may be actual impunity; there is no peradventure but there may, for sometimes it is necessary, as when a multitude sins, for then the remedy is much worse then the disease, and to cut off all would effect, ut nemo sit quem peccasse pœniteat; there would be justice without discipline, and Government without Subjects, and a cure without Remedy: And therefore it is that Princes in the Mutinies of armies or in the rebellion of their people use to cut off the heads of offenders, or Decimate the Legions, as Cesar and Germanicus did: but if it be part of the people though a considerable part, and the action highly Criminal, we find great examples that executions have been done by Subjects, by the innocent part, and then all the offenders suffer'd: Thus it happened in the mutiny of Cæcina's Legions and their defection to the Ubii. The innocent part cut off all the rebels: and thus it was commanded by Moses who punished all them who worshipped the golden Calf by the sword of the Levites, he set every mans hand against his Brother, and none of the Criminals did escape. But sometimes it is impossible to punish all; and very often the evil would be more then the good. For in all penal laws and inflictions although there be much of Vindictive justice, yet this justice is but a handmaid to Government and Correction. When revenge is not also discipline, then it is no Governement, unless Tyranny be the name of it. So that in such cases, it may be lawful to spare some who need it indeed but deserve it not.

6. But if by impunity be meant a legal impunity; it must either mean that a law shall warrant the action, or that it shall before hand promise indemnity: if it warrant the action, which the Evangelical law hath forbidden, it is like the laws of Omri, it is statutum non bonum, and erects a Government against the law of Christ: if it condemnes the action but promises indemnity, it disparages it self, and confesses its own weakness: but as the first can never be lawful; so neither can the second ever be made so but with these Cautions.

Cautions to be observed in Civil permissions of an unlawful act or state:

7. 1. That the thing so permitted, be in the present constitution of affairs necessary; and yet will not be without the evil appendage. Thus it is necessary that in all communities of Men there be borrowing and lending; but if it cannot be without usury, the Commonwealth might promise not to punish it; though of it self it were uncharitable and consequently unlawful. For it is either lawful; or else it is unlawful for being against Justice or or against Charity. If it be against Justice, the Common-wealth, by permitting it, makes it just: for as it is in the œconomy of the world, the decree of God doth establish the vicissitudes of day and night for ever: but but the Sun by looking on a point not onely ſignifies but alſo makes the little portions of time and divides them into hours; but Men comming with their little arts and inſtruments make them to be underſtood, and ſo become the Suns interpreters: ſo it is in the matter of juſtice, whoſe great return and firme eſtabliſhments are made by God, and ſome rules given for the great meaſures of it; and we from his laws know juſt and unjuſt as we underſtand day and night: but the laws of Princes, and the contracts of men like the Sun, make the little meaſures and divide the great proportions into minutes of juſtice and fair entercourſe; and the Divines and Lawyers goe yet lower, and they become expounders of thoſe meaſures, and ſet up dials and inſtruments of notice by which we underſtand the proportion and obligations of the law, and the lines of Juſtice: juſt and unjuſt we love or hate reſpectively by our warrant from God; and from him alſo we are taught to make the General lines of it; as Do what you would be done to, reſtore the pledge, hurt no man, rob not your neighbour of his rights, make no fraudulent contracts, no unjuſt bargains: but then what are his rights, and what are not, what is fraudulent and what is fair, in what he hath power, in what he hath none, is to be determin'd by the laws of Men: So that if a Commonwealth permits an uſurarious exchange or contract, it is not unjuſt, becauſe the laws are the particular meaſures of juſtice and contracts, and therefore may well promiſe impunity where ſhe makes innocence (as to the matter of juſtice.) * But if uſury be Unlawful becauſe it is uncharitable: then when it becomes neceſſary it is alſo charitable comparatively; and as to charity no man by the laws of God is to be compelled (becauſe it is not charity if it be compelled; for God accepts not an unwilling giver, and it is not charity but an act of obedience and political duty when by laws men are conſtrain'd to make levies for the poor;) ſo much leſs can they be compelled to meaſures and degrees of charity; and if to lend upon uſury be better then not to lend at all, it is in ſome ſenſe a charity to doe ſo: and if it be when it will not be otherwiſe, there is no queſtion but the Prince that allows indemnity, is not to be damnifi'd himſelf. I inſtanc'd in this, but in all things elſe where there is the ſame reaſon there is the ſame concluſion.

8. 2. Impunity may be promiſed to any thing forbidden by the law of Chriſt, if it be in ſuch caſes in which the Subject matter is diſputable and uncertain whether it be ſo or no; then it may. Thus it happens in queſtions of religion, in which it is certain there are many reſolutions againſt the truth of God; but yet they may be permitted, becauſe when they are probably diſputed, no man is fit to puniſh the error, but he who is certain and can make it appear ſo to others, that himſelf is not deceived.

9. 3. Whatſoever is againſt the law of Chriſt in any inſtance may not be directly permitted for the obtaining a greater good, but may for the avoiding of a greater evil which is otherwiſe indeclinable. If a Prince be perfectly perſuaded that the ſuffering the doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation is againſt the laws and words of Chriſt it may not be ſuffered, though the parties intereſted promiſe to pay all the Gabels of the Nation and raiſe an army to defend it: but if a rebellion cannot otherwiſe be appeaſed it is lawful; not onely upon many other accounts which are appendant to the Subject matter, but becauſe when two evils are before me, neither of which is of my procuring, I am innocent if I ſuffer either, and I am prudent if I chooſe the leaſt, and I am guilty of no crime becauſe I am but a ſuffering perſon: but if I doe it to obtain a greater good, I chooſe the evil directly, becauſe I am not forc'd to purſue the greater good; I can be without it; and although I may choſe the leaſt evil becauſe I cannot avoid that or a greater; yet when the Queſtion is, whether I ſhall permit an evil or loſe an advantage, I may eſcape all evil, at no greater price then by looſing that advantage: ſo that here is no excuſe becauſe there is no neceſſity; and in matters of duty, no good can make recompence for doing any evil: but the ſuffering of a greater evil is highly paid for by the avoiding of a greater.

10. 4. When any ſuch evil againſt the laws of Chriſt is permitted, the evil it ſelf muſt be ſo reproved, that the forced impunity may not give ſo much incouragement to the crime as the cenſure muſt abate. The reaſon is, becauſe no evil muſt be done at any price; and we muſt rather loſe our life then cauſe our Brother to offend; and if each man is bound to this, then every man is bound to it. But becauſe impunity is the greateſt incouragement to ſin, and next to the pleaſure or intereſt of it, is the greateſt temptation; care muſt be taken that what ſerves the intereſt of the Republick, may not deceive the intereſt of Soules; and this being the greateſt ought infinitely to be preferred; and therefore unleſs ſomething be directly done that may be ſufficient ſecurity againſt the probable danger, no intereſt of the Commonwealth is to be ſerv'd againſt it; becauſe none is ſufficient to be put in ballance againſt one Soule.

11. 5. This impunity (eſpecially if it be in the matter of ſobriety) muſt not be perpetual, but for a time onely, and muſt be reſcinded at the firſt opportunity. Thus S. Auſtin when he complain'd of the infinite number of ceremonies which loaded the Church and made her condition more intolerable then that of the Jews under the Levitical yoke, addes this withall, that this was no longer to be tolerated then till there was a poſſibility to reforme. And when S. Gregory had ſent Auguſtin the Monke to convert the Saxons, he gave him advice not to preſſe them at firſt too paſſionately to quit their undecent marriages, which by their long Cuſtomes and the intereſt of their families they would be too apt to hold too pertinaciouſly and with inconvenience, but afterwards it would be done.

12. 6. Till the impunity can be taken away, it were an act of prudence and piety, and (in many caſes) of duty, to diſcountenance the ſin by collateral and indirect puniſhments: Thus the old Romans confin'd their lupanaria to the outer part of the city; It was a Summænium, and their impure women had a name of diſgrace, and a yellow veile was their cogniſance: and ſo the Jews are us'd in ſome places: but thus we find that S. Paul and the Apoſtles tolerated thoſe Chriſtians which from among their own Nation gave up their Names to Chriſt; who yet were Polygamiſts, or which was equivalent, had married a ſecond wife their firſt being living and divorc'd, but although this could not well be avoided, leſt they ſhould be vex'd into Apoſtacy, and their Judaical hardneſs of heart was not yet intenerated ſufficiently by the ſofter and ſweeter Sermons of the Goſpel; but yet to repreſent their diſlike of ſuch marriages which they were forc'd to tolerate they forbad ſuch perſons to be taken into their Clergy, ſo puniſhing ſuch perſons by a privation of honour whom they could not puniſh by a direct inflíction of cenſures, or ſeparation from their wives.

13. 7. In all ſuch tolerations of evil, the ſecular intereſt muſt be apparently ſeparate ſeparate and declar'd to ſtand far off from any thing of the Religion; and the Conſciences permitted to ſtand or fall under them, who are to take care of them and anſwer for them; the permiſſion by the civil power is not to reſcue them from the Eccleſiaſtical rod: for it being a matter of civil intereſt is not to derive any countenance from religion, ſo much as accidentally; for no powers of Man can forbid the ſervants of Chriſt to preach his law, to declare his will, and to get Subjects to his Kingdome, and to turn ſinners from the error of their way: if they doe, they muſt not be obeyed, but God muſt, and if they die for it they are well enough.

14. But now againſt the doctrine of the Rule many things may be objected; for there ſeem many things and great caſes to be for which the laws of the holy Jeſus have made no proviſion. I inſtance in a very great one, That is, the whole ſtate of warre, and all the great caſes and incidents of it. For ſince it is diſputable whether Chriſtianity allowes of warre, and it is not diſputable but very certain that it ſpeaks nothing of it expreſsly, neither gives any cautions concerning it in particular, it will ſeem to be a caſus omiſſus in the law. To this there may be many conſiderations offered.

Of the meaſures of warre by Chriſts law.

15. 1. If it be ſaid that all warre is unlawful, againſt the analogy and againſt many expreſs lines of our religion; it is indeed a ſhort way of anſwering this difficulty, but will involve the whole Chriſtian world in many more; but of this in the following numbers I ſhall give accounts.

16. 2. If it be ſaid that Chriſtianity leaves that matter of warre wholly to be conducted by the laws of Nature and Nations: we ſhall find that this will intangle the whole inquiry, but we ſhall never come to any certainty. For if the Chriſtian law be (as I have proved) a perfect digeſt of the Natural law; to ſay the affairs of warre are to be conducted by the laws of Nature is not to put them from being determin'd by the Chriſtian law, becauſe they are the ſame; and if in the law of Chriſt there be no rules of warre, neither can there be any in Nature. But beſides this, if the laws of Nature which concerne warre be not ſet down in the Goſpel and writings of the new Teſtament, but that we be ſent to look for them in the tables of our own hearts in which ſome things are diſordered by paſſion, and many more are written there by intereſt, and ſome by cuſtome, and others by education, and amongſt men theſe are the authors of contrary inſcriptions; we ſhall find the law of Nature a ſtrange thing by that time we have drawn it from thence onely, and look'd over it to find ſome rules of war, whoſe whole being is very much againſt the excellent and perfective laws of Nature.

17. 3. If it be ſaid that Warre is to be conducted by the meaſures of peace; we ſpeak what is impoſſible to be true: for inter arma ſilent leges, not onely becauſe the ſword is licentious and impudent; but becauſe the caſes of peace and warre are wholly different.

18. 4. If it be ſaid that right reaſon muſt be the meaſures; I anſwer, that if right reaſon could be heard poſſibly, there would be no warre at all: and ſince one part begins the warre againſt, reaſon it is not likely that he for any reaſon that can be urg'd ſhall loſe his advantage. But beſides this who ſhall be judge? whose reason shall rule? whose arguments shall prevail? and will he who is minor in causa be minor in prælio, he who hath the worst at the dispute yeeld also in the fight? and are not the pugnacissimi the fighting men such as will hear and understand the least reason?

19. 5. Some will have the law of Nations to be the measure of warre; and possibly it might if there were a Digest of them, and a compulsory to inforce them; but there being neither, they are uncertain what they are, and are admitted with variety and by accident, and they shall oblige strangers when the men are conquered; and Subjects by the will of the Prince, that is, the measures of warre shall be the edicts of any single General and nothing else.

20. In the midst of these oppositions it will be hard to find something certain: but that which can most be relied upon is this. * That Christian Religion hath made no particular provisions for the conduct of warre under a proper title, because it hath so commanded all the actions of men, hath so ordered the religion, so taken care that men shall be just, and doe no wrong, hath given laws so perfect rules so excellent, threatnings so severe, promises so glorious that there can be nothing wanting towards the peace and felicity of mankind, but the wills of men. If men be subjects of Christs law, they can never goe to warre with each other; but when they are out of the state of laws and peace, they fall into the state of warre; which being contrary to peace, is also without all laws. So that the injurious person is not to inquire how to conduct his warre, for he is gone beyond all law; into a state of things where laws are of no value: but for the injur'd person he is just so to comport himself as he can; having one measure of action, and another of defence.

21. For his defence: it is not to be measured by laws, but by privileges: that is, things being gone beyond the laws of Nature: he is left to his natural powers and defences; and is to doe this without any other limit, but that he defend himself and his relatives and drive away the injury. That is, there being no law of God to forbid him to defend himself he is at his liberty which Naturally every man hath: Hoc & ratio doctis, & necessitas barbaris, & mos
Cic. pro Mil. gentibus, & feris Natura ipsa præscripsit, ut omnem semper vim, quacunque ope possent, à corpore, a capite, a vita sua propulsarent. The learned are taught by reason, the barbarous nations by necessity, the civil by custom, the very beasts also by Nature, to defend their head, their body, their life from all injury by all means. For God hath no where forbidden that a man shall be defended,

Ovid. Armáque in armatos sumere jura sinunt;

we may put on armour to defend us against an armed malice: he hath indeed forbidden private revenges, because those are intrusted to the laws and publick persons; but when a single person is injur'd he can defend himself or crave the patronage of Princes and the laws; but when publick interests are violated, when Kingdomes and Communities of Men and Princes are injur'd, there is no law to defend them; and therefore it must be force: for force is the defensative of all laws: and when all laws are injur'd, there can be no way to reduce men to reason, but by making them feele the evils of Unreasonableness. If this were not so then all Commonwealths were in a worse state of affairs then single persons: for Princes are to defend each single person; and the laws are to secure them; but if the laws themselves be not not defended, no ſingle perſon can be; and if they could, much rather ſhould all. Whatſoever is abſolutely neceſſary is certainly lawful, and ſince Chriſt hath no where forbidden Kings to defend themſelves and their people againſt violence; in this caſe there is no law at all to be conſidered; ſince there is a right of Nature which no law of God hath reſtrained; and by that right all men are equal; and therefore if they be not ſafe from injury it is their own fault or their own unhappineſs; they may if they will, and if they can: and they have no meaſures in this but that they take care they be defended, and quit from the danger and no more. The Jus naturæ, the rights and liberties, the equalities and privileges of Nature are the warrant of the defence, or rather there needs no warrant, where there is no law at all: But this right of Nature is the meaſure of the defence, we may be defended as much as we need.

22. But then if it be inquired, what is the meaſure of actions which muſt be done in the conduct of the defence by the injur'd Prince or Republick, and how ſhall they be meaſur'd if Chriſt in his laws hath made no proviſions and deſcrib'd no rules? I anſwer, That the meaſures of action in publick are no other then the meaſures of the private; the ſame Rule of juſtice is to be between Princes and between Private perſons: they alſo muſt doe as they would be done to; they muſt keep covenants, perform their words, hurt no innocent perſon whom they can preſerve, and yet preſerve themſelves, they muſt keep themſelves within the limits of a juſt defence: and as in private contentions and repetitions of our right we muſt look after juſtice, but doe nothing againſt charity, we muſt defend our rights, but doe the adverſary no wrong, and by no vexatious meaſures ſecure our own intereſt, and deſtroy his juſt right, in an unneceſſary conduct of our own, ſo it is with Princes: He that is injur'd may drive away the injury, he may fight againſt invaders, he may divert the warre if it be neceſſary; but he may not deſtroy the innocent with the guilty, the peacable Countrymen with the fighting Souldiers: and nothing can legitimate that but an abſolute neceſſity, that is, it muſt not be done at all when it can be underſtood and when it can be avoided: and there is no direct action of warre but it is to be rul'd by neceſſity, and juſtice and charity, and in theſe there is no variety of the rule, and no change except what is made by the Subject matter, which muſt be made to combine with the meaſures of juſtice and charity by the inſtruments of reaſon and cuſtoms and publike fame, and all the meaſures of wiſe and good Men.

23. Warrs are ſo to be manag'd as private contentions are; and there are the ſame rules for both, that is, when they are equals: but if it be a warre betwixt Subject and Superior, it is on the Princes part to be conducted as other acts of publick juſtice: when a ſingle executioner can puniſh offenders, that is enough; if one cannot, more muſt; for it is every mans intereſt that the injurious ſhould be puniſhed; and he that can raiſe the Country Troops by law, to aſſiſt the executions of juſtice, may raiſe all the Troops of his Kingdome to doe the ſame duty when there is a greater neceſſity: But for the Subjects who take up armes againſt their Superior, there is no anſwer to be given by what meaſures they muſt conduct their armes, there is no meaſure at all for them, but one, to lay them down and never to take them up again. For it can not be expected that a wiſe and a holy lawgiver ſhould give rules for the Banditi to manage their violences, or the Circaſſians how to conduct their plunder and their robberies: Chriſt never gave any laws concerning rebels, but obedience and repentance: and for juſt warres, that is, the defenſive warres of Princes (for

(for there is no other juſt but what is defenſive directly or by a juſt equivalency) Chriſt hath given no other laws but the ſame by which ſingle perſons in their contentions or differences are to be conducted: and thus alſo S. John the Baptiſt gave the ſame meaſures to the Souldiers which contain every mans duty; Doe violence to no man, and be content with your wages. For warre is but the contention of many: and as it is in ſocial contracts which are to be governed by the ſame juſtice as private Merchandiſe; ſo it is in ſocial contentions: for in this caſe, two and two thouſand make no difference in the rule, but much in the circumſtances of the matter.

Queſt.

24. BUT upon this inſtance it is ſeaſonable to inquire whether the precedents of the old Teſtament be ſo imitable by them that goe to warre, that they can paſs into a law, or if not, yet whether they are ſafe or no?

25. The queſtion though inſtanc'd in the matter of warre, yet is of uſe in all affairs whatſoever; becauſe there are divers portions of mankind, 1. who think every thing is imitable which they find done in the Scriptures, and 2. nothing ſafe or warrantable that is not: Theſe being their meaſures of right and wrong have great influence into the queſtions of Conſcience, and therefore are to be eſtabliſhed upon certain rules.

Of the Negative meaſures of examples in the Old Teſtament.

26. 1. Therefore it is evident that not every thing done in the old Teſtament is a warrant for us: I inſtance in all the injuſtices and violences, rapines, and open prevarications of Natural rights, concerning which there needs no further diſquiſition; but we are to keep our ſelves to the rule; that is, to Gods meaſures not to mans, non quà itur, ſed quà eundum; and we muſt not follow a multitude to doe evil, Argumentum peſsimi turba eſt. Quæramus quid optimè factum ſit, non quid uſitatiſsimum; & quid nos in poſſeſsione felicitatis æternæ conſtituat, non quid vulgo veritatis peſsimo interpreti probatum ſit. The croud is the worſt argument in the world: let us inquire not what is moſt uſual but what is moſt excellent; let us look after thoſe things which may place us in the boſome of beatitude, not thoſe which can tune with the common voices which are the worſt interpreters of truth in the whole world: and therefore that ſome perſons were recorded in the Scriptures is no hallowing of the fact, but ſerves other ends of the Spirit of God. But in this there is no queſtion.

Seneca de vita beata. c. 2.

27. 2. The actions of good men in Scriptures are not a competent warrant for our imitation; not onely when they are reproved, but even when they are ſet down without cenſure. The reaſons are plain, 1. Becauſe all the ſtories of the Bible are not intended to be Sermons: and the word of God is uſeful for doctrine, for reproof, for exhortation and for information; not every comma and period for every one of theſe purpoſes; for they are contrary: but in the whole there is enough to make the man of God perfect and readily inſtructed to every good work, to every holy purpoſe. Therefore as we muſt not imitate the adultery and murder of David, which are expreſsly condemned, ſo neither may we diſſemble madneſs as he did at Gath, nor perſwade another to tell a lie for us, as he did to Jonathan, that he ſhould ſay he was gone to Bethlehem, when he went but into the fields, and to pretend ſacrifice, when it was a very flight. 2. Becauſe every man is a liar, and therefore unleſs himſelf walks regularly gularly he can be no rule to us. 3. Every servant of God was bound up by severe measures, and by his rule he was to take account of his own actions, and therefore so are we of his. 4. There were in the old Testament greater latitudes of permission then there are to us: Polygamy was permitted for the hardness of their hearts, but it is severely forbidden to us; and though without a censure we find Jacob to be husband to two sisters at once; yet this cannot warrant us who are conducted by a more excellent Spirit, taught by a more perfect institution, governed by a severer law under the last and Supreme Lawgiver of Mankind: μείζονα ὑπιδείκνυσθαι δεῖ τὴν ἀρετὴν, ὅτι πολλὰ τοῦ πνεύματος χάρις ἐκκέχυται νῦν, καὶ μεγάλη ἡ τοῦ χριστοῦ παρουσία καὶ δωρεά said S. Chrisostom: we Christians ought to shew a greater vertue and more eminent Sanctity; because we have received abundance of the Spirit of God and Christs comming is a mighty gift: and if we should derive our warranties from the examples of the old Testament, it were all one as if from the licences of warre we should take patterne for our comportment in the daies of peace and laws, or from children learne what were the measures of a man. 5. Because sometimes the actions of good men were in them innocent because done before a law was given to them; but the Symbolical actions by a supervening law afterwards became criminal. Thus although the drunkenness of Noah is remark'd without a black character, and plainly told without a censure, it cannot legitimate drunkenness in us, because he was not by any positive law bound from a freer use of wine, directly by proper provision; but we are. 6. Because the actions of holy men in Scripture are complicated, and when they are propounded as examples, and the whole action described, there is something good and something bad; or something naturally good, and something peculiar and personally good which cannot pass into example. Thus when S. Paul speaks of Gideon and Jephthah, Samson and David, Deborah and Baruch, who thorough faith subdued kingdomes; here their subduing Kingdomes by invasion and hostility is not propounded as imitable; but their faith onely, and therefore let us follow their faith but not their fighting: and carry the faith to Heathen Countries but not armes. So when the fact of Razis is propounded as glorious and great when he kill'd himself to avoid Nicanor, the whole action is not imitable, but onely so much of it as was pious and prudent; and the other is to be prais'd as being the choice of a lesser evil, or is to be left to its excuse, as being necessary and unavoidable.

3. 4. 5. 6. De Virgin. 2 Mac. 14.

28. 3. The actions of men in the old Testament though attested and brought to effect by the providence of God, is no warrant for our practice nor can they make an authentick precedent. I instance in the fact of Jeroboam, who rebelled against the house of Solomon; although God was the author of that change, and by his providence dispos'd of the event, yet Jeroboam had rules to have gone by, which if he had observed God would by other means have brought his purposes to pass; and Jeroboam should not have become a prodigy and a proverb of impiety. For a man is circumscrib'd in all his waies by the providence of God just as he is in a ship: for although the man may walk freely upon the decks, or pass up and down in the little continent; yet he must be carried whither the ship bears him: A man hath nothing free but his will, and that indeed is guided by laws and reasons, but although by this he walks freely; yet the Divine providence is the ship, and God is the Pilot, and the contingencies of the world are sometimes like the fierce windes which carry the whole event of things whither God pleases: So that this event is no part of the measure of the will: that hath a motion of its own which depends not upon events and rare contingencies, or the order of secret providence: and therefore this which could not commend his action cannot warrant our imitation.

29. 4. Actions done in the old Testament though by a command of God doe not warrant us or become justificable precedents without such an expres command as they had: if the command was special and personal, the obedience was just so limited; and could not pass beyond the person. Thus Jehu took up armes against the house of Ahab by the command of God; who intended to punish him severely. But we may not lift up our hand against our Prince though he be wicked; unless God give us such an expres Commandement: For nothing is imitable but what is good: but in this there was nothing good but the obedience; and therefore nothing can legitimate it but a Commandement.

30. 5. Actions of good men if done upon a violent cause, or a great necessity are not imitable unless it be in an equal case and a like necessity. David when he was hungry went into the Priests house and took the bread which was onely lawful for the Priests to eat, and to this example Christ appeals; but it was in a like case in a case of necessity and charity, He that does the same thing must have the same reason, or he will not have the same innocence.

31. 6. Examples in matters of war are ever the most dangerous precedents: not onely becaus men are then most violent and unreasonable, but becaus the rules of warre are least describ'd; and the necessities are contingent and many, and the reason of the action depending upon heaps of circumstances (of which peradventure no notice is recorded) can less be understood; and after all this, becaus most commonly they are unreasonable and unmerciful. That David made the peop'e of the Ammonites to pass under Saws and harrows of iron is not safely imitable by Christian Souldiers; becaus it had so much cruelty, which either must be criminal or have an extraordinary legitimation, which it is certain Christian Princes cannot have unless it be by a rare contingency, and a new revelation, to which they can never reasonably pretend. But that they may drive out an invading army, that they may kill them that resist, that they may by warre defend the publick rights in which all the private are involved, they may safely take for their warrant; the example of Abraham fighting in behalf of the King of Sodom; the act of Melchisedek in blessing God for the succes of that battel; the warres of the Judges and of David, becaus these were just and necessary by special command, or necessary defence, faith was the great instrument, and Gods blessing gave them prosperity; they were against no law, and the like cases God hath not since restrained, and therefore we of our selves being left to the rights of our Nature, and unconfin'd by the laws of God, proceed prudently when we have the confidence of such great examples; against which the interest of no law is publickly, the interest of no vertue is secretly ingaged.

32. 7. When a law is changed, the Examples which acted in proportion to that law lose all manner of influence and causality, and cannot produce a just imitation. Among the Jews it was lawful for a private person to transfixe his Brother or his Father if either of them tempted him to idolatry; and in a cause of God they might doe publick justice by a private hand. All the actions of their Zealots done in such instances are no examples to Christians: becaus when that Priesthood was chang'd, the law was chang'd, and then the

Nature

Nature of the action paſs'd from lawful to unlawful; and therefore could not be imitated. He that is to write Greek muſt not tranſcribe it by the Hebrew Alphabet, and when the copy is altered, the tranſcript muſt alſo receive variety and ſpecifick difference. Thus the Diſciples of our Lord would fain have done as Elias did; but Chriſt told them that he was not imitable in that, by telling them the ſpirit which is the principle or great inſtrument of action was wholly changed. It was not ſafe for them to doe as Elias did, becauſe they were to doe as Chriſt commanded. Thus we find in the old Teſtament King Solomon dedicating and conſecrating of a Temple, it was a new caſe, and he was an extraordinary perſon, and the Chriſtian Church hath tranſcribed that copy ſo farre as to dedicate and conſecrate Churches or Temples to the ſervice of God, but ſhe does it by the miniſtery of Biſhops who are amongſt us the precedents of prayer, and have thoſe ſpecial aſſiſtances and Emanations of the holy Spirit upon their order which Solomon had in his own perſon and much more; and therefore though the act is exemplar, yet it is not imitable as to the perſon officiating: becauſe to doe ſo is not properly the effect either of power or of office; but being to be done in the way of prayer is by the reaſon of the thing it ſelf; and the conſtitution of the Church appropriate to the Preſidents of Religion.

Of the Example of Chriſt.

33. 8. In the new Teſtament we have ſo many, ſo cleer, ſo perfect rules, that we have no need of examples to inſtruct us or to warrant our practices; but examples to encourage and to lead us on in the obedience of thoſe rules. We have but one Great Example; Jeſus Chriſt; who living in perfect obedience to his Father, did alſo give us perfect inſtruction how we ſhould doe ſo too in our proportion. But then how far Chriſt is imitable, and ought to be imitated by us is beſt declared in this ſhort rule.

34. In whatſoever he gave us a Commandement, in that onely we are bound to imitate him: but in whatſoever he propounded to us as excellent, and in whatſoever he did Symbolically to it, in all that alſo we may imitate him.

35. This rule eſtabliſhes the whole caſe of Conſcience in this affair. Becauſe our Bleſſed Saviour being an extraordinary perſon was to doe ſome extraordinary things, in which either we cannot, or we ought not to imitate him. He faſted fourty daies, we cannot: He whip'd the buyers and ſellers out of the Temple, we may not without the authority of a publick perſon: He overthrew the Tables of the Merchants, but the young man in Portugal who being tranſported with zeal and ignorance beat the chalice and the Sacrament out of the Prieſts hand out of paſſion againſt his idolatrous ſervice (as he underſtood it) had a ſad event of his folly amongſt men; and what reward of his zeal he found with God is very uncertain. But whatſoever he taught to mankind, of that alſo he became a glorious example: but by the Sermons onely we are inſtructed, by the example incouraged: for admonetur omnis ætas fieri poſſe quod aliquando factum eſt: we ſee it poſſible to be done what Chriſt commanded us to doe, and then did, that we might follow his ſteps. But his example in theſe things makes up no part of our Rule, becauſe it is perfect without them: Here our rule is perfect, and ſo is our example; but becauſe Chriſt did ſome things beyond our rule, and paſt our meaſures, and things of perſonal vertue and obligation, therefore we are to look upon Chriſt as imitable juſt as his life was meaſur'd measur'd by the laws he gave us, where they are, even there we also must endeavour to be so. * There is this onely to be added: That in the prosecution of his obedience to his heavenly Father; he sometimes did actions in gradu heroico, of great excellency; which although they are highly imitable, yet they pass no obligation upon us but that we endeavour to tread in his steps, and to climb up to his degrees, and to desire his perfections. * That these pass upon us no other obligation appears because they are sometimes impossible to be attain'd to; and they are the highest and the best, and therefore are not direct matter of duty, which belongs to all, to the highest and to the lowest. * But that these do pass upon us an obligation to endeavour to attain them, and of labour towards them in our circumstances, appears in the greatest instance of all, the highest obedience, even that which was unto death; for therefore Christ hath suffered for us, leaving an example to us, that we might follow his steps: that is, when he had given his Church precepts and propounded to them rewards of suffering: he also was pleas'd to give us the greatest example as a commentary upon his own text; declaring that the Commandement did extend to the greatest instance; and that we should do as he did, obediens factus usque ad mortem, he was obedient even unto death; and so must we when God requires it in particular. * And that this is our duty, and that the obligation reaches thus farre, is certain upon the interest of love; for we must love him who is our Lord and our God; we must love him with all our heart and with all our powers; and therefore endeavour to be like him: ἡ δ' ὁμοίωσις τῷ νόμῳ πᾶσι ἡ πρὸς ἐπαίνους τῶν πεμφθέντων γνῶσις, καὶ ἡ πρὸς αὐτὸν κατὰ δύναμιν ἐξομοίωσις· ὁ γὰρ ἀγαπᾷ τις, καὶ μιμεῖται ὅσον οἷόν τε, ὡς φασὶν οἱ Πυθαγόρειοι, τιμᾷ τὸν θεὸν ἄριστα, ἐὰν τῷ θεῷ τὴν διάνοιαν ὁμοιώσῃς. The greatest honor we can doe to God and Gods law, is to understand God and to become like to him. For every one imitates that which he loves. Religiosissimus cultus est imitari, said Lactantius, that's an excellent instance of the Divine worship, to endeavour to become like to the Holy Jesus.

1 Pet. 2. 21.

Hierocl. in carm. aur.

36. 9. But this is to be reduc'd to practice so as that 1. The duty be certainly imitated; and 2. The degree of duty aim'd at; 3. And the instance be chosen with prudence and liberty. Thus when we find that Christ did spend whole nights in prayer; the duty here recommended is earnestness and diligence in prayer. In this we must imitate our Blessed Lord; because his rule and his example make τὴν κατὰ Χριστὸν ἕνωσιν, an excellent confederation and society. But then to doe it with that vehemence and earnestness, that degree of diligence, is a rare perfection which we can onely tend to in this life, but we must doe what moral diligence we can: And as for the instance and particularities of duty and devotion, we are yet at greater liberty, for we are not oblig'd to pernoctation in praier, so we pray earnestly and assiduously, which is the duty, and endeavour to doe it like Christ, which is the passion of the duty, and the degree of love, and the way of perfection; but that it be in the night, or in the day is but the circumstance of the duty, nothing of the Nature, nothing directly of the advantage of it; and is to be wholly conducted by prudence and consideration of accidents.

37. 10. After all this; as Christ must be imitated in all matter of duty; and is imitable in degrees of duty; and that for the circumstances of it we are wholly at liberty: so also it is in matters of his own ordinance and institution in which the Religion is to be obeyed, the design is to be observ'd and promoted, the essentials of the observation to be infallibly retain'd; but in the incidencies incidencies, and collateral adherencies which are nothing to the Nature of the rite, nor at all appertain to the religion, there is no obligation, no advantage, no love, no duty in imitating the practice of our Bleſſed Saviour. Thus to celebrate the Bleſſed Sacrament of the Lords Supper with bread and wine, to doe it in remembrance of his death, to doe it as he commanded, in obedience to him, to receive it à præſidentium manu, from the hands of the Preſidents of Religion, is matter of duty, and matter of love, and matter of obedience; but to ſuppoſe we are bound ſo to imitate the actions and circumſtances of the actions of Chriſt, as that it is duty or neceſſity that we take it in unleavened bread, to mingle water with wine, to receive it in wines of Judæa, to receive it lying or leaning on a bed, to take it after Supper, is ſo farre from being matter of love or duty, and a commendable imitation of Chriſt, that it is mimical and theatrical, trifling and ſuperſtitious, a ſnare to Conſciences, and a contempt of religion; it is a worſhipping of God with circumſtances in ſtead of formes, and formes in ſtead of ſubſtances, it is like burning muſhromes upon the altar, and a converting dreams into a myſtery; It is flattery, not love, when we follow our Lord in thoſe things in which he neither gave command, nor did any thing of Religion or excellence, that is, in which he neither propounded himſelf imitable, nor to be obeyed. For what worthineſs was there in it that Chriſt did eat this Supper at Supper time; or that when he did inſtitute this he was at his other Supper, and did as the faſhion of the Countrey was at his ſupper? what religion was there in it that he drank the wine of his own Countrey? and what ceremony or myſtery was it if according to the uſages of Sober perſons he put water into his wine for his ordinary beuvrage? and how could theſe become matters of Religion or imitation, when they were onely the incidencies and inveſtitures of the ordinary actions of life and converſation? and in theſe things the intereſt of Religion is conducted competently by common reaſon. He that follows the vices of his Prince does like the man that worſhip'd Mercury by throwing ſtones at him; and he ſerves him with a miſchief, and to pleaſe his vitious Prince thruſts him forward to Eternal ruine. But he that to humour him carries his neck aſide, or ſhrugs his ſhoulders in the ſame manner, or holds his knife at dinner by his pattern, is a flatterer; but he onely loves his Prince and is a worthy ſervant, who fights bravely if his Prince be valiant, and loves worthy things by his example, and obeyes his laws and celebrates his fame and promotes his intereſt, and does thoſe things in imitation, for which his Lord is excellent and illuſtrious in all the world.

38. But becauſe againſt a Rule no example is a competent warrant; and if the example be according to the Rule, it is not the example, but the Rule that is the meaſure of our action; therefore it is fit to inquire of what uſe it can be to look after the examples either of the old or new Teſtament; and if it be at all, ſince the former meaſures are not ſafe, to inquire which are. In which inquiries we are not to conſider concerning examples whoſe practices are warranted by rules; for in them as there is no ſcruple, ſo neither is there any uſefulneſs ſave onely that they put the rule into activity, and ferment the ſpirit of a man; and are to the lives of men, as exhortation is to doctrine; they thruſt him forward to action, whoſe underſtanding and Conſcience was preingag'd.

Of the use of examples in the old and new Testament.

39. But then if it be inquir'd, What use examples are of beyond the collateral incouragement to action, and which are safe to be followed? I answer,

40. 1. That in cases extraordinary, where there is no rule, or none that is direct or applicable with certain proportions to the present case, then we are to look for example, and they are next to the rule the best measures to walk by. But this is of no use in any matter where God hath given a law; but may serve the ends of humane inquiry in matters of decency and personal proportions, when men are permitted to themselves and their entercourse with others. For the measures of humane actions are either the τὸ ἁγιον, καὶ τὸ δικαιον, That which is holy, and that which is just: and of this our Blessed Lord hath given full rules and measures: or else the measure is, τὸ καλὸν καὶ τὸ ἁρμοττον, That which is worthy and becomming such a person: and because laws doe not ever descend to such minuits, the practices and examples of imitable and exemplary persons is the auxiliary of laws. But this is coincident to that of fame and reputation thus if it be inquired in the daies of persecution, whether is be fit to fly or to abide the worst; although we are by all general rules unlimited and unconstrain'd, and so the question of lawful or unlawful will cease, yet because it may be a Question of the τὸ ἁρμοττον, we may look about and see what such men as we are and ought to be, have done: Shall such a man as I fly? said the brave Eleazar: he did not, and so made up the Rule by becomming a worthy precedent.

41. 2. In complicated questions when liberty and necessity are mingled together, Rule and example together make the measures. Thus if it be inquired how we are to comport our selves towards our King, and what are the measures of our duty towards a Tyrant or a violent injurious Prince: the rule is plain, we must not strike Princes for justice; and we must not hurt the Lords anointed, nor revile the Ruler of the people: but if we inquire further concerning the extension of a just defence, the Example of David is of great use to us, who not onely comported himself by the laws of God and Natural essential reason; but his heart smote him for that he had cut off the lap of Sauls garment: and by his example kept us so far within the moderation of necessary defence, that he allowed not any exorbitancy beyond it, though it was harmless and without mischief.

42. 3. In the use of privileges, favours and dispensations where it is evident that there is no rule, because the particular is untied from the ligatures of the law; it is of great concernment that we take in the limits of the best examples. And in this we have the precedent of our Blessed Saviour to be our guide: For when in the question of Gabels or tribute-money, he had made it appear that himself was by peculiar privilege and personal right, free; yet that he might not doe any thing which men would give an ill name to, he would not make use of his right, but of his reason, and rather doe himself an injury, then an offence to others. This is of great use in all the like inquiries: because it gave probation that it is better to depart from our right, then from our charity: and that privileges are then best made use of, when they are us'd to edification.

43. 4. In all matters of doubt, when the case seems equal to the Conscience on either hand, so that the Conscience cannot determine, there the examples of wise and good men are of great use to cast the ballance and to determine the action: for to an equal Scale every grane that is added will be sufficient to make the the determination. If it be disputed whether it be lawful to relie upon the memory of our good works, and make them as an argument of confidence in God; and the rules of conduct seem antinomies, and when we think Gods goodness and justice is warrant for the affirmative, and yet the rules and precepts of humility bear us to the Negative; between these two, if they stand on equal termes, the Example of Hezekiah is sufficient to make the determination.

44. 5. The greatest use of examples is in the interpretation of laws: when the letter is equivocal, and the sence secret, or the degrees of action not determin'd; then the practice of good men is the best external measure we can take: for they are like sententiæ judicatæ in the law: the sentences of Judges and the precedents in the like cases, by which the wisest men doe often make their determinations. Thus the example of David in dividing the spoil between them that fought and them that guarded the stuff, as being a sentence in a question of equity, became a precedent in the armies of Israel for ever after.

45. These are the uses we may make of Examples in Holy Scriptures and Ecclesiastick writers; which uses are helps to our weakness, but no arguments of the imperfection of Christs law; for all these uses are such which suppose us unable to make use of our rule, as in the case of a doubting Conscience, or not to understand it, as in case of interpretation; or else are concerning such things which are not direct matter of duty, but come in by way of collateral obligation: as in matter of decency and personal proportions; for which although examples may applie them, yet the laws of Christ have given us the General measures.

46. But then since there is this use to be made of them, and the actions of men in Scripture are upon so many accounts as I before reckoned inimitable and unfit precedents: the next inquiry is, What are the positive measures by which we may know what examples are imitable and fit to be proceeded in.

The positive measures of example, and which may be safely followed?

47. 1. In this the answer hath but little difficulty not onely because of the Cautions already given in the Negative measures, but because the inquiry is after examples in cases where the Rule is not cleer and evident, not understood, or not relied upon; and they being in some sense us'd onely in the destitution of a rule, may with the less scruple be followed, because if there be no rule cleer enough to guide the action, neither will there be any to reprove the example Therefore that which remains is this;

8. 2. That example is safe, whose action is warranted by Gods blessing. Thus the piety of the Egyptian Midwives was imitable, in that they refus'd to kill the Lords people at the command of Pharaoh; for it is said, Therefore God did build them houses, it was mingled with an officious lie, but that was but accidental to their action and no part of its constitution, and therefore not relative to the reward: but whatsoever God saies he rewards with a blessing, that in equal circumstances may be safely imitated. I doe not say whatsoever is blessed or is prosperous, is imitable: for it may be prosperous and yet unblessed in one regard and accursed in another, or successful to day and blasted to morrow, or splendid in this world and damned in the next; or permitted for the trial of Gods servants, or the extinction of their sins, or the very thriving of it may be the biggest curse, and nurse up the sin into its monstrous uglinesſ and is no other but like the tumor of an Ulcer, it ſwells indeed and grows very great, but it is a ſore all the way and is a contradiction to proſperity; and ſin never thrives unleſs it be in the moſt Catachreſtical and improper way of ſpeaking in the world: but I ſay when it is ſaid or plainly enough ſignified in Scripture that God did bleſs the man for ſo doing; that for which he was bleſſed, that I ſay is onely imitable. * And on the other ſide though an action be deſcrib'd in ſtory without its mark of good or bad, it is a great condemnation of the action if the event was intolerable and the proper production was a miſchief: and thus was the drunkenneſs of Lot condemned, becauſe inceſt was the product, and of Noah, becauſe ſhame and ſlavery were the two daughters of it.

49. 3. Becauſe in theſe examples for which there is no perfect rule the concernment is not a direct but a collateral duty, not matter of direct obedience, but fame and reputation, that things honeſt in the ſight of all men be provided; therefore ſuch examples onely are to be followed which are of good report. A man ſhall not be called a juſt perſon if he invades his neighbours rights, and carries warre to diſpoſſeſs a people that live in peace, upon pretence becauſe we find in Scripture that Nimrod did ſo; becauſe he was an infamous perſon: but when Joſhuah kept the Gibeonites alive becauſe though he was deceiv'd by them yet he ſwore to them, and yet did make them to be ſlaves to his people; he is very imitable both in one part and in the other, and we may not break our words upon pretence we were deceived, but yet we may doe all that we can juſtly doe for the intereſt of our relatives: and all this can well depend upon the example of Joſhuah becauſe his fame is intire and illuſtrious he is accounted a good and a brave man.

50. 4. We muſt be careful to diſtinguiſh the examples of things lawful from the examples of things good and juſt: and alwaies imitate theſe, but with caution follow thoſe; not onely becauſe what was lawful in the old Teſtament is not alwaies ſo in the New, but that what is lawful at all times, at ſome times is not fit to be done. But then, let every example be fitted to the queſtion: If the inquiry be whether this action be holy or no? an example that declares it lawful does not anſwer that queſtion, but if it be ask'd whether it be lawful, the example proving it to be holy does conclude the other more ſtrongly.

51. 5. When evident ſigns of piety like veins of Silver in the groſſer earth are mingled with the example, it adds many degrees of warranty to the determination. Thus our B. Saviour in his apology made for his Diſciple appeald to the example of David eating the bread of propoſition: it was indeed an argument to them depending upon the fame of the Patriarch, but yet our B. Saviour knew there was in it great charity and lines of piety to his hungry followers when David neglected a ceremony that he might doe a charity and releeve a neceſſity, and therefore Chriſt did it not becauſe David did it, but becauſe he might: Davids action was not Chriſts warrant, but the piety of the thing was warrant to them both. And indeed this is the right uſe of examples: by the advantage of the mans fame they may reprove an adverſary, but by the great lines of piety mingled with the body of the action they may become a precedent for our imitation.

I have now given accounts concerning that principle (mention'd num. 25.) which affirms [every thing to be imitable if done and deſcribed in the Scripture] unleſs it be ſignally forbidden. Concerning the other [That nothing is ſafe or warrantable that is not] I reſerve it for its proper place.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

Of the Interpretation and Obligation of the Laws of JESUS CHRIST.

RULE I.

In Negative precepts the Affirmatives are commanded, and in the Affirmative commandements the Negatives are included.

1. NOT he that gives the law onely, but he who authoritatively expounds the law becomes to us a Lawgiver: and all who beleeve in God and in Jesus Christ confess themselves Subjects of the Christian Laws; but all doe not obey alike, who confess themselves equally bound, and are equally desirous to obey: because men by new or false or imperfect interpretation of laws become a law unto themselves or others, giving them measures which our Blessed Lord never intended: and yet an error in these things is far more dangerous then in a thousand others in which men make greater noises. I shall therefore indeavor to describe plain and rational measures of interpretation, that we may walk securely.

2. It is observable that in the Decalogue and so in the whole law of Moses there are more negative Precepts then affirmative. The Jewish Doctours say that there are sixe hundred and thirteen precepts given by Moses, according to the number of letters in the Decalogue which are sixe hundred and thirteen But of these 248. are affirmative according to the number of the joints of a mans body: but 365. are Negative according to the number of the daies of the yeer: but to omit these impertinent and aiery observations of the Jews it ministers some useful and material considerations, that in the Decalogue all the Moral precepts one onely excepted, are Negative (for that of the Sabbath is the caput ceremoniarum:) But that of obedience to our Superiours is onely positive and affirmative: The reasons were these, by which also we can understand the usefulness of the observation.

3. 1. Because this being the first great reformation of the world was to proceed by the measures of Nature; from imperfection to growth: from the beginnings of Religion to its greater excellencies: but in Nature the first step of our progression is to abstain from evil;

Virtus est vitium fugere, & sapientia prima Stultitiâ caruisse.—— and therefore the face of the Commandement was covered with the robe of diſcipline, and God would ſo ſecure their ſervices that they ſhouldnot diſpleaſe ger him; but the excellencies of holineſs by which he was to be indear'd to mankind were eſpecially the glories of Chriſt, not the horns of Moſes, the perfections of Evangelical Sanctity, not of the beginnings of the law.

4. 2. The great Sanction of the law was fear of puniſhment; and therefore God choſe to repreſent his law to them in Negatives, that according to the endearment ſo might be the obedience: Now to abſtain from evil is the proper effect of fear, but to doe good for fear of puniſhment is as improper as to threaten a man into love. Fear is the bridle of ſervants and boys, love is the ſpurre of brave and good men.

Non furtum feci, nec fugi, ſi mihi dicat
Servus, habes pretium, loris non ureris, aio:
Non hominem occidi, non paſces in cruce corvos.

Thats the dialogue of Maſters and Servants. If you be a thief you ſhall be condemned to the mill; if you be a murderer, you ſhall be broken upon the wheel: but if you abſtain from ſuch crimes, your reward ſhall be, you ſhall eſcape the furca: ſince therefore the ſpirit of the law was the ſpirit of fear and of bondage, God did tranſact his Covenant with them in negative meaſures.

5. 3. The law of Moſes was a purſuance of the Covenant of works; and ſince it had in it very little beſide the Umbrages of the χρηστὸς ζυγὸς the ſweet yoke of the Goſpel, it did ſtipulate for exact meaſures: but therefore the precepts were negative that the obedience might be the more poſſible, and the injunction the neerer to paternal: for it is much more poſſible to abſtain from ſins of commiſſion then from ſins of omiſſion: So that, is the beſt meaſure of obedience to the Moſaick law: he is the good Man who cannot be accuſed to have done what the law forbids, he who hath done the feweſt evils, not he who does the moſt good: and thus alſo the Phariſees underſtood their duty: and they were not reprov'd by our bleſſed Lord, for underſtanding the Negative precepts by the rules of abſtinence and a Negative duty; but becauſe they underſtood their Negative duty onely by the meaſures of the letter, not of the intention and Spirit of the law: and 2. becauſe when they had been by the Commentaries of the Prophets and other holy men inſtructed in ſome Evangelical meaſures and more perfect intendments, ſecretly at firſt deſign'd by God, and ſo expounded by the Prophets by way of Evangelical preparation; yet they would ſtill adhere to the old and firſt underſtandings of the law; becauſe they lov'd ſome ſins which (as they had known) were forbidden by thoſe Negative precepts if they would have opend their hearts to underſtand them as they ſhould.

6. 4. That the fifth Commandement is affirmative in the midſt of all the Commandements that are Negative, hath a peculiar reaſon, but nothing againſt the former diſcourſe: for it being a Sanction of obedience to our Superiours under God, is to be expreſſed in actions and external ſignifications; Not onely becauſe theſe onely can doe benefit, ſervice and advantages to our Parents and Princes, but becauſe of nothing elſe can they be judges: Men take no cogniſance of thoughts and ſecret purpoſes; but of outward ſignifications; and therefore the precept was to be affirmative, that is, preceptive of outward actions. 2. There is in children toward their Parents so much natural love and so much fear, and they are so long under their power and the needs of minority, that it will very rarely happen that children can despise their parents or curse them: their own interest, and their own passions, and their own affairs will secure the negative measures of that Commandement; and therefore the world was in this instance dispos'd to receive greater degrees of injunction and a higher Commandement: Nature in this instance doing the same office for them as the whole law did in the other; that is, it was παιδαγωγὸς a Schoolmaster to bring them to Christ: and if they had been as much disposed for the entertainment of the rare and excellent affirmative Commandements of Christ in the matter of chastity and charity and meekness and humility as in the matter of duty to their Parents, there would have been less need of the interposition and interval of the law of Moses before the comming of Christ.

7. And these observations are verified by the ἀντιστροφὴ or corresponding part: for the precepts of Christ are positive and affirmative, as appears in his Sermon on the Mount, which is the Summary of his Law, in which when he expounded the Negative commands of Moses, he still superadded an affirmative of his own: So that it will be nothing but matter of speculation to discourse whether or no in the law of Moses, the affirmatives were included in the Negatives; it is certain the Pharisees did not understand them so; and they are not alwaies involved in the nature of each other, and the promises of the law were not sufficient to incourage the ἀγαθοεργία the doing of good works, though the fear was enough to restrain the evil: but that which concerns the Conscience is that which now is evident and palpable: In the laws of Jesus Christ the negative and affirmative are but correlatives; oppositа relativa, and doe inferre each other. Thus we find it expressed often Whoso looketh on a woman to lust, hath committed adultery: that was our Blessed Lords commentary on the sixth Commandement which was negative; but he addes; If thy right eye offend thee pluck it out. So again, Resist not evil, thats the negative precept, but Christ adds, If any man sues thee at the law and takes thy coat, let him have thy cloak also. So in the matter of oaths, Christ said, Swear not at all: for he still added a more severe negative to the Negative of the Law; but then he addes his own affirmative: Let your communication be yea, yea, nay, nay; that is, let it be plain and simple, meek and positive, easie and ingenuous. Matth. 5. 28, 29 39, 40.

8. Thus our Blessed Lord did in his recitation and exposition of the Moral Commandements deliver'd by Moses; in the interpretation and inlargement of which although it was proper to declare a Negative by a Negative; yet he would follow his own method and design, and superadde his own affirmative; and when he was doing the office of a Lawgiver rather then of a Prophet and expounder of the old law, there his words were positive and affirmative. Witness the eight Beatitudes; the precepts of charity and humility, of giving and forgiving, of fasting and prayer, and many others: but because in the doing all this, he made large discourses and gave laws and exhortations, precepts and reasons, promises and threatnings in complication and mutual consequences; therefore we are without further inquiry sufficiently instructed that our duty is now intended to be complete, and as we must abstain from all evil, so we must doe all the good we can.

9. But

9. But this is to be understood with its proper caution. For we say in Logick, ad Negationem non semper sequitur affirmatio oppositi: every Negative does not presently inferre every contrary affirmative, as a matter of duty. It follows well, Thou shalt not forswear thy self, but thou shalt pay to the Lord thy vowes, but it does not follow, that therefore thou shalt make vows: So in these also there is no consequence of obligation. Thou shalt not take from thy Neighbour what is his; therefore thou shalt give to thy Neighbour. Thou must take from none, therefore thou must give to all: Thou must not give false testimony, therefore thou must tell all the truth thou knowest: Thou mayest not give wrong judgement, therefore you must give right; for it may so happen that you need not give any at all: These instances point out to us the measures of affirmatives which follow from the contrary Negations. Thus:

10. 1. Affirmative duty follows from the Negative; not in contraries but in contradictories. To make a vow and break a vow are contraries; and therefore it follows not, because I must not break a vow therefore I must make one: but to break a vow and not to break it are contradictories, and therefore if one be forbidden the other is commanded; and if the Commandement be expressed in Negatives; Thou shalt not break thy vows, the affirmative is in the bosome of it, therefore thou shalt keep them: because, unless this part of the contradiction be done, the other is, and therefore it is not enough, that we doe nothing expresly against the instance of the vow; but we must also understand our selves oblig'd to the performance of it according to the first intention. The reason of this is, because between two contraries there can be a third thing of a disparate Nature; not at all included or concluded by either part, either by inference or by opposition.

11. 2. From a Negative an affirmative is not alwaies inferr'd in a particular instance: We must not be uncharitable in any instance; but it follows not that by vertue of this Commandement, therefore we must be charitable, or doe our almes in every instance: for every man is not bound to redeem captives, or to visit prisoners: the reason is, because uncharitableness and visiting prisoners are not opposed in their whole matter and nature; but the Commandement which is contrary to uncharitableness can be obeyed according to all its intention although it be not instanc'd in that particular. But this is to be added; that when by accidents and circumstances and the efficacy of some other Commandement we are called upon to this instance; then that this be done is by vertue even of the negative, by the prohibition of uncharitableness, because when we are determin'd to an instance, the Sanction of the whole Commandement is incumbent on it; and will not be satisfied without it; but in other cases it is indifferent, and is obeyed by any instance that is fitted to our circumstances and to our powers. It is like a mans stomach, which of it self is indifferent to any good meat, but when by a particular χρᾶσις or accident it requires this and nothing else, it must either have this or it will fast: So are affirmative laws; though they oblige to every instance, and are indifferent to any that we can and may, yet sometimes we are determin'd to this and no other, and then the whole force of the law is upon it. But else, ordinarily it is true; that the universal negative infers onely the indefinite affirmative; not the particular: The Universal is onely inferd by the consequence, the particular by accidents and circumstances.

3. From

12. 3. From a Negative law the affirmative is inferr'd but not in the same degree of duty and necessity. It is not so great a sin if we neglect an act of charity, or an opportunity of doing glory to God, as if we doe an act of uncharitableness, or positively dishonour God. The reason is, because sins of omission are less then sins of commission, because negligence is not so bad as malice, and of omission sometimes there is no evil cause, but a meer negative or unavoidable inadvertency; but of a sin of commission, the cause is alwaies positive, and therefore alwaies intolerable.

13. 4. The affirmative which is inferr'd by the Negative law of Christ is not absolute and unlimited like the Negative, but modificated and limited by its proper and extrinsick measures. We must in no case and for no regard hinder our innocent Neighbour from doing his necessary work, but it does not follow, that therefore we must alwaies set his work forward, and lend him oxen to plough his land: for it is in no case lawful to doe evil, but in many cases it is lawful not to do good: that is, there is something more required to specificate a positive act besides the consequence of a Negative law: For although the body of an action is there commanded, yet because the body of the action must be invested with circumstances, they also must have their proper causes, or they cannot have a direct necessity. Never turne thy face from any poor man, is a negative precept: to which the affirmative of Christ doth rightly correspond, Give to every one that asks: Now although the Negative is universally to be observ'd in its own just sense, Ut nè aversemur à paupere; that is, that we deny not to be charitable to him; yet when this comes to be specificated by positive actions, the Commandement is not the onely measure; but some conditions are requir'd of him that is to receive; and some of him that is to give: for for to him that will not work when he can, we are not to give; and he that needs it for himself is not oblig'd to part with it to his Brother; supposing their needs are equal or not extreme. To this purpose is that known rule, that Negative precepts oblige alwaies, and to an actual obedience in all times: but affirmative although they alwaies oblige, yet they can be obeyed but in their own season. So that although every Negative precept is infinite and hath no limit; yet the affirmative have extrinsick measures and positions of their own, something to make them laws to me and you, though the consequence of the negative is sufficient to make them to be laws to all Mankind. So that although Negative precepts may be the mother of affirmatives, yet the child is but a dwarf and not like the Mother; and besides that it is exposed to be nursed by chance and by circumstances, by strangers and all the measures of contingency.

14. 5. When affirmatives are included in, and inferred from the Negatives, the proportion of them is not positive but comparative: Thus when our Blessed Lord had given Commandement, Resist not evil, That is, we should not doe evil for evil: the affirmative which is properly consequent from this, is, Doe good for evil: and this is obliging according to the former measures: but when you inquire further into the proportions, and ask after the instances, which our B. Saviour made, we shall find that their obligation is not positive but comparative: If a man strike thee on thy cheek, turn the other also, that is, rather then revenge thy self for one injury, receive another; and rather then vexe him who forces thee to goe a mile, goe with him two mile: not that Christ intends you should offer to doe thy self a shrewd turne, or invite another; nor that thou shouldst suffer it, if thou canst fairly avoid it: but that thou thou ſhouldeſt chooſe rather to ſuffer two evils, then doe one. But this is eſpecially to be reduc'd to practice in matters of Councel rather then Precept; that is, when the affirmative inferr'd from the Negative is matter of perfection rather then poſitive neceſsity; then the comparative proportion is a duty; but the abſolute proportion and meaſure is but Councel. To oblige an Enemy and doe him acts of favour and benefit is an excellency of charity: for which Chriſtians ſhall receive a glorious reward: but this is a Councel of perfection, which if upon probable reaſons, and fairly inducing circumſtances it be omitted, a man ſhall give no anſwer for: but when the caſe is ſo, that it muſt be that I muſt either take revenge of him, or elſe reſcue him from that revenge by an act of kindneſs, by a labour of love, or an expence of charity, then this becomes a duty; for in comparative meaſures every affirmative is at leaſt obligatory: that is, we muſt rather be at any trouble, or expence to doe an affirmative, then prevaricate a Negative Commandement.

15. But then as to the other part of the Rule; that [in the affirmative Commandement the Negative is included;] there is no other difficulty but this, that caution be had that the negative be oppos'd to the affirmative in relation to the ſame Subject: for becauſe we are bound to love our friends therefore we muſt not hate them; but it follows not (as the Phariſees did falſely comment on this text) Becauſe we muſt love our friends therefore we muſt hate our enemies; for theſe two are not oppos'd as affirmative and negative in the ſame ſubject, but as two affirmatives relating to Subjects that are divers.

16. But this is ſometimes not to be underſtood of the preciſe Commandement it ſelf, but of the appendages; I mean the promiſes and threatnings: for though it follows, we muſt doe good to our Neighbour; therefore we muſt doe no evil to him: yet it does not follow, Doe this and live, therefore if ye doe not doe it ye ſhall die: the reaſon of that is this, becauſe there are ſome things encouraged with excellent rewards, the negatives of which are permitted to us with impunity: Thus it is ſaid by our bleſſed Saviour, When thou makeſt a feaſt, invite the poor, and thou ſhalt have recompence in heaven; but then if we doe not invite the poor it does not follow that we ſhall be puniſhed in Hell; but we ſhall not have that recompence which the Hoſpitable man ſhall have: So that to invite the poor is an affirmative precept; but in this the Negative included is not; [Thou ſhalt not invite the rich] or if thou doeſt thou ſhalt be puniſhed: but that [it is not ſo excellent a thing, it is not ſo incouraged by the propoſition of an eternal reward;] but expires in a temporal intereſt: So that the Negative included relates to the reward, not to the precept, and means this onely: if thou doeſt not invite the poor thou ſhalt not have any reward in heaven; for feaſting and making entertainments. But the ſign of this is, 1. when the precept is onely in the particular inſtance of a general commandement; as this of inviting the poor is of alms or charity: or elſe 2. When it is matter of Councel and not of expreſs precept: then the Negative is not directly included in the preceptive words, but in the reward that is appendant.

17. Laſtly, when it is ſaid that in the affirmative precepts the Negatives are included; the word [Negative] is to be underſtood in the Moral ſence; that is, ſo as to include the privatives alſo: Thus when we are commanded to love our Brother, it is not onely forbidden to us to hate him; but we are alſo commanded not to omit to expreſs our love by Symbolical actions: for not not onely contrarieties and repugnancies to the duty of the Commandement; but even omissions also are forbidden: and this is highly to be regarded in the matters of charity; which toward Enemies we use to estimate by our not cursing him, our not hurting him, our not being revenged on him: these indeed are proper instances of the Negative included; but the privatives also are to be considered; for not loving him is hating him; our refusing to doe him kindness, our not praying for him, our unaptness to doe him good offices, our remembring and reporting his injustice, our refusing to converse with him and denying him the comforts of our Society, when without danger or injury to our selves we may converse; is a prevaricating the Negative or privative measures of the Commandement.

RULE 2.

When a Negative and an Affirmative seem opposite in any sence, the Affirmative is to be expounded by the Negative, not the Negative by the Affirmative.

1. THus are those various expressions of our Blessed Saviour to be considered and understood. Unless ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his bloud, ye have no life in you: and yet our Blessed Lord saies, He that eateth the flesh of the Son of man hath life abiding in him. Now to them who suppose these words to relate to the Sacramental manducation, the question is, Whether or no it be necessary to drink the bloud in specie as well as to eat the flesh? because of the exclusive Negative requiring both under the forfeiture of eternal life; or shall it suffice to receive the flesh onely, because life is promised to to be in him who eats the flesh, in that place no mention being made of drinking the bloud.

2. To this the answer is made by this Rule; the Negative cannot be lessened by the Affirmative, because a Negative can have no degrees as an Affirmative can; and if the Affirmative were in this case sufficient, when the Negative is expres to require more, then the Affirmative were directly contrary to the Negative: but on the other side, though the Affirmative requires less then the Negative, there is no contradiction. 1. Because in matters of duty whatsoever is any where requir'd is every where suppos'd; and no interpretation can lessen it from what it is in its whole integrity. 2. Because all our duty is not every where repeated, but the not repeating it in any place cannot annull the obligation in that place where it is expressly requir'd. 3. Because a threatning in all laws is of more force and efficacy then a promise; and therefore when under a threatning more is requir'd, the promise that is affix'd to a part of it must be understood by the analogy and promise to that threatning, because one thing is enough to destroy us, but one thing is not enough to preserve us, Bonum ex integra causa, malum ex qualibet particulari. 4. Because it is ordinary in Scripture to give the promise to every part of duty which yet shall never be paid to that alone: thus to purity, to poverty of Spirit, to mercy, to faith, to almes, to patience, to hope, the promises of blessedness are given; but although it is said, the pure in heart shall see God; and the poor in ſpirit ſhall have the Kingdom, and they that quit houſes and lands for Chriſts ſake ſhall receive the reward of the other world; yet unleſs all that is requir'd be put together in the duty, nothing of the reward ſhall be given to the perſon. Every part of an excluſive negative is an indiſpenſable duty; but every affirmative that is incouraged by a promiſe does not contain a whole duty, but a part of duty, which by being Symbolical to the whole is incouraged as every other part is, but is not paid but in an intire payment, to an intire obedience.

3. This alſo is true when in the affirmative more is put then in the Negative, for even then the Negative is the ſtrict meaſure of the Commandement, and the limit of its abſolute neceſſity and exaction. He that beleeveth and is baptized ſhall be ſaved, but he that beleeveth not ſhall be damned. Here the negative
Mark. 16. is the utmoſt limit; the neceſſe eſſe is deſcrib'd in that; the bene eſſe, and the ordinary expectation in the other: by which we are thus to underſtand this and ſuch other expreſſions, that the Negative contains the indiſpenſable duty, and ſuppoſes an obligation that nothing can excuſe in perſons capable; but the Affirmative that ſuppoſes more is yet for that which is over and above content with a leſs neceſſity, and admits of eaſier diſpenſation: For it containing all that is expected is like a Summum jus which though by the method of laws it is often expreſſed that obedience may be invited as forward as it can, yet the ὕφεσις or the abatement is in the Negative; thats the loweſt, and therefore it is bound up with the penalty. For to the higheſt duty the reward is promiſed, and it is more then enough to pay it, but the puniſhment is threatned by lower meaſures: God abates much before he ſmites; and though he will reward every good we doe, yet every good that is omitted is not puniſhed with death. But this is to be underſtood when the good is of that Nature that it may be omitted upon a probable cauſe, or without malice; or without the direct prevarication of an expreſs Commandement. For many good things are wholly put to us upon the account of hope and promiſes, and not of Commandements, and obedience: though in theſe alſo God makes what abatements he pleaſe: but we are to make none at all.

Rule 3.

In the Affirmative and Negative precepts of Chriſt, not onely what is in the words of the Commandement, but whatſoever is Symbolical or alike, is equally forbidden or commanded.

1. When S. Paul had enumerated the works of the fleſh, and had put into the Catalogue moſt of thoſe crimes which are commonly nam'd in
Gal. 5. 21. laws and fame and the manners of men; he adds, καὶ τὰ ὅμοια τούτοις, and thoſe things which are like to theſe. For 1. there are ſome things which are too bad to name, ſuch were the impurities of the Tribades, Fellatrices, Dranci, Pathici, Pædicatores, of which the Apoſtle ſaies, it is a ſhame even to name ſuch things as are done of them in ſecret: πᾶσαν ἀτιμίας, thats the general word which the Apoſtle uſes for them all, diſhonourable luſts: Now when all unnatural luſts are forbidden, all mixtures but what are hallowed by marriage, the order of Nature, it is no part of the perfection of the law, to name the ſpecies of impurity, and the circumſtances of that vileneſs which gets new names as men pleaſe to undoe themſelves by tricks and artifices of ſhame.

2. There are ſome ſins which are like new diſeaſes, vile and infectious in one yeer, or in one age which were never heard of before, and die with reproach and are never heard of again. That a woman ſhould grow to that impudence as to marry her adulterer in the ſame town where her husband was living, and a Prince, was ſo rare a contingency, that though it was once done in Rome, yet no law was needful to prevent it: and there needed no law to forbid a man to marry a boy; yet Nero did marry Sporus, and he married Doryphorus, whom Tacitus calls Pythagoras: but this was no leſs a ſin, becauſe it was not the expreſs vocal contradiction of a law; it was againſt a law that nam'd it not.

3. There are ſome ſins which Nature and the publick manners of the world doe ſo condemne, that they need no ſpecial mention in the laws. No law forbids us to eat mans fleſh, and yet all the civil part of mankind hate and condemne them that doe it; and thoſe Egyptians who did Deperire defunctarum cadavera, fall in love with the dead bodies which they did anoint, were condemned by the voice of all the world, without the charges of an expreſs law; and all that read the Narratives of the Gnoſtick impurities, how they did in the impureſt ſenſe, Litare in ſanguine femineo, and make their Euchariſt of matter of abhomination, have enough of prime reaſon and common notices of laws and things to condemn their vileneſs, though they never ſtudy the queſtion or inquire which Commandement they prevaricate.

4. There are ſome ſins like others that are nam'd; which are not diſtinct kinds, but like the monſters of Africa produc'd by heterogeneous mixtures, or equivocal generation: Thus to geld a child to make him have a good voice is ſo like cruelty, and the unmercifulneſs of homicide or mutilation, and is ſuch a curioſity of voluptuouſneſs and ſenſuality, that though it wants a name to ſignifie its whole ſinfulneſs, yet it muſt ſtand condemned though there be no text againſt it deſcrib'd expreſsly in the Tables of the law. To give money for Eccleſiaſtical preferments is ſo like the ſin of Simon Magus, that it hath obtain'd his name and his reproach, and yet it is not the ſame crime; but upon the account of S. Pauls ὁμοίωμα or Similitude, it hath the ſame condemnation. Thus Polygamy is like adultery, and marrying after divorce (except onely in the caſe of fornication) is like Polygamie. Concerning which things, there is one meaſure in general, and ſome other more particular.

1. In General.

2. * The likeneſs of things to thoſe which are expreſsly forbidden is not to be eſtimated by formes and outſides, and material reſemblances, but by the intrinſick irregularity and reaſon of the prohibition. To kill a wife or daughter taken in Adultery even in thoſe Countries where by the laws it is permitted, looks as like murder, as killing can: but becauſe the laws allow the intereſted man to be the executioner, it is the publick hand not the private that takes the vengeance: and therefore they are not alike in a culpable ſimilitude. But on the other ſide, to take my goods whereever I find them looks like juſtice; but becauſe of juſtice a man is not to be Judge and executioner in his own caſe, and this thing is in many caſes forbidden by the laws, this is againſt juſtice; for it is not enough that it is his own; for although it is juſtum, a juſt thing to take my own, yet to doe it from a thief by private authority where it isforbid-den by the publick, is juſtum injuſtè factum, a juſt thing done after an unjuſt manner. But if there be a likeneſs of injuſtice, a prevarication of the ſame reaſon, an equal injury, then not the letter of the law, but the reaſon and the ſpirit of it is its condemnation. Par pari referre, to give back the good I have borrowed is one of the great lines of Juſtice; and upon this account we are bound to pay debts, to performe contracts, to make equal returnes of valuable conſiderations, and whatever is againſt this is againſt juſtice. But then becauſe acts of kindneſs are the tranſition of a good from one to another, and although it is without a bargain, yet it is not without an obligation ingratitude comes under the τὰ ὅμοια, it is ſo like injuſtice that it is the worſe for it. It is expreſsly commanded that we ſhould provide for our children according to our powers: and therefore they that expoſe them are worſe then infidels and have denyed the faith: but then to deny to nurſe their own children (unleſs it be upon a juſt and a reaſonable cauſe, upon charity or neceſſity) is ſo like expoſing them, that it muſt ſtand as reprobate under the ſentence of the ſame Commandement.

3. 2. But the particular meaſures of this Rule are theſe: watſoever is of the ſame ſpecification is of the ſame obligation and neceſſity. But if men would be ingenuous and worthy in giving ſentences of their actions and underſtanding the meaſures of their duty, there could be no difficulty in this. For men are eaſie enough to conſent to a General rule, but they will not ſuffer their own caſe to be concerned in it: and they underſtand the particulars too faſt, when it is the intereſt of their Brother, but if it be their own, they know nothing of it. It is written, Thou ſhalt not tempt the Lord thy God, and all the world conſented to the law ſince the promulgation: but yet many nations and many ages of Chriſtendome did admit the tryals of rights by duels, and of innocency by fire Ordeal: which was as direct a tempting of God as any thing next to deſperation it ſelf: and by this is ſufficiently reprov'd. If the labourer be worthy of his hire, then ſo is the Prieſt: if the Prieſt of the old Law, then alſo the miniſter of the Goſpel: which particular I chooſe to inſtance in, that by occaſion of it I may give caution againſt that which cauſes errour in the application of this meaſure and ſenſe of laws unto the Conſcience.

4. For becauſe all actions are inveſted and varied with many circumſtances, they who are concern'd in a particular with which they are willing to eſcape, think every new circumſtance to be a warrant great enough to exempt him from the general rule. Thus if a rule was given in the law of Moſes, they who would not have it drawn into conſequence in the Goſpel; obſerve that differing circumſtance of the divers laws: and think it anſwer enough to ſay, it was ſo in the Law, but what is that to the Goſpel? Now this anſwer is onely true when the law and the Goſpel have contrary meaſures in the ſame inſtance; that is, when the inſtance did not onely relate to the law of Moſes, but is againſt the analogy of the Goſpel. Thus, no unclean thing was to come into the preſence of the Lord: and therefore the leper or the polluted in proſluvio ſanguinis or ſeminis might not come into the Temple; but then if we argue; this is much more true in the Goſpel which is a ſtate of greater purity then the law; we can conclude nothing: becauſe the meaſures of legal and Evangelical purity are wholly differing; and therefore here the relation to the ſeveral ſtates and laws is conſiderable and makes a material difference: But when there is nothing in one that appropriates it to it ſelf, and nothing in the other that excludes it, then the circumstance and relation alters nothing of the proposition: and so it is in the matter of maintenance for the Evangelical Minister.

But no circumstance can alter the question, unless it be a material ingredient in the very constitution of it, and changes the reason of the former usage. Thus when by the Commandement we are tied to give every one their own, if the owner be a madman, and in his fury demands his sword; although this particular be a specification of the General rule, yet it is altered by a circumstance which changes the reason of the law, or supposes it changed. * So when David brought his men to eat Shew bread in the dayes of need, the Priest ask'd if the young men had abstain'd from their wives; saying, That then they might: but he that shall argue from hence, that no man can receive the Sacramental bread but he that hath been continent in that instance, may be surely enough answered by telling him that such contacts did sometimes and to some purposes contract legal impurities, but not Evangelical, in which onely the purity of the Spirit is requir'd, or if also corporal were requir'd, yet such approaches under the protection of marriage are declar'd to be καθαρὰ ἁγιαν as great a purity as chastity its self, of which this is one kind. But when there is no cause of change of the ingredient in the article; if it be of the same Nature, though differing in extrinsecal or unconcerning circumstances, it is by way of specification included in the Rule, and is to be conducted by its measures.

5. 3. Whatsoever is equivalent to the instance of the law, is also within its Sanction and constitution: By [equivalent] (speaking Morally not Logically) I mean that which is inferr'd from the greater to the less affirmatively: or 2. from the less to the greater Negatively: or 3. from that which is equal to it both affirmatively and negatively. For thus laws are extended on all hands: The same law that forbids murder, forbids cruel thoughts and violent anger, whatsoever tempts to murder or is the beginning of it, or is in the Natural progression towards it. So on the other side, the law commands us to obey our Superiours (meaning the Spiritual) the same law though it there names them not, does more strongly command us to obey Princes: for they also are over us and watch for the good of our souls, and must give an account for them. Thus if Husbands must give honour to their wives, then wives must give honour much rather to their Husbands. If you may not steal out of my house you must not spoil my goods in them, much less may you fire my house and burne my goods too: if you must be faithful in little things, much more in greater things: if you must give your life for God, much rather must you give your goods: if you must not defile a Temple much less must you dishonour your bodies. Hebr. 13: 1

6. This also is to be extended to the proportionable obligation of Correlatives. For if the Relative be bound by the laws of Christ, then so also is the correlative, which Rule hath no exception but an explication of it is sufficient. For either the duty of relatives is equal, or unequal in degrees, and it is either in the same instance or in divers. If the instances be divers, they are in all cases expressed competently in the new Testament; as the duty that Husbands and Wives, that Children and Parents, that Masters and Servants, that Princes and Subjects owe to each other respectively, and they need not to be conducted by involution and consequence, for their duties are describ'd in distinct lines. But if the duty and instances be in the same kind but differ in degrees; then the measure of the degrees is to be conducted by proportion to the difference of persons by publick honesty and the sayings of wise and good men and the common usages of the best, and the measures of reason. But if they be the same in kind and degree; then the rule and measure of one is the rule and measure of both, though one onely be named in the law. And this is of use not onely in the equal instances of unequal relatives, but in all the instances of equals; as in Friendships, Societies, Guilds, Colleges, Exchanges, Traffiques and the like. There must be care taken that according to S. Pauls rule, there must not be ἄνεσις ease, remission and advantage to one, and θλῖψις trouble, burden and disadvantage to the other; but in relations that are equal, the duty and the expression must be so too; ever with this caution, that, If the duty be the same between Relatives it cannot follow that the privileges are the same. The husband & wife are equally obliged in the duties of love and justice: but they have not equal powers, neither can the woman put away the man, as the Man can the woman. For though man and woman are pares in conjugio, tyed to an equal love and an equal duty, yet they have not an equal power, nor an equal liberty, in government and divorces they are not equal.

7. But upon the account of this Rule the Christians have a most certain demonstration of the unlawfulness of Polygamy, or of having many wives at once: For our Blessed Saviour said, He that puts away his wife unless it be for fornication, and marries another committeth adultery: therefore he much more is an adulterer who marries another when his wife is not put away, and hath not committed fornication. But in this and the like cases we are to proceed by the measures of reason, and the common usages of laws.

8. 1. A law drawn from a law must be evidently and apparently in the bowels of it before such extraction, or else it must not be obtruded as the Sentence and intendment of the Lawgiver; Obey them that have the rule over you] is a plain Commandement: But if you infer therefore in all things that they say, deny your own reason, and submit your understanding; this follows not, because we are commanded to obey them onely in such things where they ought to rule over us, but that is not in our understandings, over which God alone is the Ruler, and those whom he hath sent are rational and authoriz'd Guides, they have power to teach and power to exhort, they are to doe any thing that can inform us and invite us to good; and we must follow them in all wayes that lead us to God: and that they doe we are to beleeve untill we have reason to beleeve the contrary: but because beyond these measures the law neither said nor meant any thing, therefore the obligation extends not so farre.

9. 2. Whatsoever is not in the letter of the law is then understood to be intended by the law when it is drawn from thence by a prime and immediate Consequence; in which there is no violence, nor artificial chains, nor devices of wit and labour. For laws ought to be but few, and they love not to be multiplyed without apparent necessity, and he that makes more then Christ intended, laies a snare for his own foot, and is cosen'd by his own argument: Christ commanded us that we should doe our alms and prayers in secret: from hence it follows, that all solemnities of pride, and all the dressings and adornements of our prayers design'd for vanity and publication are criminal: and under this prohibition comes all acts of proper specification. But then if I argue from hence further and say, Therefore it is not lawful to appoint publick publick assemblies for prayer; or if it be yet it is not lawful to appear to men to be passionate and devout: and further yet, that private prayer is better then publick, and therefore that it is to be preferr'd before the publick, and therefore yet that we may safely neglect the assembling of our selves together for prayer, I argue foolishly, and cannot impose a necessity of obedience upon any. The law warrants me to goe no further but within sight of it: If I goe one step from her words, I am within the call of her voice: and my obedience can well be exacted, where it can be well proved, but never else. * It is in laws as it is in articles of beleef, to which we are oblig'd primarily, and afterwards to every thing that is certainly and immediatly drawn from thence. But if you goe beyond one consequence, there are so many certain but indiscernible fallibilities, so many intriques of fancy in the disputer, and so much unaptness in the hearer, that it is tenne to one they either doe not understand one another, or doe not understand the article, and so it is in laws; so long as we goe on in the strait line of its letter and known intention we commit no error, or can soon be reproved if we doe: but if we once double a point, we presently lose sight of the law: as appears in the instance now given in the precept of [praying in secret:] against which it is no objection to say, the consequents were not rightly deduced from the words of that precept. For I grant it; it is true they are not; but then I say it is also tenne to one but it will be so in any instance that shall be made fruitful with anfractuous and involv'd consequences: for that is it that I say: A mans reason is to be suspected when he goes a great way from this Rule; and we by our Logick shall become but ill Lawgivers. Whatsoever can certainly and truly be deduc'd from a law does as certainly oblige us as the instance that is nam'd, or the first specification of it, or the direct consequent; if it could be made as evident as it is certain: but becaufe it cannot, therefore it can oblige but in the degree of its clarity and manifestation, for that is to the remote instance, the same as publication is to the Commandement it self. But the precepts or laws of Christ are like the Radix Prosapiæ, the Grand Parent of a Family; from whom the direct descendants are for ever to be reckon'd to the Kinred in the strait and proper line: but when once it goes to the transverse and collateral, they not onely have no title to the inheritance, but every remove is a step to the loosing the cognation and relation to the chief house.

10. 3. In drawing consequent duties from expres laws the first presumption is for piety and the honour of God; that is, if the obligation be no evident, yet if it be evident that such obedience is for the honour of God, it is more probably to be suppos'd that that consequent was intended by the law of God, whom it so apparently serves. But where this or the like material ingredient is not, we are to presume for our liberty rather then for the multiplication of laws; becaufe that is charity and prudence, and both of them are very considerable in the constitution and interpretation of a law: But this is more full in the next rule.

When any thing is forbidden, by the Laws of Jesus Christ, all those things are forbidden also which follow from that forbidden action, and for whose sake it was forbidden.

1. THIS Rule is of use in all laws, and is expressed to the same caution both in the Code of the Civil law, and in the Decretals, and the reason of it is, because the laws of any lawgiver being the effects of his greatest wisedome are designed to the best end, and are intended onely to operate towards and to effect that end: to this purpose laws are made to prevent evils, and though the evils are not alwaies named, yet against them it is that the laws are cautionary and provisionary; so that the evil is much more forbidden then that which brings it, or leads it in: because sometimes the evil instrument may be destitute of its evil effect, and therefore is in many degrees innocent and harmless, but if the evil be introduc'd it is all that which the laws were afraid of. And therefore Aristotle said right; τὸ δὴ τέλος ἑκάστης πολιτείας ἐστὶ λαυδαίμων· αἱροῦνται γὰρ τὰ πρὸς τὸ τέλος. we are to consider the end of every Republick, for they choose all things in order to their end; and the laws are made for publick defence, security, and profit, so it is in Religion and the laws of God. When we give almes we are commanded not to blow a Trumpet, so being warned against pride; but if without that instance or signification we be really proud, or value our selves upon that account, or despise our Brother as less holy, or oppress the Fatherless and Widdow, though without that pretence of holiness and the advantages of hypocrisy, they are greater Breakers of the Commandements then by their fond and fantastick proclamations of their charity. Thus we find in S. Paul an express prohibition, that we should not make provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof; that is, that we doe not take in great stowage of meat and drink, or use arts of sharpning the desire, or caressing the fancy to make the pleasures brisk and active, and the sense quick and pleased: but some there are that make temperance the instrument of pleasure, and the minister of Sensuality, and can be most pleased when they take the least care: and some mind the pleasures so as they will not tarry for the instruments or need them not; in these and the like cases if there were no distinct prohibition of that evil effect, yet it were sufficiently prohibited in the prohibition of the instrument. But because most of the evil effects of evil instruments are expresly and by name forbidden in the New Testament, this Rule is of use principally in the aggravation and condemnation of sin; and it means that every judgement and every evil we suffer which we were fortold of, and which is a foreseen effect of such an action, is to be imputed to us; and besides the direct sin we are also guilty of uncharitableness by doing that which we know will hurt us. God in the forbidding the sin commands us also to preserve our selves, and besides the sin is angry at the very death.

Eth. l. 1. c. 8.

Rom. 13. 14.

2. This Rule hath two limitations; 1. It is not to be understood of events contingent and accidental; but either natural and proper, or foretold and threatned, or at least usual and noted. He that maliciously sowes false doctrine in the Church

Church is answerable not onely for the Heresie but for the mischief that he intends, or is willing it should produce; but if another man to spite him or to hinder his fame shall set up a contrary Heresy, although this was the spawn of the first toad, yet because it was an equivocal production it shall be no otherwise imputed but to reproach him amongst men, to reprove his folly, and to be an argument of a speedy repentance.

3. But 1. Whatsoever effect is natural to a forbidden action is directly upon the same account. Thus, whosoever divides the Church, to him are imputed all the evil effects of Schisme which are its natural productions. If an imperious fooliſh woman by a continual inquietude, by her evil nature and a vexatious spirit so disturbe her husbands quiet and the ease of his soule and the comforts of his life that he also loose his health, she is not onely guilty of the violation of the laws of love and duty and meekness by which she is bound to God and to her husband, but is guilty of murder, or high injuriousness and uncharitableness according to the degree of the mischief which she sees impressed and growing upon him.

4. 2. Whatsoever event is foretold and threatned all that also is imputed to him that does the forbidden action to which it is threatned; and he is directly felo de se who by lust brings upon himself the rottenness of life far worse then the putrefaction of the grave, and he is a perfect prodigal of his fortune who by committing Sacrilege invites the worme and calls a spirit of unthriftiness and consumption to his estate; and he that grieves the Spirit of God and causes him to depart is guilty of that beggery and baseness of Spirit with which such evil usages of the holy spirit of God are often punished. For as God forbad some sins not onely for their own sakes, but that others which are their foul issues might be strangled in the womb; So he forbad all sins and laid direct and collateral restraints upon them, that man might not be unhappy, and extremely miserable. As therefore he who by one sin introduces another is guilty of both; so he who brings any evil which God graciously intended should not fall upon us, to him that evil is to be imputed, and that evil also does either directly or accidentally according to the nature of the Subject matter increase his guilt.

5. 3. If an evil effect be not either natural, or threatned, yet if it happens ordinarily and be noted, it is to be imputed to him who does that evil and forbidden action which does inferre it. The reason is because he wilfully sins against the purpose of the law, who will not prevent that evil which the law intendeth to prevent, and makes the law void and illusory, that is, destitute of its effect, and perfectly in vain as to that intention. Thus it is observed that the Fathers or the Mothers curse destroies the pleasures of a sin, and the gayety of a fortune, and the prosperity of an offending child: He therefore that shall doe a forbidden action which shall bring such a curse upon himself is not onely justly punished and is to impute that to himself perfectly and alone, but if upon his account evil descend upon his posterity or relatives, he is guilty of that evil and is a direct sinner in their punishment.

6. 2. The other limitation which I am to interpose is this; That the evil effects of an evil action are imputed but in proportion to the will and actual understanding, beyond the sphere of which whatsoever does happen, it is collateral and accidental both to the intention and to the time. A mans action action hath a proper life of its own, and it leaves a permanent effect, or is productive of the same by a continuing emanation, this if it be foreseen, and considered and chosen is as imputable as if it were present, or immediate. But because a man can see but so farre, and hath a limited effluxe and impression by all his actions, he is not to be judged or condemned by any thing that shall happen beyond that proper extension; and if some Polonians or Transylvanians, English or French make ill use of the arguments of Arius it is not to be supposed that it shall be put upon Arius his account at the day of judgement, and that his or any mans damnation shall increase upon such accounts, which as they are beyond the intention of the man, or the efficacy of his action, so also beyond the distance of his prevision.

7. But for this that rule which is neerest to exactness is this, No effect which happens after a mans death is imputable to him as a new sin. So far as it was actually intended and design'd in his life time, or foreseen and not reversed so far it is imputed upon the stock of the present malice, not of the futureevent; his own act and his own intention for the present, and his actual design of the future are sufficient load upon him; but then because his act and his actual design could not live after his death, therefore nothing beyond the life of the man can be a new sin: because as he cannot actually or habitually will that event, so neither can he rescind it; If he cannot will it in any sense, it can in no sense be imputed, but if it could be willed, then it may also be refused and rescinded, which because it is impossible, therefore the increase of evil stands not at his door that occasion'd it, and cannot either will it any more or hinder it. This is that which is meant by our B. Saviour; The night comes when no man worketh, and whatsoever is beyond the line of life is also beyond the line of malice, and therefore cannot increase or begin upon a new score, when the whole stock is spent.

8. Lastly, that which proves all this, does also further explicate the Rule: Whatsoever event depends upon the will of another is so contingent in respect of him that first set the evil on work, that it is no longer upon his account then he actually or habitually desires it or indeavours: because now the evil hath a new cause and every emergent event is upon such a cause as cannot be, forc'd or indeed produc'd by any thing besides it self: and therefore to it self onely it is to be imputed, excepting where the malice of the first agent hath an actual or intended influxe into the second.

Rule 5.

The laws of Jesus Christ are the measures of the Spirit, and are alwaies to be extended to a Spiritual signification.

1. IT was a fair Character that was given of the Christians, πείθονται τοῖς ὡρισμένοις νόμοις, καὶ τοῖς ἰδίοις βίοις νικῶσι τοὺς νόμους. They obey the laws appointed for them, and by the piety and charity of their lives, excell even the measure of the laws themselves: For by what instance soever God would be glorified and by what charity soever our Brother can be releeved, and by what what justice societies are established and continued, in all that they exercise themselves according to their whole power, and would do more if they could, and sometimes doe more then they are required: and oftentimes with better circumstances then are exacted, and alwaies with a mind more ready then their hand.

2. Humane laws can exact but the outward action; they neither can command the understanding, nor judge the will, because they cannot secure that nor discern this: and without these two their interest is well enough preserved. He that paies my money though it be against his will does me justice and is quit before the King, and if he dissembles, yet if he gives me good words, I cannot implead him of calumny or slander. Thus the Pharisees understood the law of Moses, and calld him innocent whom the laws could not charge; but therefore Christ calls them to new accounts. He that offers a pure lamb to God may dishonour him with a foul thought: and no sacrifice is pure by the skin and colour but by the heart and hand of him that presents it. Acts of external religion are publications of the Divine honours, but the heart does onely pay them: for there it is that God does sit judge alone; and though he hath given us bodies to converse below with a material world; yet Gods Temple is in heaven in the intellectual world, ; and the Spirit of a man is the Sacrifice, and his purest thoughts are Oblations, and holy purposes are the best presents, and the crucifixion of our passions is the best immolation, the onely beasts of sacrifice, and the Cross of Christ is the altar, and his passion is the salt of all our sacrifices, and his intercession makes the sweet perfume, and so atonement is made by the bloud of the Lamb, and we are accepted in our services, and our wills are crowned with the rewards of a holy obedience: If our hearts be right, our services will never be wanting, or rejected, and although our hearts can supply the want of external power, yet it is certain that nothing can supply the want of our hearts, and of good affections; these must be intire; for they are Gods peculiar portion, and therefore must not be divided. « Plutarch tells of Apollodorus that he dreamd he was taken by the « Scythians, flea'd alive and then cut in pieces and thrown in a boiling caldron, « where his heart leapt forth into the midst of all the little portions of flesh and « told them, I am the cause of all this evil: It was something like that saying of S. Bernard, Nihil ardet in inferno nisi propria voluntas; Nothing burnes in the Eternal flames of hell, but a mans heart, nothing but his will: for from the heart proceed evil thoughts, adulteries, &c. said our Blessed Saviour: but therefore God requires the heart, that is, that the principle of actions be secured, and the principalis Domus the chief house where God loves to dwell and reign be kept without theeves and murderers. * This then is the first sense of the Rule; That our obedience which Christ exacts is a sincere obedience of the will, and is not satisfied with the outward work. He that gives almes to the poor, and curses them in his heart: He that entertains an Apostle in the name of an Apostle, and grutches the expences of his dyet is neither charitable nor hospitable, and shall neither have the reward of an Apostle nor a Brother. In vain it is to wash a goblet if you mean to put into it nothing but the dead lees and vappe of wine; and a fair tomb of amber was too beauteous and rich an inclosure for Martials viper and his fly.

Matth 6. & Matth. 23.

De iis qui tardè à Numine puniuntur.

Matth. 12. 34. 15. 19.

Introrsum turpes, speciosæ pelle decora.

But this is a caution against Hypocrisy in the Moral sense of the words, but the legal sense of the Rule is, that in all laws, the first intention is, that that God be ſerved with the will and the affections; and that theſe be never ſeparated from the outward work.

3. 2. But it is alſo meant that the whole deſign of the laws of Jeſus Chriſt is to be perfective of the Spirit, and his Religion is a Spiritual ſervice; that is, permanent and unalterable, vertuous and uſeful, Natural and holy, not relative to time and place, or any material circumſtances, nor integrated by corporal ſervices; The effect of which is this.

4. 1. The body of the Chriſtian ſervices does wholly conſiſt of Natural religion, that is, ſuch ſervices whereby we can glorifie God and repreſent our own needs; that is, prayers and Euchariſts, acts of love and fear, faith and hope, love of God and love of our Neighbour, which are all thoſe things by by which we can be like God: by which we can doe good, and by which we can receive any: and excepting the Sacraments whoſe effect is Spiritual, and the ſenſe myſterious, and the rites eaſie, and the number the ſmalleſt of all, there is in the digeſt of the Chriſtian law no Commandement of any external rite or ceremony.

5. 2. As it intends wholly an excluſion of the Moſaick ceremonies, ſo it will not admit a body of new and ſuperinduc'd ceremonies: for they are or may be as much againſt the analogy of the Spiritual law of Chriſt, as the other. The Ceremonies of the Chriſtian ſervices muſt be no part of the religion; but either muſt be the circumſtances of the Religion, or the imperate acts of ſome vertue: The Chriſtian muſt be in a place when he praies, and that place may be determin'd, and thither he muſt goe, and yet he may goe any whither elſe, his action is finite and muſt be done in time, and that time may be appointed him, and then he muſt doe it at that time, and yet he may doe it at any time elſe: If he be commanded by his Superiours to pray kneeling, he muſt kneel at the appointment of the law; and yet he may in his own devotions at another time fall upon his face or pray ſtanding. * But the Chriſtian and the Moſaick ceremonies thus differ:

1. The Moſaick rites were appointed by God; the Chriſtian onely by Men.

2. Conſequently they are neceſſary parts of the Religion, theſe are not.

3. The Moſaick Ceremonies did oblige every where; the Chriſtian onely in publick.

4. They were integral parts of the Religion; theſe are but circumſtances and inveſtitures of the Religious actions.

4. Theſe are to be done with liberty; but the Jews were in bondage under theirs.

5. Ours are alterable, theirs laſting as their Religion.

6. Theirs were many and burdenſome, ours ought to be few; of the number of which our Superiours are to judge by charity, and the Nature and common notices of things, and the analogy of the liberty and laws of Chriſtianity. But although there are no publickly deſcribed meaſures beforehand by which Princes or Prelates ſhall appoint the number of their ceremonies; yet there is in reaſon and common voices ſufficient to reprove the folly of him who becauſe he would have his body decently veſted ſhall wear five and twenty cloaks: ſtola & tunica; ſomething for warmth and ſomething for Ornament does well; but ſhe that wears ſo many adornements on her head and girdle, that it is the work of half a day to dress her, is a servant of the tiar of her own head; and thinks neither her Soul nor her body, but her clothes to be the principal. By this I intend to reproove the infinite number of Ceremonies in the Roman Church; they are describ'd in a great book in folio, my purse will not reach to buy it: but it is too like the impertinency of the busily idle women I now mentiond: and although by such means Religion is made pompous and apt to allure them that admire gay nothings, and fine prettinesses; yet then it also spends their religious passions and wonder in that which effects nothing upon the Soule. It is certain that actions of religion must be fitted with all those things which minister to decent and grave and orderly and solemn actions: but they must be no more but a just investiture or the religious action; and every thing can distract us in our prayers, and all the arts of watchfulness and caution are too little to fixe our intentions on them, and therefore whatsoever can become a proper entertainment of the mind, can also be a diversion of the devotion and a hindrance to the prayer. The sum is this; Ceremonies may be the accidents of worship but nothing of the substance. this they were among the Jews, that they may be amongst the Christians, Time and place for the action: Habite and posture for the men; thats all that religion needs, whatsoever else is grave and decent, and whatsoever else is orderly is not to be rejected: but if it be not these, it is not to be imposed: and when they become numerous or grievous they are to be removed by the same lawful hand that brought them in.

6. 3. In the Christian law all purities and impurities are Spiritual; and the soul contracts no religious charge without her own act: He that touches a dead body though he does not wash, may lift up pure hands in prayer; but if his Soul be unclean, no water, no ceremony will wash him pure without repentance:

O nimium faciles qui tristia crimina cædis
Tolli fluminea posse putatis aqua.

It had been well if in all ages this had been considered, and particularly in the matter of marriage: for when single life was preferred before the married for the accidental advantages to piety (especially in times of persecution) which might be injoyed there rather then here, some from thence extended their declamation further, and drawing in all the auxiliaries from the old law, began to preferre single life before marriage, as being a state of greater purity, and then by little they went on thinking marriage to be less pure till at last they beleeved it to be a state of carnality; and with the persuasions of men effected by such discourses were also mingled the discourses of Hereticks who directly condemn'd marriage, and that which descended from this mixture of doctrines some false, and the others not true, was a less honourable opinion of that holy institution on which God founded the first blessing of Mankind; and which Christ hath consecrated into a mystery, and the Holy Spirit hath sanctified by the word of God and prayer, and which is the seminary of the Church, and that nursery from whence the Kingdome of heaven is peopled. But if marriage be lawful, then he that lives in that state as he should, contracts no impurities, but is capable of any holy ministery, and receptive of any Sacrament, and fit for any imployment, and capable of any office, and worthy of any

any dignity. Let them who have reaſon and experience to verifie their affirmative ſpeak all the great things of ſingle life that can be ſaid of it, and they may ſay much; for the advantages are many which are in a ſingle life, and in a private ſtate, and an unactive condition, and a ſmall fortune, and retirement; but then although every one of theſe hath ſome; yet a publick ſtate, and an active life, and a full fortune, and publick offices, and a married life have alſo advantages of their own, and bleſſings and vertues appropriate; and in all God may be equally ſerved, according as the men are, and the advantages neglected or improved But that which I inſiſt upon is, that to be rich is no ſin, and to be a publick perſon is no crime, and to be marryed is no impurity: and therefore to ſuſpect a diſproportion between this ſtate, and Spiritual actions or offices, is a jealouſie whoſe parent is hereſie, and pride and intereſt are its nurſes. Fornication is uncleanneſs, and concubinate and voluntary pollutions, and unnatural luſts are uncleanneſs and makes us unworthy to approach either to the Altar or to the railes, but marriage that fills heaven makes no man unfit for Churches or holy offices.

7. Upon this account I am alſo to take away thoſe ſcruples which have been thrown into mens Conſciences by ſome indiſcreet perſons, concerning involuntary pollutions; concerning which we find many abſurd ſtories of Friers, and of pretended temptations and ſpites of the Devil to hinder them from receiving the Holy Sacrament by procuring ſuch accidents to them before the ſolemnity: which perſuaſion was wholly upon this account that the Spirit could be polluted by ſomething that is without; and that the accidents of the body could defile the Soul. and this and the like were the accidents that could doe it. In which caſes it is without all peradventure true, that if the Soul conſented not before or after, neither Nature, nor Natures enemy are to be taken into the accounts of juſt diſpoſitions or indiſpoſitions to Spiritual miniſteries; if we ſerve God with our whole mind, and with all our heart, and doe what we can that is good, and avoid all evil that we can avoid, we can not be prejudic'd by what we cannot avoid.

8. 4. Although the Spirituality of the Goſpel excludes all ſhadows of ceremonies, and all bodily rites from being of the Subſtance of religion; yet this Spirituality does not exclude the miniſtery and ſervice of the body: for the worſhip of the body may alſo be Spiritual: to worſhip God with our bodies is λογικὴ λατρεία a reaſonable, and therefore a Spiritual worſhip. Thus when the eyes are lift up in prayer, when the bowels yerne with pity, when the hands are extended to fill the poor mans basket, the body ſerves the Spirit, and the Spirit ſerves God, and all is a Spiritual religion. But becauſe a bodily religion ſuch as was that of the Jews cannot be a Spiritual religion ſuch as muſt be that of the Chriſtians, and yet the ſervice of the body is alſo a part of the miniſtery of the Spirit; the Rule which can determine our Conſcience in the inſtances of this article is this:

Whatſoever is an elicite or imperate act of vertue whether it be acted by the Soul or by the body is an act of Spiritual religion.

For in vertues there is a body and a ſoul; and all tranſient actions, or ad extra have ſomething of materiality in them which muſt be miniſtred to by the body. For therefore our Bleſſed Lord hath commanded mortification of our bodies, that our bodies may become Spiritual; and as acts of underſtanding are ministred to by material Phantasms, so are the most spiritual acts of vertue, the love and the fear of God by sad spectacles, and gracious accidents, by feeling good and suffering evil; and as the actions of discerning sensitive objects are direct products of the Soul, but yet have for every one of the faculties a proper Organ in the body: So have the vertues of a Christian; they are acts and habits of a sanctified Soul, but to some the hand does cooperate, to some the eyes, and to some all the body, that as the graces of the Soul are commencements and dispositions to glory; so these spiritual ministeries of the body may nourish it and dispose the body to its perfect spirituality in the resurrection of the just.

8. But then these ministeries of the body, are then onely to be adjudged a spiritual service; when the soul and the body make but one intire agent, just as when the Soul sees by the eye, we say the eye sees; because that seeing is the action or passion of the Soul, which uses that Organ in her operation: so when the act of the body and Soul is but one and the same product of Religion, it is the Soul and the Spirit which is the principal agent, and from thence the action must be denominated to be Spiritual. But as when the eye is made to twinkle and look spritefully, or amorously, or is propos'd as a peece of beauty and does something of its own, but no Natural and proper ministery of the Soul, it is the instrument of vice or vanity and not of the Soul: so it is in the services of the body. if the body of our services be not the product of the Soul, and the imperate act of some vertue, or the proper specifick act of some grace, it can never be a part of the Religion. S. Paul hath given us perfect measures in this inquiry, To give our body to be burned, to give all our goods to the poor, to have all faith, are but the bodies and outsides or material parts of our Religion, and are good for nothing: but when all these proceed from charity, that is, from a willing, a loving Spirit, from a heart that is right to God, that is desirous to please him, then faith justifies, and giving gifts to the poor is true almes, and giving our bodies to the fire is a holy Martyrdome: and in this sense, dressing bodies to their burial is an act of a Spiritual grace, to adorn places of prayer, to build them and fit them for the service of God, is an act of Spiritual Religion, to minister to the poor, to dress children, to make them clean, to teach them their Catechismes, though bodily ministeries, are yet actions of the Spiritual Religion of a Christian. But from this, those things onely are excluded, which either are not the direct productions of a sanctified soul, or proper and prudent ministeries to some vertue. 1 Cor. 13.

9. 5. The Spirituality of the laws of Jesus Christ have yet one effect more: In all contrasts or interfering of laws, or Senses of the laws, the spiritual Sense is to be preferr'd, the spiritual action is to be chosen. By which it is not meant that ever there can be a dispute between the act of the mind and an act of the body; because as no man, and no thing can hinder the soul from willing or understanding, from loving or hating, from fearing or slighting, from valuing or neglecting its proper object: So the act of the body which is to minister to the Soul cannot stand in contradiction to that to which in the very nature of the thing it is subordinate: But the meaning is, when laws are to be expounded, that sense is to be chosen which more relates to an act of Grace, then that which is nothing but an external ministery: Thus, if the question be between the beautifying of a Chappel, or the rescuing of the poor from famine, although that might be an act of spiritual Religion, when Religion requires that specification of an act; yet becaus that hath less of the spirit in it then the other, and is nor requir'd in the presence of the other: this is to be adjudged the more ſpiritual; becauſe it is the more holy. If the queſtion be between keeping of a Holy day, or doing charitable releefs to neceſſitous people, Chriſt in the inſtance of the Sabbath hath taught us to preferre Charity before external miniſteries; obedience before Sacrifice, mercy before Oblations; and did not onely make way for the taking off all mere bodily rites, but alſo for the expounding his own laws to the more ſpiritual ſenſe, that is, to the complyance with the moſt excellent and uſeful grace. So alſo for the expoſition of laws expreſs'd by material ſignifications: as cutting off the hand, plucking out the right eye, eating the fleſh of Chriſt, drinking his bloud, the fleſh, that is, carnal commentaries profit nothing: but theſe words are Spirit and Life: that is, they are neither to be underſtood nor practis'd in the material but Spiritual Senſe.

10. But as to the general conduct of the Conſcience in all theſe inquiries, the Rule is this: All acts of vertue are to be preferred before the inſtruments of it: and that which exerciſes it, before that which ſignifies it; and the inward acts before the outward. Thus when faſting is appointed in order to prayer, and yet both cannot be together, (for that by faſting we are diſabled to pray) there it is, that prayer muſt be preferred and faſting let alone. If corporal auſterities be undertaken for mortification of a rebellious body; if they hinder the body in the direct miniſteries to the Soul in other caſes, and become uncharitable, charity is to take place, and the auſteri ties may be ſupplyed by ſomething elſe. Now this Rule hath in it no exception nor variety but this: that it is to be underſtood in inſtances of corporal and ſpiritual acts that are of a diſparate Nature, and but onely accidentally ſubordinate, as faſting to prayer, keeping Holy-daies for the ſpecial miniſteries of Religion, lyings upon the ground to chaſtity, and the like: but in the actions external which are proper exerciſes of a vertue, the external which is directly, naturally or by inſtitution ſubordinate to the internal muſt never be omitted upon pretence of preferring the internal; becauſe they never can contradict one another, as it never can be diſputed whether the Soul or the eye ſhall ſee; for the Soul ſees by the eye and cannot ſee without it; and it may ſo happen in the external acts of Vertue miniſtring to the internal; as in ſome caſes a man is not charitable, unleſs he extends his hand to the poor, or lifts him out of a ditch, or guide him in the way. This inſtance and ſenſe of the Rule we learn from S. James: If a Brother or a Siſter be naked and deſtitute of daily food, and one of you ſay unto them, Be ye warmed and filled, notwithſtanding ye give them not thoſe things which are needful to the body, what doth it profit? That is, it is in vain to pretend internal charity without the external: in many caſes it cannot be without it, and when it can, it is becauſe there is no object for the act, or no poſſibility to doe it, and then the internal is to be done not by way of preference to the external, but in deſtitution of it and ſupply. But this will be yet further explicated in the following Rule.

James 2. 15.

The imperate acts or outward expresions of the Vertue of one Commandement, must not contradict the elicite acts of another.

1. BY imperate acts I mean such which are commanded to be done by the interest of any vertue whatsoever, not proper to the vertues but such as may minister to it, or signifie it: Thus to deny the impure sollicitations of an unchast person is a proper, an elicite act of the vertue of chastity; but to lie upon the ground, to wear an hairen shirt, to use disciplines, to roll our naked body upon thornes, to sleep in snowes are imperate acts, that is, such which the vertue may chuse and exercise for its own advantage and interest; but such which are not necessary to any man in particular, nor to most men in the General; useful indeed in some cases but not necessary in any. To eat and drink sparingly and so as may minister to health and Religion is directly, that is, a proper and elicite act of temperance: but if a man spares to eat that he may have wherewithall to pay his debts, it is an imperate act of Justice, if to make himself healthful and strong to warre, it is an act of fortitude: the terms being so explicated, the measures of the Rule are these following particulars.

2. The elicite acts of several vertues can never be contrary to each other: as an act of Religion is never against an act of charity: chastity is never against justice, temperance is never against piety. The effect of which proposition is this, that one ought not to be pretended against another, and no piety to Parents can engage us to be drunk for their sakes, no pretence of Religion can make it lawful to neglect the care of our children, and to this purpose was that excellent precept of the Son of Sirach, Let not the reverence of any man cause thee to sin; it is no good manners to comply with our Superiours against our Supreme, and there is a time and a place for every vertue: but no time nor place, no cause or opportunity of doing against any. * It may so happen that the external actions of several vertues cannot consist, as sometimes I cannot pay the Gabel to the Prince; and the offering to the Priest; I cannot feed my child and the poor that begs; I cannot at some times tell truth and yet preserve the life of my Brother. Now when the two external elicite acts of vertue are inconsistent, the one must of necessity give place: the Rules of which are to be given more properly in another place*: but that which for the present I am to say, is this, that although the outward act cannot at all times be exercised and so must in certain cases be omitted, yet in no case can it be lawful for the interest of one vertue to doe against another. * Lib. 2.

3. 2. The imperate acts of one vertue may contradict the imperate or instrumental and ministring acts of another: as fasting when it is commanded by Religion may be against the advice of our Physitian, whom to observe it is sometimes a precept of prudence, sometimes of charity. Religion commands us sometimes to feast, and at the same time our charity bids us save our expence, that the poor may be fed the more plentifully. The reason of this is because all the imperate acts of vertue are external and must depend upon something from without: which because it can unavoidably be hindred, it muſt needs alſo be, that it may inculpably be omitted. But then the Rule is this; Becauſe all imperate acts of vertue, are nothing in themſelves but wholly in relation to the vertue; that imperate act which miniſters to that vertue which is then to be preferred, muſt alſo be preferred: The reaſon is plain: The acceſſory muſt follow the nature of the principal: and therefore if we muſt now preferre the vertue, we muſt alſo preferre the inſtrument. The caſe is this; Don Antonio Licente of Portugal according to the Portugueſe and Spaniſh vanity, lov'd to ſee his wife painted; and one evening commanded her to appear with him ſo diſguis'd at a Maſque: ſhe having notice that a young Gentleman who was paſſionately in love with her would be there, and knowing that it would enflame his paſſion if ſhe were ſo adorn'd, inquires of her Confeſſor by what means ſhe ſhould reſtrain the folly of that Inamorato, and receives this amongſt other advices, that at no hand ſhe ſhould appear before him with any Artificial handſomeneſs: If ſhe obeyes her Husbands humor at that meeting, ſhe does hurt to a Soul, and gives fuell to an impure flame which already is too big: If ſhe does not obey him in that inſtance, her Husband will loſe the pleaſure of his fancy. But becauſe ſhe finds there is no other evil will be conſequent to her omiſſion, but that her Husband ſhall want a little Phantaſtick pleaſure; and the conſequent of her obeying him would be (for ought ſhe knew) that God might loſe a Soul: ſhe choſe to doe an act miniſtring to Spiritual charity and the chaſtity of her Brother, rather then an act that could be inſtrumental to nothing but the aiery pleaſure of her Husband: though otherwiſe ſhe had been bound to ſignifie her obedience to him by any thing that had been lawful.

4. But in this there is ſome variety, and ought to be ſome caution: For although the principal vertue is to be preferred not onely in it ſelf or in its proper and elicite acts, but alſo in its imperate and inſtrumental; yet this is to be underſtood to be true, when the inſtruments are in equal order to their reſpective vertues, or when there is no conſiderable difference. For if the action in queſtion miniſtring to the leſs principal vertue doe very much promote it, and the other which is inſtrumental to the more principal doe it but an inconſiderable advantage; the miniſtery of the leſs principal is in that caſe to be preferr'd; the reaſon is, becauſe by this omiſſion of an inconſiderable inſtrument the preſent duty is not hindred; but the ſervice of God is advantaged in the other, becauſe it is able to effect ſomething that is conſiderable toward the ſervice of God, which the other is not. The caſe is this; I knew a brave man who by a conſpiracy of evil perſons was condemn'd to die: He having of a long time us'd to faſt till the morning office was completed, becauſe he found faſting to be practis'd by Antiquity, and by Holy perſons in their more ſolemn offices, and thinking it might or did him ſome advantage in order to the bettering of his prayer; did think to doe ſo in the morning before his Execution. But then on the other ſide he conſidered that if he faſted he ſhould ſuffer a great diminution of Spirits, and poſſibly might be ſuſpected of puſillanimity if he did ſuffer a natural lipothymy, and therefore could not tell what he ſhould doe. He was ſure that to acquit himſelf before God in his duty was much to be preferr'd before the other of appearing brave and hardy before men, and therefore that his private prayers were more to be regarded then his publick confidence; and therefore was chuſing to faſt: but then he reflected on the actions inſtrumental again, and conſidered that his abſtinence from a little meat would bring but a very little and inconſiderable advantage to his prayers, but his eating would very much ſtrengthen strengthen his heart and doe him a very considerable advantage that way, he chose this, because the other could easily be supplyed by the intenseness of his Spirit, his zeal, and his present necessity, but this could not but by Natural supplies and supportations of the strengths of the body.

5. But in the like cases, prudence and the conduct of a good guide is the best security to him that inquires with an honest heart and pure intention; and then the determination is best, and the Conscience is safest when both can be reconciled: but when they cannot, the former measures are to be observed.

6. 3. Those actions which can onely signifie or serve the interest of vertue by way of collateral advantage and indirect ministery must ever give place when they hinder the proper acts of any vertue whatsoever. Fasting must never be used when to fast is against charity: because charity is directly commanded, but fasting is relative to something else, and is not commanded for it self. Now in those things which are of a disparate Nature, a principal is ever to be preferred before an instrument, and an act of duty before an act of prudence, and necessity before convenience.

7. 4. But in things subordinate, that is, when the outward act is an elicite act of vertue, and truely subordinate to the internal, there can be no contradiction of one to the other; but the outward act and the inward must be both performed; that is, neither of them must be pretended in objection to the other; for they cannot hinder each other; but the outward can be hindered onely by something from without, but the inward by nothing. So that in order to Conscience, the Rule is this; He that does an inward and elicite act of vertue, will certainly if it be in his power, doe the outward elicite act: that is, the hand will move at the command of the Will, and the foot will goe if it be commanded, and if the Soul be charitable the hand will be apt to minister. For it is not well within, unless it be well without; that is, unless the vertue expresse it self in outward action where it can. And on the other side; an outward elicite act of vertue can never goe alone, unless it be the product of a good heart and of an inward elicite act, it is the imperate act of pride, or ambition, or a vitious fear, or covetousness, or something criminal, but neither the imperate nor the elicite act of any vertue whatsoever.

8. 5. Though the words of Art here used be not common, yet the practice of these Rules in the Questions of Conscience will not be difficult if we shall but with some diligence observe but the difference of external actions, and be able to discerne what outward actions are the elicite or proper, and which are the imperate and instrumental acts of vertue; because these being to give place to other acts by the events and constitution of their own nature, and the other never but when they are hindred from without, our duty will be easy when we once understand of what nature the outward action is. The Rule therefore for the direction of our Conscience in this affair is this; Those actions which either are commanded by name and in particular, or by direct and proper consequence from the General, they are the elicite and proper actions of a vertue. Thus to give alms is a proper and elicite act of charity: to condemne the Criminal is a proper act of justice: To speak well of all men behind their backs, so farre as we can with truth, is an elicite act of equity. But whatever is of that nature that it can be done innocently and yet not be an act of vertue properly, that onely is instrumental to a vertue, and is an imperate action. Thus to invite rich men to a feaſt may be done prudently and without Scruple, but he that does ſo and no more ſhall have no reward in heaven for it: but yet to invite rich men to a banquet may miniſter to friendſhips or peace, or it may obtain releef to a poor oppreſſed Brother, and then it may be a good inſtrument of that vertue to which by accident or the perſonal intention of the man (not the Natural order or intention of the thing) it does miniſter.

* By the ſerious obſervation of this difference of acts we may be guided in many caſes of Conſcience and in the interpretation of ſome of the Laws of our Religion.

RULE 7.

When any thing is forbidden by the Lawes of Chriſt, all thoſe things alſo by which we come to that Sin are underſtood to be forbidden by the ſame Law.

1. IN this there is one great difference between Poſitive and Negative laws. When any thing is commanded or enjoined, to take or uſe any inſtrument to it is left to our choice, and is matter of prudence and not duty: As when we are commanded to mortifie the luſts of the body: we are not commanded to lie upon the ground, or to maſticate Rhubarb, or to goe barefoot, or to put on S. Francis his girdle upon the bare body: as we find theſe actions aptly inſtrumental to the duty, and fitted to the perſon, ſo we may uſe them: but if the fear of Hell, or the hopes of Heaven can mortify us ſufficiently to all the purpoſes of the Spirit, or if he who is married be not tempted, or he who is unmarried be by Nature abſtinent, or by diſeaſe and imperfection, theſe inſtruments are out of uſe, as to theſe purpoſes. For here nothing is under command but the duty it ſelf; and if by any good inſtrument it be done, it is all one as to the law. * But in Negative precepts the caſe is otherwiſe: for the crime is not onely to be abſtained from, but every inſtrument of it, every path that leads to it, whatſoever can begin or promote it: and the reaſon is, becauſe all theſe things are of the ſame nature with the ſin; and therefore although every thing that is or may be good is not commanded, yet every evil is forbidden. One fly can ſpoil a pot of Ointment: But this we are plainly taught by our Bleſſed Saviours Sermon in the Mount; where he expounded the precepts of the Ancients, not only to ſignifie the outward act, but the inward deſire: and in this our Bleſſed Maſters law is much more perfect then the Digeſt of Moſes; for although there alſo God forbad Concupiſcence; yet it was onely inſtanc'd in the matter of Covetouſneſs; and was not extended to the other inſtances of duty; but in Chriſts law, Non concupiſces is the apex juris, it is the Conſervatory and the laſt duty of every Commandement

Nam ſcelus intra ſe tantum qui cogitat ullum
Facti crimen habet.——

He that thinks a luſtful thought hath broken a Commandement; and if the eye be full of Adultery, or the mouth be impure, or the hand be unclean, the whole man is polluted before God, and ſtands guilty of the breach of the main law. Exercetur, atque aperitur opere nequitia, non incipit.

The

The deed tells the heart, and opens the shop of crimes, but they begin in the heart, and end in the outward work.

2. But in this there is no difficulty: for God being Lord of all our faculties, and the searcher of hearts, and the judge of our thoughts, he must be served by all, and he searches that he may judge all, and judges that he may punish or reward all. But the Rule is onely thus to be limited: that in those sinnes whose being criminal is wholly relative to persons with whom we converse; every thought is not a sin unless that thought also be relative. As he sins not that thinks a lie, if he resolves not to abuse any body with it, and a man may love to please himself with false news, and put on a fantastick confidence and persuasion of the truth of what he would fain have to be true; though to his reason it seem improbable. In this there is some folly, but no malice: but to lie is a relative action; and if he have but a thought or purpose to abuse the credulity of any one, then that thought or purpose is a lie; that is, it is of the same nature with a lie, and therefore of the same condemnation. The case is the same in all things which are forbidden onely because they are uncharitable or unjust to my Brother, but are permitted when they are otherwise.

3. 2. But the intention of the Rule is more: For it means that all the addresses and preparations to Criminal and forbidden actions are also forbidden. Thus because Christ gave a law against fornication he hath also forbidden us to tempt any one to it by words, or by wanton gestures, or lascivious dressings, and she fornicates that paints her face with idle purposes.

4. 3. It is also meant concerning temptations to a forbidden instance; for they also are forbidden in the prohibition of the crime: which is to be understood with these Cautions:

5. 1. If the temptation be in a Natural and direct order to the Sin, it is forbidden, where the sin is. Thus because lusts of the flesh are prohibited, it is also our duty, that we doe not make provision for the flesh to fulfill the lusts of it. Eating high, and drinking deep are actions of uncleanness, as well as of intemperance: and in the same proportion also is every thing that ministers directly to the lusts of the lower belly though in a less degree; as lying soft, studying the palate, arts of pleasure and provocation, inticing gestures: with this Caution;

6. 2. If the effect be observed in these less and lower instances then they are directly criminal: for whatsoever did bring a sin and is still entertain'd knowingly and choosingly, is (at least by interpretation) chosen for the sins sake: but at first and before the observation it may enter upon another account; which if it be criminal, to that these instances are to be reckoned, and not to that sin to which they minister unknowingly.

7. 3. Every temptation is then certainly to be reckoned as a sin when it is procured by our own act; whether the temptation ministers to the sin directly or accidentally: for if we chose it, it can have no excuse: tute quod intristi tibi comedendum est: and unless the man be surprised, his chosing of an instrument to sin withal, is not for the sake of the instrument, but for its relation: and this is true, although the usual effect does not follow the instrument. For there is sometimes a fantastick pleasure in the remembrances of sin, in the approaches approaches of it, in our addreſſes to it: * and there are ſome men who dare not act the foul crime, who yet love to look upon its fair face; and they drive out ſin as Abraham did Iſmael with an unwilling willingneſs (God knows) and therefore give it bread and water abroad though no entertainment at home and they look after it, and are pleaſed with the ſtories of it, and love to ſee the place of its acting,

Hic locus, hæc eadem ſub qua requieſcimus arbor
Scit quibus ingemui curis, quibus ignibus arſi.

And they roll it in their minds: now they that goe but thus farre and love to tempt themſelves by walking upon the brink of the river, and delight themſelves in viewing the inſtrument of their ſin, though they uſe it no further, they have given demonſtration of their love of ſin when they make ſo much of its Proxy.

8. * But there are others who have great experience of the vanity of all ſin and the emptineſs and diſſatisfaction that is in its fruition, and know as ſoon as ever they have enjoyed it, it is gone, and that there is more pleaſure in the expectation then in the poſſeſſion; and therefore they had rather goe towards it then arrive thither; and love the temptation better then the ſin: Theſe men ſin with an excellent Philoſophy and wittineſs of ſinning; They love to woe alwayes and not to enjoy, ever to be hungry and ſitting down to dinner, but are afraid to have their deſires filled, but if we conſider what the ſecret of it is, and that there is in theſe men an immenſe love to ſin, and a perfect adheſion to the pleaſure of it, and that they refuſe to enter leſt they ſhould quickly paſs thorough, and they are unwilling to taſt it, leſt they ſhould eat no more, and would not enjoy, becauſe they will not be weary of it; and will deny any thing to themſelves even that which they moſt love, leſt for a while they ſhould loath their beloved ſin; we ſhall ſee reaſon enough to affirme theſe men to be the greateſt breakers of the Laws of Jeſus Chriſt; though they onely tempt themſelves, and handle the inſtruments of ſin, and although theſe inſtruments ſerve nothing but the temptation, and the temptation does not ſerve the ſin, whether in its own nature it is deſign'd.

9. 4. If the temptation be involuntary, then it is not imputed: and yet this is to be underſtood with this proviſion; that it be neither choſen directly, nor by interpretation; that is, that it be not entred into by careleſſneſs, or confidence, or choice. If it be by choice, then it is directly againſt that law of Chriſt which forbids that ſin whither the temptation leads; but if it enter by careleſſneſſe or confidence, it belongs not to this Rule; for although every ſuch temptation is againſt the laws of Chriſt, yet they are not under the ſame law by which the effect is prohibited, but unlawful becauſe they are againſt Chriſtian prudence and Chriſtian charity.

The suppositive propositions with the supervening advices of our Blessed Saviour are alwaies equivalent to matter of duty, and are by interpretation a Commandement.

1. THIS Rule is intended as an explication of the precepts of prayer, alms, and fasting: all which our Blessed Saviour in his Sermon upon the Mount expressed by way of supposition; which way of expression although it be not a positive and legal expression of a Commandement, yet it either supposes a preceding law, or a confirm'd practice, or at least that those to whom such words are directed are willing and loving and obedient people, understanding the intimations and secret significations of the Divine pleasure. When ye give almes, doe not blow a Trumpet, said our Blessed Saviour. When ye pray stand not in the corners of the streets, when you fast doe not disfigure your faces. Now concerning prayer and alms there is no difficulty, because our Blessed Lord and his Apostles have often repeated the will of God in expres Commandements concerning them, but because of fasting he hath said much less, and nothing at all but these suppositive words, and a prophecy that his Disciples should fast in the daies of the Bridegrooms absence, and a declaration of the blessed effects of fasting; this hath a proper inquiry and a special difficulty, whether or no these words have the force of a Commandement.

2. Concerning which we may take an estimate, by those other expressions of our Lawgiver concerning almes; which we without further scrutiny know to be Commandements, because in other places they are positively expressed: and therefore if we can find it so concerning fasting, this inquiry will be at an end. Now concerning this I will not onely observe that the three great heads and Representatives of the law, the Prophets, and the Gospel, Christ, Moses and Elias, who were concentred and inwrapped in one glory upon mount Tabor were an equal example of fasting, which in their own persons by a Miracle was consigned to be an example and an exhortation to fasting to all ages of Religion, and each of them fasting fourty dayes upon great occasions told to them who have ears to hear, what their duty is in all the great accidents of their life: but that which is very material to the present inquiry is, that this supposition of our Blessed Lord, [When ye fast] was spoken to a people who made it a great part of their Religion to fast, who plac'd some portions of holiness in it, who had received the influence of their greatest, their best, their most imitable examples for religious fasting; and the impression of many Commandements not onely relative to themselves as bound by such a law, but as being under the conduct of Religion in general. Such was the precept of the Prophet Joel, Thus saith the Lord, turn ye even to me, with all your heart, with fasting and with weeping and with mourning. Now whatever the Prophets said that related to Religion abstractedly, or morality, all that is Evangelical (as I proved formerly in this Book:)* Besides there was an universal solemn practice of this exercise, under Joshua at Ai, under the Judges at Gibeah, under Samuel at Mizpah, under David at Hebron; fasts frequently proclamed, frequently instituted; at the preaching of Jeremy and Daniel, of Joel and and Zechary; before the captivity, under it, and after it; in the dayes of sorrow and in the dayes of danger, in their religion solemn and unsolemn, after they had sinned and when they were punished, at Jerusalem among the Jews and at Nineveh amongst the Gentiles: Now because it is certain that all this could not be confin'd to the special Religion of the Jews, but was an expression and apt signification and instrument of a Natural religion our B. Saviour needed not renew this and efforme it over again into the same shape, but had reason to suppose the world would proceed in an instance whose nature could not receive a new reason and consequent change in the whole.

Joel 2. 12.

* Cap. 2. Rul. 5.

3. This heap of considerations relates to that state of things in which our Blessed Saviour found this Religious exercise at his comming. Now if we consider what our Blessed Savior did to it in the Gospel; we shall perceive he
1. intended to leave it no less then he found it: for first, he lik'd it and approv'd it, he allowed a time to it, a portion of that by which God will be serv'd; and he that gave us time onely to serve him and in that to serve our selves, would
2. not allow any time to that by which he was no way served. 2. We cannot tell why Christ should presuppose that a thing was to be done, which God did not require to be done: such things Christ used to reprove, not to recommend, to destroy not to adorne by the superfetation of a new Com-
3. mandement. 3. These words he speaks to his Disciples in the promulgation of his own doctrine, in his sermon upon the Mount, which is the great institution and Sanction of the Evangelical doctrine, and therefore left it recommended and bound upon them by a new ligature, even by an adopti-
4. on into the Everlasting Covenant. 4. He represents it equally with those other of prayer and almes, which in this excellent digest of laws he no otherwise recommends, but as supposing men sufficiently ingaged to the practice of these duties: when ye pray enter into your chamber, and when ye pray
5. say Our Father, and when ye fast, be sincere and humble. 5. He that presupposes does also establish; because then one part of the duty is a postulate and a ground for the superstructure of another; and is sufficiently declar'd by its parallels in the usual style of Scripture. My Son when thou serveſt the
1 King. 8. 38. Lord prepare thy soul for temptation, So the Sonne of Syrach: and again, when thou heareſt forgive: and again, when thou art afflicted call upon him, which formes of expression suppose a perfect persuasion and accepted practice of the duty; and is more then a conditional Hypothetick: Si jejunatis hath in it more contingency, but Cum jejunatis is an expression of confidence and is gone
6. beyond a doubt. 6. That exercise which Christ orders and dispose, which he reformes and purges from all evils superinduc'd appendage is certainly dress'd for the Temple and for the service of God; now this of fasting Christ reforms from its being abus'd as he did prayer and almes; and therefore left it in the first intention of God and of a Natural Religion to be a service of God, like that of bowing the head, or going to worship in the houses of prayer.
7. 7. To this duty he promises a reward: Our heavenly Father that seeth thy fasting in secret shall reward thee openly: that is, its being private shall not hinder it from being rewarded; for God sees it, and likes it, and loves it, and will reward it.

4. Now for confirmation of all this, and that this was to this purpose so understood by the Disciples and followers of our Lord: S. Paul was in fast-
2 Cor. 11. 27 ings often; and this was a characteristick note of the Ministers of the Gospel:
2 Cor. 6. 4. In all things approving our selves as the Ministers of God in much patience. . . . in watchings watchings, in fastings: and when Paul and Barnabas were ordained Apostles of the Uncircumcision, they fasted and prayed and laid their hands on them and so sent them away; and esteemed this duty so sacred, that S. Paul permitted married persons σχολαζειν to appoint vacant times from their endearments that they may give themselves to fasting and prayer: and the Primitive Christians were Generally such Asceticks in this instance of fasting, that the Ecclesiastical story is full of strange Narratives of their prodigious fastings. Acts 13. 3, 4. 1 Cor. 7 5.

5. Lastly, fasting is an act of many vertues: it is an elicite and proper act of temperance, and of repentance, aud of humiliation, and of mortification of the flesh with its affections and lusts; it is an imperate and instrumental act ministring to prayer, and is called a service of God: So the good old Propheteſs served God night and day in fasting and prayer: and that which serves God, and ministers so much to religion, and exercises so many graces, and was practis'd by the faithful in both Testaments, and was part of the Religion of both Jews and Gentiles, and was the great solemnity and publication of repentance, and part of a Natural religion, and an indearment of the Divine mercy and pitty; that which was alwaies accounted an instrument of impetration or a prevailing prayer; which Christ recommended and presuppoſed, and adorned with a cautionary precept and taught the manner of its observation, and to which he made promises, and told the world that his Heavenly Father will reward it; certainly this can be no less then a duty of the Evangelical or Christian Religion. Luke 2.

6. But yet although it be a duty, yet it is of a Nature and obligation different from other instances. When it relates to Repentance, it is just a duty, as redeeming captives is commanded under the precept of mercy: that is, it is the specification or positive exercise and act of an affirmative duty: it is a duty in it self, that is, an act whereby God can be served; but it becomes obligatory to the man by other measures, by accidental neceſſities and personal capacities, in time and place, by publick authority and private resolution. Not that a man cannot be said to be a true penitent unless he be a faster: but that fasting is a proper, apt, natural, usual, approved expression, and an exercise of repentance: it is more fitted to the capacities of men, and usages of Religion then any other outward act, it hath some Natural and many collateral advantages more then other significations of it; and it is like bowing the head or knee in prayer, and is to repentance the same outwardly as sorrow is inwardly, and it is properly the penance or repentance of the body, which becauſe it hath sinned must also be afflicted, according to that of S. James, Be afflicted, and mourn and weep, let your laughter be turned to mourning, and your joy to heavineſs: Humble your ſelves in the ſight of the Lord: that is, repent ye of your sins: for all these expressions signifie but this one duty, and this great exercise and signification of it is so much a duty in the General, that it cannot be omitted without good reason, nor then neither unless it be supplied by something else, in its just time and circumstances.

7. In order to other ends fasting is to be chosen and preferred before instruments less apt, less useful, less religious, that is indeed, before the imperate and ministring acts of any kind whatsoever; for it is the best in many respects and remains such unless it be altered by the inconveniences or healthlesness of the person.

RULE

Rule 9.

The inſtitution of a Rite or Sacrament by our Bleſſed Saviour is a direct law, and paſſes a proper obligation in its whole integrity.

1. THIS Rule can relate but to one inſtance; that of the Holy Sacrament of Chriſts body and bloud; for although Chriſt did inſtitute two Sacraments, yet that of Baptiſme was under the form of an expreſs Commandement, and therefore for its obſervation needs not the auxiliaries of this Rule. But in the other Sacrament the inſtitution was by actions, and intimations of duty, and relative precepts, and ſuppoſitions of action; as quoties feceritis, and the like. Now whether this doe amount to a Commandement or no, is the inquiry; and though the queſtion about the half Communion be otherwiſe determinable, yet by no inſtrument ſo certain and immediate as this.

2. In order therefore to the Rule of Conſcience in this inſtance I conſider, that an inſtitution of a thing, or ſtate of life by God, and by his Chriſt is to be diſtinguiſhed from the manner of that thing ſo inſtituted. When a thing is inſtituted by God it does not equal an univerſal Commandement; but obtains the force of a precept according to the Subject matter and to its appendant relations. Thus when God inſtituted marriage, he did not by that inſtitution oblige every ſingle perſon to marry: for ſome were Eunuchs from their Mothers wombs, and ſome were made Eunuchs by men; and ſome make themſelves Eunuchs for religious and ſevere ends, or advantages of retirement and an untroubled life. But by this inſtitution (ſay the Doctours of the Jews) every man was at firſt obliged, and ſo they are ſtill, if they have Natural needs or natural temptations; But becauſe the inſtitution was relative to the publick neceſſities of Mankind, and the perſonal needs of a man, therefore it was not an univerſal or unlimited Commandement; but onely ſo farre as it did miniſter to the neceſſary end, ſo farre it was a neceſſary Commandement. It was not inſtituted for Eunuchs; but for whom it was inſtituted, to them it was a remedy againſt ſin, and the ſupport of the world, and the original of Families, and the ſeminary of the Church, and the endearment of friendſhips, and the parent of ſocieties, and untill the neceſſities of the world were abated, and the needs of ſingle perſons were diverted, or broken in pieces by the diſcipline of a new inſtitution, it was eſteemed infamous, and it was puniſhable not to marry.

3. But then if we conſider the manner of this thing ſo inſtituted, it is certainly a perfect, unalterable, and univerſal Commandement. For although every man in every circumſtance be not by vertue of the inſtitution oblig'd to marry; yet if he does marry, by the inſtitution he is tied up ſtrictly that at no hand he muſt prevaricate the meaſures and limits of the inſtitution. He that marries muſt marry by that Rule and by no other. He muſt marry one woman onely while ſhe is alive: he muſt leave Father and Mother and adhere to her, he muſt treat her with charity and honour, he muſt uſe her by the limits of Nature and ſobriety, he muſt make her the Mother of his family, he he must make her serve no desire but what is Natural, and so in every thing is he limited to the first institution.

4. The reason is, because a Divine institution is the whole cause, and the intire beginning, and the onely warranty and legitimation of the state or of the action: and therefore whatsoever is otherwise then the institution, is not from God, but from our selves: So that although the institution does not oblige us in all cases to doe the thing at all; yet in all cases it obliges us to doe it in the manner it is appointed: and in this sense the word is used in good Authors. Nam is quanquam triennium nutricibus dederit, tamen ab illis quoque jam formandam quàm optimis institutis mentem infantium judicat, said Quintilian. L. 1. c. 2. The understanding even of infants is from the very beginning with the best institutions: that is, with the best laws and precepts of manners. Institutiones sunt præceptiones quibus instituuntur & docentur homines, said Laurentius Valla: the precepts by which men are taught what to doe are called institutions: so Quintilian inscrib'd his books, de institutione oratoria, and Lactantius wrote Institutions; that is, Commentaries on the precepts and laws of Christianity. But it hath in it this peculiarity of signification, that the word [institution] does signifie properly Rules and precepts of manners; properly the measures of practice, or Rules teaching us what we are oblig'd to doe. So that institution does not directly signifie a Commandement, but it supposes the persons obliged, onely it superaddes the manner and measures of obedience. Cùm ad literas non pertineat ætas, quæ ad mores jam pertinet, &c. saies Quintilian; since that age is not capable of letters, but is capable of manners, they are to be efform'd by the best and noblest institutions. Ubi supra.

5. And thus it is in the matter of the Sacrament as it is in the matter of marriage. All men are not alwaies obliged to receive the Sacrament; for the institution of it being in order to certain ends, and in the recipients certain capacities and conditions requir'd by way of disposition, there can be but a relative and therefore a limited Commandement of its reception: but to them who do receiv it, the institution is a perfect indispensable Commandement for the manner in all the essential parts, that is, in all which were intended in the institution. Now whence I argue, > Whatsoever is a part of Christs institution of the Sacrament is for ever obligatory to all that receive it.

> But the Sacrament in both kinds is a part of the institution of the Sacrament, Therefore,
> It must for ever oblige all that communicate or receive it.

The first proposition relies upon the nature of Divine institutions, which giving all the authority and warranty to the whole action, all its moral being and legitimation, must be the measure of all the natural being, or else it is not of God, but of man. Indignum dicit esse Domino qui aliter mysterium celebrat, quàm ab eo traditum est. Non enim potest devotus esse qui aliter præsumit quàm datum est ab Authore, saith S. Ambrose. S. Paul saith, he is unworthy of the Lord who celebrates the mystery otherwise then it was delivered by him. He cannot be devout who presumes otherwise then it was given by the Author: and to this purpose are those severe words of the Apostle, Si quis Evangelizaverit præter quod accepistis, if any man preach any other Gospel then what ye have received, let him be Anathema, that is, from Christ we have received it, 1 Cor. 11. Gal. 1.

and ſo as we receiv'd it, ſo we deliver it, and ſo it muſt deſcend upon you without the ſuperfetation of any new doctrine.

6. And indeed how is it poſſible to pretend a tradition from Chriſt by the hands of his Apoſtles, and the miniſtery of the Church if we celebrate it otherwiſe then Chriſt deliver'd it? Religioni noſtræ congruit, & timori, & ipſi loco, & officio Sacerdotii noſtri cuſtodire traditiones Dominicæ veritatem. Et quod prius videtur apud quoſdam erratum, Domino monente corrigere, ut cum in claritate ſua & majeſtate cæleſti venire cœperit, inveniat nos tenere quod monuit, obſervare quod docuit, facere quod fecit; they are the excellent words of S. Cyprian, and perfectly concluſive in this Article. For there were ſome who out of an impertinent pretenſion of ſobriety would not uſe wine, but water in the Sacrament; the inſtrument by which S. Cyprian confutes their folly, is a recourſe to the inſtitution. See, how did Chriſt deliver it: inventimur non obſervari à nobis quod mandatum eſt, niſi eadem quæ Dominus fecit, nos quoque faciamus. Unleſs we doe what Chriſt did, we doe not obſerve what he commanded; plainly implying that the inſtitution it ſelf was a Commandement: we muſt hold what he admoniſhed, we muſt obſerve what he taught, we muſt doe what he did. No: every thing done at the time of the inſtitution, but every thing of it. For (ſaies he) Chriſt did inſtitute it after Supper, but we in the morning. But every thing by which he did ſignifie what he did exhibite, and exhibite what he did promiſe, every ſuch thing was a part of the inſtitution, and cannot be changed. And therefore S. Paul when he inſtructs the Corinthians in the myſtery of the holy Euchariſt, uſes no demonſtration of the Rites but this. I have received this of the Lord: and This I have delivered unto you. Other things I will ſet in order when I come; That is, whatſoever I did not receive from the Lord Jeſus; whatſoever was not of his inſtitution, I have power to diſpoſe of; but not of any thing which he appointed.

1 Cor. 11. 23, 24.

7. Now there is no peradventure, but the Apoſtles underſtood this inſtitution to be a Commandement, ὅτι παρέδωκαν αὐτοῖς τοῦ Ἰησοῦ· ſaid Juſtin Martyr, ſpeaking of the diſtribution of the Bread and Wine, ἑκάστῳ τῶν παρόντων to every one that was preſent, he ſaies that the Apoſtles did deliver that Jeſus ſo commanded them. * For what Commandement have we to conſecrate in bread and wine? What precept is there that the conſecration ſhould be by a Prieſt? Nothing but the inſtitution. For if it be ſaid that Chriſt added the preceptive words of [Hoc facite,] This doe in remembrance of me. I reply, He did ſo. But [Hoc facite] is no Commandement of it ſelf, but when it is joined with, in mei commemorationem, in remembrance of me; That is, when ye remember me, then doe thus: So S. Paul more expreſsly, This doe as often as ye drink it in remembrance of me. Therefore Hoc facite will be but ill expounded to be a Commandement for the Prieſts conſecration, unleſs it borrow all its force from the whole inſtitution: for it plainly ſaies onely this; when ye remember me, then doe this which ye ſee me doe. But hoc facite does not ſignifie any particular Commandement, but that which is relative to the whole action; and all the diſcourſes of Mankind, can never extract any other ſignification.

Apol. 2.

1 Cor. 11. 25.

8. But 2. The Apoſtles receiv'd an expreſs Commandement; Drink ye all of this. If therefore Chriſt inſtituted the Sacrament for the whole Church, and that they were the repreſentatives of the whole body of Chriſt, Christ, then all the whole Church when they communicate, are bound by the Commandement to receive the Chalice. But if they did not represent the whole Church, then where shall we find a warranty that the people may receive at all? For if they receiv'd onely in the capacity of Clergy men, then the institution extends no further; and it is as much sacrilege for the people to eat and drink the Symbols as to offer at the consecration. But if they receiv'd in the capacity of Christians onely, then they receiv'd the Commandement of drinking in the chalice, for themselves and for all Christians.

9. And indeed the Apostles were not then Priests. True, say they of the Church of Rome, they were not; but James Payva a Portuguese in the Councel of Trent talked merrily, and said that the Apostles as Laicks received the Bread, but then when Christ said, Hoc facite, this doe, he made them Priests; and then gave them the Chalice as representatives of the Clergy, not of the people. But as merry a fancy as this seem'd then, it was found to be the best shift they had, and therefore upon better advice it was followed by Canisius, Suarez, Bellarmine, and divers others. But if this be stood upon, besides that it must be crusht to nothing by the preceding argument, the pretence it self crosses their own devices. For if it be said that the Apostles were made Priests by Hoc facite, spoken before the institution of the Chalice, then Hoc facite does not signifie, Offerte Sacrificium, and consequently cannot make them Priests, that is (with them) Sacrificers, For by their own doctrine to offer both kinds is necessary to its being a Sacrifice. Since therefore the first Hoc facite (which indeed is the onely one mention'd by the Evangelists) can but relate to the consecrating of the Bread, as the second (mention'd by S. Paul) does to the consecrating of the Chalice, either they are Priests without a power of Sacrifice, or the Sacrifice is compleat without the Chalice, or else they were not then made Priests when Christ first said, Hoc facite; and if they were by the second: besides that a reason cannot be fancied why the same words should, and should not effect so differing changes without difference in the voice, or in the action, or in the mystery, besides this I say, It is plain, that Christ reach'd the cup to them commanding them all to drink before he made them Priests, that is, they receiv'd the Chalice as representatives of the people: for being Laicks, at least till all that Ceremony was done, they did represent the people; and consequently as such, receiv'd a Commandement to drink. Let them chuse by what part they will be reproved. Every one of these overthrows their new doctrine, and all of them cannot be escaped.
* But let it be considered whether it be likely that Christ should at one time institute two Sacraments (for they pretend Ordination to be as very a Sacrament as the Lords supper) of so different Natures, and yet speak nothing of the use, or the reason, the benefit or the necessity of one of them; nor tell them that he did so, nor explicate the mystery, nor distinguish the Rite, or the words, but leave it to be supposed or conjectured by the most imperfect and improbable construction in the world. But suppose it; yet at least it must be confessed that the words which Christ us'd, and the same ritual, must in the Apostle ministery be able to effect the same grace: and if so, then a Priest hath power to ordain Priests; for he hath power to say, Hoc facite, in all the same meanings which Christ had, when he us'd them: and if this be not accepted, yet at least a Bishop may ordain all the congregations Priests if he please, by saying of one Mass; which are pretty fancies, and rare propositions in our Divinity.

10. To which I adde this consideration that if our Blessed Lord did by those words of Hoc facite make his Disciples Priests, then they were Priests before the Lord himself; for although he was designed for ever; yet he was consecrated on the Cross, there he entred upon his Priestly office; but officiates in that Office not on earth but in heaven, For if he were on earth he should not be a priest, saith S. Paul, Hebr. 8 4. therefore being consecrate on the Cross, he ascended into heaven to be there our priest for ever there making intercession for us. Now it were strange if the Apostles should be declar'd Priests before the Consecration, or first Sacerdotal action of their Lord; or that they should be Priests without the power of the Keys, without the comission to baptize in the Name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, for these were given afterwards. But this device is so very a dream, so groundless and aiery a phantasme, so weakly layed and imployed to such trifling purposes, that it needs no further an inquiry into it, it was raised to serve the end of this question, to answer an objection, and pretends no strength of its own, neither can it weaken that which hath; and that it is indeed onely pretended for a shift, and intended to operate no further appears in this manifestly; because if the Apostles did drink of the Chalice in the capacity of being Priests, then it ought to be followed at least so farre, and all the Priests that are present ought to receive the Chalice, which because they doe not in the Church of Rome, it is apparent they prevaricate the institution, and that they may exclude the Laity from the cup, they use their Clergy as bad, when themselves doe not officiate.

11. 3. This trifling pretence being removed, it remains that the words of institution, Drink ye all of this, be also the words of a Commandement; and although they were spoken to the Apostles onely, as being onely present, yet the precept must equally concerne all Christians and Disciples of Christ. Matth. 26 41. Just like those of Watch and pray lest ye fall into temptation; and unless ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the Kingdome of Matth. 18. 3. God; which were spoken onely in the presence of the Apostles: But as these precepts and moral Rules concerne all Christians; soe doe the words of institution of the H. Sacrament and Commandement of [Drink ye all of this] For, Oportet cœnam Dominicam esse communem, quia ille omnibus Discipulis suis In 1 Cor. 11. qui aderant, æqualiter tradidit Sacramenta, said S. Hierom. The Lords Supper is common to all, and so ought to be; because our Lord did equally deliver Ration l 4 c 1. it to all that were present: and upon this very account Durandus affirmes: In primitiva Ecclesia singulis diebus omnes qui celebrationi missarum intererant communicare solebant, eò quòd Apostoli omnes de calice biberunt, Domino dicente, Bibite ex eo omnes. In the Primitive Church all that were present did every day receive, because the Apostles did all drink of the Chalice, and the Lord said, Drink ye all of this.

12. And this appears beyond all contradiction to have been so intended. So Ep. ad Philad. S. Ignatius; there is one bread broken to all, καὶ ἓν ποτήριον τοῖς ὅλοις διανεμηθέν, and one Chalice distributed to all, and there is no difference in this between the priest Sup. 1 Cor 11. and the people, said S. Chrysostom; and it is evident that S. Paul gives the same & sup 2 Cor. hom. 18. Commandement of drinking the Chalice, as of eating the Bread; six times distinctly mentioning both the Symbols, and directing the Rule and the pre- 1 Cor. 1. 1, 2. cepts of eating and drinking to all that are sanctified in Christ Jesus, even to all 1 Cor. 11. who are to examine themselves; for let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread and drink of that cup: and that it was so the custome of the Church, and their Doctrine that all are to receive the Chalice, that there was no no Scruple made by the Church concerning it, we are fairly induc'd to a beleef; by the addition made to the Greek text of 1 Cor. 10. 17. by the Vulgar Latin; for whereas it is in the Greek [we all partake of the same bread] the Vulgar Latin addes [& de uno Calice] and of the same cup. This I the rather note becauſe the Jeſuits of Colein did uſe this for an argument of the half Communion; becauſe when S. Paul had ſpoken of the conſecration he mentions breaking bread, and drinking the cup; but when he ſpeaks of ſumption or participation, he onely mentions the bread, now ſuppoſing that: yet that defect is ſupplyed by the Vulgar Latin, the Author of which knowing the univerſal cuſtome of the Church and the doctrine of it, ſupplyed that out of the ſentence of the Church which is not in the Greek text. Though if it had not been yet the argument would have been juſt nothing, as being a concluſion drawn from a particular Negative in one place; and againſt his cuſtom in other places, and beſides the inſtitution.

13. For the doctrine and practice of the Church is ſo notorious in this Article that in the Greek Church there was never any variety in it; and to this day it is uſed as it was in the beginning and in all the intermedial Ages: and in the Latin Church for a thouſand years it was not altered; Nay to this day the Church of Rome ſings in the Hymne upon Corpus Chriſti day,

Dedit fragilibus corporis ferculum,
Dedit & triſtibus ſalutis poculum,
Dicens, Accipite quod trado vaſculum:
Omnes ex eo bibite.

He gave his body to be the food of the weak, and the Cup of ſalvation to the ſorrowful, ſaying, Take this Veſſel that I reach unto you, Drink ye all of this. Indeed it was often attempted to be chang'd upon the intereſt of divers Hereſies and ſuperſtitious fancies, and rare emergencies. For,

14. 1. It was attempted to be omitted in the time of S. Cyprian when ſome impertinent people would have water onely; But not the Chalice of the Lords inſtitution in the fruit of the vine: but theſe mens folly went not far, for being confuted and reprov'd by S. Cyprian in a letter to his Brother Cæcilius, I find no mention of them afterwards. Lib. 2. ep. 3.

15. 2. It was attempted to be chang'd upon occaſion of the Eremites, who comming but ſeldome to Church could but ſeldome receive the Chalice, but deſiring more frequently to communicate, they carryed the conſecrated bread with them into their cells, and when they had a mind to it, in that imperfect manner did imitate the Lords Supper. That they did ſo is certain, that they had no warrant for ſo doing is as certain; and therefore their doing ſo can be no warrant to us to doe as they did, much leſs ought it to be pretended in juſtification of the denying the Chalice to the whole Laity, when they deſire it and may have it. However this unwarrantable cuſtome of the Eremites was taken away by the firſt Councel of Toledo in the year 390. and afterwards again forbidden in the year 500. by the Fathers met in Councel at Cæſar Auguſta. The words of the Councel of Toledo are theſe; Si quis autem acceptam à Sacerdote Euchariſtiam non ſumpſerit, velut ſacrilegus propellatur: but this is fuller explicated in that of Cæſar Auguſta, Euchariſtiæ gratiam ſi quis probatur acceptam non conſumpſiſſe in Eccleſia, anathema ſit in perpetuum: ſo that under Can. 14.

the pain of a perpetual curſe, and under the crime of Sacrilege they were commanded to ſpend the Euchariſtical Symbols in the Church; and this took from them all pretence of the neceſſity in ſome caſe of not receiving the chalice.

16. 3. In the time of P. Leo the firſt, the Manichees who abſtained from wine as an abhomination, would yet thruſt themſelves into the ſocieties of the faithful, and pretend to be right beleevers; but S. Leo diſcover'd them by their not receiving the Chalice in the holy Euchariſt; and whereas they would have receiv'd in one kind onely, he calls it ſacrilege; and reproves them with the words of S. Paul; Mark them which cauſe diviſions amongſt you, and offences contrary to the doctrine which ye have received. This was about the year 449.

Serm. 4. de Quadrag.

Rom. 16.

17. 4. A while after, about the yeare 490. Some had gotten ſome ſuperſtitious fancy by the end; and out of reverence to the Holy Sacrament, or ſome other device of their own, they thought it fit to abſtain from the conſecrated Chalice: but P. Gelaſius made ſhort work with them; he condemn'd their ſuperſtition and gave ſentence, Aut integra Sacramenta percipiant, aut ab integris arceantur, Either all or none: Drive them from the H. Bread, if they refuſe the Sacrament of the Lords bloud.

Can. comper. de conſecrat. diſt. 2.

18. 5. The Church had ſometime in extraordinary caſes, as in communicating infants or dying people, dipt the holy Bread into the Chalice, and ſo miniſtred the Sacrament: upon occaſion of which ſome fell in love with the trick, and would have had it ſo in ordinary miniſtrations: we find it mention'd in the Hiſtory of Serapion in Euſebius, and in S. Cyprian 4. de lapſis, & in Proſper'. But againſt this breach P. Julius oppos'd himſelf and ſtood in the gap, declaring it to be againſt the Divine order and Apoſtolical inſtitutions, and contrary to the doctrine of the Goſpel and of the Apoſtles and the cuſtome of the Church; and his words are remarkable to ſhow from whence this Article is to be adjuſted and determin'd: Non difficile hoc ab ipſo fonte veritatis probatur, in qua ordinata ipſa Sacramentorum myſteria proceſſerunt; The very ordination or inſtitution of the Sacrament is the fountain from whence we are to derive the truth in this inquiry. But when this Superſtition was again reviv'd about the year 580. the now mention'd decree of P. Julius was repeated in the third Councel of Braccara, and all ſet right again according to the perpetual cuſtome of the Church, and the inſtitution of our B. Lord, and their pretence (which was leſt they ſhould ſpill any thing of the holy Chalice) laid aſide as trifling and ſuperſtitious.

De conſecr. diſt. 2. Can. Ego omne.

Ep. ad Epiſc. Aegypt.

19. 6. And yet after all theſe motions made by Hereticks and ſuperſtitious perſons, and ſo many cautions, ſuppreſſions, and decrees againſt them; about the year 920. the order of Cluniack Monks did communicate with the Bread dipt in the Chalice as Caſſander reports: and about the yeer 1120. it was permitted in ſome Churches ſo to doe: For by this time the world was ſo rude and ignorant that they knew little of the myſteries of Religion, and car'd leſs; ſo that for the danger of effuſion of the holy wine they in ſome places choſe that expedient: which although it was upon great reaſon condemned by P. Julius and the Councel of Braccara, yet it is a great argument that they ſtill beleev'd it neceſſary to communicate under both Symbols.

L. 2. c. 35.

7. But

20. 7. But about the time that the School-men began to rule the chair, this danger of ſpilling the Chalice wrought ſo much in their wiſe heads that they began about the year 1250. in ſome Churches to leave out all uſe of the Chalice, excepting to the Prieſts and ſome Great men who would be careful not to ſpill. This was but in ſome Churches ſaid Aquinas; and it was permitted to all the Prieſts preſent, de quibus præſumitur quòd magis ſint cauti; and to ſome Grandees of the people too for the ſame reaſon, as we find in Richard Middleton, Innocent the fourth, and Petrus de Tarantaſia. 3 part. ſum. Q. 80. art. 12. 4. d. 11. qu. 3. art. 3. qu. 1.

21. 8. But by little and little the abuſe went further, and grew confirm'd, and Miracles pretended and invented, as Alexander of Ales reports, to ſtop the outcries of certain Religious who were extremely troubled at the loſs of the Chalice: and now at laſt it became the general cuſtome of the Weſtern Churches; and it grew ſcandalous to deſire it; and it was eſtabliſhed into a doctrine in the Councel of Conſtance, and the inſtitution of Chriſt, and the cuſtome of the Primitive Church were openly defied, taking notice of and ſo laid aſide, and Anathema pronounced on them that ſhould inſiſt upon their right, or deny whole Chriſt to be under each kind in the Councel of Trent; and ſo it abides at this day.

22. The queſtion being now reduc'd to this ſhort iſſue; whether under each kind whole Chriſt be received; it is not unworthy a ſhort inquiry, concerning the truth, and concerning the conſequence of it.

23. 1. For the truth. I conſider that the effect of external rituals and ceremonials cannot be diſputed Philoſophically; as we inquire into the portions of effect which every herb hath in an infuſion; but we are to take and uſe them in the ſimplicity of their inſtitution; leaving them under that ſecrecy of their own myſteriouſneſs in which they were left in their firſt appointment and publication. The Apoſtle explicating the myſteries of our Religion, ſaith, that Chriſt was delivered (meaning unto death) for our ſins, and was raiſed again for our juſtification; and yet that we are juſtified by his bloud. Upon theſe accounts we can ſay that by Chriſts death and by his reſurrection we are juſtified, and therefore we are to be partakers of both; but becauſe we are juſtified by faith in his bloud, it will at no hand follow, we may let alone our faith, or neglect to procure our part in his reſurrection. So it is in the Symbols Euchariſtical: ſuppoſing it had been ſaid of the Bread, This is Chriſt, or This is the death of Chriſt, and the ſame ſaid of the Chalice; yet one alone is not ſufficient to be received when both are inſtituted: for as all the myſteries of our redemption are effective to our pardon and ſalvation; ſo are both the Symbols of the Euchariſt to our reception of Chriſt; and Baptiſme or abſolution may better be pretended to the excluſion of the whole Euchariſt, then the ſufficiency of bread to the excluſion of the Chalice; for remiſſion of ſins is perfectly the grace of Baptiſme; and thoſe ſins return not, but in the caſe of Apoſtacy: but what is the effect of bread alone is no where told, but that it is the commemoration or remembrance of the broken body of Chriſt, and the communication of that body: But then the chalice is alſo the remembrance of Chriſts bloud powred forth, and the exhibition of that which is for the remiſſion of ſins: and how theſe two doe work that in us which we hope for, we know not, but that they work as myſteries and Sacraments doe work, but not as herbs, or natural agents, that we may beleeve. Rom. 4. 25. Rom. 5. 9.

2. I

24. 2. I conſider that when Chriſt appointed to the two Symbols two diſtinct ſignifications, and that we beleeve that the Sacraments exhibite to worthy communicants what they repreſent to all, it muſt be certain that all Chriſt, that is, that all the benefits of Chriſt are not conveyed by each, which are conveyed by both, becauſe, as they ſignifie ſo they exhibite; but they do not each ſignifie what both together doe. The breaking of the body does not ſignifie the effuſion of the bloud; neither does the ſhedding of the bloud ſignifie the breaking the body: and to think that the reduplication of the Symbols is ſuperfluous, is to charge Chriſt with impertinency; and if it be not ſuperfluous, then there is ſomething of real advantage by both, that is not in each. I will not venture to aſſign to each their portion of effect: for what they have they have not naturally, but by Divine donation and appointment, and therefore I will not take notice that the ſame chalice is repreſentative and effective of union and charity, (though that is uſual enough in ſocieties and friendſhips, L. 6 ep. 11. ——Pylades, Marce, bibebat idem.)

but this I ſhall obſerve that the whole effect of the Sacrament is equally attributed to the worthy receiving the chalice as to that of the bread; and therefore S. Remy caus'd theſe verſes to be written on the chalice,

Hauriat hinc populus vitam de ſanguine ſacro,
Inflicto æternus quem fudit vulnere Chriſtus.

let the people from hence draw live iſſuing from the wounds of Chriſt: now whatſoever effect is attributed to one is not in excluſion of the other: but in concomitance with it: and therefore as it would be a ſtrange folly to diſpute what benefit we receive by Chriſts fleſh diſtinctly, and how much of our redemption is wrought by his bloud, and it could have no uſe and no certainty: ſo it would be as ſtrange to ſay there is ſo much diſtinctly in the H. bread, ſo much in the wine; and it is worſe to attribute to one that which can be employed to exclude the other: and it is certain there can be nothing ſaid of advantage that either one or the other hath; and therefore the chalice may exclude the bread as well as the H. bread the chalice, both alike, that is, indeed neither.

25. But it is to be obſerved that in this inquiry the queſtion cannot be concerning the receiving Chriſt; but of receiving the Sacraments of Chriſt, of his body and of his bloud. For we receive Chriſt in Baptiſme, and we receive Chriſt by faith; and yet nevertheleſs we are to receive the Sacraments of Chriſts body and bloud: and therefore ſuppoſe we did receive Chriſt in the Holy bread, yet that bread is but the Sacrament of his broken body; and therefore we muſt alſo receive the Sacrament of his bloud ſpilt for us: or elſe we omit to receive the one half of the Sacrament: and if the queſtion were onely about receiving Chriſt, we might pretend the whole Sacrament to be needleſs, becauſe a ſpiritual communion, and faith alone will do that work, but yet faith alone, or the Spiritual communion does not give us the Sacrament, nor obey Chriſt in this inſtance, nor commemorate and repreſent his death, which is the duty here inquir'd of, and here enjoin'd.

26. And therefore the dream of the Church of Rome that he that receives the body, receives alſo the bloud, becauſe by concomitance, the bloud is received in the body, is neither true nor pertinent to this queſtion. Not true, becauſe the Euchariſt being the Sacrament of the Lords death, that is, of his body body broken, and his bloud powred forth, the taking of the Sacrament of the body does not by concomitance include the bloud; because the body is here Sacramentally represented as slain and separate from bloud: and that is so notorious that some superstitious persons A. D. 490. refus'd the Chalice, because (said they) the body of Christ represented in the holy Sacrament exangue est, it is without bloud; but now the Romanists refuse the Chalice because the body is not without bloud: they were both amiss; for it is true the body is represented Sacramentally as killed, and therefore without bloud, which had ran out at the wounds; and therefore concomitance is an idle and an impertinent dream: but although the body is without bloud in his death; yet because the effusion of the bloud is also Sacramentally to be represented, therefore they should not omit the Chalice.

27. But as to them of the Roman Church; if the bloud be in the body by Concomitance, and therefore they who receive the body receive also the bloud; then they who sacrifice the body do also sacrifice the bloud; and then it will be no more necessary to celebrate in both kinds then to communicate in both, and indeed though the Roman Schools will not endure that the sacrifice (as they call it) or the consecration should be in one kind, yet Volaterranus saies that P. Innocent the eighth gave leave to the Norvegians to sacrifice in bread onely: certain it is the Priest may as well doe so, as the people receive in one kind, for the people doe in their manner as much celebrate the death of Christ as the Priest, nor he alone, nor they alone, but the whole action is the due celebration however the argument of concomitance concludes equally: against the celebration in both kinds, as against the participation; and why the Priest should be oblig'd to drink the chalice and cannot be excus'd by Concomitance, and yet the people are not oblig'd, but are excus'd by that pretension, abating the reasons of interest, cannot easily be imagined.

28. Certain it is they had other thoughts in the Councel of Turon; for when they considered the necessities of sick and dying people, they appointed the consecrated bread to be sopp'd in the consecrated Chalice; adding this reason, Ut veraciter Presbyter dicere possit, Corpus & Sanguis Domini nostri Jesu Christi proficiat tibi in remissionem peccatorum & vitam æternam: that the Priest may say truly, The body and bloud of our Lord Jesus Christ be profitable unto you for the remission of your sins and unto life eternal. If they had then understood the device of Concomitance, they would have known that the Priest might have said so truly, without sopping the H. Bread in the chalice: but the good Fathers had not yet learn'd the new Metaphysicks.

29. 2. Now for the consequence of this pretension; I consider that let the thing be as true as the interested persons would have it; yet it is not well that we should dispute against a Divine institution upon a pretence of our vain arguings. The Apostles with great simplicity took in both kinds at that time in which onely the device of concomitance was or could be true, for then when they receiv'd it the bloud was in the body of Christ; but it was Sacramental of the bloud to be powred out the next day; however they obeyed with simplicity and without inquiry, and never feared spilling, nor argued, nor sought excuses; such simplicity would equally become us: and as to the usefulness of receiving in both kinds, although it will ill becom any man to argue concerning the usefulness of a Divine institution, & to pretend excuses against Christ, upon the account of a Philosophy of their own invention, is very much unlike the ſpirit of humility and wiſedome and obedience which ought to be the inveſtiture of a Chriſtians heart and the tiar of his head, yet I obſerve that even in this particular the diſadvantage is not little.

10. For if receiving the Sacrament be of any advantage to ſouls, then it is certain he that does not receive it is a loſer; and yet he that does not receive the Chalice does not receive the Sacrament, but a peece of it onely; Now in Sacraments half is as good as none: as he who ſhould onely dip a child in pure water, and yet not invocate the Trinity ſhould doe nothing at all with his half Baptiſme; ſo it is certain that the effect of a Sacrament is not imparted by a half Communion. And therefore Alexander of Ales ſaid well, Sumpto hoc Sacramento digne in utraque ſpecie major eſt effectus unius corporis myſtici cum capite, quàm ſumpto ſub altera: and in another place he ſaies to receive under both kinds is majoris meriti tum ratione augmentationis devotionis, tum ratione fidei dilatationis actualis, tum ratione ſumptionis completioris: it is of greater merit or value, there is a greater myſtical Union between the head and the members, a greater increaſe of devotion, a larger and more actual extent of faith, and a more compleat Sacramental reception of Chriſt himſelf. To the ſame purpoſe there are good things ſpoken in Albertus Magnus[a], and in Thomas Aquinas[b], Bonaventure[c], and Petrus de Palude[d] and divers others, all agreeing that one alone does not make a Sacrament, but a peece of one, and that there is advantage by both kinds which is not to be had in one: which advantage if it be ſpiritual (as it is, if it be at all) then he that robs the people of a ſpiritual good which our Bleſſed Lord hath deſigned for them and left unto them, is ſacrilegious and prophane; it is uncharitable and it is impious. I ſay it is impious.

31. For it is not to be deſpiſed that our B. Lord gave this Sacrament as his laſt will and Teſtament; and though he gave it in his body and bloud, yet he expreſſed onely the New teſtament in his bloud; and for any Church to violate the Teſtament of our B. Lord, however men may make no great matter of it; yet it will receive a puniſhment according as God ſets a value upon it; and he that ſhall pluck one ſeal from a Teſtament, and ſay that one is as good as two, when two were put to it by the Teſtator, cannot be excus'd by ſaying it was nothing but a formality and a ceremony. Gods ceremonies are bound upon us by Gods Commandement; and what he hath made to be a ſign, does ſignifie and exhibit too: and as the braſen ſerpent though it was but a type or ſhadow of the H. Crucifixe; yet did real cures; ſo can the Symbols and Sacraments of the crucifixion being hallowed by the Divine inſtitution, and confirmed by his power; and therefore a violation here is not to be called onely a queſtion in a ceremony; it is a ſubſtantial part of the Chriſtian religion, it is the ſanction of the New Teſtament, the laſt will of our dying Lord. Now if it be but a mans teſtament, ſaith S. Paul, yet no man diſannulleth or addeth thereto: and therefore to diſannul or leſſen a portion of the Teſtament of the Son of God muſt needs be a high impiety. Teſtamentum quia individuum eſt pro parte agnoſci & pro parte repudiari non poſſit, ſaies the law, L. 7. jus noſtr. D. de reg. iur. If you pudiate a part of the will, you muſt renounce it all; If you permit not to the people the bloud of Chriſt, you hinder them from having a part in the death of Chriſt, ſo far as lies in you. Adde to this; that this Holy myſtery being acknowledged by all to be the moſt myſterious ſolemnity of the religion, and by the Church of Rome affirm'd to be a proper ſacrifice, and ſo contended for; it would be remembred that our B. Saviour did adapt, and fit this rite to the usages and customes both of Jews and Gentiles; amongst whom laws, and societies, and contracts and sacrifices were made solemn by effusion and drinking of bloud; and instead of bloud (amongst the more civil Nations) they drink wine; and by that were suppos'd partakers even of the bloud of the Sacrifice. Ἀπὸ τούτου γε φασὶ μεθύειν ὠνομάσθαι (saies Philo) ὅτι μὴ τὸ πιεῖν ἕνεκα τοῦ μὴ τοῖς θυσίοις ὀνεῖδος. To be drunk, viz. in the Greek hath its name from their drinking wine after their sacrifices: and with this Custome among the Gentiles, and with the Paschal ceremonie of this nature amongst the Jews our Blessed Lord complying looses the wisedome and prudence of it; if the Priest shall sacrifice, and the people drink none of the bloud of the sacrifice, or that which ritually and Sacramentally represents it. The covenant of the Gospel, the covenant which God made with us our Blessed Saviour established and ratified with bloud: Wine was made to represent and exhibite it: He therefore that takes this away, takes away the very Sacramentality of the mysterie, and without bloud there is no remission. For as he that gives bread and no water does not nourish the body but destroy it: so it is in the Blessed Sacrament: for (that I may use S. Austins expression which Paschasius and Algerus in this Article did much insist upon) Nec caro sine sanguine, nec sanguis sine carne jure communicatur. Totus enim homo ex duabus constans substantiis redimitur, & ideo carne simul & sanguine saginatur. Neither the flesh without the bloud, nor the bloud without the flesh is rightly communicated. For the whole man consisting of two substances is redeem'd, and therefore nourish'd both with the flesh and the bloud. Καὶ ὁ καθάπαξ ὅτι τὸ παλαιὰς, τὰ μὲν ὁ ἱερεὺς ἔπεσε, τὰ δὲ ὁ ἀρχομένου καὶ δέμας ἐκ μιᾶς τῷ λαῷ μετέχειν ᾧ μετεῖχεν ὁ ἱερεύς, ἀλλὰ πᾶσιν ἓν σῶμα προκεῖται καὶ ποτήριον ἕν. It is not now as it was in the old Testament where the Priest eat one portion, the Prince another, and the people another; here it is alike to all, the same body and the same chalice is to all. I end this inquiry with the saying of S. Cyprian, Si ne unum quidem ex minimis mandatis legis solvere debet, multo minus ex his magnis mandatis pertinentibus ad ipsum Dominicæ passionis & nostræ redemptionis Sacramentum fas est ullum infringere, vel humanâ traditione mutare. If it be not permitted to break one of the least Commandements of the Law, much less is it to be endured, to break any one, or by humane tradition to change any belonging to the Sacrament of our Lords passion and of our redemption: and therefore if ever any Sect or any single person was guilty of the charge, it is highly to be imputed to the Church of Rome, that they teach for doctrine the Commandements of men; and make the Commandement of God of none effect by their tradition.

Chrysost. hom. 18. in 2 Cor.

L. 2. ep. 3.

RULE

Rule 10.

If the ſence of a Law be dubious, we are ſometimes to expound it by Liberty, ſometimes by Reſtraint.

1. ALthough all the Laws of Jeſus Chriſt are ſo legible in the ſenſe intended that all good men being plac'd in their proper circumſtances conducted by the Divine providence, making uſe of all their prepared and ready inſtruments can certainly read the prime intention and deſign of God, yet becauſe ſome laws are ſo combin'd with matter and twiſted with material caſes, ſo intricated by the accidents of men and the inveſtiture of actions, that they caſt a cloud upon the light of Gods word, and a veil upon the Guide of our lives; and becauſe the ſenſe of words doe change, and very often words cannot be equal with things, it comes to paſs that the laws are capable of differing ſenſes; when therefore any thing of this Nature happens; the firſt ſenſe of the words is either to be inlarged or reſtrained according to the following meaſures.

In what caſes the ſtricter ſenſe of the laws of Chriſt is to be followed.

2. 1. When the duty enjoined by the law is in deliberation, and is to be done, we are to uſe reſtraint, and take the ſeverer ſenſe of the Law. The reaſon is becauſe that is the ſurer way, and hath in it no inconvenience or impoſſibility; but being it is the matter of choice, in all deliberation for the future we muſt give ſentence for God, and for the intereſt of Religion Thus when it is commanded we ſhould judge our ſelves that we be not iudged of the Lord; in the inquiry which every penitent man makes concerning the extenſion of the duty of judging our ſelves, , if the queſtion be whether judging our ſelves means onely to condemne our ſelves for having ſinned, and to confeſs our ſelves juſtly lyable to the Divine judgment; or does it alſo mean, to puniſh our ſelves, and by putting our own ſentence againſt our ſin into a ſevere execution of that ſentence upon our ſelves by corporal inflictions; he that can no otherwiſe be determin'd in the queſtion, can ſafely proceed by choſing the ſeverer ſide: for there is no loſs in it, no omiſſion, it contains all that any man can think to be required, and therefore hath in it prudence aud charity, caution and regard, to God and to himſelf.

3. 2. This is not to be underſtood onely in caſe there is a doubt no otherwiſe to be reſolved but by the collateral advantage of the ſurer ſide; but this ſeverer ſenſe of the law is of it ſelf moſt reaſonable to be choſen, as being the intended ſenſe and deſign of the Lawgiver, who certainly puts no poſitive meaſures to his own laws of love and duty. For ſince the great deſign of the law is ſuch a perfection which muſt for ever be growing in this world, and can never here arrive to its ſtate and period, that ſenſe which ſets us moſt forward is the moſt intended; and therefore this way is not onely to quiet the doubt, but to governe and to rule the Conſcience: This is not onely the ſurer way, but the onely way that is directly intended. It is agreeable to the meaſures of charity, or the love of God, which is to have no other bounds, but even the best we can in the measures of God and the infirmities and capacities of man.

4. 3. In the interpretation of the laws of Christ, the strict sense is to be followed when the laws relate to God and to religion, and contain in them direct matter of piety and glorifications of God, or charity to our Neighbour, because in them the further we goe, the neerer we are to God, and we are not at all to be stopp'd in that progression till we are at our journeys end, till we are in the state of comprehension. To this purpose are those words of Ben-Sirach, When you glorifie the Lord, exalt him as much as you can, for even yet will he farre exceed, and when you exalt him put forth all your strength, and be not weary, for you can never goe farre enough. who hath seen him that he might tell us, and who can magnifie him as he is? There are hid greater things yet then these be, for we have seen but a few of his works, meaning, that although we cannot glorifie God sufficiently for the works of power and mercy which we see and feel, yet because there are very many works which we see not, and infinite numbers and seas of glories above the clouds, which we perceive not and cannot understand, the onely measures of Religion and the love of God which we are to take, is to pray continually, to love God alwayes, to serve him without end, to be zealous beyond all measures, excepting those of duty and prudence, to be religious without a limit, alwaies to desire, alwaies to endeavour, never to rest as long as we can work, never to give over as long as any thing is unfinish'd, and consequent or Symbolical to all this, that in all disputes of Religion we chuse the sense of love, not of weariness, that we doe not contend for the lesser measures, but strive in all our faculties and desire beyond their strength, and propound Christ for our precedent, and heaven for our reward, and infinity for our measures toward which we are to set forth by our active and quick endeavour, and to which we are to reach by our constancy and desires, our love and the divine acceptance. Eccius. 43. 30, 31, 32.

When the lawes of Christ are to be expounded to a sense of ease and liberty?

5. If to the sense of the duty there be a collateral and indirect burden and evil appendage, and the alleviating of that burden is to be an ingredient into the interpretation of the law, and the direct duty is to be done in such measures as may doe the most good with suffering the least evil. This happens in two cases:

6. 1. If the strict and severer sense of the law be too great for the state and strength of the man, that is, if it be apt to make him despair, to make him throw away his burden: to make him tire, to be weary of, and to hate religion, his infirmities are to be pitied, and the severest sense of the law is not to be exacted of him. Apices juris non sunt jus, say the Lawyers: The little punctilios and minutes of law are not law; because if our duty be extended to every little tittle of duty it were necessary that our observation and attendance should be as particular and punctual; but because that cannot alwaies be actual and intent, particular and incumbent, those things which insensibly pass by the observation of a diligent watchful person, doe also inculpably passe by the man. But of this I have already given accounts in another place*. For the present I further consider, that charity being the great end of the law, and every law being a deſign of making a man happy, every Commandement of God is then beſt underſtood when it is made to doe moſt good, and reſcued from being an occaſion of evil. The Government of Jeſus Chriſt is moſt paternal and ſerene: his Rod is not heavy, his Commandements are not grievous, his bands are not ſnares; but they are holineſs, and they are liberty, they are glory to God, and good will towards men.

7. But this at no hand means that any material or integral part of duty can be omitted, and the omiſſion indulg'd in complyance with any mans infirmity or danger, for the law is to be our meaſure, our weakneſſes cannot be the meaſure of the integrity of the law; That infirmity by which we omit any part of duty is a ſtate of ſin; and God who knew all our infirmities and poſſibilities or impoſſibilities of obedience, complyed ſufficiently in the Sanction of the law, and impos'd no more burden then was even with our powers, and therefore for what remains we muſt ſtoop our ſhoulder and bear the burden which God's wiſedome made reaſonable and tolerable, and our neceſſity and intereſt makes unavoidable, and love will make eaſie and delectable.

8. But the burden which can be leſſen'd is the burden of degrees of intenſion or any thing which conſiſts not in a mathematical point, but is capable of growth: whatſoever is of ſuch a nature as is alwaies to increaſe in this life, in that ſuch abatements may be made as will fit the perſon and the ſtate; and no man is to be quarreld at for degrees in the beginnings, or in the firſt progreſſions of his piety, only he is to be invited on by proper and fair inducements, and if he ſtands ſtill alwaies as he is to be ſuſpected for want of love, ſo he is to be warned of his danger, and thruſt forward by the memory of the beſt examples. Thus it may not upon any terms be permitted to any weak perſon to doe an act of injuſtice, to blaſpheme God, to reproach his Father, to be wanton, he may not be allowed to ſlander his Brother, to neglect his children, to deſpiſe his wife, to part from her becauſe he is weary of her, for fear the not indulging any thing of this nature to him ſhould provoke him to anger againſt the Religion. We may not give eaſie anſwers in caſes of Conſcience, or promiſe heaven to them that live evil lives, for fear that our ſeverity ſhould make them forſake our Communion and go to the Roman Church; that is, we muſt not allow any man to do one evil to hinder him from another, or give leave to him to break one Commandement that we may preſerve another. But of this I have already given more particular accounts*. That which at preſent I intend is, that no ſin or omiſſion of duty is to be permitted, no law of Chriſt is to be expounded to comply with us againſt God, but when a leſs ſevere ſenſe is within the limits of duty, that our weakneſſes are to be complyed withall is affirm'd as being moſt charitable and neceſſary. Thus if it be inquired whether our ſorrow for our ſins ought to be punitive and vindictive, ſharp and ſenſible as the perception of any temporal evil, as the ſorrow of a Mother for the death of her onely child this being a queſtion of degrees which cannot conſiſt in an indiviſible point, is never limited and determinate; any degree that can conſiſt with the main duty may be permitted to him whoſe neceſſity requires ſuch indulgence; and if he be ſorrowful in ſuch a degree as to move him to pray paſſionately and perſeveringly for pardon, to beget in him a wiſe and a wary caution againſt temptation, to produce in him hatred againſt ſin, and dereliction of it, a war and a victory, the death of ſin, and the life of righteouſneſs, the penitent is not to be prejudic'd by the degree of his ſorrow, or the thickneſs of its edge, and the Commandement is ſo to be expounded, as to ſecure the duty and ſecure the man man too: and if he be told that a less degree of sorrow then the supreme will not serve his turne, and that the Commandement is to be expounded in the greatest and severest measures, he that finds this impossible to him, will let it all alone, for as good never a whit as never the better; but then, he that tells him so, hath laid a snare for his Brothers foot, and binds upon his shoulder a burden too heavy for him. For to what purpose can we imagine that there should be a latitude in the Commandement, and yet no use to be made of the least degree? and if God cherishes the babes in Christ, and is pleas'd in every step of our progression, then it is certain that they who are but babes are to be treated accordingly, and the Commandement is to be acted by the proportions of the man. * But then if the question be concerning the integrity of the Repentance, he that is troubled at heart because he is told that a resolution to leave sin is not enough, that without restitution there is no repentance; he that will kick at Religion because it requires all the duties which integrate the Commandement, is not to be complyed with, nor permitted to his folly. * I have read of a Gentleman who being on his deathbed and his Confessor searching and dressing of his wounded Soul, was found to be oblig'd to make restitution of a considerable summe of Money, with the diminution of his estate. His Confessor found him desirous to be sav'd, a lover of his religion, and yet to have a kindness for his estate, which he desir'd might be intirely transmitted to his beloved Heir: he would serve God with all his heart, and repented him of his sin, of his rapine and injustice, he begg'd for pardon passionately, he humbly hop'd for mercy, he resolv'd in case he did recover, to live strictly, to love God, to reverence his Priests, to be charitable to the poor; but to make restitution he found impossible to him, and he hop'd the Commandement would not require it of him, and desir'd to be releeved by an easy and a favourable interpretation, for it is ten thousand pities so many good actions and good purposes should be in vain, but it is worse, infinitely worse, if the man should perish. What should the Confessor doe in this case? shall not the man be releeved; and his piety be accepted? or shall the rigor and severity of the Confessor, and his scrupulous fears and impertinent niceness cast away a Soul either in future misery, or present discomfort; neither one nor other was to be done; and the good man was onely to consider what God had made necessary, not what the vices of his penitent and his present follies should make so. Well! the Priest insists upon his first resolution, Non dimittitur peccatum nisi restituatur ablatum: The sick man could have no ease by the loss of a duty. The poor Clinick desires the Confessor to deal with his Son and try if he could be made willing that his Father might goe to Heaven at the charge of his Son, which when he had attempted, he was answer'd with extreme rudenesses and injurious language; which caused great trouble to the Priest and to the dying Father. At last the religious man found out this device, telling his penitent, that unless by corporal penances there could be made satisfaction in exchange for restitution he knew no hopes, but because the profit of the estate which was oblig'd to restitution was to descend upon the Son, he thought something might be hop'd if by way of commutation the Son would hold his finger in a burning candle for a quarter of an hour. The glad Father being overjoyed at this loophole of eternity, this glimpse of heaven, and the certain retaining of the whole estate, called to his Son, told him the condition and the advantages to them both, making no question but he would gladly undertake the penance. But the Son with indignation replyed he would not endure so much torture to save the whole estate. To which the Priest espying his advantage made this quick return to the Old man, Sir, if your Son will not for a quarter of an hour endure the pains of a burning finger to ſave your Soul, will you to ſave a portion of the eſtate for him endure the flames of Hell to eternal ages? The unreaſonableneſs of the odds, and the ungratefulneſs of the Son, and the importunity of the Prieſt, and the fear of Hell, and the indiſpenſable neceſſity of reſtitution awakened the old Man from his lethargy, and he bowed himſelf to the Rule, made reſtitution, and had hopes of pardon and preſent comfort.

9. 2. The other caſe in which the law is to be expounded to the ſenſe of eaſe and liberty is when the queſtion is concerning outward actions, or the cruſt and outſides of Religion. For the Chriſtian Religion being wholly Spiritual, and being miniſtred to by bodily exerciſes, and they being but ſignifications of the inward, not at all pleaſing to God for themſelves, but as they edifie, inſtruct, or doe advantages to men, they are in all caſes to be exacted but in ſuch proportions as can conſiſt with charity, which is the life of Religion: and therefore if a Soul be in danger to be tempted, or overburden'd with a bodily exerciſe if there be hazard that all Religion will be hated, and that the man will break the yoke if he be pinched in his skin, it is better to ſecure the great and internal principle of obedience, then the external inſtance and expreſſion. This Caution is of uſe in the injunction of faſting daies, and external acts of mortification, which are indeed effects of the laws of Chriſt, but the meaſures of theſe laws are to be ſuch as conſiſt with the great end of the laws, that is, mercy and internal Religion. And the great reaſon of this is; becauſe all external actions are really ſuch as without our fault they may be hindred; there may be ſome accidents and cauſes by which they ſhall not be at all, and there may be many more by which they may be eas'd and leſſen'd. An external accident, or a corporal infirmity is to be complyed withall in the matter of external miſteries; that is, when there is mercy in it: and ſo muſt every vertue and inward grace, becauſe it is for the intereſt of Religion. Now what muſt be permitted in the action ought to be ſo in the ſentence, and that is the meaning of the law which is either commanded to the ſtrong or indulged to the weak. Adde to this, that outward actions of Religion are for the weak, not for the ſtrong; they are to miniſter to weakneſs and infirmities, and by bodily expreſſions to invite forward, to entertain, to ferment, to endear the ſpirit of a man to the purpoſes of God; but even the body it ſelf ſhall be ſpiritual, and it is intended that it ſhall wholly miniſter to God in ſpiritual ſervices hereafter. In the mean time, by outward acts it does ſomething Symbolical, or at leaſt expreſſive of the inward duty. But therefore if the external doe diſſerve the Spirit of God by oppreſſing the ſpirit of the man; that whoſe Nature and inſtitution is wholly inſtrumental muſt be made to comply with the end; and therefore muſt ſtand there when it is apt to miniſter to it, but muſt goe away if it hinders it.

10. 3. In the interpretation of the laws of Chriſt to a ſenſe of eaſe and liberty, there muſt be no limits and leſſenings deſcrib'd beforehand; or in general; becauſe any ſuch proceeding would not onely be deſtitute of that reaſon which warrants it in ſome caſes, but would evacuate the great purpoſe of the law in all: that is, it would be more then what is neceſſary to comply with new and accidental neceſſities, and to others it would be leſs then what is intended in the law, it would either tye the weak to impoſſibilities, or give leave to the ſtrong to be negligent and unprofitable; it would command too much or permit too much; it would either hold the bridle too hard, or break it all in peeces. But the interpretation and ease must be as accidental as the cause that inforces it, or the need that invites it; that is, every law of Christ intends that we should obey it in the perfection, that we should do it in the best way we can; and every man must doe so; but because all cannot doe alike, every mans best is alike in the event, but not in the action; and therefore the law which is made for man must mean no more then every man can doe; but because no man is to be supposed to be in disorder and weakness, till he be found to be so, therefore beforehand no complyance or easie interpretation is to be made of the degrees of duty.

11. 4. No laws of Christ are to suffer diminution of interpretation in the degrees to persons that make themselves weak, that they may bear but a little burden: but the gentler sentence and sence of laws is to be applyed to ease the weary and the afflicted, him that desires much and can doe but little; to him that loves God and loves religion; to him that endeavours heartily, and inquires diligently, and means honestly; to him that hath every thing but strength, and wants nothing but growth and time, and good circumstances and the prosperities of piety. The best indications of which state of persons are these:

Who are truly and innocently weak and to be complyed with?

12. 1. They are to be complyed with who are new beginners in religion, or the uninstructed; they who want strengths not by reason of any habitual sin, but by the nature of beginnings and new changes; for none can more innocently pretend to a forbearance and sufferance, then those who have the weakness of infancy. But I added also that the uninstructed have the same pretension, for according as their degrees of ignorance are, so are the degrees of their excusable infirmity. But then by uninstructed is onely meant such who have not heard, or could not learn; not such who are ever learning and never sufficiently taught; that is, such who love to hear but not to be doers of the word, such who are perverse and immorigerous, such who serve a humor or an interest, an opinion or a peevish Sect in their learning. For there are some who have spent much time in the inquiries of religion, whom if you call ignorant they suppose themselves injur'd; and yet will require the privileges and complyances of the weak: these men trouble others, and therefore are not to be eas'd themselves; their weakness of state is the impotency of passion, and therefore they must not rejoice in that by which they make others griev'd.

13. 2. They are to be complyed with according to the foregoing measures who in all things where they know and can, doe their hearty endeavours, and make no abatement to themselves, but with diligence and sincerity prosecute their duty. For this diligence and sincerity is a competent Testimony that the principle of their necessity is not evil but innocent and unavoidable. Whatsoever is not an effect of idleness or peevishness may come in upon a fair, but alwaies comes in upon a pityable account; and therefore is that Subject which is capable of all that case of rigour and severity which the wise Masters of assemblies and interpreters of the Divine laws doe allow to any persons in any cases.

14. 3. The last sign of Subjects capable of ease is infirmity of body; and that is a certain disposition to all the mercies and remissions of the law in such caſes as relate to the body and are inſtanc'd in external miniſteries. To which alſo is to be referred diſability of eſtate in duties of exteriour charity; which are to be exacted according to the proportions of mens civil power, taking in the needs of their perſons and of their relations, their calling and their quality, and that God intends it ſhould be ſo appears in this; becauſe all outward duties are ſo enjoin'd that they can be ſupplyed, and the internal grace inſtanc'd in other actions, of which there are ſo many kinds that ſome or other can be done by every one; and yet there is ſo great variety that no man or but very few men can doe all. I inſtance in the ſeveral waies of mortification, viz. by faſtings, by watchings and pernoctations in prayer, lyings on the ground, by toleration and patience, laborious geſtures of the body in prayer, ſtanding with arms extended, long kneelings on the bare ground, ſuffering contradiction and affronts, leſſenings and undervaluings, peeviſh and croſs accidents, denying our ſelves lawful pleaſures, refuſing a pleaſant morſel, leaving ſociety and meetings of friends, and very many things of the like Nature; by any of which the body may be mortified and the Soul diſciplin'd: or the outward act may be ſupplyed by an active and intenſe love which can doe every thing of duty: So alſo it is in alms, which ſome doe by giving money to the poor; ſome by comforting the afflicted, ſome by giving ſilver and gold, others which have it not, doe yet doe greater things: but ſince it matters not what it is we are able to doe, ſo that we do but what we are able, it matters not how the grace be inſtanc'd, ſo that by all the inſtances we can, we doe miniſter to the grace, it follows, that the law can be made to bend in any thing of the external inſtance ſo that the inward grace be not neglected; but therefore it is certain that becauſe every thing of matter can by matter be hindred; and a ſtring or a chain of Iron can hinder all the duty of the hand and foot, God who impoſes and exacts nothing that is impoſſible, is contented that the obedience of the Spirit be ſecured, and the body muſt obey the law as well as it can.

But there are ſome other conſiderations to be added to the main Rule.

15. 5. When the action is already done, and that there is no further deliberation concerning the direct duty, yet the law is not at all to be eaſed and leſſened, if there be a deliberation concerning the collateral and accidental duty of Repentance: and this is upon the ſame reaſons as the firſt limitation of the rule. for when a duty is to be done, and a deliberation to be had, we are in perfect choice, and therefore we are to anſwer for God and for Religion, and this is all one, whether the inquiry be made in the matter of inocence or repentance, that is, in the preventing of a ſin or curing of it. For we are in all things tyed to as great a care of our duty after we have once broken it as before; and in ſome things to a greater; and repentance is nothing but a new beginning of our duty, a going from our error, and a recovery of our loſs, and a reſtitution of our health, and a being put into the ſame eſtate from whence we were fallen; ſo that at leaſt all the ſame ſeverities are to be uſed in repentance, as great a rigor of ſentence, as ſtrict a caution, as careful a walking, as humble and univerſal an obedience, beſides the ſorrow and the relative parts of duty which come in upon the account of our ſin.

16. 6. But if the inquiry be made after the ſin is done, and that there is no deliberation concerning any preſent or future duty, but concerning the hopes or ſtate of pardon, then we may hope that God will be eaſie to give us pardon, according to the gentleſt ſenſe and meaſures of the law. For this, provided it be not brought into evil example in the meaſures of duty afterwards, can have have in it no danger: it is matter of hope, and therefore keeps a man from deſpair; but becauſe it is but matter of hope, therefore it is not apt to abuſe him into preſumption, and if it be miſtaken in the meaſures of the law, yet it makes it up upon the account of Gods mercy, and it will be all one; either it is Gods mercy in making an eaſie ſenſe of the law, or Gods mercy in giving an eaſie ſentence on the man, or Gods mercy in eaſing and taking off the puniſhment, and that will be all one as to the event, and therefore will be a ſufficient warrant for our hope, becauſe it will ſome way or other come to paſs as we hope. It is all alike whether we be ſaved becauſe God will exact no more of us, or becauſe though he did exact more by his law yet he will pardon ſo much the more in the ſentence: But this is of uſe onely to them who are tempted to deſpair, or oppreſſed by too violent fears; and it relies upon all the lines of the Divine mercy, and upon all the arguments of comfort by which declining hopes uſe to be ſupported: and ſince we our ſelves by obſerving our incurable infirmities eſpy ſome neceſſities of having the law read in the eaſier ſenſe, we doe in the event of things find that we have a need of pardon greater then we could think we ſhould in the heats of our firſt converſion and the fervors of our newly returning piety; and therefore God does not onely ſee much more reaſon to pity us upon the ſame account; but upon divers others, ſome whereof we know and ſome we know not; but therefore we can hope for more then we yet ſee in the lines of Revelation, and poſſibly we may receive in many caſes better meaſure then we yet hope for: but whoever makes this hope to leſſen his duty will find himſelf aſhamed in his hope; for no hope is reaſonable but that which quickens our piety, and haſtens and perfects our repentance, and purifies the Soul, and engages all the powers of action, and ends in the love of God, and in a holy life.

17. 7. There are many other things to be added by way of aſſiſtance to them who are preſſed with the burden of a law ſeverely apprehended, or unequally applyed, or not rightly underſtood; but the ſumme of them is this.

1. If the ſenſe be hidden or dubious, doe nothing till the cloud be off, and the doubt be removed.

2. If the law be indifferent to two ſenſes, take that which is moſt pious and moſt holy.

3. If it be between two, but not perfectly indifferent, follow that which is moſt probable.

4. Doe after the cuſtome and common uſages of the beſt and wiſeſt men.

5. Doe with the moſt, and ſpeak with the leaſt.

6. Ever bend thy determination to comply with the analogy of faith, and the common meaſures of good life, and the glorifications and honour of God, and the utility of our Neighbour.

7. Then choſe thy part of obedience, and doe it cheerfully and confidently, with a great induſtry and a full perſuaſion.

8. After the action is done enter into no new diſputes whether it was lawful or no, unleſs it be upon new inſtances and new arguments, relating to what is to come, and not troubling thy ſelf with that which with prudence and deliberation thou didſt (as things were then repreſented) well and wiſely choſe.

Rule II.

The positive laws of Jesus Christ cannot be dispensed with by any humane power.

1. I Have already in this book given account of the indispensability of the Natural laws which are the main constituent parts of the Evangelical: but there are some positive laws whose reason is not natural nor eternal, which yet Christ hath superinduc'd; concerning which there is great question made whether they be dispensable by humane power. Now concerning these I say that all laws given by Christ are now made for ever to be obligatory, and he is the King of heaven and earth, the Head and Prince of the Catholick Church, and therefore hath supreme power, and he is the wonderful Councellour, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace, and his wisedome is supreme, he is the wisedome of the Father, and therefore he hath made his laws so wisely, so agreeably to the powers and accidents of mankind that they can be observed by all men and all waies, where he hath pass'd an obligation: Now because every dispensation of laws must needs suppose an infirmity or imperfection in the law or an infirmity in the man, that is, that either the law did inferre inconvenience which was not foreseen, or was unavoidable; or else the law meets with the changes of mankind with which it is not made in the sanction to comply, and therefore must be forc'd to yeeld to the needs of the man. and stand aside till that necessity be past: it follows that in the laws of the H. Jesus there is no dispensation; because there is in the law no infirmity and no incapacity in the man: for every man can alwaies obey all that which Christ commanded and exacted: I mean he hath no natural impotency to do any act that Christ hath requir'd, and he can never be hindred from doing of his duty.

Chap. 1. Rule 10.

2. And this appears in this, because God hath appointed a harbour whether every vessel can put in when he meets with storms and contrary winds abroad: and when we are commanded by a persecuter not to obey God, we cannot be forc'd to comply with the evil man; for we can be secure against him by suffering what he pleases, and therefore disobedience to a law of Christ cannot be made necessary by any external violence: I mean every internal act is not in it self impedible by outward violence: and the externall act which is made necessary can be secur'd by a resolution to obey God rather then men.

3. 2. But there are some external actions and instances of a Commandement which may accidentally become impossible by subtraction of the material part; so for want of water a child cannot be baptized; for want of wine or bread we cannot communicate; which indeed is true, but doe not inferre that therefore there is a power of dispensing left in any man or company of men; because in such cases there is no law, and therefore no need of dispensation; For affirmative precepts in which onely there can be an external impediment doe not oblige but in their proper circumstances and possibilities: and thus it is even in human laws. No law obliges beyond our power; and although it be necessary sometimes to get a dispensation even in such cases, to rescue our selves from the malice or the carelessness, the ignorance or the contrary interests of the ministers of justice, who goe by the words of the law, and are not competent or nor instructed judges in the matter of necessity or excuse, yet there there is no such need in the laws of God. For God is alwaies just and alwaies wise, he knows when we can and when we cannot, and therefore as he cannot be deceived by ignorance, so neither can he oppress any man by injustice, and we need not have leave to let a thing alone, which we cannot doe if we would never so fain; and if we cannot obey, we need not require of God a warrant under his hand or an act of indemnity; for which his justice and his goodness, his wisedome and his very Nature are infinite security: and therefore it cannot be necessary to the Church that a power of dispensing should be intrusted to Men, in such cases where we cannot suppose the law of God to bind. Thats our best security that we need no dispensation.

4. 3. In external actions and instances of vertue or of obedience to a Commandement of Jesus Christ where ever there can be a hinderance, if the obligation does remain, the instance that is hindred can be supplyed with another of the same kind. Thus releeving the poor hungry man, can be hindred by my own poverty and present need, but I can visit him that is sick, though I cannot feed the hungry, or I can give him bread when I cannot give him a cloak; and therefore there can need no dispensation when the Commandement if it be hindred in one instance can as perfectly and to all the intentions of our lawgiver be performed in another.

5. 4. In external actions which can be hindred and which cannot be supplyed by the variety of the instances in the same kind, yet if the obligation remains, they may be supplyed with the internal act, and with the spiritual. Thus if we cannot receive actual baptisme, the desire of it is accepted, and he that communicates spiritually, that is, by faith and charity, by inward devotion and hearty desire, is not guilty of the breach of the Commandement if he does not communicate sacramentally, being unavoidably and inculpably hindred. For whatsoever is not in our power, cannot be under a law, and where we doe not consent to the breach of a Commandement, we cannot be exposed to the punishment. This is the voice of all the world, and this is natural reason, and the ground of justice, without which there can be no Government but what is Tyrannical and unreasonable. These things being notorious and confess'd the consequents are these:

6. 1. That there is no necessity that a power of dispensing in the positive laws of Christ should be intrusted to any man, or to any society. Because the law needs it not, and the Subjects need it not: and he that dispenses must either doe it when there is cause, or when there is none. If he dispenses when there is no cause, he makes himself superiour to the power of God by exercising dominion over his laws: If he dispenses when there is cause, he dispenses when there is no need. For if the Subject can obey, he must obey, and man cannot untie what God hath bound: but if he cannot obey, he is not bound, and therefore needs not be untyed: he may as well go about to unbend a strait line, or to number that which is not, as to dispense in a law, to which in such cases God exacts no obedience.

7. * Panormitan affirms that the Pope hath power to dispense in all the laws of God, except in the Articles of faith; and to this purpose he cites Innocentius in c. Cum ad Monasterium, de statu Monachorum. * Felinus affirmes that the Pope can change the form of Baptisme, and that he can with one word, and without all solemnity consecrate a Priest, and that he can by his word alone alone make a Bishop: and though these pretenses are insolent and strange, yet in fact he does as much as this comes to: for the Pope gives leave sometimes to a mere Priest to give confirmation, which by divine right is onely belonging to Bishops by their own confession: That the Blessed Eucharist is to be consecrated in both kinds is certainly of Divine right; and so confessed by the Church of Rome: but the Pope hath actually dispensed in this article and given leave to some to consecrate in bread onely, and particularly to the Norvegians a dispensation was given by Innocent the eighth, as I have already noted out of Volaterranus.

* C. proposuit. de concess. præbend. n. 20.
* In c. quæ in Eccles. inconst. n. 19, 20.

8. There are some learned men amongst them who speak in this question with less scandal, but almost with the same intentions and effects. Some of their Divines, particularly the Bishop of the Canaries, saies that the Pope hath not power to dispense in the whole, or in all the laws of God, but in some onely; namely where the observation of the law is impeditiva majoris boni, a hindrance or obstruction to a greater Spiritual good; as it may happen in oaths and vows: and (Sanchez addes) in the consecration of the Blessed Sacrament in both kinds: in these, say they, the Pope can dispense: But where the observation of the laws in the particular brings no evil, or inconvenience, and does never hinder a greater good, there the laws are indispensable; such as are Confession, Baptisme, using a set form of words in the ministration of the Sacraments. So that the meaning is, the Pope never wants a power to doe it, if there be not wanting an excuse to colour it, and then in effect the Divines agree with the Lawyers; for since the power of dispensing is given in words indefinite and without specification of particulars (if it be given at all;) the authority must be unlimited as to the person, and can be limited onely by the incapacity of the matter; and if there could be any inconvenience in any law, there might be a dispensation in it: So that the Divines and the Lawyers differ onely in the instances; which if we should consider, or if any great interest could be serv'd by any, there can be no doubt but it would be found a sufficient cause of dispensation. So that this is but to cozen mankind with a distinction to no purpose; and to affirme that the Pope cannot dispense in such things which yeeld no man any good or profit: such as is the using a set forme of words in Baptisme, or the like; and they may at an easie rate pretend the Popes power to be limited, when they onely restrain him from violating a Divine law, when either the observation of it is for his own advantage, as in Confession (meaning to a Priest) or when it serves the interest of no man to have it changed, as in the formes of Sacraments.

Canus relect. de Penitent. p. 5. a. finem.

9. But then, that I may speak to the other part; to say that the Pope may dispense in a Divine law when the particular observation does hinder a greater spiritual good, and that this is a sufficient cause, is a proposition in al things false, and in some cases, even in those where they instance, very dangerous. It is false, because if a man can by his own act be oblig'd to doe a thing which yet is impeditive of a greater temporal good, then God can by his law oblige his obedience, though accidentally it hinder a greater spiritual good. Now if a man have promised, he must keep it though it were to his own hindrance, said David; and a man may not break his oath though the keeping of it hinder him from many spiritual comforts and advantages; nay a man may neglect a spiritual advantage for a temporal necessity; and in the Bohemian warres, the King had better been at the head of his Troops, then at a Sermon when Prague was taken.

Psal. 15.

* But

* But I consider (for that is also very material) that it is dangerous. For whenmen to justifie a pretence or to verifie an action or to usurpe a power shall pretend that there is on the other side a greater Spiritual good they may very easily deceive others, because either voluntarily or involuntarily they deceive themselves, for when God hath given a Commandement, who can say that to let it alone can doe more good to a mans Soul then to keep it? I instance in a particular which is of great interest with them. If a man have vowed to a woman to marry her, and contracted himself to her per verba de præsenti; she according to her duty loves him passionately, hath marryed her very Soul to him, and her heart is bound up in his: but he changes his mind, and enters into religion: but stops at the very gate and asks who shall warrant him for the breach of his faith and vows to his Spouse? The Pope answers he will; and though by the law of God he be tyed to that woman, yet because the keeping of that vow would hinder him from doing God better service in religion this is a sufficient cause for him to dispense with his vow. This then is the case concerning which I inquire: 1. How does it appear that to enter into a monastery is absolutely a greater Spiritual good then to live chastly with the wife of his love and vows? 1. 2. I inquire whether to break a mans vow be not of it self (abstracting from all extrinsecal pretensions and collateral inducements) a very great sin? and if there were not a great good to follow the breach of it, I demand whether could the Pope dispense or give leave to any man to doe it? If he could, then it is plain he can give leave to a man to doe a very great evil; for without the accidentally consequent good, it is confessed to be very evil to break our lawful vows. But if he cannot dispense with his vow unless some great good were to follow upon the breach of it, then it is cleer he can give leave to a man to doe evil that good may come of it. For if without such a reason or such a consequent good the Pope could not dispense, then the consequent good does legitimate the dispensation, and either an evil act done for a good end is lawful and becomes good, or else the Pope plainly gives him leave to doe that which is still remaining evil, for a good end: either of which is intolerable, and equally against the Apostles Rule, which is also a rule of natural religion and reason: No man must doe evil for a good end. 2.

* But then, 3. who can assure me that an act of religion is better then an act of justice? or that God will be served by doing my wife an injury? or that he will accept of me a new vow which is perfectly a breaking of an old? or that by our vows to our wives we are not as much obliged to God as by our Monastical vows before our Abbot? or that marriage is not as great an act of religion if wisely and holily undertaken (as it ought to be) as the taking the habit of S. Francis? or that I can be capable of giving my self to religion when I have given the right and power of my self away to another? or that I may not as well steal from a man to give alms to the poor, as wrong my wife to give my self to a Cloyster? or that he can ever give himself to religion, who breaks the religion of vows and promises, of justice and honour, of faith and the Sacramental mystery that he may goe into religion? or that my retirement in a cloister, and doing all that is these intended can make recompence for making my wife miserable, and it may be desperate and calamitous all her life time? Can God be delighted with my prayers which I offer to him in a cloister, when it may be at the same time my injur'd Spouse is praying to God to doe her justice and to avenge my perjuries upon my guilty head, and it may be, cries loud to God and weeps and curses night and day? who can tell which is better, or which is worse? For marriage and single life of themselves are indifferent to piety or impiety, they may be us'd well, or abus'd 3.

us'd to evil purpoſes; but if they take their eſtimate by the event, no man can beforehand tell which would have been the greater ſpiritual good. But ſuppoſe it as you liſt, yet,

11. I conſider that when God ſaies that obedience is better then Sacrifice, he hath plainly told us that no pretence of Religion, or of a greater ſpiritual good can legitimate vow-breach, or diſobedience to a divine Commandement: and therefore either the Pope muſt diſpenſe in all laws of Chriſt, and without all reaſon, that is, by his abſolute authority and ſupereminency over the law and the power that eſtabliſhed it, or elſe he cannot diſpenſe at all; for there is no reaſon that can legitimate our diſobedience.

12. But then if we conſider the Authority it ſelf, the conſiderations will be very material. No man pretends to a power of diſpenſing in the law of God but the Pope onely; and he onely upon pretence of the words ſpoken
Matth. 16. 19. to S. Peter, Whatſoever thou ſhalt looſe on earth ſhall be looſed in heaven. Now did ever any of the Apoſtles or Apoſtolical men ſuppoſe that S. Peter could in any caſe diſpenſe with vow-breach, or the violation of a lawful oath? Was not all that power which was then promiſ'd to him wholly relative to the matter of Fraternal correption? and was it not equally given to the Apoſtles? for either it was never perform'd to S. Peter, or elſe it was alike Matth. 18. 18. promiſed and perform'd to all the Apoſtles in the donation of the Spirit, and of John 20. 23. the power of binding, and the words of Chriſt to them before and after his reſurrection: ſo that by certain conſequence of this, either all the ſucceſſours of the Apoſtles have the ſame power, or none of the Succeſſours of S. Peter. Or if the Succeſſours of S. Peter onely, why not his ſucceſſors at Antioch as well as his Succeſſors at Rome? ſince it is certain that he was at Antioch, but is not ſo certain that he was at all at Rome, for thoſe things that Ulrichus Velenus ſaies againſt it in a Tractate on purpoſe on that Subject and publiſhed by Goldaſtus in his third Tome are not inconſiderable allegations & arguments for the Negative, but I ſhall give account of that inquiry in ſome of the following pages. And yet ſuppoſe he was, yet it is as likely, that is, as certain as the other; that after the Martyrdom of S. Peter and S. Paul there were two Biſhops or Popes of Rome; as it is conjectur'd by the different Catalogues of the firſt ſucceſſions, and by their differing Preſidencies or Epiſcopacies, one being over the Circumciſion and the other over the Uncircumciſion (if I ſay they were at all, concerning which I have no occaſion to interpoſe my ſentence.) But if either this gift was given in common to all the Apoſtles, or if it was given perſonally to S. Peter, or if it means onely the power of Diſcipline over ſinners and penitent perſons, or if it does not mean to deſtroy all juſtice and humane contracts, to reſcind all the laws of God and man, to make Chriſts laws Subject to Chriſts Miniſter, and Chriſts Kingdome to be the Popes inheritance and poſſeſſion, in alto Dominio, if thoſe words of Chriſt to S. Peter are ſo to be underſtood as that his Subjects and ſervants ſhall ſtill be left in thoſe rights which he hath given and confirm'd and ſanctified, then it follows undeniably that S. Peter's power of the keys is not to be a pick-lock of the laws of his Maſter, but to bind men to the performance of them, or to the puniſhment of breaking them, and if by thoſe words of [Whatſoever thou ſhalt looſe] it be permitted to looſe and untie the band of oaths and vows, then they may alſo mean a power of looſing any mans life, or any mans right, or any mans word, or any mans oath, or any mans obligation ſolemn, or unſolemn, when he hath really an intereſt or reaſon ſo to doe, of which reaſon himſelf onely can be the warran-

warrantable Judge: which things becauſe they are unſufferably unreaſonable, that pretence which inferrs ſuch evils and ſuch impieties muſt be alſo unſufferable and impoſſible.

13. I conclude therefore with this diſtinction. There is a proper diſpenſation, that is, ſuch a diſpenſation as ſuppoſes the obligation remaining upon that perſon who is to be diſpenſed with: but no man or ſociety of men can in this ſenſe diſpenſe with any law of Chriſt. But there is a diſpenſation improperly ſo called, which does not ſuppoſe a remanent obligation, and therefore pretends not to take away any, but ſuppoſes onely a doubt remaining whether the law does by Gods intention oblige or no? He that hath skill and authority, and reaſon to declare that in ſuch ſpecial caſes God intended not to oblige the Conſcience, hath taken away the doubt, and made that to become lawful which without ſuch a declaration by reaſon of the remaining doubt was not ſo. This is properly an interpretation; but becauſe it hath the ſame effect upon the man which the other hath directly upon the law, therefore by Divines and Lawyers it is ſometimes alſo called a Diſpenſation, but improperly.

14. But the other Conſequent ariſing from the firſt obſervations which I made upon this Rule is this; That as there is no neceſſity that there ſhould be any diſpenſation in the laws of Jeſus Chriſt; ſo in thoſe caſes where there may be an improper diſpenſation, that is, an interpretation or declaration that the law in this caſe does not bind at all, no man muſt by way of equity or condeſcention and expedient appoint any thing that the law permits not, or declare that a part of the law may be us'd; when the whole is in the inſtitution. For example; The Norvegians complaind that they could very ſeldom get any wine into their Country, and when it did come it was almoſt vinegar or vappe; He who had reaſon and authority might then certainly have declar'd that the precept of conſecrating did not oblige, when they had not matter with which they were to doe it; becauſe no good law obliges to impoſſibilities, But then no man of his own head might interpoſe an expedient, and ſay, though you have no wine to conſecrate and celebrate with all, yet you may doe it in ale or meath; nor yet might he warrant an imperfect conſecration and allow that the Prieſts ſhould celebrate with bread onely. The reaſon is becauſe all inſtitutions Sacramental, and poſitive laws depend not upon the Nature of the things themſelves, according to the extenſion or diminution of which our obedience might be meaſur'd; but they depend wholly on the will of the lawgiver, and the will of the Supreme, being actually limited to this ſpecification, this manner, this matter, this inſtitution; whatſoever comes beſides it hath no foundation in the will of the Legiſlator, and therefore can have no warrant or authority. That it be obeyed or not obeyed is all the queſtion and all the variety. If it can be obeyed it muſt, if it cannot it muſt be let alone. The right Mother that appeard before Solomon demanded her child; half of her own was offered; but that was not it which would doe her any good, neither would ſhe have been pleas'd with a whole bolſter of goats hair, or with a perfect image of her child, or with a living lamb; it was her own child which ſhe demanded: So it is in the Divine inſtitution, whatſoever God wills that we muſt attend to: and therefore whatſoever depends upon a divine law or inſtitution, whatſoever is appointed inſtrumental to the ſignification of a myſtery, or to the collation of a grace or a power, he that does any thing of his own head, either muſt be a deſpiſer of Gods will, or muſt ſuppoſe himſelf the author of a grace, or elſe to doe nothing at all in what he does, becauſe all his obedience and all the bleſſing of his obedience depends upon the will of God which ought alwaies to be obeyed when it can, and when it cannot, nothing can ſupply it becauſe the reaſon of it cannot be underſtood, for who can tell why God would have the death of his Son celebrated by Bread and wine? why by both the Symbols? why by ſuch? and therefore no proportions can be made, and if they could, yet they cannot be warranted.

15. This Rule is not onely to be underſtood concerning the expreſs poſitive laws and inſtitutions of our Bleſſed Lawgiver, but even thoſe which are included within thoſe laws, or are neceſſary appendages to thoſe inſtitutions are to be obeyed, and can neither be diſpenſed withall nor diverted by any ſupplętory or expedient. Thus to the law of repreſenting and commemorating the death of our deareſt Lord by the celebration of his laſt ſupper it is neceſſarily appendant and included that we ſhould com worthily prepared, leſt that which is holy be given to Dogs, and holy things be handled unholily. In this caſe there can be no diſpenſation; and although the Curates of ſouls having the key of knowledge and underſtanding to divide the word of God rightly, have power and warrant to tell what meaſures and degrees of preparation are juſt and holy; yet they cannot give any diſpenſation in any juſt and requir'd degree, nor by their ſentence effect that a leſs degree then God requires in the appendant law can be ſufficient to any man, neither can any human authority commute a duty that God requires; and when he demands repentance no man can diſpenſe with him that is to communicate, or give him leave to give almes in ſtead of repentance. But if in the duty of preparation God had involv'd the duty of confeſſion to a Prieſt: this might have in ſome caſes been wholly let alone: that is, in caſe there were no Prieſt to be had but one, who were to conſecrate and who could not attend to hear my confeſſions: And the reaſon is, becauſe in caſe of the deſtitution of any material or neceſſary conſtituent part of the duty, there is no need of equity or interpretation, becauſe the ſubject matter of degrees of heightnings and diminutions being taken away, there can be no conſideration of the manner or the degrees ſuperſtructed. When any condition intrinſecally and in the nature of the thing included in an affirmative precept is deſtituent or wanting, the duty it ſelf falls without interpretation.

16. Laſtly; This Rule is to be underſtood alſo much more concerning the Negative precepts of the Religion: becauſe there can be no hindrance to the duties of a Negative precept; every man can let any thing alone; and he cannot be forc'd from his ſilence or his omiſſion; for he can ſit ſtill and die; violence can hinder an action, but cannot effect it or expreſs it: and therefore here is no place for interpretation much leſs for diſpenſation, neither can it be ſupplyed by any action or by any omiſſion whatſoever.

17. But upon the matter of this ſecond Conſequent remark'd above [numb. 14.] it is to be inquired whether in no caſe a ſupply of duty is to be made? or whether or no it is not better in ſome caſes, that is, when we are hindred from doing the duty commanded, to doe ſomething when we cannot doe all; or are we tyed to doe nothing when we are innocently hindred from doing of the whole duty?

When we may be admitted to doe part of our duty, and when to supply it by something else.

17. 1. Negative precepts have no parts of duty, no degrees of obedience, but consist in a Mathematical point; or rather in that which is not so much; for it consists in that which can neither be numbred nor weighed. No man can goe a step from the severest measure of a Negative Commandement; if a man doe but in his thought goe against it, or in one single instance doe what is forbidden, or but begin to doe it, he is intirely guilty. He that breaks one is guilty of all said S. James; it is meant of negative precepts; and then it is true in every sense relating to every single precept, and to the whole body of the Negative Commandements. He that breaks one hath broken the band of all; and he that does sin in any instance or imaginary degree against a Negative hath done the whole sin that is in that Commandement forbidden.

18. 2. All positive precepts that depend upon the meer will of the Lawgiver (as I have already discourted) admit no degrees, nor suppletory and commutation: because in such laws we see nothing beyond the words of the law and the first meaning and the nam'd instance; and therefore it is that in individuo which God points at; it is that in which he will make the tryal of our obedience; it is that in which he will so perfectly be obeyed, that he will not be disputed with, or inquir'd of why and how, but just according to the measures there set down; So, and no more, and no less, and no otherwise. For when the will of the Lawgiver is all the reason, the first instance of the law is all the measures, and there can be no product but what is just set down. No parity of reason can inferre any thing else, because there is no reason but the will of God; to which nothing can be equal, because his will can be but one. If any man should argue thus; Christ hath commanded us to celebrate his death by blessing and communicating in bread and wine; this being plainly his purpose; and I finding it impossible to get wine, consider that water came out of his side as well as blood, and therefore water will represent his death as well as wine; for wine is but like bloud, and water is more then like it self; and therefore I obey him better, when in the letter I cannot obey him; He I say that should argue thus, takes wrong measures; for it is not here to be inquired which is most agreeable to our reason, but which complies with Gods will, for that is all the reason we are to inquire after.

19. 3. In natural laws and obligations depending upon true and proper reason drawn from the nature of things; there we must doe what we can, and if we cannot doe all that is at first intended, yet it is secondarily intended that we should doe what we can. The reason is, because there is a natural cause of the duty, which like the light of the Sun is communicated in several degrees according as it can be received; and therefore whatever partakes of that reason is also a duty of that Commandement. Thus it is a duty of natural and essential religion that we should worship God with all the faculties of the soul, with all the actions of the body, with all the degrees of intension, with all the instances and parts of extension: For God is the Lord of all; he expects all, and he deserves all, and will reward all; and every thing is design'd in order to his service and glorification: and therefore every part of all this is equally commanded, equally requir'd; and is Symbolical to the whole; and therefore in the impossibility of the performance of any one, the whole

Commandement is equally promoted by another; and when we cannot bow the knee yet we can incline the head, and when we cannot give, we can forgive, and if we have not silver and gold, we can pay them in prayers and blessings; and if we cannot goe with our Brother two mile, we can (it may be) go one, or one half; let us goe as farre as we can, and doe all that is in our power and in our circumstances. For since our duty here can grow, and every instance does according to its portion doe in its own time and measures the whole work of the Commandement, and God accepts us in every step of the progression, that is, in all degrees; for he breaks not the bruised reed, and he quenches not the smoaking flaxe; it follows, that though we are not tyed to doe all, even that which is beyond our powers; yet we must doe what we can towards it; even a part of the Commandement may in such cases be accepted for our whole duty.

20. 4. In external actions which are instances of a Natural or Moral duty, if there be any variety, one may supply the other; if there be but one, it can be supplyed by the internal onely and spiritual. But the internal can never be hindred, and can never be chang'd or supplyed by any thing else; it is capable of no suppletory, but of degrees it is: and if we cannot love God as well as Mary Magdalen lov'd him, let us love him so as to obey him alwaies, and so as to superadde degrees of increment to our love, and to our obedience; but for this or that expression it must be as it can, and when it can, it must be this or another; but if it can be neither upon the hand, it must be all that is intended upon the heart; and as the body helps the Soul in the ministeries of her duty; so the Soul supplies the body in the essentialities of it and indispensable obedience.

Rule 12.

Not every thing that is in the Sermons and Doctrine of Jesus Christ was intended to bind as a law or Commandement.

1. Every thing that is spoken by our Blessed Saviour is to be plac'd in that order of things where himself was pleas'd to put it. Whatsoever he propounded to us under the Sanction of love, and by the invitation of a great reward, that is so to be understood as that it may not become a snare, by being supposed in all cases, and to all persons to be a law. For laws are established by fear and love too, that is, by promises and threatnings; and nothing is to be esteemed a law of Christ but such things which if we doe not observe we shall die, or incurre the Divine displeasure in any instance or degree. But there are some things in the Sermons of Christ which are recommended to the diligence and love of men; such things whether men must tend and grow. Thus it is required that we should love God with all our heart; which is indeed a Commandement and the first and the chiefest: but because it hath an infinite sense, and is capable of degrees beyond all the actualities of any man whatsoever, therefore it is incouraged and invited further by a reward that will be greater then all the work that any man can doe. But yet there is also the minimum morale in it, that is, that degree of love and duty, less then which is by interpretation no no love, no duty at all; and that is, that we so love God, that 1. we love nothing against him, 2. that we love nothing more then him, 3. that we love nothing equal to him, 4. that we love nothing disparately and distinctly from him, but in subordination to him; that is, so as to be apt to yeeld and submit to his love, and comply with our duty. Now then, here must this law begin, it is a Commandement to all persons, and at all times to do thus much; and this being a general law of which all other laws are but instances and specifications, the same thing is in all the particular laws which is in the General: there is in every one of them a minimum morale, a legal sense of duty, which if we prevaricate or goe less then it, we are transgressours: but then there is also a latitude of duty, or a sense of Love and Evangelical increase, which is a further pursuance of the duty of the Commandement; but is not directly the law, but the love; to which God hath appointed no measures of greatness but hath invited as forward as the man can goe.

2. For it is considerable that since Negative precepts include their affirmatives, and Affirmatives also doe inferre the Negatives (as I have already discoursed) and yet they have differing measures and proportions, and that the form of words and signes Negative or Affirmative, are not the sufficient indication of the precepts, we can best be instructed by this measure; There is in every Commandement a negative part and an affirmative: The Negative is the first, the least and the lowest sense of the law and the degree of duty; and this is obligatory to all persons and cannot be lessened by excuse, or hindred by disability, or excus'd by ignorance, neither is it to stay its time or to wait for circumstances; but obliges all men indifferently. I doe not say that this is alwaies expressed by negative forms of law or language, but is by interpretation Negative; it operates or obliges as doe the Negatives. For when we are commanded to love our Neighbour as our self; the least measure of this law, the legal or Negative part of it is, that we should not doe him injury: that we shall not doe to him, what we would not have done to our selves. He that does not in this sense love his Neighbour as himself, hath broken the Commandement; he hath done that which he should not doe; he hath done that which he cannot justifie; he hath done that which was forbidden: for every going less then the first sense of the law, then the lowest sense of duty, is the commission of a sin, a doing against a prohibition.

3. But then there are further degrees of duty then the first and lowest; which are the affirmative measures, that is, a doing excellent actions and instances of the Commandements, a doing the Commandement with love and excellency, a progression in the exercise and methods of that piety; the degrees of which because they are affirmative therefore thy oblige but in certain circumstances; and are under no law absolutely, but they grow in the face of the Sun, and pass on to perfection by heat and light, by love and zeal, by hope and by reward.

4. Now concerning these degrees it is that I affirme that every thing is to be plac'd in that order of things where Christ left it: and he that measures other men by his own stature, and exacts of children the wisedome of old men, and requires of babes in Christ the strengths and degrees of experienc'd Prelates, he addes to the laws of Christ, that is, he ties where Christ hath not tyed; he condemnes where Christ does not condemne. It is not a law that every man should in all the stages of his progression be equally perfect, the nature of things hath several stages, and passes by steps to the varieties of glory. For ſo laws and Counſels differ, as firſt and laſt, as beginning and perfection, as reward and puniſhment, as that which is ſimply neceſſary, and that which is highly advantagious; they differ not in their whole kind; for they are onely the differing degrees of the ſame duty. He that does a Counſel Evangelical does not do more then his duty, but does his duty better: He that does it in a leſs degree ſhall have a leſs reward, but he ſhall not periſh if he does obey the juſt and prime or leaſt meaſures of the law.

5. Let no man therefore impoſe upon his brother the heights and ſummities of perfection, under pain of damnation or any fearful Evangelical threatning; becauſe theſe are to be invited onely by love and reward, and by promiſes only are bound upon us, not by threatnings. The want of the obſerving of this, hath caus'd impertinent diſputes and animoſities in men, and great miſunderſtandings in this queſtion. For it is a great error to think that every thing ſpoken in Chriſts Sermons is a law, or that all the progreſſions and degrees of Chriſtian duty are bound upon us by penalties as all laws are. The Commandements are made laws to us wholly by threatnings; for when we ſhall receive a crown of righteouſneſs in heaven, that is, by way of gift, meerly gratuitous, but the pains of the damned are due to them by their merit and by the meaſures of juſtice, and therefore it is remarkable that our Bleſſed Saviour ſaid, when ye have done all that ye are commanded, ye are unprofitable ſervants; that is, the ſtrict meaſures of the laws or the Commandements given to you are ſuch which if ye doe not obſerve ye ſhall die according to the ſentence of the law; but if ye doe, ye are yet unprofitable; ye have not deſerved the good things are laid up for loving Souls: but therefore towards that we muſt ſuperadde the degrees of progreſſion and growth in grace, the emanations of love and zeal, the methods of perfection and imitation of Chriſt. For by the firſt meaſures we eſcape hell; but by the progreſſions of love onely and the increaſe of duty, through the mercies of God in Chriſt we arrive at heaven. Not that he that eſcapes hell may in any caſe fail of heaven; but that whoſoever does obey the Commandement in the firſt and leaſt ſenſe, will in his proportion grow on towards perfection. For he fails in the firſt, and does not doe that worthily, who if he have time does not goe on to the ſecond.

6. But yet neither are theſe Counſels of perfection left wholly to our liberty ſo as that they have nothing of the law in them; for they are purſuances of the law; and of the ſame nature, though not directly of the ſame neceſſity; but collaterally and accidentally they are. For although God follows the courſe and nature of things, and therefore does not diſallow any ſtate of duty that is within his own meaſures; becauſe there muſt be a firſt before there can be a ſecond, and the beginning muſt be eſteemed good or elſe we ought not to purſue it and make it more in the ſame kind; yet becauſe God is pleaſed to obſerve the order of nature in his graciouſneſs, we muſt doe ſo too in the meaſures of our duty; Nature muſt begin imperfectly, and God is pleas'd with it, becauſe himſelf hath ſo order'd it; but the nature of things that begin and are not perfect, cannot ſtand ſtill. God is pleas'd well enough with the leaſt or the Negative meaſure of the law; becauſe that is the firſt or the beginning of all; but we muſt not alwaies be beginning but paſs on to perfection, and it is perfection all the way, becauſe it is the proper and the natural method of the grace to be growing: every degree of growth is not the perfection of glory; but neither is it the abſolute perfection of grace, but it is the relative perfection of it: juſtas corne and flowers are perfectly what they ought to be when in their several moneths they are arrived to their proper stages: but if they doe not still grow till they be fit for harvest, they wither and die and are good for nothing: he that does not goe from strength to strength, from vertue to vertue, from one degree of grace to another, he is not at all in the methods of life, but enters into the portion of thornes, and wither'd flowers, fit for excision and for burning.

7. Therefore 1. No man must in the keeping the Commandements of Christ set himself a limit of duty; hither will I come and no further: for the tree that does not grow is not alive, unless it already have all the growth it can have: and there is in these things thus much of a law: Evangelical counsels are thus far necessary, that although in them, that is, in the degrees of duty, there are no certain measures describ'd; yet we are oblig'd to proceed from beginnings to perfection.

8. 2: Although every man must impose upon himself this care that he so doe his duty that he doe adde new degrees to every grace; yet he is not to be prejudic'd by any man else, nor sentenc'd by determin'd measures of another mans appointment: God hath nam'd none, but intends all; and therefore we cannot give certain sentence upon our Brother since God hath describ'd no measures; but intends that all, whither no man can perfectly arrive here; and therefore it is supplyed by God hereafter.

9. 2. But the Rule is to be understood in great instances as well as in great degrees of duty; For there are in the Sermons of Christ some instances of duties which although they are pursuances of laws and duty, yet in their own material, natural being are not laws, but both in the degree implyed, and in the instance expressed are Councels Evangelical; to which we are invited by great rewards, but not oblig'd to them under the proper penalties of the law. Such are making our selves Eunuchs for the Kingdome of heaven, selling all and giving it to the poor. The duties and laws here signified are chastity, charity, contempt of the world, zeal for the propagation of the Gospel: The vertues themselves are direct duties and under laws and punishment, but that we be charitable to the degree of giving all away, or that we act our chastity by a perpetual cœlibate are not laws; but for the outward expression we are wholly at our liberty; and for the degree of the inward grace, we are to be still pressing forwards towards it, we being obliged to doe so by the nature of the thing, by the excellency of the reward, by the exhortations of the Gospel, by the example of good men, by our love to God, by our desires of happiness, and by the degrees of glory. Thus S. Paul took no wages of the Corinthian Churches; it was an act of an excellent prudence, and great charity, but it was not by the force of a general law, for no man else was bound to it, neither was he; for he did not do so to other Churches; but he pursued two or three graces to excelent measures and degrees; he became exemplary to others, useful to that Church, and did advantage the affairs of Religion: and though possibly he might, and so may we, by some concurring circumstances be pointed out to this very instance and signification of his duty, yet this very instance, and all of the same nature are Councels Evangelical; that is, not imposed upon us by a law, and under a threatning; but left to our liberty that we may express freely, what we are necessarily oblig'd to doe in the kind, and to pursue forwards to degrees of perfection.

These

10. These therefore are the Characteristick notes and measures to distinguish a Counsel Evangelical from the laws and Commandements of Jesus Christ.

The notes of difference between Counsels and Commandements Evangelical.

1. Where there is no Negative expressed nor involved, there it cannot be a law; but it is a Counsel Evangelical. For in every law there is a degree of duty so necessary, that every thing less then it, is a direct act or state of sin, and therefore if the law be affirmative the Negative is included, and is the sanction of the main duty. Honour thy Father and Mother, that is a law: for the lowest step of the duty there enjoined is bound upon us by this Negative, thou shalt not curse thy Father or Mother; or, thou shalt not deny to give them maintenance. Thou shalt not dishonour them, not slight, not undervalue, not reproach, not upbraid, not be rude or disobedient to them: when ever such a Negative is included, that is the indication of a law. But in Counsels Evangelical, there is nothing but what is affirmative. There are some who make themselves Eunuchs for the kingdome of heaven: that is the intimation of a religious act or state: but the Sanction of it is nothing that is negative, but this onely; He that hath ears to hear let him hear, and Qui potest capere capiat: He that can receive it let him receive it: and he that hath power over his will, and hath so decreed in his heart, does well. In Commandements it is [He that does
1 Cor. 7. the duty, does well; He that does not, does ill:] but in Counsels it is; [He that does not, may doe well: but he that does, does better:] as S Paul discourses in the question of marriage; in which instance it is observable that the comparison of Cœlibate and marriage is not in the question of chastity, but in the question of religion, one is not a better chastity then the other. Marriage is κοίτη ἀμίαντος an undefiled state; and nothing can be cleaner then that which is not at all unclean; but the advantages of cœlibate above marriage as they are accidental and contingent, so they are relative to times and persons and states, and external ministeries; For to be made an Eunuch for the Kingdom of heaven, is the same that S. Paul means by, the unmarryed careth for the things of the Lord; that is, in these times of trouble and persecution, they who are not entangled in the affairs of a houshold, can better travail from place to place in the ministeries of the Gospel, they can better attend to the present necessities of the Church, which are called the things of the Lord; or the affairs of the Kingdome of heaven: but at no hand does it mean that the state of single life is of it self a Counsel Evangelical, or a further degree of chastity; but of an advantageous ministery to the propagation of the Gospel. But be it so, or be it otherwise; yet it is a Counsel and no law, because it hath no Negative part in its constitution, or next appendage.

11. 2. When the action or state is propounded to us onely upon the account of reward, and there is no penalty annexed, then it is a Counsel and no law: for there is no legislative power where there is no coercitive; and it is but a precarious Government, where the lawgiver cannot make the Subject either doe good or suffer evil: and therefore the Jus gladii and the merum Imperium are all one: and he that makes a law and does not compell the involuntary does but petition the Subject to obey, and must be content he shall doe it when he hath a mind to it. But therefore as soon as men made laws, and liv'd in communities, they made swords to coerce the private, and warres to restrain the publick irregularities of the world.

——dehinc absistere bello,
Oppida caperunt munire, & condere leges,
Nè quis fur esset, neu latro, neu quis adulter.

For it was impossible to preserve justice, or to defend the innocent, or to make obedience to laws if the Consuls lay aside their rods and axes: and so it is in the Divine laws; the Divine power and the Divine wisedome makes the Divine laws, and fear is the first Sanction of them: it is the beginning of all our wisedome; and all humane power being an imitation of and emanation from the Divine power is in the summe of affairs nothing but this, habere potestatem gladii ad animadvertendum in facinorosos homines, and therefore we conclude it to be no law, to the breaking of which no penalty is annexed: and therefore it was free to S. Paul to take or not to take wages of the Corinthian Church; for if he had taken it, it had been nothing but the making of his glorying void; that is, he could not have had the pleasure of obliging them by an uncommanded instance and act of kindness. Hope and reward is the endearment of Counsels; fear and punishment are the ligatures of laws.

12. 3. In Counsels sometimes the contrary is very evil: Thus to be industrious and holy, zealous and prudent in the offices Ecclesiastical, and to take holy orders in the daies of persecution and discouragement, is an instance of love (I doubt not) very pleasing and acceptable to God, and yet he that suffers himself to be discouraged from that particular employment, and to divert to some other instance in which he may well serve God, may remain very innocent or excusable: But those in the Primitive Church who so fear'd the persecution or the imployment that they cut off their thumbs or ears to make themselves canonically incapable, were highly culpable; because he that does an act contrary to the design of a Counsel Evangelical, is an enemy to the vertue and the grace of the intendment: He that onely lets it alone does not indeed venture for the greater reward, but he may pursue the same vertue in another instance or in a less degree, but yet so as may be accepted. He that is diverted by his fear and danger, and dares not venture, hath a pityable but in many cases an innocent infirmity: but he that does against it, hath an inexcusable passion; and is so much more blameable then the other, by how much a fierce enemy is worse then a cold friend, or a Neuter more tolerable then he that stands in open hostility and defiance. But in laws, not onely the contrary, but even the privative is also criminal; for not onely he that oppresses the poor is guilty of the breach of charity, but he that does not releeve them; because there is in laws an affirmative and a negative part; and both of them have obligation; so that in laws both omissions and commissions are sins, but where nothing is faulty but a contrariety or hostility, and that the omission is innocent, there it is only a Counsel.

13. 4. In internal actions there is properly and directly no Counsel, but a law onely: Counsels of perfections are commonly the great and more advantageous prosecutions of an internal grace or vertue: but the inward cannot be hindred by any thing from without, and therefore is capable of all increase and all instances onely upon the account of love; the greatest degree of which is not greater then the Commandement: and yet the least degree if it be sincere is even with the Commandement: because it is according to the capacity and greatness of the Man. But the inward grace in all its degrees is under a law or Commandement, not that the highest is necessary at all times, and to every person; but that we put no positive barrs or periods to it at any time, but love as much as we can to day, and as much as we can to morrow, and ſtill the duty and the words to have a current ſenſe: and [as much as we can] muſt ſignifie ſtill more and more; now the uſing of direct and indirect min ſteries for the increaſing of the inward grace, this I ſay becauſe it hath in it materiality and an external part, and is directly ſubjicible to the proper Empire of the will, this may be the matter of Counſel in the more eminent and zealous inſtances, but the inward grace directly is not. To be juſt conſiſts in an indiviſible point, and therefore it is alwaies a law, but if to ſignifie and act our juſtice we give that which is due, and a great deal more to make it quite ſure, this is the matter of Counſel; for it is the external proſecution of the inward grace, and although this hath no degrees, yet that hath; and therefore that hath liberty and choice, whereas in this there is nothing but duty and neceſſity.

Rule 13.

Some things may be uſed in the ſervice of God which are not commanded in any Law, nor explicitely commended in any doctrine of Jeſus Chriſt.

1. THIS Rule is intended to regulate the Conſcience in all thoſe queſtions which ſcrupulous and ſuperſtitious people make in their inquiries for warranties from Scripture in every action they doe; and in the uſe of ſuch actions in the ſervice of God, for which particulars becauſe they have no word, they think they have no warrant, and that the actions are ſuperſtitious. The inquiry then hath two parts;

1. Whether we are to require from Scripture a warrant for every action we doe, in common life?

2. Whether we may not doe or uſe any thing in religion, concerning which we have no expreſs word in Scripture, and no Commandement at all?

1. Concerning the firſt the inquiry is but ſhort, becauſe there is no difficulty it but what is made by ignorance and jealouſie; and it can be anſwer'd and made evident by common ſenſe and the perpetual experience and the Natural neceſſity of things. For the laws of Jeſus Chriſt were intended to regulate humane actions in the great lines of Religion, juſtice and ſobriety, in which as there are infinite particulars which are to be conducted by reaſon and by analogy to the laws and Rules given by Jeſus Chriſt; ſo it is certain that as the general lines and rules are to be underſtood by reaſon how far they doe oblige, ſo by the ſame we can know where they doe not. But we ſhall quickly come to iſſue in this affair. For if for every thing there is a law or an advice; let them that think ſo find it out and follow it. If there be not for everything ſuch proviſion, their own needs will yet become their lawgiver and force them to do it without a law. Whether a man ſhall ſpeak French or Engliſh? whether baptiſed perſons are to be dipt all over the body, or will it ſuffice that the head be plunged? whether thrice or once? whether in water of the ſpring, or the water of the pool? whether a man ſhall marry, or abſtain? whether eat eat flesh or herbs; chooſe Titius, or Caius for my friend; be a Scholar or a Merchant; a Phyſician or a Lawyer; drink wine or ale; take Phyſick for prevention, or let it alone; give to his Servant a great penſion, or a competent; what can the Holy Scriptures have to doe with any thing of theſe, or any thing of like Nature and indifferency?

2. For by nature all things are indulged to our uſe and liberty; and they ſo remain till God by a ſupervening law hath made reſtraints in ſome inſtances to become matter of obedience to him, and of order and uſefulneſs to the world; but therefore where the law does not reſtrain, we are ſtill free as the Elements, and may move as freely and indifferently as the atomes in the eye of the Sun. * And there is infinite difference between law and lawful; indeed there is nothing that is a law to our Conſciences but what is bound upon us by God, and conſign'd in holy Scripture (as I ſhall in the next Rule demonſtrate) but therefore every thing elſe is permitted, or lawful, that is, not by law reſtrain'd: liberty is before reſtraint; and till the fetters are put upon us we are under no law and no neceſſity, but what is natural. * But if there can be any natural neceſſities, we cannot chooſe but obey them, and for theſe there needs no law or warrant from Scripture. No Maſter needs to tell us or to give us ſigns to know when we are hungry or athirſt; and there can be as little need that a lawgiver ſhould give us a comand to eat when we are in great neceſſity ſo to doe. * Every thing is to be permitted to its own cauſe and proper principle; Nature and her needs are ſufficient to cauſe us to do that which is for her preſervation; right reaſon and experience are competent warrant and inſtruction to conduct our affairs of liberty and common life; but the matter and deſign of laws is Honeſtè vivere, alterum non lædere, ſuum cuiq; tribuere; or as it is more perfectly deſcrib'd by the Apoſtle, that we ſhould live a godly, a righteous, a ſober life; and beyond theſe there needs no law: when nature is ſufficient Jeſus Chriſt does not interpoſe, and unleſſe it be where reaſon is defective or violently abus'd, we cannot need laws of ſelf-preſervation, for that is the ſanction and great band and indearment of all laws: and therefore there is no expreſs law againſt ſelf-murder in all the new Teſtament; onely it is there and every where elſe by ſuppoſition; and the laws take care to forbid that, as they take care of fools and madmen, men that have no uſe or benefit of their reaſon or of their natural neceſſities and inclinations muſt be taken under the protection of others; but elſe when a man is in his wits, or in his reaſon, he is defended in many things, and inſtructed in more without the help or need of laws: nay it was need and reaſon that firſt introduced laws; for no law, but neceſſity and right reaſon taught the firſt ages, to meet and dwell in communities, to make covenants and laws, to eſtabliſh equal meaſures, to doe benefit interchangeably, to drive away publick injuries by common armes, to join houſes that they may ſleep more ſafe: and ſince laws were not the firſt inducers of theſe great tranſactions, it is certain they need not now to inforce them, or become our warrant to do that without which we cannot be what we cannot chuſe but deſire to be. But

3. But if nothing were to be done but what we have Scripture for, either commanding or commending, it were certain that with a leſs hyperbole then S. John us'd, the world could not contain the books which ſhould be written; and yet in ſuch infinite numbers of laws and ſentences no man could be directed competently becauſe his Rule and guide would be too big; and every man in the inquiry after lawful and unlawful would be juſt ſo enlightned as he that muſt for ever remain blind unleſs he take the Sun in his hand to ſearch into all the corners of darkneſs, no candleſtick would hold him, and no eye could uſe him. But ſuppoſing that in all things we are to be guided by Scripture, then from thence alſo let us inquire for a conduct or determination even in this inquiry; whether we may not doe any thing without a warrant from Scripture? and the reſult will be that if we muſt not doe any thing without the warrant of Scripture; then we muſt not for every thing look in Scripture for a warrant; becauſe we have from Scripture ſufficient inſtruction that we ſhould not be ſo fooliſh and importune as to require from thence a warrant for ſuch things in which we are by other inſtruments competently inſtructed, or left at perfect liberty.

4. Thus S. Paul affirmes, All things are lawful for me; he ſpeaks of meats and drinks, and things left in liberty concerning which becauſe there is no law, and if there had been one under Moſes, it was taken away by Chriſt, it is certain that every thing was lawful, becauſe there was no law forbidding it: and when S. Paul ſaid, This ſpeak I, not the Lord; he that did according to that ſpeaking, did according to his own liberty, not according to the word of the Lord; and S. Pauls ſaying in that manner is ſo far from being a warranty to us from Chriſt; that becauſe he ſaid true, therefore we are certain he had no warranty from Chriſt, nothing but his own reaſonable conjecture. * But when our Bleſſed Saviour ſaid and why of your ſelves doe ye not judge what is right? he plainly enough ſaid that to our own reaſon and judgement many things are permitted, which are not conducted by laws or expreſs declarations of God.

Adde to this that becauſe it is certain in all Theology, that whatſoever is not of faith is ſin, that is, whatſoever is done againſt our actual perſuaſion becomes to us a ſin, though of it ſelf it were not; and that we can become a law unto our ſelves, by vows and promiſes, and voluntary engagements and opinions, it follows that thoſe things which of themſelves inferre no duty, and have in them nothing but a collateral and accidental neceſſity, are permitted to us to doe as we pleaſe, and are in their own nature indifferent, and may be ſo alſo in uſe and exerciſe: and if we take that which is the leſs perfect part in a Counſel Evangelical, it muſt needs be ſuch a thing as is neither commanded nor commended, for nothing of it is commanded at all; and that which is commended is the more not the leſs perfect part; and yet that we may doe that leſs perfect part, of which there is neither a Commandement, nor a commendation but a permiſſion only appears at large in S. Pauls diſcourſe concerning Virginity and Marriage 1 Corinth. 7. 6, 37. But a permiſſion is nothing but a not prohibiting, and that is lawful which is not unlawful, and every thing may be done that is not forbidden: and there are very many things which are not forbidden, nor commanded; and therefore they are onely lawful and no more.

5. But the caſe in ſhort is this; In Scripture there are many laws and precepts of holineſs, there are many prohibitions and ſevere cautions againſt impiety: and there are many excellent meaſures of good and evil, of perfect and and imperfect: * whatsoever is good, we are oblig'd to pursue; * whatsoever is forbidden must be declin'd; * whatsoever is laudable must be lov'd, and followed after. Now if all that we are to doe can come under one of these measures, when we see it, there is nothing more for us to doe but to conform our actions accordingly. But if there be many things which cannot be fitted by these measures, and yet cannot be let alone; it will be a kind of madnesse to stand still, and to be useless to our selves and to all the world, because we have not a command or a warrant to legitimate an action which no Lawgiver ever made unlawful.

6. But this folly is not gone far abroad into the world; for the number of mad-men is not many, though possibly the number of the very wise is less: but that which is of difficulty is this,

Quest. Whether in matters of religion we have that liberty as in matters of common life? or whether is not every thing of religion determined by the Lawes of Jesus Christ, or may we choose something to worship God withall, concerning which he hath neither given us Commandement or intimation of his pleasure?

Of Will-Worship.

To this I answer by several Propositions.

7. 1. All favour is so wholly arbitrary, that whatsoever is an act of favour, is also an effect of choice and perfectly voluntary. Since therefore that God accepts any thing from us is not at all depending upon the merit of the work, or the natural proportion of it to God, or that it can adde any moments of felicity to him, it must be so wholly depending upon the will of God that it must have its being and abiding onely from thence. He that shall appoint with what God shall be worshipped, must appoint what that is by which he shall be pleased; which because it is unreasonable to suppose, it must follow that all the integral, constituent parts of religion, all the fundamentals and essentials of the Divine worship cannot be warranted to us by nature, but are primarily communicated to us by revelation. Deum sic colere oportet quomodo ipse se colendum præcepit, said S. Austin. Who can tell what can please God, but God himself? for to be pleased, is to have something that is agreeable to our wills and our desires: now of Gods will there can be no signification but Gods word or declaration; and therefore by nothing can he be worship'd, but by what himself hath declar'd that he is well pleas'd with: and therefore when he sent his Eternal Son into the world, and he was to be the great Mediator between God and Man, the great instrument of reconciling us to God, the Great Angel that was to present all our prayers, the onely beloved by whom all that we were to doe would be accepted, God was pleased with voices from Heaven and mighty demonstrations of the Spirit to tell all the world that by him he would be reconcil'd, in him he would be worship'd, through him he would be invocated, for his sake he would accept us, under him he would be obeyed, in his instances and Commandments he would be lov'd and serv'd; saying, This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased.

S. Auguſt. de vera relig. c. 55. Non ſit nobis religio in phantaſmatibus noſtris. Melius eſt enim qualecũque verum quam omne quicquid arbitrio cogi poteſt. Lib. 1. de conſenſ. Evang. cap. 18.

8. 2. Now it matters not by what means God does convey the notices of his pleasure; πολυμερῶς, καὶ πολυτρόπως, in sundry wayes and in sundry manners God manifests his will unto the world: so we know it to be his will, it matters not whether by nature or by revelation, by intuitive and direct notices, or by argument or consequent deduction, by Scripture, or by tradition, we come to know what he requires and what is good in his eyes; onely we must not doe it of our own head. To worship God is an act of obedience and of duty, and therefore must suppose a Commandement; and is not of our choice, save onely that we must chuse to obey. Of this God forewarn'd his people: He gave them a Law, and commanded them to obey that intirely, without addition or diminution; neither more nor less then it, [whatsoever I command you, observe to doe it; thou shalt not adde thereto nor diminish from it] and again, [ye shall not doe after all the things that we doe here this day, every man whatsoever is right in his own eyes] that is, This is your Law that is given by God; make no lawes to your selves or to one another, beyond the measures and limits of what I have given you: nothing but this is to be the measure of your obedience and of the Divine pleasure. So that in the Old Testament there is an expres prohibition of any worship of their own chusing; all is unlawful, but what God hath chosen and declar'd.

Deuter. 12. 32. Vers. 8.

9. 3. In the New Testament we are still under the same charge; and ἐθελοθρησκεία or Will-worship is a word of an ill sound amongst Christians most generally, meaning thereby the same thing which God forbad in Deuteronomy, viz. ἕκαστος τὸ ἀρεστὸν ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ πράττῃ, as the Lxx. expresses it, when every man does that (not which God commands, or loves) but which men upon their own fancies and inventions think good, that which seems good in their own eyes, or as our Blessed Saviour more fully, teaching for doctrines the traditions, the injunctions or Commandements, of Men: the instance declares the meaning. The Pharisees did use to wash their hands before meat, cleanse the outside of cups and dishes, they wash'd when they came from the judgment hall; and these they commanded men to doe, saying that by such things God was worshipped and well pleas'd. So that these two together, and indeed each of them severally, is will-worship in the culpable sense. He that sayes an action which God hath not commanded is of it self necessary, and he that sayes God is rightly worshipped by an act or ceremony concerning which himself hath no way expres'd his pleasure, is superstitious, or a will-worshipper. The first sins against charity; the second against religion: The first sins directly against his neighbour; the second against God: The first layes a snare for his neighbours foot; the second cuts off a Dogs neck and presents it to God: The first is a violation of Christian liberty; the other accuses Christs law of imperfection. So that thus far we are certain, 1. That nothing is necessary but what is commanded by God. 2. Nothing is pleasing to God in religion that is meerly of humane invention. 3. That the commandements of men cannot become doctrines of God, that is, no direct parts of the religion, no rule or measures of conscience.

Matt. 15. 8, 9 Mark 7. 7.

10. But because there are many actions which are not under command, by which God in all ages hath been served and delighted, and yet may as truly be called ἐθελοθρησκεία or will-worship as any thing else, and the name is general and indefinite, and may signifie a new religion, or a free will-offering, an uncommanded general or an uncommanded particular, that that is, in a good sense, or in a bad, we must make a more particular separation of one from the other, and not call every thing superstitious that is in any sense a will-worship, but onely that which is really and distinctly forbidden, not that which can be signified by such a word which sometimes means that which is laudable, sometimes that which is culpable. Therefore,

What Voluntary or Uncommanded actions are Lawful or Commendable.

11. 1. Those things which men doe, or teach to be done by a probable interpretation of what is doubtful or ambiguous, are not will-worship in the culpable sense. God said to the Jewes that they should rest or keep a Sabbath upon the seventh day. How far this rest was to be extended, was to be taught and impressed not by the law, but by the interpretation of it; and therefore when the Doctors of the Jewes had rationally and authoritatively determin'd how far a Sabbath-daies journey was to extend, they who strictly would observe that measure which God describ'd not, but the Doctors did interpret, all that while were not to be blam'd, or put off with a quis requisivit? who hath requir'd these things at your hands?] for they were all that while in the pursuance and in the understanding of a Commandement. But when the Jew in Synesius who was the pilot of a ship, let go the helm in the even of his Sabbath, and did lye still till the next even, and refus'd to guide the ship though in danger of shipwrack, he was a superstitious foole, and did not expound but prevaricate the Commandement. * This is to be extended to all probable interpretations so far, that if the determination happen to be on the side of error, yet the consequent action is not superstitious if the error it self be not Criminal. Thus when the Fathers of the primitive Church did expound the sixth chapter of S. Johns Gospel of sacramental manducation; though they erred in the exposition, yet they thought they serv'd God in giving the Holy Communion to Infants: and though that was not a worship which God had appointed, yet it was not superstition, because it was (or for ought we know was) an innocent interpretation of the doubtful words of a Commandement. From good nothing but good can proceed, and from an innocent principle nothing but what is innocent in the effect. In fine, Whatsoever is an interpretation of a Commandement is but the way of understanding Gods wil, not an obtruding of our owne; alwayes provided the interpretation be probable, and that the glosse doe not corrupt the text.

12. 2. Whatsoever is an equal and reasonable definition or determination of what God hath left in our powers, is not an act of a culpable will-worship or Superstition. Thus it is permitted to us to chuse the office of a Bishop, or to let it alone; to be a Minister of the Gospel, or not to be a Minister. If a man shall suppose that by his own abilities, his inclination, the request of his friends, the desires of the people, and the approbation of the Church, he is called by God to this Ministery, that he should please God in so doing, and glorify his Name, although he hath no command or law for so doing, but is still at his liberty, yet if he will determine himself to this service, he is not superstitious or a will-worshipper in this his voluntary and choſen ſervice, becauſe he determines by his power and the liberty that God gives him, to a ſervice which in the general is pleaſing to God; ſo that it is but voluntary in his perſon, the thing it ſelf is of Divine inſtitution.

13. 3. Whatſoever is done by prudent Counſel about thoſe things which belong to piety and charity, is not will-worſhip or ſuperſtition. Thus when there is a Commandement to worſhip God with our body; if we bow the head, if we proſtrate our ſelves on the ground, or fall flat on our face, if we travail up and down for the ſervice of God, even to wearineſs and diminution of our ſtrengths, if we give our bodies to be burned, though in theſe things there is no Commandement, yet neither is there ſuperſtition, though we deſigne them to the ſervice of God, becauſe that which we doe voluntarily is but the appendage, or the circumſtance, or the inſtance of that which is not voluntary but impoſed by God.

14. 4. Every inſtance that is Uncommanded if it be the act or exerciſe of what is commanded, is both of Gods chooſing and of mans, it is voluntary and it is impoſed; this in the general, that in the particular. Upon this account, the voluntary inſtitution of the Rechabites in drinking no wine and building no houſes, but dwelling in Tents, was pleaſing to God; becauſe although he no where requir'd that inſtance at their hands, yet becauſe it was an act or ſtate of that obedience to their Father Jonadab which was injoyn'd in the fifth Commandement, God lov'd the thing, and rewarded the men. So David powr'd upon the ground the waters of Bethlehem which were the price of the young mens lives; he powred them forth unto the Lord: and though it was an Uncommanded inſtance, yet it was an excellent act, becauſe it was a ſelf denial and an act of mortification. The ὑπερεκα τῶ νομυ, the abundant expreſſions of the duty contained in the Law, though they be greater then the inſtances of the Law, are but the zeale of God, and of religion; the advantages of lawes, and the enlargements of a loving and obedient heart. Charity is a duty, and a great part of our Religion. He then that builds almes-houſes, or erects hoſpitals, or mends high wayes, or repairs bridges, or makes rivers navigable, or ſerves the poor, or dreſſes children, or makes meat for the poor, cannot (though he intends theſe for Religion) be accuſed for will-worſhip; becauſe the lawes doe not deſcend often to particulars, but leave them to the conduct of reaſon and choice, cuſtome and neceſſity, the uſages of ſociety and the needs of the world. That we ſhould be thankful to God, is a precept of natural and eſſential religion; that we ſhould ſerve God with portions of our time, is ſo too: But that this day, or to morrow, that one day in a week, or two, that we ſhould keep the anniverſary of a bleſſing, or the ſame day of the week, or the return of the moneth, is an act of our will and choice; it is the worſhip of the will, but yet of reaſon too and right religion. Thus the Jewes kept the feaſt of Purim, the feaſt of the fourth, the fifth, the ſeventh, the tenth moneth, the feaſt of the dedication of the Altar; and Chriſt obſerv'd what the Maccabees did inſtitute: and as it was an act of piety and duty in the Jewes to keep theſe feaſts, ſo it was not a will-worſhip or ſuperſtition in the Maccabees to appoint it, becauſe it was a purſuance of a general Commandement by ſymbolical but uncommanded inſtances. Thus it is commanded to all men to pray: but when Abraham firſt inſtituted morning prayer; and Iſaac appointed in his family family the Evening prayer, and Daniel prayed three times a-day, and David seven times, and the Church kept her Canonical houres, Nocturnal and Diurnal Offices, and some Churches instituted an Office of forty houres, and a continual course of prayer, and Solomon the perpetual ministery of the Levites, these all doe and did respectively actions which were not nam'd in the Commandement; but yet they willingly and choosingly offer'd a willing but an acceptable sacrifice, because the instance was a daughter of the law, incouraged by the same reward, serving to the same end, warranted by the same reason, adorn'd with the same piety, eligible for the same usefulness, amiable for the same excellency, and though not commanded in the same tables, yet certainly pleasing to him who as he gave us lawes for our rule, so he gives us his Spirit for our Guide, and our Reason as his Minister.

15. 5. Whatsoever is aptly and truly instrumental to any act of vertue or grace, though it be no where signified in the law of God, or in our religion, is not will-worship in the culpable sense. I remember to have read that S. Benedict was invited to break his fast in a Vineyard: he intending to accept the invitation betook himself presently to prayer; adding these words, Cursed is he who first eates before he prayes. This religion also the Jewes observ'd in their solemn dayes; and therefore wondred and were offended at the Disciples of Christ because that early in the morning of the Sabbath they eate the ears of corn. This and any other of the like nature may be superadded to the words of the law, but are no criminal will-worship, because they are within the verge and limits of it; they serve to the ministeries of the chief house. Thus we doe not finde that David had receiv'd a Commandement to build a Temple; but yet the prophet Nathan told him from God, that he did well because it was in his heart to build it: It was therefore acceptable to God because it ministred to that duty and religion in which God had signified his pleasure. Thus the Jewes serv'd God in building Synagogues or places of prayer besides their Temple; because they were to pray besides their solemn times, and therefore it was well if they had less solemn places. So Abraham pleased God in separating the tenth of his possessions for the service and honour of God; and Jacob pleased the Lord of Heaven and Earth by introducing the religion of Vowes; which indeed was no new religion, but two or three excellencies of vertue and religion dress'd up with order and solemne advantages, and made to minister to the glorification of God. Thus fasting serves religion; and to appoint fasting daies is an act of religion and of the worship of God, not directly, but by way of instrument and ministery. To double our care, to intend our zeale, to enlarge our expence in the adorning and beautifying of Churches is also an act of religion or of the worship of God; because it does naturally signify or express one vertue, and does prudently minister to another; it serves religion, and signifies my love. 1 King. 8. 18.

16. 6. To abstain from the use of privileges and liberties though it be no where commanded, yet it is alwaies in it self lawful, and may be an act of vertue or religion if it be designed to the purposes of religion or charity. Thus S. Paul said he would never eat flesh while he did live rather then cause his brother to offend: and he did this with a purpose to serve God in so doing, and yet it was lawful to have eaten, and he was no where directly commanded to have abſtained; and though in ſome caſes it became a duty, yet when he extended it or was ready to have extended it to uncommanded inſtances or degrees, he went not back in his religion by going forwards in his will. Thus not to be too free in uſing or requiring diſpenſations, is a good handmaid to piety or charity, and is let into the kingdome of heaven, by being of the family and retinue of the Kings daughters, the glorious graces of the Spirit of God. Thus alſo to deny to our ſelves the uſe of things lawful in meat and drink and pleaſure, with a deſign of being exemplar to others and drawing them to ſober counſels, the doing more then we are commanded, that we be not tempted at any time to doe leſſe, the ſtanding a great way off from ſin, the changing our courſe and circumſtances of life that we may not loſe or leſſen our ſtate of the Divine grace and favour, theſe are by adoption and the right of cognation accepted as purſuances of our duty and obedience to the Divine Commandement.

17. 7. Whatſoever is proportionable to the reaſon of any Commandement and is a moral repreſentation of any duty, the obſervation of that cannot of it ſelf be ſuperſtitious. For this we have a competent warranty from thoſe words of God by the prophet Nathan to David. Thou ſhalt not build a houſe to the honour of my Name, becauſe thou art a man of blood. In proſecution of this word of God, and of the reaſonableneſſe of it, it is very warrantable that the Church of God forbids Biſhops and Prieſts to give ſentence in a cauſe of blood; becauſe in one caſe God did declare it unfit that he who was a man of blood ſhould be imployed in the building of a houſe to God. Upon this account all Undecencies, all unfitting uſages and diſproportionate ſtates or accidents are thruſt out of religion. A Prieſt may not be a fidler, a Biſhop muſt not be a ſhoomaker, a Judge muſt religiouſly abſtain from ſuch things as diſgrace his authority, or make his perſon and his miniſtery contemptible; and ſuch obſervances are very far from being ſuperſtitious, though they be under no expreſſe Commandement.

2 Sam. 7. 5. 1 Chron. 22. 8. & 28. 3.

18. 8. All voluntary ſervices, when they are obſerved in the ſenſe and to the purpoſes of perfection, are ſo farre from being diſpleaſing to God, that the more uncommanded inſtances and degrees of external duty and ſignification we uſe, the more we pleaſe God. Οἱ πνευματικοὶ πάντα πρατθουσιν ὑπομονῇ καὶ πόνῳ καὶ τοῦτο δηλοῦσι τῷ καὶ ὑπερβαίνειν τὰ ὑπαγόμενα, Spiritual men doe their actions with much paſſion and holy zeale, and give teſtimony of it by expreſſing it in the uncommanded inſtances. And Socrates ſpeaking of certain Church offices and rituals of religion, ſayes, ἐπειδὴ οὐδεὶς περὶ τούτου ἔγγραφον ἔχει παράγγελμα, δῆλον ὡς καὶ περὶ τούτου τῇ ἑκάστου γνώμῃ καὶ προαιρέσει ἐπέτρεψαν οἱ Ἀπόστολοι, ἵνα ἕκαστος μὴ φόβῳ μηδὲ ἐξ ἀνάγκης τὸ ἀγαθὸν κατεργάζοιτο, Since no man hath concerning this thing any written Commandement, it is clear that the Apoſtles permitted it to the choice of every one, that every one may doe good not by neceſſity and feare] but by love and choice. Such were the free will-offerings among the Jewes, which alwaies might expect a ſpeciall reward, ἃ γὰρ ὑπὲρ τὸν ἐντολὸν γίνεται πολλοῦ ἔχει μισθὸν καὶ τοῦτο, ἃ δὲ ἐν ἐντολῇ τάξει ἐστὶ τοιοῦτον, Thoſe things which are in the tables of the Commandement ſhall be rewarded, but thoſe which are more then theſe ſhall have a greater; the reaſon is, becauſe they proceed from a greater intenſion of the inward grace: and although the meaſures of the Commandement were therefore leſs becauſe they were to fit all capacities; yet they who goe farther, ſhew that they are nearer to the perfections of grace grace then the first and lowest measures of the Commandement, and therefore are dispos'd to receive a reward greater then they shall have who are the least in the Kingdome of Heaven. But of this I have already given accounts in the foregoing rule, and * otherwhere.

* Doctrine & pract. of Repen. cap. 1.

19. 9. The circumstance of a religious action may be undertaken or impos'd civilly without being superstitious. As to worship God is a duty which can never be a superstitious will-worship, so to worship God by bowing the head or knee towards the East or West is a circumstance of this religious worship; and of this there may be lawes made, and the circumstance be determin'd, and the whole action so clothed and vested, that even the very circumstance is in some sense religious, but in no sense superstitious; for some way or other it must be done, and every mans act is determin'd when it is vested with circumstances, and if a private will may determine it, so may a publick law, and that without fault: but of this in the sequel.

10. The summe is this: Though the instance, the act or state be uncommanded, yet it is not a culpable will-worship, if either it be a probable interpretation of a Divine Commandement, or the use of what is permitted, or the circumstance or appendage to a vertue, or the particular specification of a general law, or is in order to a grace instrumental & ministring to it, or be the defalcation or the not using of our own rights, or be a thing that is good in the nature of the thing, and a more perfect prosecution of a law or grace, that is, if it be a part or a relative of a law: if a law be the foundation, whatsoever is built upon it, growes up towards Heaven, and shall have no part in the evil rewards of superstition.

„ But that what of it self is innocent or laudable may not be spoil'd by evil „ appendages, it is necessary that we observe the following cautions.

20. 1. Whatsoever any man does in an uncommanded instance, it must be done with liberty and freedome of conscience; that is, it must not be presſed to other men as a law which to our selves is onely an act of love, or an instrument of a vertue, or the appendage and relative of a grace. It must, I say, be done with liberty of conscience, that is, without imposing it as of it self necessary, or a part of the service of God: and so it was anciently in the matter of worship towards the East: for though generally the Christians did worship toward the East, yet in Antioch they worshipped toward the West. But when they begin to have opinions concerning the circumstance, and think that abstracting from the order or the accidental advantage, there is some religion in the thing it self, then it passes from what it ought to what it ought not, and by degrees proves folly and dreames. For then it comes to be a Doctrine and injunction of men. when that is taught to be necessary which God hath left at liberty, and taken from it all proper necessity; it then changes into superstition and injustice; for it is an invading the rights of God and the rights of man; it gives a law to him that is as free as our selves, and usurps a power of making lawes of conscience, which is onely Gods subject and Gods peculiar. Dogmatizing and Censoriousnesse makes a will-worship to be indeed superstition.

Socrat. lib. 5 c. 22.

In prosecution of this it is to be added, It is as great a sin to teach for doctrines the prohibitions of Men, as the injunctions and commandements; to say that we may not doe what is lawful, as that it is necessary to doe that which is onely permitted, or is commended. He that impoſes on mens conſcience an affirmative or a negative that God hath not impoſed, is equally injurious, and equally ſuperſtitious; and we can no more ſerve or pleaſe God in abſtaining from what is innocent, then we can by doing what he hath not commanded. He that thinks he ſerves God by looking to the Eaſt when he prayes, and believes all men and at all times to be oblig'd to doe ſo, is a ſuperſtitious man: but he who believes this to be ſuperſtition, and therefore turns from the Eaſt, and believes it alſo to be neceſſary that he do not look that way, is equally guilty of the ſame folly; and is like a traveller that ſo long goes from the Eaſt, that he comes to it by his long progreſſion in the circle. If by the law of God it be not ſinful, or if by the law of God it be not neceſſary, no doctrines of men can make it ſo: to call good evil, or evil good, is equally hateful to God: and as every man is bound to preſerve his liberty that a yoke be not impoſed upon his conſcience, and he be tied to do what God hath left free; ſo he is oblig'd to take care that he be not hindred, but ſtill that he may doe it if he will. That this no way relates to humane laws I ſhall afterwards diſcourſe: I now onely ſpeak of impoſition upon mens underſtandings, not upon their wills or outward act. He that ſayes that without a ſurplice we cannot pray to God acceptably, and he that ſayes we cannot well pray with it, are both to blame; but if a poſitive law of our ſuperiour intervenes, that's another conſideration: for, quædam quæ licent, tempore & loco mutato non licent, ſaid Seneca; and ſo on the contrary, that may be lawful or unlawful, neceſſary or unneceſſary, accidentally, which is not ſo in its own nature and the intentions of God.

21. 2. Whatſoever pretends to lawfulneſs or praiſe by being an inſtrument of a vertue and the miniſter of a law, muſt be an apt inſtrument, naturally, rationally, prudently, or by inſtitution ſuch as may doe what is pretended. Thus although in order to prayer I may very well faſt, to alleviate the body & make the ſpirit more active & untroubl'd; yet againſt a day of prayer I will not throw all the goods out of my houſe, that my dining-room may look more like a Chappel, or the ſight of worldly goods may not be in my eye at the inſtant of my devotion: becauſe as this is an uncommanded inſtance, ſo it is a fooliſh and an unreaſonable inſtrument. The inſtrument muſt be ſuch as is commonly uſed by wiſe and good men in the like caſes, or ſomething that hath a natural proportion and efficacy to the effect.

22. 3. Whatſoever pretends to be a ſervice of God in an uncommanded inſtance, by being the ſpecification of a general command, or the inſtance of a grace, muſt be naturally and univocally ſuch, not equivocally and by pretenſion onely: of which the beſt ſign is this, If it be againſt any one commandement directly or by conſequent, it cannot acceptably purſue or be the inſtance of any other. Thus when the Gnoſticks abuſed their Diſciples by a pretenſe of humility, telling them that they ought by the mediation of Angels to preſent their prayers to God the Father, and not by the Son of God, it being too great a preſumption to uſe his name and an immediate addreſs to him (as S. Chryſoſtome, Theophylact, and OEcumenius report of them) this was a culpable will-worſhip, becauſe the relation it pretended to humility was equivocal and ſpurious, it was expreſly againſt an article of faith * and a Divine Commandement. So did the Pythagoreans in their pretenſions to mortification; they commanded to abſtain from marriages, marriages, from flesh, from fish, as unclean, and ministeries of sin, and productions of the Devil. Both these the Apostle reproves in his epistle to the Colossians; and therefore condemns all things of the same unreasonableness.

23. 4. All uncommanded instances of piety must be represented by their own proper qualities, effect and worthiness; that is, if all their worth be relative, they must not be taught as things of an absolute excellency, or if it be a matter of abstinence from any thing that is permitted, and that abstinence be by reason of danger or temptation, error or scandal, it must not be pressed as abstinence from a thing that is simply unlawful, or the duty simply necessary. Thus the Encratites and Manichees were superstitious persons, besides their heresie; because although they might lawfully have abstain'd from all ordinary use of wine, in order to temperance and severe sobriety, yet when they began to say, that such abstinence was necessary, and all wine was an abomination, they pass'd into a direct superstition, and a criminal wil-worship. While the Novatians denied to reconcile some sort of lapsed criminals, they did it for discipline and for the interests of a holy life, they did no more then divers parts of the Church of God did; but when that discipline, which once was useful, became now to be intolerable, and that which was onely matter of Government became also matter of doctrine, then they did that which our blessed Saviour reproved in the Pharisees, they taught for doctrines the injunctions of men, and made their wil-worship to be superstition.

24. 5. When any uncommanded instance relative to a Commandement is to be performed, it ought to be done temperately and according to its own proportion and usefulness: for if a greater zeal invites us to the action, we must not give the reins and liberty to that zeal, and suffer it to pass on as far as it naturally can; but as far as piously and prudently it ought. He that gives alms to the poor, may upon the stock of the same vertue spare all vain or less necessary expence and be a good husband to the poor, and highly please God with these uncommanded instances of duty: but then he must not prosecute them beyond the reason of his own affairs, to the ruine of his relations, to the danger of temptation. To pray is good; to keep the continual sacrifice of morning and evening devotions is an excellent specification of the duty of [pray continually:] now he that prayes more frequently does still better, but there is a period beyond which the multiplication and intension of the duty is not to extend. For although to pray nine times is more then is describ'd in any diurnal or nocturnal office; yet if a man shall pray nine and twenty times, and prosecute the excess to all degrees which he naturally can, and morally cannot, that is, ought not, his will-worship degenerates into superstition; because it goes beyond the natural and rational measures, which though they may be enlarged by the passions of Religion, yet must not pass beyond the periods of reason, and usurp the places of other duties civil and religious.

25. If these measures be observ'd, the voluntary and uncommanded actions of religion, either by their cognation to the laws, or adoption into obedience, become acceptable to God, and by being a voluntary worship, or an act of religion proceeding from the will of man, that is, from his love and from his desires to please God, are highly rewardable: εἰ γὰρ ἑκὼν τοῦτο πράσσω πράσσω, μισθὸν ἔχω, said S. Paul, If I doe this thing with a voluntary act or free choice, then I have a reward. And that no man may be affrighted

Isa. 1. 11, 12, 13 with those words of God to the Jews, who hath requir'd these things at your hands? as if every thing were to be condemned concerning which God could say, Quis requisivit? meaning, that he never had given a commandement to have it done; it is considerable, that God speaks not of voluntary, but of commanded services; he instances in such things which himself had requir'd at their hands, their sacrifices of bulls and goats, their new moons and solemn assemblies, their sabbaths and oblations: but because they were not done with that piety & holiness as God intended, God takes no delight in the outward services: so that this condemns the unholy keeping of a law, that is, observing the body, not the spirit of religion; but at no hand does God reject voluntary significations of a commanded duty, which proceed from a well-instructed and more loving spirit, as appears in the case of vows and free-will-offerings in the Law; which although they were will-worshippings, or voluntary services, and therefore the matter of them was not commanded, yet the religion was approved. And if it be objected that these were not will-worshippings because they were recommended by God in general; I reply, Though they were recommended, yet they were left to the liberty and choice of our will, and if that recommendation of them be sufficient to sanctifie such voluntary religion, then we are safe in this whole question; for so did our blessed Saviour in the Gospel, as his Father did in the Law, Qui potest capere capiat; and
1 Cor. 7. 37. he that hath ears to hear, let him hear; and so saith S. Paul, He that standeth fast in his heart, that is, hath perfectly resolved and is of a constant temper, having no necessity, but hath power over his own will, and hath judged in his heart that he will keep his virgin, doth well. But the ground of all is this; all voluntary acts of worship or religion are therefore acceptable quia fundamentum habent in lege Divina, Gods law is the ground of them; that's the Canon, and these will-worshippings are but the Descant upon the plain-song: some way or other they have their authority and ground from the law of God; For

26. Whatsoever hath its whole foundation in a persuasion that is meerly humane, and no waies relies upon the Law or the expressed will of God, that is will-worship in the criminal sense, that is, it is superstition. So the vulgar Latine and Erasmus render the word ἐθελοθρησκία, or will-worship; and they both signifie the same thing, when will-worship is so defin'd: but if it be defin'd by [a religious passion or excess in uncommanded instances relating to, or being founded in the Law and will of God,] then will-worship signifies nothing but what is good, and what is better; it is a free-will-offering ἀκριβεστάτη αἵρεσις τῆς θρησκείας, like the institution under which S. Paul was educated, the strictest and exactest sect of the religion, and they that live accordingly, are ἑκουσιαζόμενοι τῷ νόμῳ the voluntary and most willing subjects of the law. So that although concerning some instances it can be said, τὸ μὲν ἔξω ὅπ. ταγμα, this is directly a commandement; and concerning others, τὸ δὲ τῆς ἐμῆς προαιρέσεως κατόρθωμα, this is a vertuous or a right action of my choice; yet these are no otherwise oppos'd then as in and super, for the one are ἐν τῇ ἐντολῇ τάξει in the order and constitution of the commandement, the other ὑπὲρ τὴν ἐντολήν (as S. Chrysostome expresses it) are above the commandement, yet all are in the same form or category: it is within the same limits & of the same nature, and to the same ends, and and by the same rule, and of the same holinesse, and by a greater love; that's all the difference: and thus it was from the beginning of the world, in all institutions and in all religions, which God ever lov'd.

27. I onely instance in the first ages and generations of mankinde, because in them there is pretended some difficulty to the question. Abel offer'd sacrifice to God, and so did Cain; and in the dayes of Enoch men began to call upon the name of the Lord; * and a priesthood was instituted in every family, and the Major-domo was the Priest, and God was worshipped by consumptive oblations: and to this they were prompted by natural reason, and for it there was no command of God. [a] So S. Chrysostome, οὐδὲ ὑφέ τινος μαθὼν, οὐδὲ νόμου. ὑφὲ ἀπαρχῶν διαλεγομένου ταῦτα ἀκούσας, ἀλλ' οἰκοθεν καὶ παρὰ τοῦ σωζοντος διδαχθεὶς, τῳ θεῳ θυσίαν ἐκείνῳ ἀνένεγκε· Abel was not taught of any one, neither had he receiv'd a law concerning the oblation of first-fruits; but of himself and moved by his Conscience he offer'd that sacrifice: and [b] the Author of the answers ad Orthodoxos in the workes of Justin Martyr affirmes, οὐδεὶς τῶν θυσάντων τὰ ἄλογα θυσίαν τῷ θεῷ πρὸ τοῦ νόμου μετὰ τὴν θείαν διάταξιν ἔθυσε, κἂν φαίνεται ὁ θεὸς τούτῳ προσδεξάμενος τὴν ταύτης ἀπαρχὴν δι' ἀγγέλων τὸν θυσαντα εὐάρεστον αὐτῷ, They who offer'd to God before the law the sacrifice of beasts did not do it by a Divine Commandement, though God by accepting it gave testimony that the person who offered it was pleasing to him. What these instances doe effect or prove we shall see in the sequel; in the mean time I observe that they are by men of differing perswasions us'd to contrary purposes. Some there are that suppose it to be in the power of men to appoint new instances and manners of religion, and to invent distinct matters and formes of Divine worship; and they suppose that by these instances they are warranted to say, that we may in religion doe whatsoever by Natural reason we are prompted to; for Abel and Cain and Enoch did their services upon no other account. Others that suspect every thing to be superstitious that is uncommanded, and believe all sorts of will-worship to be criminal, say, that if Abel did this wholy by his natural reason and religion, then this religion being by the law of Nature was also a command of God; so that still it was done by the force of a law, for a law of Nature being a law of God, whatsoever is done by that is necessary, not will-worship, or an act of choice and a voluntary religion.

28. Now these men divide the truth between them. For it is not true that whatsoever is taught us by Natural reason, is bound upon us by a Natural law: which proposition although I have already prov'd competently, yet I shall not omit to adde some things here to the illustration of it, as being very material to the present question and rule of Conscience. Socinus the lawyer affirm'd Reason to be the Natural law, by which men are inclin'd first, and then determin'd to that which is agreeable to reason. But this cannot be true, least we should be constrain'd to affirme that God hath left the government of the world to an uncertain and imperfect guide; for nothing so differs as the reasonings of men, and a man may doe according to

to his reaſon, and yet doe very ill. Sicut omnis citharœdi opus eſt citharam pulſare, periti verò ac probè docti rectè pulſare: ſic hominis cujuſcunq; eſt agere cum ratione, probi verò hominis eſt rectè cum ratione operari. So Ariſtotle. Ethic. l. 1. c. 7. It is the work of every Muſician to play upon his inſtrument; but to play well requires art and skil: ſo every man does according to reaſon; but to doe righteous things, and according to right reaſon, muſt ſuppoſe a wiſe and a good man. The conſequent of this is, that reaſon is not the natural law, but reaſon when it is rightly taught, well ordered, truly inſtructed, perfectly commanded; the law is it that binds us to operate according to right reaſon, and commands us we ſhould not decline from it. He that does according to the natural law, or the law of God, does not, cannot doe amiſſe: but when reaſon alone is his warrant and his guide, he ſhall not alwaies find out what is pleaſing to God. And it will be to no purpoſe to ſay, that not every mans reaſon, but right reaſon ſhall be the law. For every man thinks his own reaſon right, and whole nations differ in the aſſignation and opinions of right reaſon; and who ſhall be Judge of all, but God, and he that is the Judge muſt alſo be the law-giver, elſe it will a be ſad ſtory for us to come under his Judgement, by whoſe lawes and meaſures we were not wholly directed. If God had commanded the Prieſts pectoral to be ſet with rubies, and had given no inſtrument of diſcerning his meaning but our eyes, a red cryſtal or ſtained glaſſe would have paſs'd in ſtead of rubies: But by other meaſures then by ſeeing we are to diſtinguiſh the precious ſtone from a bright counterfeit. As our eyes are to the diſtinction of viſible objects, ſo is our reaſon to ſpiritual, the inſtrument of judging, but not alone; but as reaſon helps our eyes, ſo does revelation informe our reaſon; and we have no law till by revelation or ſome ſpecifick communication of his pleaſure God hath declar'd and made a law. * Now all the law of God which we call natural is reaſon, that is, ſo agreeable to natural and congenit reaſon, that the law is in the matter of it written in our hearts before it is made to be a law. Lex eſt Naturæ vis, & ratio prudentis, juris atque injuriæ regula. So Cicero lib. 1. de leg. But though all the law of Nature be reaſon; yet whatſoever is reaſon is not preſently a law of Nature. And therefore that I may return to the inſtances we are diſcourſing of, it followes not that although Abel and Cain and Enoch did doe ſome actions of religion by the dictate of natural reaſon, that therefore they did it by the law of nature: for every good act that any man can doe is agreeable to right reaſon, but every act we doe is not by a law, as appears in all the inſtances I have given in the explication and commentaries on theſe two laſt rules. Secondly, On the other ſide it is not true, that we may doe it in religion whatſoever we are prompted to by natural reaſon. For although natural reaſon teaches us that God is to be lov'd, and God is to be worſhipped, that is, it tells us he is our ſupreme, we his creatures and his ſervants; we had our being from him, and we ſtill depend upon him, and he is the end of all who is the beginning of all, and therefore whatſoever came from him muſt alſo tend to him; and whoſoever made every thing, muſt needs make every thing for himſelf, for he being the fountain of perfection, nothing could be good but what is

is from, and for, and by, and to that fountain, and therefore that every thing must in it's way honour and serve and glorify him: now I say, although all this is taught us by natural reason, by this reason we are taught that God must be worshipped; yet that cannot tell us how God will be worshipped. Natural reason can tell us what is our obligation, because it can discourse of our nature and production, our relation and minority; but Natural reason cannot tell us by what instances God will be pleas'd with us, or prevail'd with to doe us new benefits; because no natural reason can informe us of the will of God, till himself hath declar'd that will. Natural reason tels us we are to obey God; but Natural reason cannot tell us in what positive commandements God will be obeyed, till he declares what he will command us to doe and observe. So though by Nature we are taught that we must worship God; yet by what significations of duty, and by what actions of religion this is to be done, depends upon such a cause as nothing but it self can manifest and publish.

29. And this is apparent in the religion of the old world, the religion of sacrifices and consumptive oblations; which it is certain themselves did not choose by natural reason, but they were taught and injoyn'd by God: for that it is no part of a natural religion to kill beasts, and offer to God Wine and Fat, is evident by the nature of the things themselves, the cause of their institution, and the matter of fact, that is the evidence that they came in by positive constitution. For blood was anciently the sanction of lawes and Covenants, Sanctio à Sanguine say the Grammarians; because the sanction or establishment of lawes was it which bound the life of man to the law, and therefore when the law was broken, the life or the blood was forfeited: bt then as in Covenants, in which sometimes the wilder people did drink blood, the gentler and more civil did drink wine, the blood of the grape; so in the forfeiture of lawes they also gave the blood of beasts in exchange for their own. Now that this was lesse then what was due is certain, and therefore it must suppose remission and grace, a favourable and a gracious acceptation; which because it is voluntary and arbitrary in God, less then his due, and more then our merit, no natural reason can teach us to appease God with sacrifices. It is indeed agreeable to reason that blood should be pour'd forth, when the life is to be paied, because the blood is the life; but that one life should redeem another, that the blood of a beast should be taken in exchange for the life of a man, that no reason naturally can teach us. Ego verò destinavi eum vobis in altare ad expiationem faciendam pro animis vestris: nam sanguis est qui pro anima expiationem facit, said God by Moses. The life of the flesh is in the blood; and I have given it to you upon the Altar to make an atonement for your Souls: for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the Soule: according to which are those words of S. Paul, without shedding of blood there is no remission; meaning that in the Law, all expiation of sins was by sacrifices, to which Christ by the sacrifice of himself put a period. But all this Religion of sacrifices, was (I say) by Gods appointment; Ego verò destinavi, so said God, I have design'd or decreed it: but that this was no part of a law of nature, or of prime, essential reason appears in this, * 1. Because God confin'd it among the Jewes to the family of Aaron, and that onely in the land of their own inheritance, the land of promise; which could no more be done in a natural religion then the Sun can be confin'd to a village-Chappel. * 2. Because God did expres oftentimes that he took no delight in Sacrifices of Beasts; as appears in Psalm 40. and Psal. 50. and

Pſal. 51. Iſai. 1. Jerem. 7. Hoſea 6. Micah 6. * 3. Becauſe he tells us in oppoſition to ſacrifices and external rites, what that is which is the natural and eſſential religion in which he does delight; the ſacrifice of prayer and thanksgiving, a broken and a contrite heart; that we ſhould walk in the way he hath appointed; that we ſhould doe juſtice and judgment, and walk humbly with our God: He deſires mercy and not ſacrifice, and the knowledge of God more then burnt-offerings. 4. Becauſe Gabriel the Archangel foretold that the Meſſias ſhould make the daily ſacrifice to ceaſe. 5. Becauſe for above 1600. years God hath ſuffered that nation to whom he gave the law of ſacrifices to be without Temple, or Prieſt, or Altar, and therefore without Sacrifice.

30. But then if we inquire why God gave the law of ſacrifices, and was ſo long pleas'd with it; the reaſons are evident and confeſs'd. 1. Sacrifices were types of that great oblation which was made upon the altar of the Croſſe. 2. It was an expiation which was next in kind to the real forfeiture of our own lives: it was blood for blood, a life for a life, a leſſe for a greater; it was that which might make us confeſſe Gods ſeverity againſt ſin, though not feel it; it was enough to make us hate the ſin, but not to ſink under it; it was ſufficient for a fine, but ſo as to preſerve the ſtake; it was a manuduction to the great ſacrifice, but ſuppletory of the great loſſe and forfeiture; it was enough to glorify God, and by it to ſave our ſelves; it was inſufficient in it ſelf, but accepted in the great ſacrifice; it was enough in ſhadow, when the ſubſtance was ſo certainly to ſucceed. 3. It was given the Jewes ὅπως πεζόμβοι, καὶ ὑπὸ κλοιῶ ἀγχόμβοι, τῇ πολυθέῳ πλάνῃ ἐκχῶσι, as the Author of the Apoſtolical conſtitutions affirmes, that being loaden with the expence of ſacrifices to one God, they might not be greedy upon the ſame terms to run after many: and therefore the ſame Author affirmes, before their golden calfe and other idolatries, Sacrifices were not commanded to the Jewes, but perſwaded onely; recommended, and left unto their liberty. By which we are at laſt brought to this truth, That it was taught by God to Adam, and by him taught to his poſterity, that they ſhould in their ſeveral manners worſhip God by giving to him ſomething of all that he had given us; and therefore ſomething of our time, and ſomething of our goods: and as that was to be ſpent in praiſes and celebration of his name, ſo theſe were to be given in conſumptive offerings; but the manner and the meaſure was left to choice, and taught by ſuperadded reaſons and poſitive lawes: and in this ſenſe are thoſe words to be underſtood which above I cited out of Juſtin Martyr and S. Chryſoſtom. To this purpoſe Aquinas cites the gloſſe upon the ſecond of the Coloſſians, ſaying, Ante tempus legis juſtos per interiorem inſtinctum inſtructos fuiſſe de modo colendi Deum, quos alii ſequebantur; poſtmodum verò exterioribus præceptis circa hoc homines fuiſſe inſtructos, quæ præterire peſtiferum eſt. Before the Law the righteous had a certain inſtinct by which they were taught how to worſhip God, to wit in the actions of internal religion; but afterwards they were inſtructed by outward precepts. That is, the natural religion conſiſting in praiers & praiſes, in ſubmitting our underſtandings and ſubjecting our wills, in theſe things the wiſe Patriarchs were inſtructed by right reaſon and the natural duty of Men to God: but as for all external religions, in theſe things they had a Teacher and a guide; of theſe things they were to doe nothing of their own heads. In whatſoever is from within there can be no Will-worſhip, for all that the Soul can doe is Gods right; and no act of faith or hope in God,

Num. 7.

God, no charity, no degree of charity, or confidence, or desire to please him can be superstitious. But because in outward actions there may be undecent expressions or unapt ministeries, or instances not relative to a law of God or a Councel Evangelical, there may be irregularity and obliquity, or direct excesse, or imprudent expressions, therefore they needed Masters and Teachers, but their great teacher was God. Deum docuisse Adam cultum divinum quo ejus benevolentiam recuperaret quam per peccatum transgressionis amiserat; ipsumque docuisse filios suos dare Deo decimas & primitias, said Hugo de S. Victore. God taught Adam how to worship him, and by what means to recover his favour, from which he by transgression fell (the same also is affirmed by S. Athanasius * :) but that which he addes, that Adam taught his children to give first-fruits and tenths, I know not upon what authority he affirmes it. Indeed Josephus seemes to say something against it: ὁ θεὸς ὁ τούτῳ μᾶλλον ἥδεται τῇ θυσίᾳ τοῖς αὐτομάτοις καὶ κατὰ φύσιν γεγόσιν τιμωμένῳ, ἀλλ' ὑ τοῖς καθ' ἐπίνοιαν ἀνθρώπω πλεονέκτῃ καὶ βίαν πεφυκόσι, God is not pleas'd so much in oblation of such things which the greedinesse and violence of man forces from the Earth, such as are corne and fruits; but is more pleas'd with that which comes of it self naturally and easily, such as are cattel and sheep. And therefore he supposes God rejected Cain and accepted Abel, because Cain brought fruits which were procur'd by labour and tillage; but Abel offered sheep, which came by the easy methods and pleasing ministeries of Nature. It is certain Josephus said not true, and had no warrant for his affirmative: but that which his discourse does morally intimate is very right, that the things of mans invention please not God; but that which comes from him we must give him again, and serve him by what he hath given us, and our religion must be of such things as come to us from God: it must be obedience or compliance; it must be something of meer love, or something of love mingled with obedience: it is certain it was so in the instance of Abel.

31. And this appears in those words of S. Paul, By faith Abel offer'd sacrifice: it was not therefore done by choice of his own head; but by the obedience of faith, which supposes revelation and the command or declaration of the will of God. And concerning this, in the traditions and writings of the Easterlings, we find this story. In the beginning of mankind, „ when Eve for the peopling of the world was by God so bless'd in the „ production of Children that she alwaies had twins before the birth of „ Seth, and the twins were ever male and female, that they might inter- „ changeably marry, ne gens sit unius ætatis populus virorum, lest mankinde „ should expire in one generation; Adam being taught by God did not „ allow the twins to marry, ἃς ἡ μὲν φύσις ἅμα τῇ γενέσει διῄρησα καὶ διέζευξε, „ whom nature her self by their divided birth had separated and divided; „ but appointed that Cain should marry the twin-sister of Abel, and Abel „ should marry Azron the twin-sister of Cain: But Cain thought his own „ twin-sister the more beautifull, and resolved to marry her. Adam there- „ fore wished them to inquire of God by sacrifice; which they did: and „ because Cains sacrifice was rejected, and his hopes made void, and his „ desire not consented to, he kill'd his Brother Abel; whose twin-sister „ afterwards fell to the portion of Seth, who had none of his owne. Upon this occasion sacrifices were first offered. Now whether God taught the religion of it first to Adam, or immediately to Cain and Abel, yet it is certain from the Apoſtle (upon whom we may relie, though upon the tradition of the Eaſterlings we may not) that Abel did his religion from the principle of faith; and therefore that manner of worſhipping God did not conſiſt onely in manners, but in ſupernatural myſtery; that is, all External formes of worſhipping are no parts of moral duty, but depend upon divine inſtitution and divine acceptance: and although any external rite that is founded upon a natural rule of vertue may be accepted into religion, when that vertue is a law; yet nothing muſt be preſented to God but what himſelf hath choſen ſome way or other. Superſtitio eſt quando traditioni humanæ Religionis nomen applicatur, ſaid the Gloſſe [in Coloſſ. 2.] when any tradition or invention of man is called Religion, the proper name of it is ſuperſtition; that is, when any thing is brought into Religion and is it ſelf made to be a worſhip of God, it is a will-worſhip in the Criminal ſenſe. Hanc video ſapientiſſimorum fuiſſe ſententiam, legem neque hominum ingeniis excogitatam, neque ſcitum aliquod eſſe populorum, ſed æternum quiddam, quod univerſum mundum regeret, imperandi prohibendique ſapientia. Ita principem legem illam, & ultimam mentem eſſe dicebant omnia ratione aut cogentis aut vetantis Dei, ſaid Cicero. Neither the wit of man, nor the conſent of the people is a competent warranty for any prime law; for law is an eternal thing, fit to governe the world, it is the wiſdome of God commanding or forbidding. Reaſon indeed is the aptneſs, the diſpoſition, the capacity and matter of the eternal law; but the life and forme of it is the command of God. Every plant which my Heavenly Father hath not planted ſhall be rooted up. Some plants ariſe from ſeed, ſome from ſlips and ſuckers, ſome are grafted, and ſome inoculated; and all theſe will grow, and bring forth pleaſing fruit; but if it growes wild, that is, of its own accord, the fruit is fit for nothing, and the tree is fit for burning.

Rule XIV.

The Chriſtian law both of Faith and Manners is fully contained in the Holy Scriptures; and from thence onely can the Conſcience have divine Warrant and Authority.

1. OF the perfection and fulneſs of the Chriſtian law I have already given accounts; but where this law is recorded, and that the Holy Scriptures are the perfect and onely Digeſt of it, is the matter of the preſent Rule, which is of great uſe in the Rule of Conſcience; becauſe if we know not where our Rule is to be found, and if there can be ſeveral Tables of the law pretended, our obedience muſt be by chance or our own choice, that is, it cannot be obedience, which muſt be voluntary in the ſubmiſſion, and therefore cannot be chance, and it muſt be determin'd by the ſuperior, and therefore cannot be our own antecedent choice, but what is choſen for us.

2. That the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Teſtament doe contain the whole will and law of God is affirmed by the primitive Fathers, and and by all the reformed Churches; that the Scriptures are not a perfect Rule of Faith and manners, but that Tradition is to be added to make it a full repository of the Divine will, is affirmed by the Church of Rome. For the establishing of the truth in this great rule and directory of Conscience, I shall first shew, as matter of fact, that the Church of God in all the first and best ages, when tradition could be more certain, and assent to it might be more reasonable, did nevertheless take the Holy Scriptures for their onely rule of faith and manners. 2. Next, I shall shew what use there was of Traditions. 3. That the topick of traditions, after the consignation of the Canon of Scripture, was not onely of little use in any thing, but false in many things, and therefore unsafe in all questions; and as the world grew older, traditions grew more uncertain, and the argument from tradition was intolerably worse.

3. 1. That the first ages of the Church did appeale to Scripture in all their questions, I appeale to these testimonies. S. Clemens of Alexandria hath these excellent words, Ου γὰρ ἁπλῶς ἀποφαινομένοις ἀνθρώποις προσέχομεν, οὐδὲ ἀναπεφανεῶσθαι ἐπ' ἴσης ἕξειν· εἰδ' ἐκ ἀρκεῖ μόνον ἁπλῶς εἰπεῖν τὸ δόξαν, ἀλλὰ πιστωθῆναι δεῖ τὸ λεχθὲν, ἢ τῶν ἐξ ἀνθρώπων ἀναμένωμεν μαρτυρίαν, ἀλλὰ τῇ τοῦ Κυρίου φωνῇ πιστώμεθα τὸ ζητούμενον, ἣ πασῶν ἀποδείξεων ἐχεγγυοτέρα μᾶλλον ἢ ἡμῶν ἀπόφασις ἔσται τυχόν, It is not fit that we should simply attend to the affirmatives of men, for our Nay may be as good as their Yea. But if the thing be matter of faith, and not of opinion onely, let us not stay for a testimony of man, but confirme our question by the word of God; which is the most certain of all, or is indeed rather the onely demonstration. Now that there may be no starting-hole from these words of the Saint, I onely adde this, that it is plain from the whole order of his discourse that he speakes onely of the word of God written. For the words before are these, Do they take away all demonstration, or doe they affirme that there is any? I suppose they will grant there is some; unless they have lost their senses. But if there be any demonstration, it is necessary that we make inquiry καὶ ἐκ τῶν ἀληθῶν γραφῶν ἐκμανθάνειν ἀποδεικτικῶς, and from the Scriptures to learne demonstratively. And a litle after he addes, they that imploy their time about the best things, never give over their searching after truth πρὶν ἂν τῶν ἀποδείξεων ἀπ' αὐτῶν λάβωσι τῶν γραφῶν, untill from the Scriptures they have got a demonstration. He speakes against the Gnosticks, who pretended to secret traditions from I know not who: against them he advises Christians καλαγηράσαι τὰς γραφὰς, ἀποδείξεις ἐπιζητεῖν, to wax old in the Scriptures, thence to seek for demonstrations, and by that rule to frame our lives. Clem. Alex. stromat. 7.

4. S. Basil in his Ethics defin. 26. Δεῖ πᾶν ῥῆμα ἢ πρᾶγμα πιστοῦσθαι τῇ μαρτυρίᾳ τῆς θεοπνεύστου γραφῆς, εἰς πληροφορίαν μὲν τῶν ἀγαθῶν, ἐντροπὴν δὲ τῶν πονηρῶν, whatsoever is done or said ought to be confirmed by the testimony of the Divinely-inspired Scripture; both for the ful perswasion of the good, as also for the condemnation of the evil: πᾶν ῥῆμα ἢ πρᾶγμα, that is, every thing that belongs to faith and manners, not every indifferent thing, but every thing of duty; not every thing of a man, but every thing of a Christian; not things of natural life, but of the supernatural. Which sense of his words clearly excludes the necessity of tradition, and yet intends not to exclude either liberty, or humane lawes, or the conduct of prudence.

5. To the like purpose is that of Origen: Debemus ergo ad testimonium in Matth. tract. 5. verborum quæ proferimus in doctrina, proferre ſenſum ſcripturæ, quaſi confirmantem quem exponimus ſenſum, we ought to bring Scripture for the confirmation of our expoſition: which words of his are very conſiderable to thoſe who are earneſt for our admittance of traditive interpretation of Scriptures. Concerning which in paſſing by (becauſe it will be nothing to the main inquiry, which is not how Scripture is to be underſtood, but whether being rightly underſtood it be a ſufficient rule of faith and manners) I ſhall give this account: That beſides there are (I mean in matters of faith, not in matters ritual and of government) no ſuch traditive commentaries; there being no greater variety and difference amongſt the ancient and modern writers commonly and reſpectively in any thing than in their expoſitions of Scripture; no where ſo great liberty, no where ſo little agreement; beſides this, I ſay, that they are in commentaries of Scripture to be lookt upon as ſo many ſingle perſons, becauſe there was no publick authentick commentary any where, no aſſemblies in order to any ſuch expoſitions, no tradition pretended for the ſenſe of controverted places; but they us'd right reaſon, the analogy of faith, the ſenſe of the words, and the notice of the originals, and ſo they expounded certainly or probably according as it hapned, according to that of S. Athanaſius Sunt verò etiam multi Sanctorum Magiſtrorum libri in quos ſi quis incurrat aſſequetur quodammodo ſcripturarum interpretationem, There are many bookes of the holy Doctors, upon which if one chance to light, he may in ſome meaſure attain to the interpretation of the Scriptures. But when they (according to Origens way here deſcribed) confirmed an expoſition of one place by the doctrine of another, then and then onely they thought they had the ἀπόδειξις γραφικὴ the Scripture-demonſtration, and a matter of faith and of neceſſary belief, and that this was the duty of the Chriſtian Doctors, Origen does expreſsly affirme. „ Afterwards, as „ Pauls cuſtome is he would verify from the holy Scriptures what he had „ ſaid; ſo alſo giving an example to the Doctors of the Church, that „ what they ſpeak to the people ſhould not be of their own ſenſe, but „ confirmed by divine teſtimonies: For if he, ſuch and ſo great an Apoſtle, „ did not ſuppoſe his own authority ſufficient warrant to his ſayings, unleſs he make it appear that what he ſayes is written in the Law and the „ Prophets: how much more ought we little ones obſerve this, that we „ doe not bring forth ours, but the ſentences of the holy Spirit, viz. from Scripture; for that was the practice of S. Paul, whom he in this place for that very thing propounds as imitable. And in purſuance of this example and advice, S. Cyril expreſſes himſelf perfectly, μὴ τῇ ἡμετέρᾳ εὑρεσιολογίᾳ πρόσεχε attend not to my inventions; for you may poſſibly be deceiv'd: but truſt no words, ἐὰν μὴ μάθῃς ἐκ τῶν θείων γραφῶν, unleſs thou doeſt learne it from the Divine Scriptures. And more fully yet he ſpeaks in another place; ſpeaking of faith in the H. Trinity he adviſes them to retain that Zeale in their mind, which by heads, or ſummaries is already lightly expounded to you, but if God grant, ſhall according to my ſtrength be demonſtrated to you by Scripture, Δεῖ γὰρ περὶ τῶν θείων καὶ ἁγίων τῆς πίστεως μυστηρίων μηδὲ τὸ τυχὸν ἄνευ τῶν θείων παραδιδόναι γραφῶν. For it behoves us not to deliver ſo much as the leaſt thing of the holy myſteries of faith without the Divine Scriptures, nor to be moved with probable diſcourſes. Neither give credit to me ſpeaking, unleſs what is ſpoken be demonſtrated by the holy Scriptures: ἡ σωτηρία γὰρ ἄυλη τῆς πίστεως ἡμῶν ἐκ ἐξ εὑρεσιολογίας ἀλλ' ἐξ ἀποδείξεως τῶν θείων ἐστὶ γραφῶν, for that is the ſecurity of our faith which is deriv'd not from witty inventions, inventions, but from the demonstration of divine Scriptures. Omne quod loquimur debemus affirmare de scripturis Sanctis, said S Hierome, Every thing that we speak we must prove it from the holy Scriptures; not every thing absolutely but every thing of religion, every thing of faith and manners: and if all this be not in the Scriptures, it can have no just authority. Hoc quia de scripturis authoritatem non habet cândem facilitate contemnitur quâ probatur, If it have not its warrant from Scripture, it may with as much ease be despis'd as it was offered. Where though S. Hierom speakes of a particular question, viz. whether Zecharias the son of Barachias were the Father of John the Baptist; yet it could not have been applied to this particular if it had not been true in the general, That every thing of religion may be rejected that is not prov'd from Scripture. But this is expressly affirm'd by S. Chrysostome; Nam si quid dicitur absque Scripturâ auditorum cogitatio claudicat, &c. If any thing be spoken without Scripture the thought of the hearers is lame; sometimes inclining to assent, sometimes declining; sometimes rejecting the opinion as frivolous, sometimes receiving it as probable: but when a testimony of the Divine voice proceedes from Scripture, it confirmes the speech of him that speakes, and the mind of him that heares. And upon this account it was that S. Cyril of Alexandria, being to dispute with Theodoret concerning some mysterious questions of Religion, refus'd to conferre but from the fountains of Scripture. It became him (saies he) being exercis'd in Scriptures, since his desire was to conferre with me about divine mysteryes, to speak with us onely out of the Holy Scriptures, and so to frame his discourse as becomes holy things. And I should wonder if Theodoret should doe otherwise: for he himself brings in the orthodox Christian saying to Eranistes, μή μοι λογισμὺς καὶ συλλογισμὺς ἀνθρωπίνους προσενέγκῃς· ἐγὼ γὰρ μονῃ πείθομαι τῃ θείᾳ γραφῃ· Tell not me of your logismes and syllogismes: I rely upon Scripture alone. In which short sentence he makes provision against all devices of mans inventing; but he establishes a remedy and an affirmative that is equally strong against all pretension of traditions besides Scripture, by saying that Scripture alone is the ground of his confidence, the argument of his perswasion in matters of Religion. But S. Austin establishes the same sufficient and onely rule of Scripture, and by way of instance excludes the Authority of Councels. Sed nunc nec ego Nicenum nec tu debes Ariminense tanquam præjudicaturus proferre Concilium. Neque ego hujus authoritate neque tu illius detineris: Scripturarum authoritatibus, non quorumcunque propriis, sed utrisque communibus testibus, res cum re, causa cum causa, ratio cum ratione concertet, I ought not to urge the Nicene Council, nor you that of Ariminum; as prejudging the question on either side. But let the causes be confronted, argument against argument, matter against matter, thing against thing by the authorities of Scripture, which are the witnesses common to us both. By which words, if S. Austins affirmative can prevaile, it is certain that nothing ought to be pretended for argument but Scripture in matters of Religion. For if a General Council, which is the best witness of tradition, the best expounder of Scripture, the best determiner of a question, is not a competent measure of determination, then certainly nothing else can pretend to it, nothing but Scripture. And if it be replied, that this is onely affirm'd by him in case that two Councils are or seem contrary: I answer that if Councils can be or seem contrary, so that wise and good men cannot competently insist upon their testimony, it is certain a man may be deceived, or cannot justly be determin'd by any topick but the words and consequences of Scripture; and if this be the onely probation, then it is ſufficient, that's certain. But that will be a diſtinct conſideration. In the mean time that which I intend to perſwade by theſe teſtimonies, is that the Fathers of the primitive Church did in all their myſterious inquiries of religion, in all matters of faith and manners, admit no argument but what was deriv'd from Scripture.

Ergo in terris nullum de ea re reperiri poterit judicium: de cælo quærendus eſt Judex. Sed ut perveniatur ad Cælum, cum habeamus hic in Evangelio teſtamentum? Optat. lib. 5. contr. Parmen.*

Ego ſolebam ſcripturarum qui jam Canonici appellantur, diſci hunc timorem honoremque deferre, ut nullum eorum ſcribendo errare aliquem credere: alios autem ita lego ut quantalibet ſanctitate doctrinaque polleant: non ideo verum putem quia ipſi ita ſenſerunt, ſed quia mihi vel per illos auctores Canonicos, vel probabili ratione, quod à veritate non abhorreat, perſuadere potuerunt. Vide eundem lib. ad Donatiſtas poſt collationem cap. 15. & lib. de unitate Eccleſiæ cap. 18, & 19. lib. 2. de baptiſ. contra Donatiſtas, cap. 3.

6. 2. Next to this and like it is, that the primitive Doctors did confute all hereſies from Scripture; which could no way be done, but that becauſe Rectum eſt index ſui & obliqui, that which is ſtraight will demonſtrate its own ſtraightneſs and the crookedneſſe of that which is crooked. Scripture muſt be a rule of all religion and all faith, and therefore ſufficient to reprove all vice and every hereſy. So Tertullian diſcourſes, Auſer hæreticis quæ cum Ethnicis ſapiunt, ut de Scripturis ſolis quæſtiones ſuas ſiſtant, Take from hereticks their Ethnic learning, that they may diſpute their queſtions out of Scripture onely. To this purpoſe Origen brings in the precedent of our Bleſſed Lord, from Scriptures confuting the hereſy of the Sadducees about the Reſurrection. As Chriſt did, ſic facient & Chriſti imitatores exemplis Scripturarum, quibus oportet ſecundum ſanam doctrinam omnem vocem obmuteſcere Pharaonis. So will the followers of Chriſt doe by the examples of Scriptures, which will put to ſilence every voice of Pharaoh; that is, every doctrine of the adverſaries. Plainer yet are thoſe excellent words of S. Athanaſius, ſpeaking but of a ſmall part of Scripture, even ſo much as was ſufficient to prove the articles of the Nicene Creed: Ἡ γὰρ ἐν αὐτῇ παρὰ τῶν πατέρων καλὰ τῆς θείας γραφῆς ὁμολογηθεῖσα πίστις αὐταρκὴς ἐστὶ πρὸς ἀπαλοιφὴν μὲν πάσης ἀσεβείας, σύστασιν δὲ τῆς εὐσεβείας ἐν Χριστῷ πίστεως· he ſayes, That faith which the Fathers confeſſed at Nice, according to the Holy Scriptures, was ſufficient to reprove all [heretical] impiety, and to eſtabliſh our Religion or faith in Chriſt. And therefore S. Chryſoſtome compares the Scriptures to a doore: αὗται γὰρ ἡμᾶς προσάγουσι τῷ θεῷ, καὶ τὴν θεογνωσίαν ἀνοίγουσιν .... ἵνα ἀποκλείσῃ τοῖς αἱρετικοῖς τὴν εἴσοδον, For they lead us to God, and open to us the knowledge of God, and keep hereticks from entring in. The metaphor is dogmatical and plain enough without a commentary. The Scripture muſt be the port at which every article of faith muſt goe forth, and by which every hereſy can be kept from the fold of Chriſt. Quæ ignoramus ex ea diſcimus. So Theodoret. Whatſoever we are ignorant of, we learn from thence. Nihil eſt quod nequeat Scripturis diſſolvi. So Theophylact. There is no difficulty but may be untied by the Scriptures.

Homil. 38. in John.

* Ad illud [ad docendum] in 2. Timoth. 3. ibidem.

7. The Author of the imperfect work upon S. Matthew, uſually attributed to S. Chryſoſtome, diſcourſes pertinently and extreme fully to this article. Then [when ye ſhall ſee the abomination of deſolation ſtanding in the the holy place] that is, when ye ſhall ſee impious hereſy, which is the army of Antichriſt, ſtanding in the holy places of the Church, in that time [he which is in Judæa let him flee to the mountains,] that is, they who are in Chriſtianity, let them run to the Scriptures. And why does he command all Chriſtians in that time to run to the Scriptures? Becauſe ever ſince hereſy did infeſt thoſe Churches, there can be no proof of true Chriſtianity, nor any other refuge for Chriſtians who would know the truth of faith, but that of the Divine Scripture. And a little after, Now by no meanes can he that deſires, come to know which is the true Church of Chriſt, but onely by the Scriptures.... Our Lord therefore knowing that there would be ſo great a confuſion in the laſt dayes, commands that all Chriſtians who would be eſtabliſhed in the truth of faith ſhould flye to nothing but to the Scriptures. Theſe words in ſome editions of the works of S. Chryſoſtome are ſcratch'd out by a Roman hand, to the regret of ſome of his own party, and the ſhame of them that ſuffered it or are pleaſed with it. All that I ſhall ſay to the book is this, that it is very often urg'd by the greateſt patrons of tradition to ſerve their ends in many other queſtions, and therefore cannot be rejected upon pretence of not being S. Chryſoſtom's; much leſſe upon pretence that it was written or interpolated by an Arrian; becauſe the Arrians call'd for Scripture in the uſe of the word ὁμοούσιος, but for the thing it ſelf they offer'd to be tried by tradition: and ſo did the Catholicks, as it hapned, or as the peeviſhneſs of their adverſaries, or the advantages of the queſtion did prompt them; but the Catholicks and the Arrians never did differ upon the queſtion of the ſufficiency of Scripture. But as for the book, it is liber doctus & minimè ſpernendus, ſaies Bellarmine; and ſo is this teſtimony: and the rather becauſe it is perfectly agreeing with the doctrine of the other Fathers.

De ſcript. Eccl. de S. Joh. Chryſoſt.

8. So S. Auguſtine, Contra inſidioſos errores Deus voluit ponere firmamentum in Scripturis, contra quas nullus audet loqui qui quoquo modo ſe vult videri Chriſtianum, Againſt treacherous errors God would place our ſtrength in the Scriptures; againſt which none that would any way ſeem a Chriſtian dares to ſpeak. And a little after he addes this example. When Chriſt offered himſelf to Thomas to be handled, non illi ſuffecit niſi de Scripturis confirmaret cor credentium, Chriſt thought it not enough unleſs out of the Scriptures he had confirmed the heart of the believers: proſpiciebat enim nos futuros, He foreſaw that we ſhould come after: For if they therefore believed becauſe they held and handled him, what doe we? Chriſt is aſcended into heaven, not to return but at the end of the world that he may judge the quick and the dead: whence ſhall we believe but by that by which he confirm'd them who handled him? He opened unto them the Scriptures] The Scriptures therefore are the great repoſitory and the great ſecurity of faith. They are alſo the great and the onely deletery of hereſies. So Juſtus Orgilitanus expounds that of the Canticles [take the little foxes] that is, convincite hæreticos eorúmque verſutias ſanctarum Scripturarum concludite teſtimoniis; convince hereticks, and reſtrain their ſubtleties and crafts with the teſtimonies of Holy Scriptures. And thus in fact the Fathers did conclude againſt the Gnoſticks, the Valentinians, the Marcionites, the Manichees, the Photinians, the Arrians, the Novatians, Eutichians, Eunomians, Neſtorians, Macedonians, and all the peſts of Chriſtendome. Hos percuſſit gladius. The word of God is ſharper then a two-edged ſword; and the magazines of Scripture were the armories of the Church.

Tract. 2. in Epiſt. Johan.

3. The

9. 3. The Fathers did reject whatsoever was offered as an article of faith or a Rule of manners, that was not in, or could not be proved from Scriptures. So Tertullian, Sed quoniam unum aliquod attigimus vacuæ observationis, non pigebit cætera quoque denotare, quibus meritò vanitas exprobranda est, siquidem sine ullius aut Dominici aut Apostolici præcepti authoritate fiunt. Hujusmodi enim non religioni, sed superstitioni deputantur, affectata & coacta, & curiosi potius quam rationalis officii. If you cannot shew the authority of a divine or Apostolical præcept, your office is not religion, but superstition, not a reasonable service, but curiosity, coaction or affectation. Pamelius suppos'd these words to be very dangerous against Ecclesiastical Traditions. They are indeed against all such traditions as either were meere matters of fact without command, or were postnate to the dayes of the Apostles, of which nature are almost all now in reputation and practice amongst the Romanists. But more ful yet and explicative of the former are those other words of Tertullian against Hermogenes: Whether all things were made of præexisting matter, I have no where read, let the schoole of Hermogenes shew where it is written. Si non est scriptum, timeat Væ illud adjicientibus aut detrahentibus destinatum, If it be not written, let him fear the curse of them that adde or detract to or from what is written in the Scriptures. But S. Basil is yet more decretory: φανερὰ ἔκπτωσις πίστεως, καὶ ὑπερηφανίας κατηγορία, ἢ ἀθετεῖν τι τῶν γεγραμμένων, ἢ ἐπεισάγειν τῶν μὴ γεγραμμένων, It is a manifest defection from the faith, and a conviction of pride, either to reject any thing of what is written, or to introduce any thing that is not. And therefore in pursuance of this great truth and measure of conscience, he gives this rule, πᾶν τὸ ἐκτὸς τῆς θεοπνεύστου γραφῆς ἐκ ἐκ πίστεως ὂν ἁμαρτία ἐστίν, Whatsoever is without Scripture, not deriv'd from thence, is not of faith, and therefore is a sin: and therefore every such thing S. Austin accurses; Siquis sive de Christo, sive de ejus Ecclesia, sive de quacunque alia re quæ pertinet ad fidem vitámque nostram, non dicam si nos, sed, quod Paulus adjecit, si Angelus de cælo vobis annunciaverit præterquam quod in Scripturis legalibus & Evangelicis accepistis, anathema sit, If any of us I will not say, but if any Angel (for that S. Paul added) shall say any thing of Christ or of his Church or of any other thing pertaining to faith and our life, except what we have received from the Scriptures of the Law and the Gospels, let him be Anathema. Scripturis non loquentibus quis loquetur? If the Scriptures speak not, who will speak? said S. Prosper. "All things which are delive-"red to us by the Law and the Prophets and the Apostles we receive, "acknowledge and confesse, neither doe we inquire after any thing else: "For it cannot be that beside those things which are divinely spoken by "the divine oracles of the Old and New Testament, we should say or at "all think any thing of God. So S. Cyril. These Fathers speak dogmatically, generally and peremptorily: nothing but what is in Scripture; nothing of God, nothing of Christ, nothing of his Church, nothing of any thing else. Adde to these, that by their doctrine of the sufficiency and sole use and necessity of Scripture in matters of Religion they doe exclude by name every thing that pretends against Scripture. So Theophilus Alexandrinus; Dæmonici spiritûs est instinctus sophismata humanarum mentium sequi, & aliquid extra Scripturarum authoritatem sequi, It is the instinct of the Devil to follow the inventions of mens minds, and to follow any thing without the authority of the Scriptures. No devise, no wit, no argument or invention of man is to be admittted into religion; nothing but Scriptures: but neither may traditions be received. Quæ absque authoritate thoritate & testimoniis Scripturarum quasi traditione Apostolicâ sponte reperiunt & confingunt, percutit gladius. So S. Hierome. These things which they feign as if they were traditions Apostolical, the sword shall smite, if they be without authority and testimonies from Scripture. And so S. Basil to the Question, Whether new converts are to be accustomed to the Scriptures; he answers, It is fit that every one should out of the Holy Scriptures learn what is for his use; yea it is necessary, εἰς τε πληροφορίαν τῆς θεοσεβείας, καὶ ὑπὲρ τοῦ μὴ προσεθίζωσι ἀνθρωπίναις παραδόσεσιν, both for the full certainty of godliness, and also that they may not be accustomed to humane traditions. Where it is observable, he calls all humane traditions that are not in Scripture; for if there were any divine traditions which are not in Scripture, he ought to have advis'd the learning of them besides Scripture, for the avoiding of traditions which are not divine: but the Scripture being sufficient for all, whatsoever is besides it is humane, and to be rejected. I summe up this particular with an excellent discourse of the same Saint to the same purpose: He asks a question, Whether it be lawful or profitable to any one to permit himself to doe or to speak what himself thinkes right, without the testimony of the Holy Scriptures. He answers (after the quotation of many places of Scripture) Who therefore is so mad, that of himself he dare so much as in thought to conceive any thing, seeing he wants the Holy and good Spirit for his guide, that he may be directed both in minde, in word and in action into the way of truth, or that he would remain blind without our Lord Jesus Christ who is the Sun of righteousness, &c? But because of those things which are disputed amongst us some are determin'd by the Commandement of God in holy Scripture, others are passed over in silence; as for those things which are written, there is absolutely no power at all given to any one, either to doe any of those things which are forbidden, or to omit any of those things which are commanded: since our Lord hath at once denounc'd and said, Thou shalt keep the word which I command thee this day, thou shalt not adde to it, nor take from it. For a fearful judgment is expected and a burning fire to devour them who dare any such thing. But as for those things which are pass'd over in silence, the Apostle Paul hath appointed us a rule, saying, All things are lawful to me, but all things are not expedient; all things are lawful, but all things doe not edify: Let no man seek to please himself, but every one anothers good. So that it is altogether necessary to be subject to God according to his Commandment. The summe is this, Nothing is matter of duty either in word or deed, in faith or manners, but what is written in the Scriptures: whatsoever is not written there it is left to our liberty, and we are to use it as all indifferent things are to be us'd, that is, with liberty and with charity. Now if concerning such things as these there be any traditions, it matters not; they are no part of our religion, but to be receiv'd like lawes of man, or customes, of which account is to be given in the proper place.

sacram scripturam in qua quid tenendū & quid fugiendum sit plenè invenietis, Read the holy Scriptures; in which ye shall [perfectly, or] fully find what is to be held, what is to be avoided. And again, Sancta Scriptura nostræ doctrinæ regulam figit, The Holy Scripture fixes or limits the rule of our doctrine. In hoc volumine cuncta quæ ædificant, omnia quæ erudiunt, scripta continentur, saith S. Gregory Bp. of Rome, In this volume whatsoever can instruct us, whatsoever can edify us is contained. Παῖλα τὰ παραδεδομένα ἡμῖν διὰ τε νόμου καὶ προφητῶν καὶ ἀποστόλων καὶ εὐαγγελιστῶν δεχόμεθα καὶ γινώσκομεν καὶ σέβομεν, οὐδὲν περαιτέρω τούτων ἐπιζητοῦντες, said S. Damascen; All things delivered to us by the Law and the Prophets, the Apostles and Evangelists, we receive and know and reverence, looking for nothing beyond these. "And to "bring in any thing that is a stranger to Scripture Theodoret calls it an ex- "tinguishing of the Spirit; something contrary to that duty whereby we "are oblig'd to stirre up the grace of God we have received. "For the "Church of Christ dwells in and possesses assemblies in all the world being "joyn'd by the unity of the Spirit, and hath cities of the Law and the Pro- "phets, of the Gospel and Apostles, she departs not out of her own bounds, "that is, from the Holy Scriptures, but retains her first possession. So S. Hierome. And in his commentary on Psal. 86. (if he be the Author of it, as Rupertus affirmes,) expounding those words, Dominus narrabit in Scriptura populorum & principum horum qui fuerunt in ea, he sayes, [Et principum] hoc est Apostolorum & Evangelistarum: [horum qui fuerunt in ea] videte quid dicat, Qui fuerunt, non qui sunt, ut exceptis Apostolis, quodcunque aliud postea dicitur, abscindatur, non habeat postea autoritatem. Quam vis ergo Sanctus sit aliquis post Apostolos, quamvis disertus sit, non habet autoritatem, quoniam Dominus narrat in Scriptura populorum & principum qui fuerunt in ea. "The "Princes of the people] that is, the Apostles and Evangelists: [of them "which have been in her] which have been, not which are in her; that "excepting what the Apostles say, every thing after them may be cut off, it "hath after them no authority. For if there be any wise man, any Saint "after the Apostles, he hath no authority; because our Lord saith in the Scripture or writing of the princes that have been in her. Sufficit Divina Scriptura ad faciendū eos qui in illa educati sunt sapientes, & probatissimos, & sufficientissimam habentes intelligentiam; indigemusque ad hoc prorsus nihil externis Magistris. So S. Cyril of Alexandria. "The divine Scripture is suf- "ficient to make them who are educated in it wise and most approv'd and "having a most sufficient understanding, and be sides this we need no exter- nal Masters. To the same purpose is that of Anastasius of Antioch, Quòd quæ silentio præteriit Scriptura divina non sint scrutanda, perspicuum: Omnia enim quæ faciunt ad nostrā utilitatem dispensavit & administravit Spiritus sanctus: "It is manifest that those things are not to be inquir'd into which the "Scripture hath pass'd over with silence. For the holy Spirit hath dispen- "sed to us and administred all things which conduce unto our profit. *Quic- quid est de verbo Dei, quicquid sciri vel prædicari oportet, de Incarnatione, de vera Divinitate & Humanitate filii Dei, duobus ita continetur Testamentis, ut extra hæc nihil sit quod annunciari debeat aut credi. "comprehended in theſe, which we muſt ſo firmely believe, that beſides "theſe it is not lawful for us to hear either Man or Angel: and indeed it were not to be imagin'd how the Scripture ſhould be a Canon or Rule to Chriſtians, if it were ſo imperfect that it did not contain the meaſures of faith and manners. Κανών ἐστι μέτρον ἀδιάψευστον πᾶσαν πρόθεσιν καὶ ἀφαίρεσιν ἐδαμῶς ἐπιδεχόμενον, ſaid Varinus, A Rule or Canon is an unerring meaſure, which at no hand can receive addition or ſuffer diminution. And S. Baſil reproved the heretick Eunomius for folly beſides his falſe doctrine, becauſe that he affirm'd tradition of the Fathers to be the Gnomon or Canon of faith, and yet ſaid προσθήκης ἀκριβεστέρας δεῖσθαι, that it wanted ſome additament to make it exact; one part contradicts the other. Ὁ κανὼν ὅτε προσθεσιν ἔτε ἀφαίρεσιν δέχεται, ἐπεὶ τὸ κανὼν εἶναι ἀπόλυσι, ſaith S. Chryſoſtome, If any thing be put to it, or taken from it; it ceaſes to be a Canon. And therefore Scriptures are not the Chriſtian Canon, they are not Canonical, if they need to be ſupplied by traditions. Homil. 12. in 3. Philip.

11. 5. Whatſoever Chriſt taught to his Apoſtles by his Sermons and by his Spirit, all that the Apoſtles taught to the Church, and ſet it down in writing.

This we learn from S. Irenæus, Non per alios diſpoſitionem ſalutis noſtræ cognovimus quàm per eos per quos Evangelium pervenit ad nos, quod quidem hinc præconiaverunt, poſtea verò per Dei voluntatem in Scripturis nobis tradiderunt, fundamentum & columnam fidei noſtræ futurum. We have known the Oeconomy of our ſalvation by no other but by thoſe by whom the Goſpel came to us; which truly they then preach'd, but afterwards by the will of God deliver'd to us in the Scriptures, which was to be the pillar and ground to our faith:] viz. what the Church was afterwards to miniſter, the Scriptures did conſigne, and both of them were pillars and grounds of faith, the Church λειτουργικῶς, the Scriptures αὐθεντικῶς, the Church by way of Miniſtery, the Scriptures by their Authority. To this purpoſe are thoſe words of S. Auſtin, Cum multa feciſſet Dominus Jeſus, non omnia ſcripta ſunt, ſicut idem ipſe ſanctus Evangeliſta teſtatur, multa Dominum & dixiſſe & feciſſe quæ ſcripta non ſunt: electa ſunt autem quæ ſcriberentur quæ ſaluti credentium ſufficere videbantur. Our Lord Jeſus did doe many things which are not written; and the Holy Evangeliſt does witneſs that he both did and ſpake many things which are not written: but thoſe things which were ſeen to ſuffice to the ſalvation of believers were choſen to be written. And therefore S. Auſtin and Optatus compare the Scriptures to the Will of the Teſtator: concerning his goods the kinred may ſtrive, one affirming this, and another that; but proferte tabulas, ſhew the Will, peruſe the writings; then the Judge liſtens, the Advocates are ſilent, the people are in ſuſpence, the litigants wait: let The teſtators words be read, that muſt end all contention. Now this Will was therefore conſign'd in writing, that when our Teſtator was gone from us we might not doubt concerning his Legacies and his Commandments. The ſame is by Nicephorus particularly affirm'd of S. Paul, Quæ præſens oratione ſuâ dilucidè docuerat, eadem per compendium abſens in memoriam revocans per epiſtolas dedit. The things which he plainly and explicitely preach'd, he being abſent, to recal into their memory what he had delivered, ſet them down in his Epiſtles as in a ſummary. And S. Peter having (as appeares in his Epiſtle) promiſed to doe ſomething to put put them in mind after his deceaſe (meaning to remind them of the doctrine delivered) cauſed S. Mark to write his Goſpel.

12. Thus I have ſufficiently demonſtrated the Rule ſo far as this topick can extend; that is by matter of fact, and the doctrine of the Church. For if Tradition be regardable, then that the Scriptures are a ſufficient and a perfect Rule of Faith and Manners is competently prov'd by that which our adverſaries in this queſtion pretend to regard: but if Tradition be not conſiderable, then the Scriptures alone are; and there is indeed no Tradition ſo clear, ſo regular, ſo unreprovable as thoſe which are concerning Scripture. That theſe books are Scripture, that is, the written word of God, and that the written word of God is all that we have of Gods will, is univerſally delivered by the Chriſtian, and of that which of late is queſtion'd I have given a ſpecimen: for if the concurrent teſtimony of ſo many Fathers cannot perſwade this article, then the topick of Tradition will be wholly uſeleſs in all queſtions; but if they can, as indeed they ought in this queſtion, then we are fix'd upon this great rule of Conſcience; the Holy Scriptures are the great Rule of Conſcience both in doctrines of Faith, and in doctrines of Manners.

13. 2. The next inquiry is what uſe there is of Traditions, and if they cannot be a part of the Rule, what aides doe they bring to the Conſcience in faith or manners.

14. 1. To this I anſwer, that Tradition is of great uſe for the conveying of this great Rule of Conſcience, the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Teſtament. For when I affirm that the Holy Scriptures are a perfect rule of faith and manners, that is, that they contain all the word of God; it is to be underſtood, that it is a rule, a perfect rule to them who believe them to be the word of God. For the queſtion is not whether Scriptures be a Rule, but whether they be a perfect Rule: not whether they be the word of God, but whether they be all the word of God that is of neceſſity to be preach'd to the Church. So that the Traditions concerning Scripture it ſelf, being extrinſecal to Scripture, are alſo extrinſecal to the queſtion: and ſuppoſing that Tradition were the onely inſtrument of conveying Scripture to us; yet that Tradition muſt not, cannot poſſibly be any part of the queſtion, for Scripture muſt be ſuppos'd as deliver'd to us and accepted for the word of God, before we can inquire whether this Scripture ſo delivered be all the word of God or no. And indeed Tradition of Scripture is the hand that reaches forth this repoſitory of the Divine word, but it ſelf is not directly any part of it; it miniſters to the will of God, but is no part of the matter of it: and therefore the common pretence for the neceſſity of Tradition beſides Scripture (becauſe by univerſal Tradition we underſtand theſe to be the books of Scripture) will come to nothing, becauſe the queſtion of the plenitude of Scripture is after the admiſſion of that tradition which reports Scripture to us to be the word of God: but it matters not how or why we believe it, whether by univerſal or particular Tradition, whether becauſe my Prieſt tells me ſo or my Father, whether I am brought into it by reaſon or by education, by demonſtrative or by probable inducements: if it be believed heartily it is ſufficient; and then it is that we affirme the Scriptures ſo believ'd to be the word of God, to be a perfect Rule of all that we are to think or ſpeak or doe in order to Salvation.

15. 2. Beſides this, to inquire of what uſe traditions are is to no purpoſe for us, for there is no tradition of any doctrine of Faith or Rule of life but what is in Scripture; but if there were, Traditions would be of the ſame uſe as Scripture is, if the tradition were from Chriſt and his Apoſtles, and were as certain, as univerſal, as credible as that is by which we are told that Scripture is the word of God. For the word which is now written was firſt delivered, that which is now Scripture was at firſt tradition; and becauſe it was afterwards call'd ſo, it hath been made uſe of by theſe perſons, who, knowing that the change of words in deſcending Ages is leaſt diſcerned by mankind, and that from words which are fewer then things moſt advantages can be made by them who love every thing better then truth, have pretended every ſaying of the Scripture and Fathers, in which Tradition is us'd, to be a competent argument of the imperfection of Scripture, and of the neceſſity of a ſupply to be made by tradition.

16. Παράδοσις, Tradition, is any way of communicating the notice of a thing to us: Παρέδωκα ὑμῖν ὅτι Χριστὸς ἀπέθανεν ὑπὲρ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ἡμῶν, I have delivered to you that Chriſt died for our ſins. But this tradition is alſo in Scripture: ſo S. Paul addes that Chriſt died for our ſins, κατὰ τὰς γραφὰς according to the Scriptures; and he commands the Theſſalonians to preſerve the traditions which they had learned from his mouth or from his hand, from his preaching or his writings: and this uſe of the word continued in the Church for divers Ages, even till all traditions that were not in Scripture were loſt, or made uncertain. Si ergo aut Evangelio præcipitur, aut in Apoſtolorum epiſtolis aut actibus continetur .... obſervetur divina hæc & ſancta traditio. So S. Cyprian. If this be commanded in the Goſpel, or be contained in the Epiſtles or Acts of the Apoſtles, let this Divine and holy tradition be obſerved. Such was that which S. Baſil calls παράδοσιν τοῦ βαπτίσματος the tradition of baptiſme, ἀπὸ τοῦ Κυρίου ἐν τῇ παραδόσει τοῦ σωτηρίου βαπτίσματος. ὧν δεδώκοτος. τὴν τάξιν, Our Lord himſelf having delivered or given the order in the tradition of baptiſme. And S. Irenæus calls it a tradition Apoſtolical, Chriſtum accepiſſe calicem, & dixiſſe ſanguinem ſuum eſſe, &c. That Chriſt tooke the cup, and ſaid it was his blood; and that the Barbarians did diligently keep the tradition, Credentes in unum Deum & in Chriſtum qui natus eſt ex Virgine, believing in one God and in Chriſt who was born of a Virgin. Such traditions as theſe the whole Church had before the conſignation of Scripture-Canon, and ſhe retain'd them better by help of the Scriptures. Tradition is a giving or delivering of it; and ſo long as it is a tradition of God, it is well enough: but if it comes to be your traditions, there is in them nothing of Divinity, nothing of that authority which is to preſcribe in faith and holineſs. So that in ſhort the thing is this;

Lib. 3. cap. 4.

If God by his Son or by his Apoſtles, or any way elſe, hath taught his Church, there is no diſputing of it, let it be made appear that it is a tradition of God, whether written or unwritten, it matters not. If it cannot be made to appear, then idem eſt non eſſe & non apparere, it is not obliging to us: we cannot follow the light of a candle that is hid in a dark lanthorn, or thruſt into a buſhel. But that there is nothing of Faith and manners which the Church of God ever did hold neceſſary, or ought to have held neceſſary, but what is in the Scriptures, I have already largely prov'd, and ſhall in the conſequents illuſtrate with other collateral lights.

In

17. In the mean time it ought to be known that in the first ages of the Church the Fathers disputing with Hereticks did oftentimes urge against them the constant and universal tradition of the Church · and it was for these reasons. 1. Because the Hereticks denied the Scriptures : so did the Manichees reject the four Gospels; Ebion received onely S. Matthews Gospel, Cerinthus onely S. Mark, Marcion onely S. Luke, and not all of that, Valentinus none but S. John, but the Alogi received all but that ; Cerdo, Cherinthus, Tatianus and Manichæus rejected the acts of the Apostles ; the Ebionites all S. Pauls Epistles; the Church of Rome for a long time rejected the Epistle to the Hebrews, so did Marcion; others also refus'd to admit the Epistles of S. James and S. Jude, the second of S. Peter, the second and third of S. John, as we learn from [a] Eusebius and S. [b] Hierom. Now to such men as these, and in all the interval till the whole Canon was consign'd and accepted, it was of great use to alledge Tradition, especially because the doctrine of the Scriptures was intirely and holily preach'd in all the Apostolical Churches, and by the known and universally preached doctrines they could very well refute the blasphemies of wicked and heretical persons. But in all this here is no objection, for all this tradition was nothing else but the doctrine of the holy Scriptures.

a Lib. 3. hist. cap. 25.
b Lib. de viris illustr.

18. 2. The hereticks did rely upon this topick for advantage, and would be tried by Tradition ; as hoping because there were in several Churches contrary customes, there might be differing doctrines, or they might plausibly be pretended ; and therefore the Fathers had reason to urge tradition, and to wrest it from their hands, who would fain have us'd it ill. Thus did the Carpocratians in Irenæus, When they are reprov'd from Scripture, they accuse the Scriptures, as if they were not right, as if they had no authority, as if from them truth could not be found by them that know not tradition : For they affirme that Jesus spake some things in mystery to his Disciples apart, and that they requir'd that they might deliver them to the worthy, and to them that would assent to them. Upon this pretence Artemon expos'd his errors, saith Eusebius, and Papias introduc'd the Millenary heresy ; and by tradition the Arians would be tried, and S. Basil was by them challeng'd in an appeal πρὸς τὴν συνήθειαν to custome or tradition and by this Eunomius did suppose he had prevail'd ; and S. Austin affirmes that all the most fooliſh hereticks pretend for their most senseless figments those words of our Blessed Saviour [I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot beare them now.] And to this purpose was that which the Basilidians did affirme, that the mysteries of their sect were no things of publike notice, but conveyed in secret. Now to such as these there were but two wayes of confutation : one was, which they most insisted upon, that the Holy Scriptures were a perfect rule of faith and manners, and that there was no need of any other tradition ; the other, that the traditions which they pretended were false, and that the contrary was the doctrine which all the Churches of God did preach alwaies. Now thus far Tradition was useful to be pleaded ; that is, though the hereticks would not admit the doctrine of Christianity as it was consign'd in Scripture, yet they might be convinc'd that this was the doctrine of Christianity because it was also preach'd by all Bishops and confess'd by all Churches. But in all these contests the Fathers did not pretend to prove by Tradition what they could not prove by Scripture ; but the same things were preach'd which were written, and no other articles of Faith, no other rules and measures of good life : onely becauſe they did not conſent in the authority of one inſtrument, they ought to be convinc'd by the other.

19. 3. There is yet one uſe more of Traditions, but it is in Rituals, and in ſuch inſtances concerning which S. Paul wrote to the Corinthians theſe words [The reſt will I ſet in order when I come.] Such are, 1. The obſervation of the Lords day, ſolemnly once a year, and leſſe ſolemnly once a week, that is, the feaſt of Eaſter, and the weekly Sunday; 2. The Government of the Church by Biſhops, which is conſign'd to us by a tradition greater then ſome books of Scripture, and as great as that of the Lords day: and that ſo notorious, that thunder is not more heard then this is ſeen in all the monuments of Antiquity; 3. Offices Eccleſiaſtical to be ſaid and done by Eccleſiaſtical perſons: ſuch as are the publick Prayers of the Church, the conſecration of the bleſſed Euchariſt, the bleſſing of the Married paires and joyning them in the holy and myſterious rite of Marriage, the conſecration of Biſhops by Biſhops onely, and of Prieſts by Biſhops and Presbyters, though for this laſt there is not ſo univerſal tradition, that every where requiring the impoſition of the Biſhops hand, and but in ſome places requiring the aſſiſtance of the Presbyters. Theſe three are the moſt Univerſal and Apoſtolical traditions, which although they alſo have great grounds in Scripture, yet becauſe the univerſal practice and doctrine of the Church of God in all Ages and in all Churches primitive is infinitely evident and notorious, leſs liable to exception, and an apt Commentary upon the certain but leſs evident places of Scripture, therefore theſe may be plac'd under the protection of univerſal Tradition; for they really have it beyond all exception. And although in theſe the Scripture is ſufficient to all wiſe and good men, to all that are willing to learn and obey, and not deſirous to make Sects and noiſes; yet becauſe all men arenot wiſe and good & diſ-intereſs'd, Tradition in theſe things is to Scripture as a Burning-glaſs to the Sun, it receives its raies in a point, and unites their ſtrength, and makes them burn as well as ſhine, that is, it makes them doe that which in their own nature they are apt to doe, and from doing which they are onely hindered accidentally.

20. By theſe inſtances it is evident that we ought not to refuſe Tradition when it is univerſal, nor yet believe that in any thing of great concernment, though it be but matter of rite and government, the Scripture is defective; for in theſe things we admit Tradition to be the Commentary, but Scripture to be the Text: πάντα σύμφωνα τῇ γραφαῖς, as Irenæus in Euſebius expreſſes it, all muſt be agreeable to Scripture. And although a tradition ſo abſolutely univerſal as theſe, were a warranty greater then any objection can be againſt them, and were to be admitted though they had not expreſs authority in Scripture, as all theſe have; yet that even theſe things alſo are in Scripture, is a very great argument of the perfection of it.

lib. 5. c. 20.

21. For all other things the Scripture is abundant, and whatever elſe is to be us'd in the Externals and appendages of Religion the authority of the Church is a ſufficient warranty, as I ſhall prove in it's proper place. But if in theſe Externals there be a tradition, according to the degree of it's antiquity and univerſality, ſo it puts on degrees of reaſonableneſs, and may be us'd by any Age of the Church: and if there be nothing ſupervening that alters the caſe, it is better then any thing that is new; if it be equally fit, it is not equally good, but much better. This

22. This is all the use which is by wise and good men made of Traditions, and all the use which can justly be made by any man; and besides the premisses this will be yet further apparent, That although there are some universal practices which ever were and still are in all Churches, which are excellent significations of the meaning of these Scriptures, where the practices are less clearly injoyn'd, yet there are no traditive Doctrines distinct from what are consign'd in Scripture. And this I shall represent in the third particular which I promised to give account of, viz.

23. That the topick of Tradition, after the consignation of the Canon of Scripture, was not onely of little use in any question of Faith or Manners, but falsely pretended for many things, and is unsafe in all questions of present concernment.

24. In order to the proof of this, I divide the great heap of Traditions, which are shovel'd together by the Church of Rome, into three little heaps: 1. of things necessary or matters of Faith, 2. of things impertinent to the Faith and unnecessary, 3. of things false.

25. The Traditions of things necessary, are the Trinity of Persons, the consubstantiality of the Eternal Son of God with his Father, the Baptisme of infants, the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son, and Original sin, that the Father was not begotten, that the Holy Ghost is God, and to be invocated, that Baptisme is not to be reiterated, that in Christ there are two natures and one person. Now that these be appertaining to the Faith, I easily grant; but that the truth of these articles and so much of them as is certain or necessary is also in Scripture, I appeal to all the books of the Fathers, and of all moderns who doe assert them by testimonies from Scripture. Quicquid sciri vel prædicari oportet de Incarnatione, de vera Divinitate atque humanitate filii Dei, duobus ita continetur Testamentis, ut extra hæc nihil sit quod annunciari debet aut credi, said Rupertus Abbas, as I before quoted him. All the mysteries of Christs nature and person, of his humanity and Divinity are clearly set down in both Testaments. But they are not clearly reported in Tradition: the Fathers having sometimes spoken in these articles more in the Arian then in the Catholick style, say Hosius, Gordon, Huntly, Gretser, Tanner, Perron and Fisher. By Scriptures therefore the Church confuted the Arians, the Eutychians, the Nestorians, the Monothelites, the Photinians and the Sabellians. The other articles are also * evidently in the words of Scripture or in the first consequences and deductions. And when we observe the men of the Church of Rome going about with great pretensions to confirme all their articles by Scriptures, they plainly invalidate all pretence of necessity of Traditions. If they say that all the articles of Trent are not to be found in Scripture, let them confess it plainly, and then goe look out for proselytes. If they say there are Scriptures for all their articles, then Scripture is sufficient, or else their faith is not. For all these I before reckoned, it is certain both they and we have from Scripture many proofs, and if there were not, I believe Tradition would faile us very much; for the heresies which oppugned them were very early, and they also had customes and pretences of customes to prescribe for their false doctrines; as I shall make appear in the following periods.

26. There are alſo traditions pretended of things which are not neceſſary, ſuch as are the Faſt of Lent, Godfathers and Godmothers in baptiſme, the mixture of wine and water in the Euchariſtical chalice, the keeping of Eaſter upon the firſt day of the week, trine immerſion in baptiſme, the Apoſtles Creed, prayer for the dead, the wedneſday and the friday Faſt, Unction of ſick people, Canon of the Scripture, the formes of Sacraments, and the perpetual Virginity of the Virgin Mary. Now that theſe are not Divine traditions nor Apoſtolical appears by the deſtitution of their proper proof. They are Eccleſiaſtical traditions and of ſeveral ages, and ſome of them of very great antiquity; but of what obligation they are I ſhall account in the Chapter of [Lawes Eccleſiaſtical.] In the mean time they neither are of the neceſſity of faith, or the eſſential duty of Chriſtian religion: and therefore as a Chriſtian can goe to heaven without the obſervation of them in certain circumſtances, ſo is the Scripture a perfect Canon without giving rules concerning them at all.

27. But then as for others, there are indeed a great many pretended to be traditions, but they are falſe articles, or wicked practices, or uncertain ſentences at the beſt. I reckon ſome of thoſe which the Roman Church obtrudes: ſuch as are invocation of Saints and Angels, adoration of them, and worſhipping of Images, the doctrine of Purgatory, prayer in an Unknown tongue, the Popes power to depoſe Kings, and to abſolve from lawful and rate oaths, the picturing of God the Father and the holy Trinity, the half Communion, the doctrine and practice of Indulgences, Canon of the Maſſe, the doctrine of proper ſacrifice in the Maſs, Monaſtical profeſſion, the ſingle life of Prieſts and Biſhops. Now theſe are ſo far from being Apoſtolical traditions, that they are ſome of them apparently falſe, ſome of them expreſsly againſt Scripture, and others confeſſedly new, and either but of yeſterday, or, like the iſſues of the people, born where and when no man can tell. Concerning Indulgences, Antoninus the famous Arch-Biſhop of Florence, ſayes that we have nothing expreſsly recited in holy Scripture, nor are they found at all in the writings of the ancient Doctors. The half-communion is by the Council of Conſtance affirmed to be different from the inſtitution of Chriſt and the practice of the primitive Church. Concerning invocation of Saints, *Cum ſcriberentur Scripturæ nondum cæperat uſus vovendi Sanctis. Bellarmine confeſſes that in the age in which the Scriptures were written, the uſe of making vowes to Saints was not begun; and [a] Cardinal Perron excludes the next ages from having any hand in the invocation of them. Et quant aux autheurs plus proche du ſiecle apoſtolique, encore qu'il ne ſe trouve pas de veſtiges de ceſte couſtume &c. In the authours more near the Apoſtolical age no footſteps of this cuſtome can be found.

Concerning making an image of the Father or of the Holy Trinity Baronius cites an Epiſtle of Gregory the ſecond, An. Dom. 726. in which he gives a reaſon why the Church did not make any picture of the Father; which forces him to confeſs that the beginning of the cuſtome of painting the Father and the Holy Ghoſt poſtea uſu venit in Eccleſia, came into uſe afterward in the Church.

The doctrine of Purgatory is not onely expreſsly againſt Scripture, ſaying, Bleſſed are the dead which die in the Lord, even ſo ſaith the Spirit, that they reſt from their labours; but it is alſo certain that it was not ſo ancient as the Canon of the Roman Maſs, the age of which no man can tel any more then then they can tell the age of a flock of sheep, or a company of men and children together; for one piece is old, and another is late, and another of a middle age. But the prayer which in the Canon is for the Dead, supposes that they are not in Purgatory; but prayes for them which are asleep in rest and quietness.

28. I shall not instance in any more, because I shall in other places meet with the rest: but these are a sufficient indication how the Church hath been abused by the pretence of tradition, and that a bold man may in private confidently tell his parishioner that any doctrine is a Tradition; and he is the more likely to prevail because he cannot be confuted by his undiscerning hearer, since so great parts and so many Ages of the Church have been told of things that they were traditions Apostolical, when the articles themselves are neither old nor true. Is it imaginable by a man of ordinary understanding, or that hath heard any thing of antiquity, that the Apostles should command their followers to worship the reliques of S. James, or S. Stephen; or that S. Peter did ever give leave to a man that had sworn, to goe from his oath, and not to doe what he had sworn he would? Is it likely that S. Peter or S. Paul should leave secret instructions with S. Clement or S. Linus that they might depose Kings lawfully when it was in their power, and when Kings did disagree in opinion from them? Is there any instance, or precept, or line, or doctrine, or history that ever any Apostle or Apostolical man consecrated the Holy Communion where there was none to communicate? It was never heard that a Communion could be single, till the Catholick Church came to signify the Roman: and yet if Scripture will not prove these things, Tradition must. The experience and the infinite unreasonableness of these things does sufficiently give a man warning of attending to such new traditions, or admitting the topick in any new dispute, it having been so old a cheat: and after the Canon of Scripture was full, and after that almost the whole Church had been abus'd by the tradition of Papias in the Millenary opinion, which for 300. years of the best and first antiquity prevailed, all the world should be wiser then to rely upon that which might introduce an error, but which Truth could never need, it being abundantly provided for in Scripture.

29. Sometimes men have been wiser, and when a Tradition Apostolical hath been confidently pretended, they would as confidently lay it aside, when it was not in Scripture. Clemens Alexandrinus reckons many traditions Apostolical; but no man regards them. Who believes that the Greeks were sav'd by their Philosophy, or that the Apostles preach'd to dead Infidels, and then raised them to life, although these were by S. Clement affirm'd to have been traditions Apostolical? Did the world ever the more believe that a Council might not be called but by the authority and sentence of the Bishop of Rome, though Marcellus was so bold to say it was a Canon Apostolical? And after S. Hierom had said these words, præcepta majorum Apostolicas traditiones quisque existimat, that what their Fathers commanded, all men were wont to call them Traditions Apostolical; no man had reason to rely upon any thing which by any one or two or three of the Fathers was called Tradition Apostolical, unless the thing it self were also notorious or proved by some other evidence. But this topick of Tradition is infinitely uncertain, and therefore if it be pretended new, it can be of no use in any of our questions. For if in the primitive Church Tradi-

Tradition was claimed by the oppoſite parties of a queſtion, who can be ſure of it now? Artemon pretended it to be an Apoſtolical tradition that Chriſt was ψιλὸς ἀνθρωπος a meer man, and the Nicene Fathers prov'd it was not ſo, but much rather the contrary: but that Topick would not prevail for either ſide. In the queſtion of Rebaptization of perſons baptized by Hereticks, both ſides pretended Tradition; ſo they did in that impertinent, but (as they then made it) great queſtion of the time of keeping Eaſter. Clemens Alexandrinus ſaid it was an Apoſtolical Tradition that Chriſt preached but one year; but Irenæus ſaid it was an Apoſtolical Tradition that Chriſt was about fifty years old when he died, and conſequently that he preach'd almoſt twenty years. But if they who were almoſt at the fountain were uncertain of the Rivers head; how ſhall we know it who dwell where the waters are ready to unboſome themſelves into the Ocean? And to pretend an Apoſtolical Tradition in matters of Faith, now that the books of the Fathers have been loſt, and yet there are a very great many to be read for the proving of Tradition, that is, that there are too many and too few, that in the loſſe of ſome of them poſſibly we have loſt that light which would have confuted the preſent pretences of Tradition, & the remaining part have paſſed through the limbecs and ſtrainers of Hereticks and Monkes and ignorants and intereſted perſons, and have paſſed through the corrections and deturpations and miſtakes of tranſcribers, (a trade of men who wrote books that they might eat bread, not to promote a truth) and that they have been diſorder'd by Zeal and Faction and expurgatory Indices, and that men have been diligent to make the Fathers ſeem of their ſide, and that Hereticks have taken the Fathers names and publiſhed books under falſe titles, and therefore have ſtampt and ſtain'd the Current; is juſt as if a Tartar ſhould offer to prove himſelf to have deſcended from the family of King David, upon pretence that the Jewes mingled with their Nation, and that they did uſe to be great keepers of their genealogies.

L. 1. Stromat. Lib. 2. cap. 39.

31. But after all this, the queſtion of Tradition is wholly uſeleſs in the queſtions between the Church of Rome and the other parts of Chriſtendome. Not onely becauſe there are many Churches of differing rites and differing doctrines from the Roman, who yet pretend a Succeſſion and Tradition of their cuſtomes and doctrines per tempus immemoriale, they know not when they began, and for ought they know they came from the Apoſtles, and they are willing to believe it, and no man amongſt them queſtions it, and all affirm it; particularly the Greek Church, the Ruſſians, the Abyſſines: but alſo becauſe thoſe articles which they diſpute with the other Churches of the Weſt cannot be prov'd by Tradition univerſal, as infinitely appears in thoſe pittiful endeavours and attempts which they uſe to perſwade them to be ſuch; which if they did not ſometimes confute themſelves, the Reader may find confuted every where by their learned adverſaries.

32. Therefore although the perfection of Scripture be abundantly prov'd, yet if it were not, Tradition will but make it leſs certain, and therefore not more perfect. For beſides that nuncupative records are like diagrams in ſand and figures efform'd in aire, volatile and ſoon diſordered, and that by the words and practice of God, and all the world, what is intended to laſt was therefore written, as appears in very many places in Scripture, [& therefore Job calls out, O that my words were now written, O that they were printed in a book, that they were ingraven with an iron pen and lead in the rock for ever: upon which words the Greek Catena sayes, He drawes a similitude from them who put those things in writing which they very greatly desire should remain to the longest posterity] and that the very nature of things is such, that a Tradition is infinitely better preserved in writing then in speaking, and besides all those very many weak and uncertain and false Traditions with which several Men, and several Ages, and several Churches have abus'd others, or been abus'd themselves; I instance in two great things, by the one of which we may see how easily the Church may be imposed upon in the matter of Tradition; and by the other, how easily those men impose upon themselves whose faith hath a temporal bias and divertisement.

Exod. 17. 14 & 34. 27. Job. 19. 23, 24. Psal. 102. 19. Isai. 30. 8. Jer. 30. 2. Revel. 1. 11, 19. & 21. 5.

33. The first is, That very many Epistles of Popes, viz. from S. Clement to S. Gregory, that is, for above 500. years, were imposed upon the Church as the genuine writings of those excellent men who govern'd the Church of Rome in all her persecutions and hardnesses; and of these Epistles the present Church of Rome makes very great use to many purposes, and yet no imposture could be greater then this.

34. For 1. they are patched up of several arguments and materials not at all agreeing with the Ages in which they were pretended to be written, but are snatch'd from the writings of other men and latter times. 2. They were invented after S. Hieroms time, as appears in the citation of the testimonies of Scripture from S. Hieroms translation, and the Author cited S. Hieroms version of the Hebrew Psalter. 3. They were not known in Rome for eight Ages together: which were a strange thing that the records of Rome should have no copies of the Epistles of so many of the Bishops of Rome. 4. They are infinitely false in their Chronology, and he that invented them put the years of false Consuls to their date, as Baronius himself confesses quite reckoning otherwise: and in the Epistles of the whole five & fourty, the decrees of Councils and the words of Ecclesiastical writers are cited, who yet were not at all in their ages, but wrote after the death of those Popes who are pretended to have quoted them, or something is said that could not be done or said by them, or in their times. 5. They are written with the same style; and therefore it is no more probable that they should be the genuine Epistles of so many Popes, then that so many men in several Ages should have the same features in their faces: but these Epistles say over the same things several times, even unto tediousnes, and yet use the very same words without any differing expressions. 6. And sometimes these words were most intolerably barbarous, neither elegantly fine, nor elegantly plain, but Solecismes, impure words and the most rude expressions, not unlike the Friers Latine or the Epistolæ obscurorum virorum. 7. None of the Ancient writers of the Church did ever cite any testimony from these Epistles for 800. years together, onely one part of one of the Epistles of S. Clement was mention'd by Ruffinus and the Council of Vase. 8. None of those who wrote histories Ecclesiastical, or of the Church-writers, made mention of them: but all that doe were above 830. years after the Incarnation of our Blessed Lord. 9. And all this beside the innumerable errors in the matter which have been observed by the Centuriators of Magdeburg, David Blondel and divers others. And a more notorious rious cheat could never have been impoſed upon the world; but that there are ſo many great notorieties of falſhood, that it is hard to ſay which is greater, the falſhood of the Pontifical Book, or the boldneſs of the Compiler. Now if ſo great a heap of Records can at once be clapp'd upon the credulity of men, and ſo boldly defended as it is by Turrian and Binius, and ſo greedily entertain'd as it is by the Roman Confidents, and ſo often cited as it is by the Roman Doctors, and yet have in it ſo many ſtrange matters ſo diſagreeing to Scripture, ſo weak, ſo impertinent, and ſometimes ſo dangerous, there is very great reaſon to reject the topick of Traditions, which can be ſo eaſily forged, and ſometimes rely upon no greater foundation then this, whoſe foundation is in water and ſand, and falſhood that is more unſtable.

35. The other thing is, that Hereticks and evil perſons, to ſerve their ends, did not onely pretend things ſpoken by the Apoſtles and Apoſtolical and Primitive men, (for that was eaſy) but even pretended certain Books to be written by them, that under their venerable names they might recommend and advance their own heretical Opinions. Thus ſome falſe Apoſtles (as Origen relates) wrote an Epiſtle and ſent it to the Church of Theſſalonica under S. Pauls name, which much troubled the Theſſalonians, and concerning which, when S. Paul had diſcovered the impoſture, he gives them warning that they ſhould not be troubled about any ſuch Epiſtle, as if he had ſent it. Thus there was a Book publiſh'd by an Aſian Prieſt under S. Pauls name (as S. Hierome reports) containing the Viſion of Paul and Tecla, and I know not what old tale of the baptizing Leo. Some or other made S. Clement an Eunomian, and Dionyſius of Alexandria an Arrian, and Origen to be every thing, by interpolating their Books, or writing Books for them. Ruffinus tells that the Hereticks endeavoured to corrupt the Goſpels: and that they did invent ſtrange Acts of the Apoſtles, and make fine tales of their life and death, we need no better teſtimony then Tertullians inſtances in his Books againſt Marcion: and for this reaſon Origen gives caution, Oportet cautè conſiderare, ut nec omnia ſecreta quæ feruntur nomine Sanctorum ſuſcipiamus, We muſt warily conſider, and not receive all thoſe ſecret traditions which goe up and down under the names of Saints, [viz. of the holy Apoſtles.] And of the ſame nature is that famous cheat that uſurps the name of Dionyſius the Areopagite, called [The Paſſion of Peter and Paul] as who pleaſe may ſee in Laurentius Valla and Eraſmus. And ſuch is the Book of the ſame Paſſions attributed to Linus, which was invented ſo fooliſhly and careleſly that it contradicts the Scriptures moſt apparently; as every one that reads it may without difficulty obſerve. Now the obſervation from theſe things is plain: In the matter of Traditions as they are now repreſented there is ſo much of humane failings, and ſo little of Divine certainty, they are often falſly pretended, and never truly proved, and if they ſhould need to be proved, were therefore not to be accepted; becauſe no particular proofs can make them univerſal, and if they be not univerſal, of themſelves they cannot be credible, but need ſomething elſe to make them ſo; they are (whether true or falſe) ſo abſolutely now to no purpoſe, becauſe it is too late to prove them now, and too late to need them, the Church having ſo long accepted and relied upon the Canon of Scripture, that we are plainly, and certainly, and neceſſarily devolv'd upon Scripture for the Canon of our Faith and lives. For though no man ought to reject Tradition if he did need it, and if he could have have it, yet because he neither can want it (because Scripture is a perfect Rule) nor can have it (because it cannot in any of our questions be prov'd) we must rely upon what we have. It is in the matter of traditions as in the Epistle of S. Paul to Laodicea: if this or those were extant and sufficiently transmitted and consign'd to us, they would make up the Canon as well as those we have: but there is no such thing as the Laodicean Epistle, and there is no such thing as tradition of doctrines of Faith not contained in Scriptures. The Fathers that had them, or thought they had them, might call upon their Churches to make use of them; but we that cannot have them, must use what we have; and we have reason to give thanks to God that we have all that God intended to be our Rule. God gave us in Scripture all that was necessary; it was a perfect Rule; and yet if it had not, it must become so when we have no other.

36. But upon the matter of this Argument, there are three Questions to be considered in order to Faith and Conscience.

1. Whether there be not any rules and general measures of discerning tradition, by which although tradition cannot be prov'd the natural way, that is, by its own light, evidence of fact and notoreity, yet we may be reasonably induc'd to beleeve that any particular is descended from tradition Apostolical, and consequently is to be taken in, to integrate the rule of Conscience?

2. How farre a negative Argument from Scripture is valid, and obligatory to Conscience?

3. Whether there may be any new Articles of Faith, or that the Creed of the Church may so increase, that what is sufficient to salvation in one Age cannot serve in another?

1. Question is concerning the indirect ways of discerning Tradition.

37. In vain it is to dispute whether traditions are to integrate the Canon of Scripture, when it cannot be made to appear that there are any such things as Apostolical traditions of doctrines not contained in Scripture. For since the succession in all the Chairs hath been either interrupted or disordered by warres or heresies, by interest or time, by design or by ignorance, by careleſsness or inconsideration, by forgetfulness or unavoidable mistake, by having no necessity of tradition, and by not delivering any, it is in vain to dispute concerning the stability of atomes, which as of themselves they are volatile and unfixt, so they have no basis but the light aire: and so are traditions; themselves are no argument, and there are no traditions; they are no necessary or competent stabiliment of doctrine or manners, or if they were, themselves have no stabiliment.

38. For it is certain there can be no tradition receiv'd for Apostolical at a less rate then the rule of Vincentius Lirinensis. For to prove by Scripture that there are any traditions not written in Scripture is a trifling folly; since there might be necessity of keeping traditions before all that which is necessary was set down in writing. So that all the pretensions taken from Scripture in behalf of traditions are absolutely to no purpose, unless it were there said, There are some things which we now preach to you which ſhall never be written; keep them: but the naming of [traditions] in ſome Books of Scripture, and the recommending them in others, is no argument to us to inquire after them, or to rely upon them; unleſs that which was delivered by Sermon was never to be delivered by writing, and that we knew it as certainly as that which is. * And the ſame is to be ſaid of the ſayings of Fathers who recommend traditions: for although the argument leſſened every year, yet it was better then, then it can be now; it could ſerve ſome uſes then, it can ſerve none now; it might in ſome inſtances be certain, and ſafe in many, but now it cannot be either, neither certain, nor ſafe, nor neceſſary, nor of any uſe at all: which having made to appear in the preceding numbers, it muſt follow that there can be no doctrinal traditions beſides the matters of Scripture; becauſe there are none ſuch recommended to the Church by the meaſures of Vincentius Lirinenſis. There is no doctrine, no rule of Faith or Manners which is not in the Holy Scriptures, and yet which was believed always, and in all Churches, and of all men in thoſe Churches. For although it is very probable that Vincentius by this rule intended to reprove the novelties and unuſual doctrines which S. Auſtin by his great wit and great reputation had brought into the Church, contrary to the ſentiments and doctrines of the Fathers which were before him; yet it will perfectly ſerve to reprove all our late pretenſions to traditions. For by this meaſure, we finde it not to be enough that a Doctrine hath been received for a thouſand years together by the Catholick Church, reckoning from this period upwards; unleſs it were alſo received by the Apoſtolical ages and Churches throughout the world, it is nothing: and if it were received by all the Apoſtolical Churches, and all good and wiſe men in thoſe Churches, and ſo downwards; whereever any Church failed, it was to their own prejudice, not to the prejudice of the doctrine; for that was Apoſtolical which was from the beginning; and whatſoever came after could not change what was ſo before; and the interruption of an Apoſtolical truth, though for a thouſand years together, cannot annul the obligation, or introduce the contrary. So that if we begin to account by this rule of Vincentius and goe backwards, it is nothing unleſs we goe back as farre as to the Apoſtles inclusively: but if we begin there, and make that clear, it matters not how little a way it deſcends: and therefore although it is an excellent rule to reprove vain and novel pretenſions, yet there is nothing to be proved by it practicably; for we need not walk along the banks and intrigues of Volga, if we can at firſt point to the fountain; it is that whither the long progreſſion did intend to lead us. If any thing fails in the principle it is good for nothing; but if the tradition derive from the fountain, and the head be viſible, though afterwards it ran under ground, it is well enough. For if a doctrine might invade the whole Church which was not preached by the Apoſtles, or if the doctrine might to many good and wiſe perſons ſeem to have poſſeſſed the whole Church, that is, to be believed by all thoſe that he knows, or hears of, or converſes with, and yet not have been the doctrine of the Apoſtles; it is certain that this univerſality, and any leſs then that which takes in the Apoſtles, can never be ſufficient warranty for an article of Faith or a Rule of life, that is, the inſtance and obligation of a duty neceſſary to ſalvation. But how ſhall we know concerning any doctrine, whether it be a tradition Apoſtolical? Here the Rule of Vincentius comes in. If it can be made to appear that all Churches and all Men did from the Apoſtles times down to the time of inquiry accept it as true, and report it from the Apostles, then it is to be so received and continued. Indeed a less series and succession will serve. For if we can be made sure that the Age next to the Apostles did universally receive it as from the Apostles, then we may not reject it. But what can make faith in this? certainly nothing; for there is no doctrine so delivered but what is in Scripture. Indeed some practices and rituals are, because the publick exercise and usages of the Church being united and notorious, publick and acted, might make the rite evident as light; but in doctrines (besides Scriptures) we have not records enough to doe it: and therefore this general rule of Vincentius not being practicable, and the other lesser rules or conjectures rather being incompetent, μένωμεν ὥσπερ ἐσμὲν, we must remain as we are, and give God thanks for the treasures of Holy Scripture, and rejoyce and walk in the light of it.

39. But let us try a little. The first Rule which is usually given is this; That which the Catholick Church believes as an article of faith, which is not found in Scriptures, is to be believed to descend from Apostolical tradition. This Rule is false and insufficient upon many accounts.

1. For if the Church can erre, then this Rule can have no firmament or foundation. If she cannot erre, then there is no need either of Scriptures or Tradition; and there is no use of any other argument to prove the truth of an article or the Divinity of a truth, but the present belief and affirmation of the Church, for that is sufficient whether it be written or not written, whether it be delivered or not.

But 2. Supposing the Church could not erre in matters of Faith, yet no man says but she may erre in matter of fact: but whether this thing was delivered by the Apostles is matter of fact; and therefore though the Church were assisted so that she could not mistake her article, yet she may mistake her argument and instrument of probation: the conclusion may be true, and yet the premisses false; and she might be taught by the Spirit, and not by the Apostles.

3. No man now knows what the Catholick Church does believe in any question of controversy; for the Catholick Church is not to be spoken with, and being divided by Seas, and Nations, and interests, and fears, and Tyrants, and poverty, and innumerable accidents, does not declare her minde by any common instrument, and agrees in nothing but in the Apostles Creed, and the Books of Scripture; and millions of Christians hear nothing of our controversies, and if they did, would not understand some of them.

4. There are thousands that doe believe such an article to be taught by the Catholick Church, and yet the Catholick Church with them is nothing but their own party; for all that believe otherwise they are pleased to call Hereticks. So that this Rule may serve every party that is great, and every party that is little, if they will adde pride and contumacy to their article: and what would this Rule have signified amongst the Donatists, to whom all the world was heretick but themselves? and what would it signify amongst those peevish little Sects that damne all the world but their own congregations? even as little as it can to the Church of Rome, who are resolved to call no Church Catholick but their own.

5. The believing of such an article of faith could not be indication of a true Catholick, that is, of a true member of the Catholick Church; because if the article is to be proved to be Apostolical by the present belief of the Catholick Church, either the Catholick Church is the whole Christian Church, and then we can never tell what she believes in a particular question, and indeed she believes nothing in the question, because if it be a question, the Catholick Church is divided in her sense of it; or else the Catholick Church is some body or Church of Christians separate from the rest, and then that must by other means be first known that she is the Catholick Church, before we can accept her belief to be an argument that the article is an Apostolical Tradition. Adde to this, that the Churches believing it, is not, cannot be an argument that the doctrine is Apostolical; but on the contrary it ought to be prov'd to be Apostolical before it is to be admitted by the Churches. And if it be answer'd, that so it was to those Churches who admitted it first, but to us it ought to be sufficient that the Church received it, and we ought therefore to conclude it to be Apostolical: I reply, that it is well if it was at first prov'd to the Church to be Apostolical; but then if the primitive Church would not receive the doctrine without such evidence, it is a sign that this was the right way of proceeding, and therefore so ought to be with us: they would not receive any doctrine unless it were prov'd to come from the Apostles, and why should we? and to say that because they receiv'd it, we ought to suppose it to have been Apostolical, I say that is to beg the question: for when we make a question whether the Church did well to receive this doctrine, we mean whether they did receive it from the Apostles or no. And therefore to argue from their receiving it, that it was Apostolical, is to answer my question by telling me, I ought to suppose that, and to make no question of it. But if this rule should prevail, we must believe things which even to affirm were impudent. The Church of Rome, calling her self the Catholick Church, affirms it to be Heresy to say that it is necessary to give the Communion under both kinds to the Laity: but he that will from hence, though he believe that Church to be the Catholick, conclude that doctrine to be the Apostolick, must have a great ignorance or too great a confidence. Nay this rule is in nothing more apparently confuted then in this instance; for the Canon in the Council of Constance which establishes this for Catholick doctrine, by confessing it was otherwise instituted by Christ, and otherwise practis'd at the beginning, confesses it not to be Apostolick. So that upon this account it is obvious to conclude that either the universal Church can erre, or else the same thing can come and cannot come from Tradition Apostolical. For the half-Communion is no where commanded in Scripture; therefore either the Ancient Catholick Church did erre in commanding the whole Communion, or the modern Catholick Church (I mean the Roman, which pretends to the name) does erre in forbidding it; or else, if neither does erre, then the Communion under both kinds did come and did not come from Tradition Apostolical.

But 6. suppose it were agreed that one Congregation is the Catholick Church, and resolved upon which is that Congregation, yet if it be but a part of Christians, and that interested, it is not in the nature of the thing to inferre, that because this interested, divided part believes it, therefore the Apostles taught it: this Consequent is not in the bowels of that Antecedent, it cannot be prov'd by this argument: if it can be proved by revelation, that what the present Church believes, was a Tradition Apostolical, let it be shewn, and there's an end of it. In the mean time this rule is not of it self certain, or fit to be the proof of what is uncertain, and therefore not a good rule, till it be proved by revelation.

7. It is evidently certain that what one Age believes as a necessary doctrine, another Age (I mean of the Catholick Church) did not believe for such; and it is not sufficient for the making of a Catholick doctrine that it be ubique, believ'd every where, unless it be also semper & ab omnibus, alwayes and by all men. I instance in the Communicating of Infants, which was the doctrine of S. Austin and of Pope Innocentius, and prevail'd in the Church for 600. years (saies Maldonat the Jesuit) that it was necessary to the salvation of Infants, that they should receive the holy Sacrament of the Lords Supper. Now it is also as certain that for 600. years more, the Church which calls her self Catholick believ'd the contrary. Which of these can prove Apostolical Tradition? For if it be objected that this was not the doctrine of the Catholick Church in those ages in which the most eminent Fathers did believe and practise it, besides that it is not probable that they would teach it to be necessary, and generally practise it in their Churches, if the matter had been nothing but their own opinion, and disputed by others; I adde this also, that it was as much the doctrine of the Catholick Church, that it was necessary, as it is now, that it is not necessary: for it is certain the Holy Fathers did believe and teach and practise it, and the contrary was not disputed; but now though it be condemned by some, it is still practis'd by very great parts of the Catholick Church, even by all the Greek Church, and by those vast numbers of Christians in Ethiopia. So that although no doctrinal Tradition is universally received but what is contained in Scriptures; yet those that have been received as universally as any other matter of question is, have been and have not been believ'd by the Church in several ages: and therefore if this rule be good, they must prove that the same doctrine was and was not a Tradition Apostolical.

In cap. 6. Johan. n. 11.

Vide Hierem. Patriar. C. P. doctr. & exhort. ad Germanos.

8. This Rule were good (and then indeed onely) if there were no way to make an opinion to be universally receiv'd but by derivation from the Apostles. But 1. there are some which say every Age hath new revelations: where this is believ'd, it is apparent an opinion which the Apostles never heard of, may be adopted into the faith and universally received. But besides this there are more wayes of entry for a popular error then any man can reckon or any experience can observe. 2. It is not impossible that some leading man may be credulous and apt to be imposed upon by Hereticks and Knaves; but when he hath weakly received it, it shall proceed strongly upon his authority. The matter of Papias about the doctrine of the Chiliasts is notorious in this particular. 3. It is also very possible that what is found at first to be good, shall be earnestly press'd by a zealous man, and he may over-express himself, and consider not to what consequence it may afterwards be extended; and then following ages may observe it, and make a Logical conclusion from a Rhetorical expression; and then what onely good men had entertain'd when it was called useful, all men shall receive when it is called necessary; and it is no great progression from what all men believe good, that some men should believe necessary, and from them others, and from others all men. It was thus in many degrees in the matter of Confession and Penance. 4. It is not very unlikely, certainly it is no way impossible, but that the reputation of some great man in the Church may prevail so far by our weaknesses and his own accidental advantages, that what no man at first questions, very many will afterwards believe, and they introduce more, and from more to most, and from most to all men, are no impoſſible progreſſions, if we conſider how much mankind (eſpecially in Theology) have ſuffered the authority of a few men to prevail upon them. 5. Does not all the world ſee that zeal makes men impatient of contradiction, and that impatience makes them fierce in diſputing, and fierce in fighting, and ready to perſecute their enemies? and what that Unity and Univerſality is which can be introduc'd by force, a great part of the world hath had two long an experience to be ignorant. 6. Beyond all this, a propoſition may be ſuppos'd to follow from an Apoſtolical Tradition, and prevail very much upon that account; and yet it would be hard to believe the Scholars deduction equally with the Maſters Principle, and a probable inference from Tradition equal to the very affirmative of the Apoſtles. A man may argue, and argue well too, and yet the Concluſion will not be ſo evident as the Principle: but that it may equally prevail, is ſo certain, that no man can deny it but he that had never any teſtimony of the confidence of a diſputing man, and the compliance of thoſe who know not ſo well, or inquire not ſo ſtrictly, or examine not ſuſpiciouſly, or judge not wiſely.

40. 2. The next Rule which is pretended for the diſcovery of an Apoſtolical Tradition is this, That which the Univerſal Church obſerves, which none could appoint but God, and is not found in Scripture, it is neceſſary to ſay that it was delivered by Chriſt and his Apoſtles. This Rule muſt needs be falſe, becauſe it does actually deceive them that rely upon it. Becauſe their Church, which they will fondly ſuppoſe to be the Catholick, uſes certain Sacramentals to conferre grace, (which none could inſtitute but Chriſt, who alone is the fountain of grace) and the Holy Spirit to his ſervants: but yet to pretend that they are Traditions Apoſtolical were the greateſt unreaſonableneſs in the world. I inſtance in holy water, baptizing of bells, hallowing of agnus Dei's, roſes, ſwords, hats, Chriſme and the like, which no man can fairely pretend to be Traditions Apoſtolical, but yet they are practis'd by all their Catholick Church, and they are of ſuch things as no man but God could be the author of, if they were good for any thing; but then to conclude from hence that they are Traditions Apoſtolical, were juſt as if one were to give a ſign how to know whether lying were lawful or unlawful, and for the determination of this queſtion ſhould give this rule, Whatſoever mankind does univerſally which they ought not to doe without Gods law, that certainly they have a law from God to doe; but all mankind are given to lying, and yet nothing can make it lawful to lye, unleſs there be a warranty or no prohibition from God to lie; therefore certain it is that to lye deſcends from the authority of God. Indeed if the Catholick Church could not be uncharitable, if they could not ſin againſt God, then it were certain, if they all did it, and it were not warranted in Scripture, it muſt be from God: but it does not follow, it would be by Tradition; becauſe it may be by the dictate of right reaſon, by natural principles, or it would be a thing indifferent; but that it muſt be by Tradition, if it were not by Scripture, or by the Church, were as if we ſhould ſay, if Lælaps be not a horſe, or begotten by a Lyon, he muſt needs be a Bear: but theſe rules are like dead mens candles, they come from no certain cauſe, and ſignifie no determin'd effect, and whether they be at all, we are no ſurer then the reports of timorous or phantaſtick perſons can make us. But this Rule differs not at all from the former, ſave onely, that ſpeaks of doctrinal, and this of ritual

Tradi-

Traditions: but both relying upon the same reason, and that reason failing (as I have prov'd) the propositions themselves doe fail. But then as to rites, it is notorious beyond a denyall, that some rites used in the Universal Church, which are also said to be such which none ought to appoint but God, were not delivered by the Apostles. I instance in the singularity of baptisme of Hereticks, which the whole Church now adheres to, and yet if this descended from Apostolical Tradition, it was more then S. Cyprian or the African Churches knew of, for they rebaptized Hereticks, and disputed it very earnestly, and lived in it very pertinaciously, and died in the opinion.

41. 3. The third rule is, Whatsoever the Catholick Church hath kept in all ages by-gone, may rightly be believed to have descended from the Apostles, though it be such a thing which might have been instituted by the Church. This rule is the same with that of Lirinensis, of which I have already given account: and certainly in those things in which it can be made use of (which are extremely few) it is the best, and indeed the onely good one. But then this can relate onely to Rituals, not to matter of Doctrine; for nothing of this can be of Ecclesiastical institution and appointment: it cannot be a doctrine of Faith unless it be of Divine Tradition; for Christ is the Author and finisher of our Faith, which the Church is to preach and believe, not to enlarge or shorten, not to alter or diversify. But then as to Rituals, the keeping of Easter on the first day of the week by this rule cannot be prov'd to be an Apostolical Tradition; because the Asian Churches kept it otherwise: and by this rule the keeping of Lent fast for 40. dayes will not be found to be an Apostolical Tradition; because the observation of it was very full of variety, and some kept it 40. houres, some a day, some a week, as I shall afterwards in its proper place make to appear. But by this rule the distinction of Bishops and Presbyters is an Apostolical Tradition (besides the Scriptures, by which it appears to be Divine;) by this the consecration of the Blessed Eucharist by Ecclesiastical persons, Bishops and Priests, is certainly a Tradition Apostolical; by this the Lords day is deriv'd to us from the Apostles; and by this the Baptisme of infants is much confirm'd unto the Church: and whatsoever can descend to us and be observed in this channel, there is no sufficient reason to deny it to be Apostolical: but then how far it can be obligatory to all Ages and to all Churches, will be another consideration; it being on all hands confessed, that some Rituals which were observed in the Apostles times are with good cause and just authority laid aside by several Churches. But of this I shall give particular accounts.

42. 4. When all the Doctors of the Church by common consent testify concerning any particular that it descends from Apostolical tradition, we are to hold it for such: whether they affirm this in all their writings, or together in a Council. To this Rule I answer, That where it would doe good there it is not practicable, and where it is practicable there it is not true. For it is indeed practicable that a Council may give testimony to a particular that it came from the Apostles; but it does not follow that they are not deceived, for it never was, and it never will be that all the Doctors of the Church shall meet together in Council, and unless they doe, their testimony is not universal. But if all the Fathers should write in their Books that such a thing was delivered by the Apostles, unless it were evidently againſt Scripture or right reaſon, there could be no ſufficient cauſe to disbelieve it; and it were the beſt way we have of conveying and handing the tradition to us, next to the univerſal practice of the Church in her Rituals. But there is no ſuch thing ſo conveyed to us: and therefore Bellarmine plays at ſmall game with this Rule, and would fain have the world admit Tradition for Apoſtolical, if ſome Fathers of great name ſay ſo, and others that ſpeak of the ſame thing contradict it not. But this is a plain begging that, when he cannot prove a thing to be Tradition Apoſtolical by a good argument and ſufficient, we will be content to take it without proof, or at leaſt to be content with ſuch as he hath, and believe his own word for the reſt, though he knowes nothing of it. If it failes or goes leſs then Omnibus, and Semper, and Ubique, which is Vincentius his meaſure, it cannot be warranted, and he that allowes it is more kind then wiſe. S. Baſil proves the perpetual Virginity of the Bleſſed Virgin Mary by a Tradition that Zechary was ſlain by the Jewes between the Porch and the Altar for affirming her to be a Virgin after the birth of her moſt Holy Son: but S. Hierom ſayes it is Apocryphorum ſomnium, a dream of Apocryphal perſons. But it was a long time before the report of the Milleniary Tradition was contradicted, and yet in that intervall in which many of the moſt eminent Fathers atteſted it to have deſcended from the Apoſtles, it was neither true nor ſafe to have believed it. But then as to the particular and more practicable part of this rule, That if a general Council affirmes it to be Tradition Apoſtolical it is ſo to be accepted, it is evidently fallacious and uncertain; for the ſecond Council of Nice affirm'd the veneration of Images to be an Apoſtolical Tradition: but it is ſo far from being true that it was ſo as they affirm'd, that not onely the Apoſtolical but divers of the following ages hated all Images, and did not think it lawful ſo much as to make them; of which I have already given a large account in this book.

43. 5. When the Apoſtolical Churches, which from the Apoſtles have had uninterrupted ſucceſſion, doe witneſs concerning any thing that it is Apoſtolical tradition, it is to be admitted for ſuch. This rule was good before the Chanels were mingled with impure waters entring in: It was uſed by Irenæus, Tertullian, S. Auguſtine, and others; and it was to them of great advantage. But although it was good drinking of Euphrates when it newly ran from the garden of Eden, yet when it began to mingle with the Borborus it was not good: and who durſt have truſted this Rule when Dioſcorus was Biſhop of Alexandria, who yet was lineally deſcended from S. Mark? And who durſt have relied upon this Rule when Pope Julius abſolved the Sabellian Hereticks, and communicated with Marcellus Ancyranus? and when S. Baſil complains of the Weſtern Biſhops, and particularly the Roman, quòd veritatem neque nôrunt, neque diſcere ſuſtinent . . . cum iis qui veritatem ipſis annunciant contendentes, hæreſin autem per ſe ipſos ſtabilientes: that they neither know the truth, nor care to learn it; but they contend with them who tell them the truth, and by themſelves eſtabliſh hereſy. Quia multi Principes & ſummi Pontifices & alii inferiores inventi ſunt apoſtataſſe à fide, propterea eccleſia conſiſtit in illis perſonis in quibus eſt notitia vera, & confeſſio fidei & veritatis. How can this rule guide any man when all the Apoſtolical Churches have fallen into error, and many Popes have been apoſtates from the Faith, and the Church conſiſted not of Prelates, but indifferently of all that believ'd and profeſs'd the truth which the Popes and and Princes and Prelates did deny? The Apostolical Church of Antioch is not; and the Patriarchal Church of Alexandria is accus'd by the Latines of great errors; and the Mother Church of Jerusalem hath no succession, but is buried in ruines; and the Church of Rome is indeed splendid, but he that will take her word for Tradition is sure to admit many false ones, but not sure of any true, but such as she hath in common with all the Churches of the world.

44. I conclude therefore this question, that amongst those rules of discerning Traditions truly Apostolical from them that are but pretended such, there is no rule competent but one, which is scarcely practicable, which indeed transmits to the Church a few Rituals, but nothing of Faith or rule of good life; and therefore it is to no purpose to look any where else for the Divine Rule of Conscience but in the pages of the Old and New Testament: they are sufficient, because they were intended by God to be our onely Rule; and yet if God had intended Traditions to be taken in, to integrate the Rule and to oblige our Conscience, it is certain that God intends it not now, because the Traditions are lost if there were any, and if they be now, they doe not appear, and therefore are to us as if they were not.

II. Question.

45. The second Question also does very nearly relate to Conscience and it's conduct. viz. Since the Scripture is the perfect Rule of Conscience, and contains in it all the will of God, whether or no, and how far is a negative argument from Scripture to prevail?

46. The resolution of this depends upon the premisses. For if Scripture be the intire Rule of Faith, and of Manners, that is, of the whole service and worship of God, then nothing is an article of Faith, nothing can command a moral action, that is not in it's whole kind set down in Scripture. This I proved by direct testimonies of Tertullian, S. Basil, S. Austin, S. Cyril, Theophilus Alexandrinus and S. Hierome, in the * foregoing numbers. To which I adde these excellent words of S. Cyril of Jerusalem, speaking of the Jerusalem Creed, which he had recited and explicated and promis'd to prove from Scripture; he gives this reason, Nam Divinorum sanctorumque fidei mysteriorum nihil, ne minimum quidem, absque Divinis Scripturis tradi debet, neque simplici probabilitate neque verborum ornatu traduci. Not the least part of the Divine and Holy mysteries of Faith must be delivered without the Divine Scriptures. Believe not me telling thee, unless I demonstrate what I say from the Divine Scripture. For the safety and conservation of our Faith relies upon the proof of the Divine Scriptures. But because there are some particulars and some variety in the practise of this rule, I am to consider it now to other purposes. * Vide Num. 9.

47. 1. Nothing is necessary either to be believ'd or done unless it be in Scripture. Thus S. Gregory Nyssen argues, Ubinam dixit Deus in Evangeliis oportere credere in unum & solum verum Deum? Non possent ostendere nisi habeant ipsi novum aliquod Evangelium. Quæ n. ab antiquis per traditionem ad hæc usque tempora in Ecclesiis leguntur, hanc vocem non continent quæ dicat, oportere credere vel baptizare in unum solum verum Deum, quemadmodum Orat. 2 contra Eunomium.

admodum iſti autumant, ſed in nomen Patris & Filii & Spiritus Sancti. I have I confeſs ſomething wondred at the matter of this diſcourſe. For either the Arrians have infinitely impoſed upon us, and interpolated Scripture in a very material article; or elſe S. Gregory forgot the 17. of S. John and the 3. verſe; or elſe he inſiſted onely upon the words δεῖ πιστεύειν, for the ſame ſenſe is in the place now cited. For if this be life eternal to know him the onely true God, and whom he hath ſent Jeſus Chriſt, then alſo to believe in them onely is life eternal, and then we are tied to believe in none elſe; for we cannot believe in that we doe not know. Indeed the words are not there or any where elſe, that we ought to believe in [God the Father] him, the one, onely true God, &c. But certainly, if we are to know him onely, then onely to believe in him ſeems to be a very good conſequent. But S. Baſil therefore onely inſiſted upon the very words, and thought himſelf ſafe (as indeed he was) upon the reverſe of another argument. For ſince the words oportere credere in unum ſolum verum Deum were not in S. John or any where elſe, he concluded the contrary ſenſe from a very good argument: we are commanded to be baptized into the faith of Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, therefore we are to believe in three: and becauſe the word [believe] was not ſet down expreſly, where knowledge is confin'd to one or two, therefore it cannot be ſaid that we are tied to believe onely in one or two: but becauſe to believe in three can be inferr'd as a duty from another place, therefore it cannot be denied as a conſequent from this; and therefore he had reaſon to inſiſt upon his negative argument. Thus S. Auſtin alſo argued, Pater enim ſolus nuſquam legitur miſſus, The Father is never in Scripture ſaid to be ſent; therefore no man muſt ſay it. So Epiphanius, Ipſa dictio non omnino cogit me de Filio Dei dicere: non enim indicavit Scriptura, neque quiſquam Apoſtolorum meminit, neque Evangelium. The manner of ſpeaking compels me not to underſtand it of the Son of God: For the Scripture hath not declared it; neither the Goſpel nor any of the Apoſtles hath made any mention of it.

Lib. 2. de Trinit. cap. 5. & cap. 6. contr. hær. l. 2. tom. 2.

48. 2. A negative argument from the letter of Scripture is not good, if the contrary affirmative can be drawn by conſequent from any part of it. Thus our Bleſſed Saviour confuting the Sadducees in the article of the Reſurrection hath given us a warranty for this proceeding; God is the God of Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob. Theſe were the words of Scripture. But theſe directly would not doe the work. But therefore he argues from hence, God is not the God of the dead, but of the living: therefore theſe men are alive. That the Holy Ghoſt is God is no where ſaid in Scripture; that the Holy Ghoſt is to be invocated is no where commanded, nor any example of its being done recorded. It follows not therefore that he is not God, or that he is not to be invocated: and the reaſon is, becauſe that he is God is a certain conſequent from ſomething that is expreſly affirmed; and therefore the negative argument is imperfect, and conſequently, not concluding. Quæ neque à Chriſtianis dicuntur neque creduntur, neque ex conſequente per ea quæ apud nos certa ſunt & conceſſa intelliguntur, &c. If Chriſtians did never ſpeak, nor believe any ſuch thing, nor can they be drawn from the conſequence of thoſe things which are certain and granted amongſt us, then indeed it is to be rejected from our Creed. Now amongſt Chriſtians this is believed as certain, that we may pray to him in whom we believe; that we believe in him into the faith of whom we are baptized; that we are commanded to be baptized into the belief and profeſſion of the Father,

S. Greg. Nyſſen. ibid.

Father, Son, and Holy Ghost: from hence Christians doe know that they are to invocate the Holy Ghost. For S. Pauls argument is good, How shall we call on him on whom we have not believed? therefore we may call on him if we believe on him: according to that Rule of reason, Negatio unius diversum affirmat, The denying of one is the affirmation of its contrary in the like matter. And something of this was used by Paschasius the Deacon: and the effect of it prevail'd upon the account of a negative from Scripture; In nullis autem Canonicis libris, de quibus Symboli textus pendet, accepimus, quia in Ecclesiam credere sicut in Spiritum Sanctum Filiúmque debemus, We are taught in no Scripture (from whence the Creed is deriv'd) to believe in the Church, as we believe in the Son and in the Holy Ghost: and therefore we ought not to doe it; but it being plain in the Creed, and consequently in the Scripture, that we must believe in the Holy Ghost, therefore also we may pray to him, and confess him to be God. To the same purpose S. Basil argues concerning the Holy Spirit; Dignitate namque ipsâ secundum esse à Filio pietatis sermo fortassis tradit: naturâ verò tertiâ uti nec à Divinis Scripturis edocti sumus, nec ex antecedentibus possibile est consequenter colligi, That the Holy Spirit is of a nature distinct from the Father and the Son we neither are taught in Scripture, neither can it be drawn into consequence from any antecedent pretences. * Lib. de Spir. c. 1.

* Nonne perspicuum est, ista, tametsi non dicantur, tamen ex illis colligi quæ hæc necessariò efficiant ac probent? Quæ tandem? Ego sum primus, & post hæc, & ante me non est alius Deus, & post me non erit. Totum enim quicquid est, mecum est, nec principium habens, nec finem habiturum. His à Scriptura acceptis, illud quidem, quod ante eum nihil sit, nec antiquiorem causam habeat, Anarchum & Ingenitum appellasti: quod autem nunquam desiturum sit, Immortale, exitiique expers. Nazianz. lib. 5. Theol. interprete Jacobo Billio. Et infra, Cum ergo in nominibus & rebus tantum discrimen reperiatur, quid causæ est cur literæ tantopere tertias, Judaicæque sapientiæ teipsum adjungas, relictisque rebus syllabas consectaris? Quod si te bis quinque aut bis septem dicente, decem aut quatuordecim ex verbis tuis colligerem, aut ex eo quod animal ratione præditum, & mortale diceres, hominem esse concluderem, an tibi viderer delirare? Neque enim verba magis sunt ejus qui loquitur quam illius qui loquendi necessitatem simul affert.

49. 3. A negative argument of a word or an expression cannot be consequently deduc'd to the negation of the mystery signified by that word. The Arrians therefore argued weakly, Shew us in all the Scripture that the Son is called ὁμοούσιον or Consubstantial to the Father; if you cannot, you ought not to affirm it. For we know God is one; if therefore we finde in Scripture that the Son is true God, we know he must needs be of the same substance with his Father; for two substances cannot make one God. So though the Blessed Virgin Mary be not in Scripture called θεοτόκος the Mother of God, yet that she was the Mother of Jesus, and that Jesus Christ is God, and yet but one person, that we can prove from Scripture, and that is sufficient for the appellative: and if the Church of Rome could prove the mystery of Transubstantiation from Scripture, we would indulge to them the use of that word, or any other aptly to express the same thing.

50. 4. A negative argument from Scripture is sufficient to prove an article not to be of necessary belief, but is not sufficient to prove it not to be true: because although the Scripture is the measure of Faith and of Manners, yet it is an adequate measure of all truth. The meaning of which rule takes in all truths of art, of experience, of prudence, of tradition and common report. Thus although it be no where said in Scripture that our Blessed Saviour said, Nunquam læti sitis nisi cum Fratrem vestrum in charitate videritis, Be never very merry but when you see your Brother in charity; yet S. Hierome reports it of him, and it is a worthy saying, and therefore may very well be entertain'd, not onely as true and useful, but as from Christ. The Scripture

Scripture no where ſays that the bleſſed Virgin was a Virgin perpetually to the day of her death: but as therefore it cannot be obtruded as an article of faith, yet there are a great many decencies and probabilities of the thing, beſides the great conſent of almoſt all the Church of God, which make it very fit to be entertain'd. There are ſome things which are piè credibilia, there is piety in the believing them: and in ſuch caſes it is not enough that there is nothing in Scripture to affirm it; if there be any thing in any other topick, it is to be entertain'd according to the merit of the thing.

51. 5. A negative argument from Scripture does not conclude in queſtions of fact: and therefore S. Hierome did not argue rightly, Quanquam excepto Apoſtolo non ſit manifeſtè relatum de aliis Apoſtolis quod Uxores habuerint, & cum de uno ſcriptum ſit ac de cæteris tacitum, intelligere debemus, ſine uxoribus eos fuiſſe, de quibus nihil tale Scriptura ſignificat; The Scripture names onely Peters wife, and does not ſay that any of the other Apoſtles were married, therefore we are to conclude that they were not. For beſides that the allegation is not true, and S. Paul intimates that the other Apoſtles as well as Peter did lead about a Siſter, a Wife; and that from thence the Fathers did believe them all to have been married except S. John, and ſome alſo except S. Paul; yet the argument is not good: for it may as well be concluded that S. Peter never had a child, or that Chriſt did never write but once when he wrote upon the ground, becauſe the Scripture makes no mention of either.

Lib. 1. contra Jovin.

52. 6. When a negative argument may be had from Scripture for both the parts of the contradiction, nothing at all can be concluded thence, but it muſt be wholly argued from other topicks. The Scripture neither ſays that Chriſt did ever laugh, nor it does not ſay that he did never laugh; therefore either of the contradicting parts may be equally inferr'd, that is truly neither. And indeed this is of it ſelf a demonſtration that in matters of fact and matters not neceſſary a negative argument from Scripture is of no uſe at all.

53. 7. But when the queſtion is of lawful or unlawful, then it is valid. If it be not in Scripture forbidden directly or by conſequent then it is lawful; it is not by God forbidden at all. And on the other ſide, if it be not there commanded it is not neceſſary. Lucentius thus argued in the Council of Chalcedon, Dioſcorus Synodum anſus eſt facere ſine authoritate ſedis Apoſtolicæ, quod nunquam licuit, nunquam factum eſt. That it was never done, proves not but it may be done; but if it was never lawful to be done, then it was forbidden; for whatſoever is not forbidden is not unlawful: but if it was not in Scripture forbidden, then aliquando licuit, it once was lawful, and therefore is always ſo, if we ſpeak of the Divine Law; and if Lucentius ſpeaks of that, he ought to have conſidered it in the inſtance: but I ſuppoſe he means it of cuſtome, or the Eccleſiaſtical Law; and therefore I meddle not with the thing, onely I obſerve the method of his arguing.

54. 8. An argument from the diſcourſe of one ſingle perſon omitting to affirm or deny a thing relating to that of which he did diſcourſe, is no competent argument to prove that the thing it ſelf omitted was not true: and therefore Ruffinus had but a weak argument againſt the traduction of the ſoul when he

he argued thus, Si anima quoque esset ex anima secundam illorum vanas opiniones, nunquam profecto hoc Adam præterisset. Nam sicut os ex ossibus meis, & caro de carne mea dicebat, sic etiam anima ex anima mea dicere potuisset. Sed tantum hoc dixit quod sibi videlicet sciebat ablatum. Adam. seeing his wife, said, this is bone of my bone and flesh of my flesh, for he knew what was taken from him; but he could have said, soul of my soul, if the soul had been deriv'd from him. This I say is no good argument, unless every one must be supposed when he says any thing to say all that is true, and all that he knows: so that Ruffinus in this particular defended a good cause with a broken sword.

55. 9. But if that which is omitted in the discourse be pertinent and material to the inquiry, then it is a very good probability that that is not true that is not affirmed. When the Jews asked our Blessed Saviour, Why doe the disciples of John and of the Pharisees fast often, but thy disciples fast not? he gave an answer that related to the present state of things and circumstances at that time, and said nothing of their not fasting in the time of the Gospel: from which silence we may well conclude that there is nothing in the Religion disobliging Christs disciples from fasting; if it had, it is very likely it would have been then expressed when there was so apt an occasion, and the answer had been imperfect without it. S. Hieromes was also very good, but not so certain as the other, against the tale of Leo baptized after his death, and the periods of Paul and Tecla; Igitur periodos Pauli & Teclæ & totam baptizati Leonis fabulam inter apocryphas Scripturas computamus. Quale enim est ut individuus comes Apostoli inter cæteras ejus res hoc solùm ignoraverit? It is not likely that S. Luke, who continually attended on S. Paul, observed all his actions, remark'd his miracles, describ'd his story, should omit things so strange, so considerable, if they had been true.

Lib. de Script. Eccles. in Luca

56. The reason of these things is, Every thing is to be suspected false that does not derive from that fountain whence men justly expect it, and from whence it ought to flow. If you speak of any thing that relates to God, you must look for it there where God hath manifested himself; that is, in the Scriptures. If you speak of any humane act or ordinance, or story and matter of fact, you must look for it in its own spring and original, or goe the neareſt to it you can. And thus the Bishops at the conference had with the Acephali, Hereticks who had Churches without Bishops, refused their allegations of the authority of Dionysius the Areopagite, upon this account, Illa testimonia quæ vos Dionysii Areopagitæ dicitis, unde potestis ostendere vera esse sicut suspicamini? Si enim ejus essent, non potuissent latere Beatum Cyrillum. Quid autem de B. Cyrillo dico, quando & B. Athanasius, si pro certo sciisset ejus fuisse, ante omnia in Niceno Concilio de Consubstantiali Trinitate eadem testimonia protulisset adversus Arii diversæ substantiæ blasphemias? Si autem nullus ex Antiquis recordatus est ea, unde nunc potestis ostendere quia illius sunt, nescio. If neither S. Cyril, nor S. Athanasius, who were so diligent to inquire, so skilful in knowing, so concern'd that these Books should be the works of S. Dionys, did yet know nothing of them, and if amongst the Ancients they were not known, for you Moderns now to tell of Antiquity, what by them who then liv'd was not told, is a folly that can never gain credit amongst reasonable persons. Let every fruit proceed from its own root. We cannot say, because a thing is not in Scripture,

C. Pli. An. Dom. 532.

therefore it is not at all; but therefore it is nothing of Divine Religion. So it is alſo in things relating to the Ancient Church; from thence onely can we derive any notice of their doctrine and of their practices. For if an article prevail'd in S. Auſtins time, it was no argument that therefore it was believ'd in S. Cyprians time: but a negative argument from any Age ought to prevail in reference to that Age; and if there be in it nothing of Antiquity, no argument of the Moderns can prove it to be Ancient: and Baronius ſaid well, Quod à recentiori Authore de rebus antiquis ſine alicujus vetuſtioris authoritate profertur, contemnitur, What the Moderns ſay of the Ancients without warranty from themſelves is to be deſpiſed. One thing one-Commonit. cap. 1. ly I am to adde to this out of Vincentius Lirinenſis, Quicquid vero ab Antiquo deinceps Uno præter omnes, vel contra omnes Sanctos novum & inauditum ſubinduci ſenſerit, id non ad religionem ſed ad tentationem potius intelligat pertinere, If one of the Fathers ſay a thing, and the others ſay it not, but ſpeak diverſly or contrarily, that pertains not to Religion, but to temptation. I doubt not but he intended it againſt S. Auſtin, who ſpake things in the matter of Predeſtination, and the damnation of infants, and other appendant queſtions againſt the ſenſe of all the Fathers that were before him; one (it may be) or ſcarce one being excepted. And to the Lib. 4 cap. 2. contr. Marcion. ſame purpoſe Tertullian argued againſt Marcion concerning a pretended Goſpel of S. Paul, Etſi ſub ipſius Pauli nomine Evangelium Marcion intuliſſet, non ſufficeret ad fidem ſingularitas inſtrumenti deſtituta patrocinio Anteceſſorum. If you cannot bring teſtimony from the Fathers and Ancient Records, you muſt not receive it; one alone is not to be truſted. He that affirms muſt prove; to him that denies, a negative argument is ſufficient. For to a mans belief a poſitive cauſe is required, but for his not believing, it is ſufficient that he hath no cauſe. Thus S. Hierome
Dial. adv. Luciferianos. argues well againſt the rebaptizing of converted Hereticks, Ad eos venio hæreticos qui Evangelia laniaverunt .... quorum plurimi vivente adhuc Johanne Apoſtolo eruperunt, & tamen nullum eorum legimus rebaptizatum. Of all the Hereticks which appeared in S. Johns time, we never read of any that was rebaptiz'd: and therefore it is to be preſumed they were not; for a thing ſo conſiderable and ſo notorious, in all reaſon would have given ſome ſigns, and left ſome indications of it. But then it is to be obſerved,

57. 10. A negative argument muſt not be μέσον μερικὸν a partial or a broken piece of a medium. You cannot argue rightly thus, S. John in his Goſpel ſpeaks nothing of the Sacrament of the Lords Supper, therefore that Sacrament is no part of the doctrine of ſalvation. For three Evangeliſts had done it before him, and therefore he did not; and a negative argument onely from one Goſpel cannot conclude rightly concerning any article of the Religion. And this is very evident in matters of fact alſo. For if it be argued thus, We doe not finde in Scripture nor in the days of the Apoſtles any infant baptized; therefore we conclude there was none. This is μέσον μερικὸν. It is true, if there were no way elſe to finde it but the practice of the Apoſtles, the negative argument had been very good; but we derive it from the force of Chriſts words of inſtitution, and of his diſcourſe with Nicodemus, and the analogy of Circumciſion, and the practice of the Jews in baptizing their children, and many proprieties of Scripture, and the effect of the Sacrament, and the neceſſities of regeneration. S. Irenæus his negative argument was good; Quod neque Prophetæ
Lib. 1. c. 1. prædicaverunt, neque Dominus docuit, neque Apoſtoli tradiderunt, &c. If neither neither Moses nor the Prophets, Christ nor his Apostles have taught it, it is not to be received as any part of Christian doctrine. For this negative is integral & perfect. But S. Cyril of Alexandria disputed also well with his negative argument from Antiquity, Etenim nomen hoc Θεοτόκος nullus unquam Ecclesiasticorum Doctorum repudiavit: qui autem illo subinde usi sunt, & multi reperiuntur, & maximè celebres. Many famous Doctors used this word, calling the Virgin Mary the Parent of God; and none ever refused it; therefore it may safely be used. If the negative argument from Scripture or Antiquity respectively can run thus, It was not condemn'd in Scripture or Antiquity, but it was used, therefore it is good; the argument concludes rightly in relation to Scripture, and probably in relation to Antiquity. But if it be said onely, the Scripture condemnes it not, but neither does it approve it, then it cannot be concluded to be laudable, but onely not criminal. But if it be said of Antiquity, it was neither condemn'd nor us'd, it cannot be inferr'd from thence that it is either laudable or innocent. The reason is, because Scripture is the measure of lawful and unlawful, but the writings of the Doctors are not; and these may be deficient, though that be full.

Prima parte Concil. Ephes. cap. 25

58. 11. In the mysteries of Religion, and in things concerning God, a negative argument from Scripture ought to prevail both upon our faith and upon our inquiries, upon our belief and upon our modesty. For as S. Austin said well, De Deo etiam vera loqui periculosissimum, It is hard to talk many things of God: we had need have good warranty for what we say; and therefore it is very fit we speak Scripture in the discourses of God. And thus S. Austin argued, Ideo nusquam scriptum est quod Deus Pater major sit Spiritu Sancto, vel Spiritus Sanctus sit minor Deo Patre: quia non sic assumpta est Creatura, in qua appareret Spiritus Sanctus, sicut assumptus est Filius hominis. Since it is no where written that the Father is greater then the Spirit, we ought not to say he is. But if it be objected that neither does the Scripture say, that he is not greater, it does not say that they are equal; and therefore it will be hard to use a negative argument in such cases; and how shall we know which part of the negative to follow? I answer, it is very true according to the sixth proposition num. 52. but then in this case we must inquire for other words of Scripture by which we may be directed, and proceed accordingly, or inquire into the analogy of faith, or the measures of piety: but if there be nothing to determine to any side of the negative, we must say nothing; and if there be, yet we must say but little, because the notice is not great.

Lib. 2. de Trinit. cap. 6.

59. 12. Lastly, In matters of envy and burden, a Negative argument even in matter of fact ought to prevail, unless the contrary be proved by some other competent Topick. That the Clergy ought not to marry is no where affirmed in Scripture, and therefore it is permitted; and because it is agreeable to Nature, and the Lawes of all republicks, their marriage is also holy and pleasing to God. A burden must be directly imposed; a man must not be frighted or scar'd into it. When our Blessed Saviour reproved the Pharisees for imposing heavy burdens, such which God impos'd not, he taught us the value of this argument; ubi scriptum est? shew us where it is written that this is displeasing to God: if it be no where forbidden, præsumitur pro libertate; all men are as free as they were born. How this can be altered by the lawes of man will be afterwards consider'd. In the mean time God hath left us under no more reſtraints then are deſcrib'd in Scripture. This argument S. Chryſoſtome urges againſt the neceſſitie of corporal afflictions to a contrite weeping penitent. Lacrymas Petri lego, Satisfactionem non lego. I read that S. Peter wept, I doe not read that he impos'd penances on himſelf. The argument were good from this place, if the caſe be not ſpecial, or if it be not altered by ſome other conſideration. This is alſo to be extended to ſuch negative arguments as are taken from matter of fact in accuſations, and criminal proceedings: not that it can of it ſelf be great enough to prevail, but that the caſe is ſo favourable, that every little thing ought to be ſtrong enough. Thus S. Athanaſius detended his Deceſſor Dionyſius: Et prius eorum Authorem Dionyſium per hoc voluit eſſe purgatum, atque ab Arianorum crimine alienum, quod ipſe non ſicut Arius cum viveret de impietate fuerat accuſatus, aut de Epiſcopatu dejectus, neque velut hæreſim defendens de Eccleſia, ſicut ille, deceſſerit, ſed in ejus permanſerit unitate. Dionyſius was not accuſed while he was alive, he was not thrown from his Biſhoprick, he did not depart from the Church, but remain'd in her Communion; and therefore he was no Arian. But arguments of this nature, when the medium is ſo limited, and the inſtance ſo particular, have their force onely by accident. For this and the like Negatives are good arguments when they are the beſt light in the queſtion, that is, when nothing greater can be ſaid againſt them, or when men are eaſy and willing to be perſwaded; as in the queſtions of burden and trouble all men ought.

Apud Facundum lib. 10. cap. 5

III. Queſtion.

60. Whether there may be any new articles of Faith: or that the Creed of the Church may ſo increaſe that what is ſufficient to ſalvation in one age, cannot ſerve in another.

61. If this Queſtion were to be determin'd by witneſſes, it were very eaſy to produce many worthy ones. Theodorus the Bp. of Rome in his Synodical Epiſtle to Paul the Patriarch of Conſtantinople thus concludes againſt the Monothelites, Sufficit nobis fides quam ſancti Apoſtoli prædicaverunt, Concilia firmaverunt, & Patres conſignaverunt, That faith which the Apoſtles preach'd, which the Councils have confirm'd, which the Fathers have conſign'd, that faith is ſufficient for us: Therefore nothing new can be ſuperinduc'd. After the Apoſtles had done preaching, the Faith was ful and intire. It was ſo long before they died; but after their death the inſtruments were ſeal'd and ratified, and there could be nothing put to them, but our obedience and conſent. And therefore Victor Bp. of Carthage in his Synodical Epiſtle to Theodorus gives caution againſt any thing that is new. Veſtrum eſt itaque, Frater Sanctiſſime, Canonica diſcretione ſolita contrariis Catholicæ fidei obviare, nec permittere noviter dici quod patrum venerabilium authoritas omnino non cenſuit. You muſt not permit any thing to be newly ſaid, which the authority of the venerable Fathers did not think fit. If therefore the Fathers did not ſay it was neceſſary to believe any other articles then what they put into their confeſſions of Faith; he that ſayes otherwiſe now is not to be ſuffer'd. Excellent therefore is the Counſel of S. Cyprian, "As it happens when the pipes of an aquæduct are "broken or cut off, the water cannot run, but mend them and reſtore the "water

" water to it's course, and the whole city shall be refreshed from the foun-
" tains head: Quod & nunc facere oportet Dei sacerdotes, præcepta Divina servantes, ut si in aliquo nutaverit & vacillaverit veritas, ad originem Dominicam & Evangelicam & Apostolicam traditionem revertamur, & inde surgat actus nostri ratio, unde & ordo & origo surrexit. So must Gods Priests doe, keeping the Divine Commandements: if the truth be weakned or faile in any thing, let a recourse be made to the Original, to the fountain of Christ and his Apostles, to what hath been delivered in the Gospel; that thither our faith may return from whence it did arise.

62. From the simplicity, truth and ingenuity of this discourse it will plainly follow, that what was the faith at first, the same it is now and no other, Sicut erat in principio &c. As it was in the beginning, so it is now, and so it shall be for ever. For to what purpose can it be advis'd that in all questions of faith or new springs of error we should returne to the fountains of our Saviour and the first emanations of the Apostles, but because no Divine truth is warrantable but what they taught, no necessity is to be pretended but what they impos'd? If it was their faith, it is and must be ours; but ours it ought not to be, if it was not theirs.

63. Now concerning this, there are very material considerations. 1. Whatsoever the Apostles taught we must equally believe, if we equally know it: but yet all that they taught is not equally necessary to be taught; but onely so much as upon the knowledge of which good life is superstructed and our hopes of heaven depend. Whatsoever is in the Scripture is alike true, but whatsoever is there is not alike necessary, nor alike useful, nor alike easy to be understood. But whatsoever by reading or hearing or any other instrument we come to learn to be the truth of God, that we must believe: because no man disbelieves any such thing, but he disownes God. But here the question is not what we must believe when we know it to be the word of God, for that is every thing; but how much we are bound to know, what must be taught to all Christians, how much their memory and their hearts must be charged withall. For the Faith of a Christian is not made up of every true proposition; but of those things which are the foundation of our obedience to God in Jesus Christ, and the endearment of our duty, and the stabiliment of our hope. Faith, Hope, and Charity, are the fundamentum, paries & tectum, the foundation, the walls and the roofe of our building: Now this foundation is that necessary belief, without which nothing could subsist in our Religion.

64. 2. This foundation was by Christ and his Apostles laid sure, but at first it was made but of a just latitude and eveness with the intended building. It was a little enlarged and paraphras'd by the Apostles and Apostolical men in their dayes; the Faith of Christians was the most easy and plain, the most simple and wise thing in the world: it was wholly an art of living well, and believing in God through Jesus Christ. And what Seneca said of the wisdome of the old men in infant Rome, is very true of the Aborigenes in Christianity, in the first spring of our Religion; Antiqua sapientia nihil aliud quam facienda & vitanda præcepit: & tum longè meliores erant viri: postquam docti prodierunt, desunt boni. The Ancient and primitive wisdome did onely command vertue, and prohibite vice; and then men liv'd good lives: but when they became more learned they became Senec. ep. 95.

leſs vertuous. Simplex erat ex ſimplici cauſa valetudo: multos morbos multa fercula fecerunt. The old world eat a ſimple and a natural diet, and they had a ſimple and a natural religion: but when variety of diſhes were ſet upon the table, variety of diſeaſes entred together with them. Now in what inſtance the ſimplicity of a Chriſtian was at firſt exerciſed we find in S. Irenæus. Melius itaque eſt nihil omnino ſcientem quempiam, ne quidem unam cauſam cujuſlibet eorum quæ facta ſunt, cur factum, & credere Deo, & perſeverare in ejus dilectione quæ hominem vivificat, nec aliud inquirere ad ſcientiam niſi Jeſum Chriſtum filium Dei qui pro nobis crucifixus eſt, quam per quæſtionum ſubtilitates & multiloquium in impietatem cadere. It is therefore better for a man to know abſolutely nothing of the cauſes of things why any thing was done, [and to believe in God, and to perſevere in his love that makes a man to live, and to inquire after no knowledg but to know Jeſus Chriſt the Son of God who was crucified for us] then by ſubtile queſtions and multitude of words to fall into impiety.

Lib. 2. cap. 47.

65. 3. If we obſerve the Creeds or Symbols of belief that are in the New Teſtament, we ſhall find them very ſhort. Lord, I believe that thou art the Son of God who was to come into the world. That was Martha's Creed. Thou art Chriſt the Son of the living God. That was Peters Creed. We know and believe that thou art Chriſt the Son of the living God. That was the Creed of all the Apoſtles. This is life eternal, that they know thee the onely true God, and whom thou haſt ſent, Jeſus Chriſt. That was the Creed which our Bleſſed Lord himſelf propounded. And again, I am the reſurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, yea though he were dead, yet ſhall he live, and he that liveth and believeth in me ſhall not die for ever. That was the Catechiſme that Chriſt made for Martha, and queſtion'd her upon the article, Believeſt thou this? And this belief was the end of the Goſpel, and in ſufficient perfect order to eternal life. For ſo S. John, Theſe things are written, that ye might believe that Jeſus is the Chriſt, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through his Name. For this is the word of Faith which we preach, namely, if you with the mouth confeſs Jeſus to be the Lord, and believe in your heart that God raiſed him from the dead, you ſhall be ſaved. That's the Chriſtians Creed. For I have reſolved to know nothing amongſt you, but Jeſus Chriſt and him crucified; that in us ye may learn not to be wiſe above that which is written, that ye may not be puffed up one for another, one againſt another. That was S. Paul's Creed, and that which he recommends to the Church of Rome, to prevent factions and Pride and Schiſme. The ſame courſe he takes with the Corinthian Church; I make known unto you the Goſpel which I preached unto you, which ye have received, in which ye ſtand, and by which ye are ſav'd, if ye hold what I deliver'd to you, &c. Well; what is that Goſpel by which they ſhould be ſav'd? It was but this, That Chriſt died for our ſins, that he was buried, that he roſe again the third day, &c. So that the ſumme is this, The Gentiles Creed or the Creed in the natural law is that which S. Paul ſets down in the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, Deum eſſe, & eſſe Remuneratorem, that God is, and that God is a rewarder. Adde to this the Chriſtian Creed, that Jeſus is the Lord, that he is the Chriſt of God, that he died for our ſins, that he roſe again from the dead; and there is no queſtion but he that believes this heartily, and confeſſes it conſtantly, and lives accordingly, ſhall be ſaved: we cannot be deceived; it is ſo plainly, ſo certainly affirm'd in Scripture, that there is no place left for hæſitation. For this is his præcept, that we believe in the

Name

Name of his Son Jesus Christ, and that we love one another. So S. John. This is his precept. True, and so there are many more: but why is this so signally remark'd, but because this is the fundamental precept, that upon which all the rest are superstructed? that is the foundation of faith and manners, & he that keeps this Commandement shall never perish. For other foundation can no man lay then this which is laid, which is Jesus Christ. But if any man shall build upon this foundation, gold, silver, pretious stones, wood, hay, stubble, Every mans work shall be made manifest; for that day shall declare it, because it is revealed in fire; and every ones work the fire shall prove what it is. If any mans work which he hath superstructed shall remain, he shall receive a reward. But if any mans work shall be burned, he shall receive loss, yet himself shall be sav'd, but so as by fire. Nothing more plain, then that the believing in Jesus Christ is that fundamental article upon which every other proposition is but a superstructure, but it self alone with a good life is sufficient to Salvation. All other things are advantage or disadvantage according as they happen; but Salvation depends not upon them. For every Spirit which confesseth Jesus Christ to have come in the flesh is of God, and whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God abideth in him, and he in God: and, Every one that believeth that Jesus is Christ is born of God: and, who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?

1 Cor. 3 11, 12, 13, 14, 15. 1 Joh. 4. 2. 1 Joh. 5. 1.

66. In proportion to this measure of faith, the Apostles preach'd the doctrine of faith. S. Peters first Sermon was, that Jesus is Christ, that he was crucified, and rose again from the dead: and they that believed this were presently baptized. His second Sermon was the same; and then also he baptized Proselytes into that confession. And when the Eunuch had confessed that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, Philip presently baptized him. And it is observable, that when the Eunuch had desir'd baptisme, S. Philip told him, He might if he did believe: and was, when he made that confession; intimating that this is the Christian Faith, which is the foundation of all his hope, and the condition of his baptisme, and therefore sufficient for his Salvation. For indeed that was the summe of all that Philip preached; for it is said of him, that he preached things concerning the Kingdome of God, and the name of Jesus Christ. And this was the summe of all that S. Paul preached in the Synagogues and assemblies of the people, this he disputed for, this he prov'd laboriously; that Jesus is Christ, that he is the Son of God, that he did, that he ought to suffer, and rise again the third day: and this was all that new doctrine for which the Athenians and other Greeks wondred at him, and he seem'd to them to be a setter forth of strange gods, because he preached Jesus and the resurrection. This was it into which the Jaylor and all his house were baptized; this is it which was propounded to him as the onely and sufficient means of Salvation; Believe in the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt be saved and all thine house. This thing was illustrated sometimes with other glorious things still promoting the faith and honour of Jesus, as that he ascended into heaven and shall be the Judge of all the world. But this was the whole faith; τὰ περὶ τῆς βασιλείας τοῦ θεοῦ, καὶ περὶ ὀνόματος τοῦ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, the things which concerned the Kingdome of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, was the large circumference of the Christian faith. That is, such articles which represent God to be our Lord, and Jesus Christ to be his Son, the Saviour of the world, that he died for us, and rose again and was glorified and reigns over all the world, and ſhall be our Judge, and in the reſurrection ſhall give us according to our works; that in his name onely we ſhall be ſaved, that is, by faith and obedience in him, by the mercies of God revealed to the world in Jeſus Chriſt: this is all which the Scripture calls neceſſary: this is that faith alone into which all the Church was baptized: which faith, when it was made alive by charity, was and is the faith by which the Juſt ſhall live.

67. This excellent ſummary of Faith we find alſo but with a very little Paraphraſe propounded as ſufficient by S. Polycarp in that excellent Epiſtle of his to the Philippians, which S. Irenæus ſo much commends, Fidei veſtræ firmitas à principio uſque nunc permanet, & ſanctificatur in Domino Jeſu Chriſto, This is the firmneſs of your faith from the beginning, which remains unto this day, and is ſanctified in Jeſus Chriſt. This S. Ignatius calls ple-

When he hath recited this, he addes, Hæc qui planè cognorit & crediderit, beatus eſt, He that plainly knowes theſe things and believes them, is bleſſed. And in another

68. The ſame Creed in more words but no more articles is recited by S. Irenæus in his ſecond and third chapters of his firſt book, ſaying that *the Church throughout all the world being planted by the Apoſtles to the ends of the Earth, and by their Diſciples, hath received this faith. He of all the Prelates that is moſt powerful in ſpeech cannot ſay any thing elſe: for no man is above his Maſter, and he that is weak in ſpeaking cannot ſay leſs. Here

69. Here were almost two Ages spent by this time, in which the most pestilent Heresies that ever did trouble the Church did arise, in which some of the Questions were talk'd of and disputed, and which afterwards by the zeal of some that overvalued their own forms of speaking pass'd into a faction; and yet in all this time, and during all that necessity, there was no more added to the Christian Creed, no more articles for the condemnation of any new heresy: whatsoever was against this was against the faith; but any thing else they reprov'd if it were false, but did not put any more into their Creed. And indeed they ought not. Regula quidem fidei una omnino est, sola immobilis & irreformabilis, Credendi scil. in Unum Deum, &c. saith Tertullian; The Rule of faith is altogether One, and immovable and unalterable. This law of faith remaining, other things may be inlarged according as the grace of God multiplies upon us. But for the faith it self here consign'd and summ'd up, the Epistle of Celestine to Nestorius is very affirmative and clear, ἡ πίστις ἡ παραδοθεῖσα παρὰ τῶν Ἀποστόλων, ἔστι προσθήκῃ, ἔστι μειώσιν ἀπαιτεῖ, The faith or Creed delivered by the Apostles requires neither addition nor defalcation. Neque enim ulla extitit hæresis quæ non hoc Symbolo damnari potuit, There was never any heresie but this Creed was sufficient for its condemnation, said the Catechism of the Archbishop of Triers. De veland. Virgin. cap. 1

70. This faith passing into all the world was preserved with great sacredness and great simplicity, no Church varying from it at all: some indeed put some great things into it which were appendages to the former; but the fullest and the most perfect were the Creeds of Jerusalem and Rome, that is, the same which the Greek and Latine Church use at this day. The first and the most simple forms were sufficient; but these fuller forms being compiled by the Apostles themselves or Apostolical men, and that from the words of Scripture, made no great alteration: the first were not too little, and these were not too much. The first was the thing it self, which was of a declar'd sufficiency; but when the Apostles were to frame an instrument of Confession, τύπον διδαχῆς a form of doctrine by way of art and method, they put in all that they directed by the Holy Spirit of God knew to contain the whole faith of a Christian. Now of this form so described, so delivered, so received, the Fathers of the Church affirm that it is intire and sufficient, and nothing is to be added to it. Ergo & cunctis credentibus quæ continentur in præfato symbolo salus animarum & vita perpetua bonis actibus præparatur, said the Author of the Epistle to S. James attributed to S. Clement, To all that believe those things contained in the foresaid Symbol or Creed, and doe good deeds, salvation of their souls and eternal life is prepared.

71. And therefore this summary of faith was called, τύπος διδαχῆς, ὁ κανών, ὑποτύπωσις ὑγιαινόντων λόγων, ἀναλογία πίστεως, γαλακτοδὴς εἰσαγωγή, παράδοσις, στοιχεῖα τ ἀρχῆς τῶν λογίων τοῦ Θεοῦ, παράδοθεῖσα πίστις, Regula fidei, depositum, breve Evangelium, The form or exemplar of doctrine, the Canon, a description of sound words, the proportion or measure of Faith, the milky way, or the Introduction of Novices, the Elements of the beginning of the Oracles of God, the Repository of faith, the faith that was delivered to the Saints, the Rule of Faith, that which was intrusted to the Church, A short Gospel. These and divers other appellatives of the Creed were used by the ancient Doctors, most of them taken out of Scripture. For what the Scriptures did affirm of the whole Faith, that the Fathers did apply to this Creed,

Creed, as believing it to contain all that was neceſſary. And as a grain of Muſtard-ſeed in little contains in it many branches, ſo alſo this faith in a few words involves all the knowledge [the neceſſary knowledge] of the Old and New Teſtament, ſaith S. Cyril; and therefore he calls this Creed, Traditionem Sanctæ & Apoſtolicæ fidei, The Tradition of the Holy and Apoſtolick Faith. Cordis ſignaculum, & noſtræ militiæ Sacramentum, ſo S. Ambroſe calls it, The ſeal of our heart, and the Sacrament of our Warfare. S. Hierome yet more fully, The Symbol of our faith and of our hope, which being delivered by the Apoſtles is not written with paper and ink, but in the fleſhy tables of our hearts, after the confeſſion of the Trinity and Unity of the Church. Omne Chriſtiani dogmatis Sacramentum carnis reſurrectione concluditur; The whole Sacrament of the Chriſtian doctrine is concluded with the reſurrection of the fleſh to eternal life. Norma futuræ prædicationis; ſo Ruffinus calls it; the rule of future preachings appointed by the Apoſtles; & hanc credentibus eſſe regulam dandam ſtatuunt, they appoint this to be given as a Rule to all believers: and again, This Creed was the token by which he ſhould be known who did preach Chriſt truly according to the Rules of the Apoſtles; the indication of their Faith and Unanimity. Comprehenſio fidei noſtræ atque perfectio, ſo S. Auſtin calls it. Virtus eſt Sacramenti, illuminatio animæ, plenitudo credentium, The illumination of the ſoul, the fulneſs of believers, the comprehenſion and the perfection of our faith. By this the knot of infidelity is untied, by this the gate of life is opened, by this the glory of our confeſſion is manifeſted. It is teſſera & ſignaculum quo inter Fideles perfidóſque ſecernitur, ſaid *Maximus Taurinenſis. 72. Now to what purpoſe is all this? The Apoſtles compil'd this form of words, all Churches received them, all Catechumens were baptized into this faith, in the Roman Church they recited it publickly before their immerſion, to this ſalvation was promiſed; this was the Sacrament of the Chriſtian faith, the fulneſs of believers, the characteriſtick of Chriſtians, the ſign of the Orthodox, the ſword of all hereſies and their ſufficient reproof, the unity of belief, ſufficient, full, immovable, unalterable; and it is that and that alone in which all the Churches of the world doe at this day agree. It

73. It is true, that the Church of God did explicate two of the articles of this Creed, that of the second, and that of the third Person of the Holy Trinity; the one at Nice, the other at Constantinople; one against Arius, the other against Macedonius; they did explicate, I say, but they added no new matter but what they suppos'd contain'd in the Apostolical Creed. And indeed the thing was very well done, if it had not been made an ill example; they had reason for what they did, and were so near the Ages Apostolical that the explication was more likely to be agreeable to the Sermons Apostolical: But afterwards the case was alter'd, and that example was made use of to explicate the same Creed, till by explicating the old they have inserted new Articles.

74. But all the while, it is consented to on all hands, that this onely faith is sufficient. What can certainly follow from these infallible Articles is as certainly true as the Articles themselves, but yet not so to be impos'd, because it is not certain that this or this explication is right, that this consequent is well deduc'd; or if it be certain to you, it is not so to me; and besides it is more an instrument of schism then of peace, it can divide more then it can instruct, and it is plainly a recession from the simplicity of the Christian faith, by which simplicity both the learned and the ignorant are the more safe. Turbam non intelligendi vivacitas, sed credendi simplicitas tutissimam facit: and when once we come to have the pure streams pass through the limbecks of humane wit, where interest, and fancy, and error, and ignorance, and passion are intermingled, nothing can be so certain, though some things may be as true; and therefore here the Church does rest, here she finds peace; her faith is simple, easy and intelligible, free from temptation, and free from intrigues; it is warranted by Scripture, compos'd and delivered by the Apostles, entertain'd by all the world: In these they doe agree, but in nothing else, but this and in their fountain, the plain words of Scripture.

Augustin. contra epist. Fundam. c. 4.

75. For all the rest, it is abundant to all excellent purposes. It can instruct the wise, and furnish the Guides of Souls with treasures of knowledge, and imploy the tongues and pens of the learned; it can cause us to wonder at the immensity of the Divine wisdome, and the abyss of revelation: it is an excellent opportunity for the exercise of mutual charity in instructing and in forbearing one another, and of humility and patience and prayer to God to help our infirmities, and to enlighten us more and more in the knowledge of God. It is the great field of faith where she can enlarge her self; but this is the house of faith where she dwels for ever in this world.

76. So that for any other thing of the Religion it is to be believed so farre as it does appear to be the word of God; and by accidents and circumstances becomes of the family or retinue of faith: but it is not necessary to be believed for it self, unless it be for something else it is not necessary at all. A man may be saved without knowing any thing else, without hearing of any thing, without inquiring after any thing, without believing any thing else, provided that in this faith he live a good life. But because sometimes a man is by the interests of a good life requir'd to know more, to inquire after more, and to learn more, therefore upon the stock of obedience more may be necessary; but not upon the account of faith.
